One thing which commends this recording of Pergolesi's Stabat mater above others seems to lie in the imaginative and stylistically assured direction of Rinaldo Alessandrini. He lays emphasis on the relationship between words and music, and he has come up with some ideas which probe deeper than many, in his aim to bring the piece to life with expressive fervour. And it was an inspired move to pair the work with another, earlier Stabat mater by Alessandro Scarlatti. Both settings were commissioned by the same Neapolitan brotherhood, Pergolesi's to replace the other which the brethren reckoned a little old-fashioned. It isn't really, for though it does not breathe the theatrical atmosphere of Pergolesi's iridescent music, it is far from being archaic and overall, perhaps, makes a stronger appeal to the contemplative spirit. Both settings are similarly scored for soprano and alto soloists with strings and continuo. Gemma Bertagnolli's secure technique – which allows her to indulge in virtuosic vocal athletics – and her clear, forceful delivery, are immediately appealing. It is Sara Mingardo, though, who makes the stronger impression with her slightly more disciplined approach and her fervent declamation. Both singers make much of the vivid word-painting – present in each of the settings – but wholeheartedly revelling in the melodic allure of the Pergolesi.

La serva padrona

Livietta e Tracollo^{a}. La serva padrona^{b} 🅿
^{a}Nancy Argenta sop Livietta; ^{a}Werner van Mechelen bass Tracollo; ^{b}Patricia Biccire sop Serpina; ^{b}Donato di Stefano bass Uberto
La Petite Bande / Sigiswald Kuijken vn
Accent ACC96123D (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and texts included. Recorded live in 1996

La serva padrona is given here with a rare but comparable companion-piece. Livietta e Tracollo is also for two characters, light soprano and buffo bass, with two sections, originally to be played in the intervals of the evening's opera seria. Rather more complicated and improbable than La serva padrona, it tells of a girl disguised as a French peasant (male) seeking vengeance on a robber who in turn appears disguised as a pregnant Pole. She succeeds in the first half, while in the second the man, now disguised as an astrologer, has more luck and they agree to get married. Musically it is not so very inferior to the Serva. Both have more wit in the music than in the libretto, with deft parodies of opera seria and a popular appeal in the repeated phrases of their arias.

The performance is a lively one with Nancy Argenta a resourceful and not too pertly soubrettish Livietta. Kuijken's Petite Bande plays with a distinctively 'period' tone; the speeds are sprightly and the rhythms light-footed. In both works, the women are better than the men, who lack the comic touch. Patricia Biccire sings attractively, especially in her 'sincere' aria, 'A Serpina penserate', and she paces her recitatives artfully. A lower Baroque pitch is used and the final number is the short duet, 'Per te io ho nel core', as in the original score.

Pérotin

French c1155/60-c1225

GROVE Pérotin was the most celebrated musician involved in the revision and re-notation of the Magnus liber (attributed to Léonin). Two decrees by the Bishop of Paris concerning the 'feast of the fools' and the performance of quadruple organum, from 1198 and 1199, have been associated with Pérotin since the theorist known as Anonymous IV stated that he composed four-voice settings of both the relevant texts. Attempts to identify him at Notre Dame have proved inconclusive. He may have been born c1155-60, revised the Magnus liber 1180-90 subsequently composed his three- and four-voice works and died in the first years of the 13th century; or he wrote the four-voice works early in his career, revised the Magnus liber in the first decade of the 13th century and died c1225. As regards his Magnus liber revisions, Anonymous IV refers to his abbreviations and improvement of the work by substituting succinct passages in discant style for the more florid organum; this would seem to be confirmed by one source of the Magnus liber, although the substitute sections are not attributed there to a specific composer. The creation of three- and four-voice organum c1200 is an important step in the development of polyphony which until then had been conceived in terms of two voices, and Pérotin's compositions show great awareness of the implications for structure and tonality. The confusion over dating derives from unresolved problems of notation.

Viderunt omnes / Sederunt principes

Pérotin Viderunt omnes. Alleluia, Posui Adiutorium. Dum sigillum summi Patris. Alleluia, Nativitas. Beata viscera. Sederunt principes Anonymous Veni creator spiritus. O Maria virginei. Isias cecinit

Hilliard Ensemble (David James counterten John Potter, Rogers Covey-Crump, Mark Padmore, Charles Daniels tens Gordon Jones bar) / Paul Hillier bar
ECM New Series 837 751-2 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included ●

This is a superb and original recording. It gives musical individuality to a group of works that have hitherto tended to sound much the same. Moreover, as a special attraction for those wanting to see artistic individuality in early composers, it includes all but one of the identifiable works of Pérotin. Inevitably his two grand four-voice organa take up much of the record. At nearly 12 minutes each they may have been the most ambitious polyphonic works composed up to the end of the 12th century. The Hilliard Ensemble adopts a suave and supple approach to both Viderunt and Sederunt, softening the pervasive rhythms that can make them a shade oppressive and showing a clear view of the entire architecture of each piece. They surge irrepressibly from one section to another, creating a musical momentum that belies the admirably slow speeds they generally adopt. They also beautifully underline the musical differences between the two works, producing a sound which seems a credible reflection of what one might have heard at Notre Dame in the late 12th century. What is particularly exciting is the way in which the musicians grasp at the individual dynamic of each work: the huge open spaces they create to project the text of the magical O Maria virginei; the breakneck virtuosity in their swirling performance of Dum sigillum, the gently modulated rhythms in the strophic Veni creator; the harder edge in their tone for Alleluia Nativitas; and so on. This is a recording of the highest distinction.

Allan Pettersson Swedish 1911-1980

Pettersson, a pupil of Olsson and Blomdahl GROVE at the Stockholm Conservatory (1930-39), played the viola in the Stockholm PO (1939-51), then went to Paris for further study with Honegger and Leibowitz. Back in Sweden he concentrated on composition, in particular on large-scale, single-movement symphonies in an impassioned diatonic style (there were eventually 15, c1950-78); he also wrote concertos, songs and chamber pieces.

Symphonies

Symphonies Nos 5 and 16
John-Edward Kelly sax Saarbrücken Radio Symphony Orchestra / Alun Francis
CPO CPO999 284-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1995

The orchestral playing is full of commitment, the account of the 40-minute Fifth (1960-62) sounding tremendously vivid; Francis has the edge over rival versions where it counts, in his overall view of this magnificent work. Yet the coupling – the last symphony the Swede completed – is better still. No 16 was written in 1979 for the American saxophonist Frederik Hemke. Here Kelly, who has made some minor modifications to the solo part for reasons explained in the booklet (the ailing composer appears to have been uncertain of the instrument's range), glides through the hair-raising virtuosity with breathtaking ease. This is the kind of advocacy Pettersson, who never heard the work, can only have dreamed of. An excellent disc.

Symphonies Nos 7 and 11
Norrköping Symphony Orchestra / Leif Segerstam
BIS CD580 (70 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1992 Ⓕ

Most of Pettersson's major works are constructed as large, unified movements (although he was an accomplished miniaturist) and Nos 7 and 11, respectively 46 and 24 minutes in length, are no exceptions. The former in some ways is unrepresentative of the composer; the obsessiveness of mood and hectoring tone are present, especially in the Angst-ridden first and third spans, but the range of expression is much wider than in most of his other works. Composed in 1967-68, it has a unique atmosphere, both haunting and haunted, which will stay with you for a long time. His melodic genius is confirmed in the long and heartfelt central threnody, as well as by the beautiful quiet coda, truly music to 'soften the crying of a child'; its delivery by the Norrköping players has just the right amount of detachment. Segerstam's tempos permit the work to breathe and resonate not unlike Mahler. The 11th Symphony (1974) is less combative in tone, although it has its moments, and is not on the same elevated plane as the Seventh. The recording quality is first-rate, allowing both the devastating power and delicate fine detail of these scores to emerge equally well.

Hans Pfitzner German 1869-1949

Pfitzner, a pupil of Knorr and Kwast at the GROVE Hoch Conservatory, Frankfurt, was a teacher in Berlin, Strasbourg and Munich until 1934, when he was relieved of his post. His earlier works, including the operas Der arme Heinrich (1895) and Die Rose vom Liebesgarten (1901), are Wagnerian, but in Palestrina (1917) he produced a remarkable piece of operatic spiritual autobiography, contrasting the pressures of the everyday world with the inner certainties of artistic genius. One of his certainties was of the supremacy of the German Romantic tradition – he was a powerful patriot – which he supported in polemical exchanges with Berg and implicitly in the cantatas (Von deutscher Seele, 1921; Das dunkle Reich, 1929) which were his main works after Palestrina. He also wrote three symphonies (1932, 1939, 1940), concertos for the piano (1922), the violin (1923) and two for the cello (1935, 1944), chamber music (including three string quartets) and c100 songs.

Overtures and Preludes

Pfitzner Palestrina – Preludes, Acts 1, 2 and 3. Das Herz – Liebesmelodie. Das Käthchen von Heilbronn, Op 17 – Overture R Strauss Guntram – Overture. Capriccio – Prelude. Feuersnot – Liebesszene
Orchestra of the Deutsche Oper, Berlin / Christian Thielemann
DG 449 571-2GH (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

Christian Thielemann shows a marked fondness for broad tempos: even more obviously he loves big gestures and sumptuously rich sound. You can hear both tendencies in Pfitzner's Käthchen von Heilbronn Overture. On the face of it this is a problematic piece: very long and with especially leisured transitions between its sections. After the big, bold, martial music of the opening you might expect a conductor to be a little nervous of the fact that Pfitzner allows a particularly lengthy transition to ensue before he even begins to prepare for his 'second subject', in fact the superbly Romantic melody that represents Käthchen herself. Quite admirably, Thielemann does not hurry nor does he overstate the Käthchen theme: full, impassioned eloquence is reserved for its grandiose return. Although he allows the overture's big moments ample space to expand, there is no sense of mere waiting between them: he shows great care and sensitivity in Pfitzner's quieter pages. He obviously loves this music, and that is still more obvious in the Palestrina preludes, where the luminously pure textures of the first Prelude receive no less scrupulous attention than the nobly baying brass in the second or the velvety denseness of string sonority in some pages of the last. Thielemann's Strauss is no less effective. A distinguished début marked by ravishing orchestral playing. The recording is richly ample.

Piano Trio

Violin Sonata in E minor, Op 27. Piano Trio in F, Op 8[a]
Benjamin Schmid vn [a]Clemens Hagen vc Claudius Tanski pf
Dabringhaus und Grimm MDG312 0934-2 Ⓕ
(70 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ●●

The Sonata is a fine piece from Pfitzner's maturity, while the much earlier Piano Trio is one of the most extraordinary works for the medium you're likely to have ever heard. To be sure, enterprising chamber players hunting for neglected repertory may well have come across early critical reactions to both these pieces, and references to (for example, in the case of the Trio) Pfitzner's 'sick imagination' and the work's 'monstrous length' might put anyone off. When he wrote it Pfitzner was in despair at his financial and other problems; he told a friend that after finishing it all he wanted was to die. It does at times suggest a man at the end of his tether, but also a composer chronicling such a state when at the height of his powers.

It is long, extremely tense, at times weirdly obsessive, even hysterical, but all this takes place within a cunningly plotted ground plan. After the strange and powerful contrasts of the first movement, with its wild coda, the noble but perilously assaulted main theme of the slow movement, the dance-like but fraught and nervous Scherzo, Pfitzner begins his finale with a choleric gesture which soon fades to pathos and pallor. After 10 minutes of desperate attempts to climb out of this pit, a positive coda seems possible, but when the music turns instead to utterly euphonious calm the listener is likely to be moved by what seems in context heroic as well as wonderfully beautiful.

The Sonata, from 1918, sounds like a demonstration – with various modernisms in the ascendancy all round – that Pfitzner's late Romantic style and prodigious craft still had abundant life in them. Its inexhaustible inventiveness and the beauty of its themes are accompanied by a considerable enjoyment of virtuosity: Pfitzner, you realise, is having a high old time. Both works are vastly welcome, in short, but that they should be so superbly played goes beyond all reasonable expectations.

Palestrina

Nicolai Gedda ten Palestrina; Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Borromeo; Gerd Nienstedt bass Master of Ceremonies; Karl Ridderbusch bass Christoph Madruscht, Pope Pius IV; Bernd Weikl bar Morone; Herbert Steinbach ten Novagerio; Helen Donath sop Ighino; Brigitte Fassbaender mez Silla; Renate Freyer contr Lukrezia; Victor von Halem bass Cardinal of Lorraine; John van Kesteren ten Abdisu; Peter Meven bass Anton Brus; Hermann Prey bar Count Luna; Friedrich Lenz ten Bishop of Budoja; Adalbert Kraus ten Theophilus; Franz Mazura bass Avosmediano
Tölz Boys' Choir; Bavarian Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Rafael Kubelík
DG 20th Century Classics ③ 427 417-2GC3 (206 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Ⓜ
Recorded 1970s ●

Kubelík's magnificent, sumptuously cast DG recording of Palestrina is an almost impossible act to follow, indeed it's hard to imagine such an extravagance of vocal riches being encountered in a German opera recording nowadays: Brigitte Fassbaender ardently impulsive in the brief role of Palestrina's pupil Silla, Helen Donath pure-voiced and touching as his son Ighino, and an absolute constellation of superb basses and baritones, often doubling quite small parts: Karl Ridderbusch, Bernd Weikl, Hermann Prey, Franz Mazura, with at their head Dietrich

Fischer-Dieskau as a surely unsurpassable Borromeo: dangerously powerful, intensely concerned and in magnificent voice. And those are just the 'secondary' roles! Pfitzner's text is one of the finest librettos ever written, and Gedda's singing gives the impression that the beauty of the words and their portrayal of Palestrina's dignity and suffering are more important to him than concern for his own voice. Kubelík's urgent conducting shows a visionary quality, and he clearly has a marvellous ear for the radiance of this wonderful score.

Astor Piazzolla Argentinian 1921-1992

A child prodigy on the bandoneón, Piazzolla emigrated with his family to New York in 1924. In 1954 he won a scholarship to study with Boulanger, who encouraged him in the composition of tangos. Piazzolla's unique version of the tango, which initially met with opposition, included dissonance, jazz elements and chromaticism. By the 1980s his work had finally become accepted in Argentina and had begun to be espoused by classical artists.

Tangos

'Tangazo'
Adiós Noninoc. Milonga del ángel[c].
Tres movimientos tanguísticos porteños. Oblivion[ac].
Double Concerto for Bandoneon and Guitar[bc].
Danza criolla. Tangazo
[a]Louise Pellerin ob [b]Eduardo Isaac gtr
[c]Daniel Binelli bandoneon Montreal Symphony Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca 468 528-2DH (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Piazzolla's objective was to establish the tango as a viable art form in its own right and to fuse it with jazz and more formal musical genres. In essence the tango is not the natural province of a large orchestra, but Piazzolla came to accept and embrace it in that form as a natural extension of his 'crusade'.

Many of Piazzolla's works bear specific reference to Buenos Aires, such as the Movimientos tanguísticos poerteños. But the most movingly memorable are arguably those which were emotionally personal to him: Adiós Nonino was his immediate reaction to the death of his father – 'Perhaps I was surrounded by angels,' he said of it. The eponymous Angel of the milonga signifies inspiration, the natural gift of artists. Only the bandoneon and guitar soloists have any direct connection with this music but one could not hope for more sympathetic and finely recorded performances than these. Piazzolla's musical 'voice' remains one of the most captivating in all South American art music and it is well served in this magnificent recording.

Piazzolla Libertango (arr Calandrelli). Tango Suite (arr S Assad) – Andante; Allegro. Le Grand Tango (arr Calandrelli). Sur – Regreso al amor. Fugata. Mumuki. Tres minutos con la realidad. Milonga del ángel. Histoire du Tango – Café 1930 (all arr Calandrelli)
Calandrelli Tango Remembrances
Yo-Yo Ma vc Antonio Agri vn Nestor Marconi, Astor Piazzolla bandoneón Horacio Malvicino, Odair Assad, Sérgio Assad, Oscar Castro-Neves gtrs
Edwin Barker, Héctor Console db
Kathryn Stott, Gerardo Gandini, Leonardo Marconi, Frank Corliss pfs
Sony Classical SK63122 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1987-97

Yo-Yo Ma is the latest international artist to surrender to the spell of the Argentinian dance: he can also be heard on the soundtrack of the film, The Tango Lesson. Here, surrounded by a brilliant group of experts in the genre, he presents with wholehearted commitment a well-varied programme of Piazzolla pieces. They range from the melancholy or sultry to the energetic or fiery. Among the latter, Fugata is ingenious, Mumuki richly eloquent, and Tres minutos con la realidad nervily edgy: in this last, Kathryn Stott understandably earned the admiration of her Argentinian colleagues. She also shines with Yo-Yo Ma in an exciting performance of Le Grand Tango: his playing in the Milonga del ángel is outstandingly beautiful. Special mention must also be made of some spectacular virtuosity by the Assad brothers in the Tango Suite. The characteristic bandoneón is featured with the cellist in Café 1930; and by technological trickery Yo-Yo Ma partners Piazzolla himself (recorded in 1987) in a confection called Tango Remembrances. Those who are already fans of this genre will be in no need of encouragement to procure this disc.

Aconcagua. Adiós Nonino (arr Morera)[a]. Oblivión (arr Morera). Tres tangos
Mika Väyrynen accordion [a]Esko Hilander vn
[a]Petteri Karttunen pf Kuopio Symphony Orchestra / Atso Almila
Finlandia 3984-29723-2 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

The accordion, when handled as virtuosically as by Mika Väyrynen and in music which fits it like a glove – as in Piazzolla's Tres tangos and Aconcagua Concerto – is an irresistible instrument. The Tres tangos are an excellent set, more suite than concerto, and more intimate in scale than Aconcagua which, in keeping with its subject (Argentina's highest peak), possesses a greater massiveness of sound. Both were written for the bandoneon, a variant of the accordion, but Väyrynen uses a Russian Jupiter instrument, the sound of which 'is much akin to that of the bandoneon', so why not use the latter? Well, power and depth mainly; and questions of authenticity are not so acute here as they are in, say, Bach or Scarlatti. The result is most satisfactory and, if nothing else, proves that for Piazzolla tango could be a means to an expressive end as much as a vehicle for enjoyment. And enjoyment is the watchword for the whole of this brilliantly played and recorded disc.

María de Buenos Aires

(arr Desyatnikov)
Julia Zenko, Jairo vocs Horacio Ferrer narr
Buenos Aires Coral Lírico; Kremerata Musica / Gidon Kremer vn
Teldec ② 3984-20632-2 (94 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1997-98

María de Buenos Aires is victim, lover, heroine and femme fatale, a powerful illusion given substance and pathos by the approachable surrealism of the opera's librettist, Horacio Ferrer. Piazzolla's music harbours a Weill-like sense of foreboding; minor-key heartache invades almost everywhere, even when the dancing starts, the air thickens and the drink starts to flow.

If you want to sample prior to purchasing, then try disc 1, track 4, 'I am María', potentially the set's hit number; or the gorgeous, rambling bandoneón solo that opens the track 8 but which soon gives way to a rhythmically ferocious but heavily sentimental 'Accusation Toccata'. María is a textile-worker whose spirit is conjured from an asphalt-covered grave for various fresh encounters – not least with a gaggle of psychoanalysts who, in real life (Argentina around 1960) helped cope with a national neurosis caused by severe economic problems. Piazzolla's madcap 'Aria of the Analysts' (disc 2, track 4) recalls Bernstein's 'Gee, Officer Krupky' from West Side Story, but elsewhere the musical style has that air of ineffable sadness, melancholy and 'tragedy bravely borne' that is so typical of Piazzolla's music in general.

Leonid Desyatnikov's arrangement takes heed of various recorded predecessors, but centres mainly on the graphically stark style of the Astor Quartet. This latest set is fresher in tone, texturally more inventive and tellingly astringent than any rival. Julia Zenko is a sensually alluring singer and Jairo recalls the passionate, jazz-inflected delivery of that great tango past-master, Carlos Gardel. And then there's Kremer himself, agile, personable, a template in sound for the tragic but elusive main protagonist, 'María tango, slum María, María night, María fatal, María of love'. Through him, you learn to love her.

Walter Piston

American 1894-1976

GROVE Piston trained as a draughtsman before studying composition at Harvard (1919-24) and with Dukas and Boulanger in Paris; he then returned to Harvard (1926-60), becoming a renowned theory teacher. His textbook Harmony (1941) has been widely used. His music is in a clear, tonal style suggesting the neo-classical Stravinsky, Fauré and Roussel: the main works include eight symphonies (1937-65), five string quartets (1933-62) and the ballet The Incredible Flutist (1938).

Violin Concertos

Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra
James Buswell vn National Symphony Orchestra of Ukraine / Theodore Kuchar Ⓢ
Naxos 8 559003 (61 minutes: DDD) ●

Piston's First Violin Concerto, written in 1939, has much in common with the Barber, including a similar abundance of individual melody. The heart of the work is in the moving, pensive central Andantino molto tranquillo. With just a hint of Gershwin in its bluesy opening, the movement is essentially searching and ruminative. This is a masterpiece, as will be confirmed when other violinists take it up.

The Second Concerto, written two decades later, is less obviously 'popular', its atmosphere more elusive. But its opening is similarly haunting and the more one hears it the more one is drawn by its depth of inner feeling. The extended, pensive Adagio introduces a serene and very beautiful theme, which later forms a canonic duet with the flute. The finale is another sparkling, jaunty rondo. The Fantasia is a late work, first performed in 1973. In five intricately related sections, its language more dissonant with almost feverish, bravura allegros framed by troubled, lonely adagio passages, dominated by the soloist, which have been described as 'painfully aware and transcendentally serene'. The closing section is profoundly gentle. It may seem remarkable that these works should make their CD début played by a Russian orchestra, but it plays the music with splendid commitment, much subtlety of expression and fine ensemble too. The sure idiomatic feeling is explained by the fact its conductor, Theodore Kuchar, moved to the Ukraine from Cleveland, Ohio. James Buswell is a superbly accomplished and spontaneous soloist, and the recording is first-class.

Fantasy

The Incredible Flutist – Suite. Fantasy for English Horn, Harp and Strings. Suite for Orchestra. Concerto for String Quartet, Wind Instruments and Percussion. Psalm and Prayer of David
Scott Goff fl Glen Danielson hn Theresa Elder Wunrow hp Juilliard Quartet (Robert Mann, Joel Smirnoff vns Samuel Rhodes va Joel Krosnick vc); Seattle Symphony Chorale and Orchestra / Gerard Schwarz
Delos DE3126 (68 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1991-92 Ⓕ

Gerard Schwarz's flutist fixes you with his limpid tone. However, it will always be known as the score with the Tango. Schwarz goes with the flow, the sway of the melody, but it can never linger long enough. The Fantasy enters darkened Elysian fields – Piston's lyricism sits well with this distinctive voice of sorrow and regret. We can trace their kinship right back to the composer's first published work – the orchestral Suite of 1929. At its heart is a long and intense pastorale: the cor anglais is there at the inception. Framing it, motoric syncopations carry us first to a kind of drive-by the blues with bar-room piano and Grappelli violin. The finale is essentially a fugal work-out: high-tech Hindemith. Piston's very last work, the Concerto, is 10 eventful minutes where the imperative is once again pitted against the contemplative. The mixing of timbres is masterly, a fleck of woodwind or a brush of tambourine or antique cymbal speaking volumes. But at the centre of gravity is the Juilliard Quartet, moving in mysterious ways. In fact, the last words uttered here are those of the Psalm and Prayer of David – a rare vocal setting for Piston, and as such, refreshingly open, unhackneyed, unhieratical. Performance and recording are superb.

Symphony No 4

Symphony No 4. Capriccio.
Three New England Sketches
Seattle Symphony Orchestra / Gerard Schwarz
Naxos American Classics 8 559162 Ⓢ
(52 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1990s ●

Those unfamiliar with Piston's work should investigate this Naxos disc that repackages performances originally issued on Delos. This one is arguably the best of the lot as it features the Fourth Symphony (1951) and the Three New England Sketches (1959), two of the composer's greatest and most attractive scores.

The Fourth's rollicking syncopations show that Piston had been listening closely to Copland's ballets. This is a symphony in the true sense, though, and its musical ideas are as lucidly argued, profoundly uttered and strongly structured as any in the classical repertoire. Perhaps the surface dissonance of 'Seaside', the first of the Sketches, might be off-putting to some, but how could anyone resist the exquisite colours Piston conjures up. 'Summer Evening', with its flitting, twittering evocation of insect activity, is as vivid as the best of Mendelssohn's scherzos, and the craggy majesty of 'Mountains' is truly awesome.

We also get the delightfully atmospheric Capriccio for Harp and Strings, and the quality of both the performances and recorded sound is as impressive as ever. At budget price, this disc should prove utterly irresistible.

Amilcare Ponchielli

Italian 1834-1886

After studying at the Milan Conservatory GROVE Ponchielli settled in the provinces as an organist and municipal band conductor, repeatedly attempting to establish himself as an opera composer. He finally won success in 1872 with the much-revised I promessi sposi, in 1874 with the Ricordi commission I lituani and above all in 1876 with La Gioconda. As professor of composition at the Milan Conservatory (from 1880) he taught Puccini and, briefly, Mascagni. He also composed much sacred music for S Maria Maggiore, Bergamo. Of his works, only La Gioconda, on a text drawn by Boito from Hugo, is in the modern repertory. An inspired stylisation of grand opera, it contains music that is alive, varied and sensitive, notably the tenor romanza 'Cielo e mar' and the famous 'Suicidio', and that foreshadows aspects of late Verdi and of verismo opera. Elsewhere Ponchielli's atmospheric colouring and symphonic treatment show remarkable imagination and workmanship, despite his lack of a strong personality.

La Gioconda

La Gioconda
Montserrat Caballé sop La Gioconda; Agnes Baltsa mez Laura; Luciano Pavarotti ten Enzo Grimaldo; Sherrill Milnes bass Barnaba; Nicolai Ghiaurov bass Alvise; Alfreda Hodgson contr La Cieca; John del Carlo bass Zuane; Regolo Romani ten Isepo; Neil Jenkins ten Pilot and Distant Voice; Rodney Macann bass Barnabatto; Stephen Varcoe bar Cantor; London Opera Chorus, Finchley Children's Music Group; National Philharmonic Orchestra / Bruno Bartoletti
Decca ③ 414 349-2DH3 (DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded early 1980s ●

This performance has much to commend it: Pavarotti's typically fervent account of Enzo's part, Milnes's splendidly characterised but unexaggerated Barnaba, Baltsa's vivid, lightish Laura, Ghiaurov's powerful Alvise. The only slight reservations concern Caballé's Gioconda. At times it's a little mannered, and slightly forced in the chest register.

The orchestra and chorus, though, respond willingly to Bartoletti's vital conducting. And all round Decca's cast has much to offer. Let's have no more nonsense about this being a second-rate work. It is brimful of melody, skilful scoring and has a novel and effective form, with at least four characters swept away by their passions. The CD transfer is immediate with lots of presence.

La Gioconda[a] H
Bellini Norma – Casta diva[d]; Mira, o Norma[b] Donizetti Lucrezia Borgia – Com'è bello!; M'odi, ah m'odi[d] Rossini Guglielmo Tell – Selva opaca[d] Verdi Ernani – Fa che a me venga[c]. La forza del destino[d] – Madre, pietosa Vergine; La Vergine degli angeli. I lombardi[d] – Te, Vergin santa; O madre dal cielo
Giannina Arangi-Lombardi sop La gioconda; [a]Alessandro Granda ten Enzo Grimaldi; [a]Gaetano Viviani bar Barnaba; [a]Camilla Rota mez La Cieca; [a]Corrado Zambelli bass Alvise Badoero; [ab]Ebe Stignani mez Laura Adorno; [a]Aristide Baracchi bar Zuàne; [a]Giuseppe Nessi ten Isèpo; [c]Enrico Molinari bar, [a]Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan; [bcd]Orchestra / Lorenzo Molajoli
Naxos Historical mono ③ 8 110112/4 Ⓢ
(169 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1926-33 ●

Outstanding among Italian operatic sets of the interwar years, this was also the first complete recording of Ponchielli's masterpiece. Inevitably the sound quality of 1931 is at some disadvantage; the carefully orchestrated score, large-scale ensembles and off-stage effects need more space and clarity to do them full justice. Yet, to compensate, the voices have the vivid immediacy of their period and the transfers are excellent.

The work of chorus and orchestra is certainly among the strengths of the performance. That in turn reflects on the conductor, Lorenzo Molajoli. The three male principals were also Scala singers, though not in this opera. Alessandro Granda, a Peruvian who made his Italian début in 1927, was also Columbia's Pinkerton and Cavaradossi; as Enzo in La Gioconda he is perhaps a little too slender and lacking in heroic potential, yet the tone is incisive and the characterisation convincing. The baritone Gaetano Viviani is most exciting, a Ruffo-imitator perhaps and a bit throaty, but rich, vibrant, grandly sinister and not unsubtle. These are not qualities shared by the Alvise, Corrado Zambelli, who sings with dull authority and unimpressive low notes: a pity they did not have Tancredi Pasero for the part. Mind, if they had, that would have meant the addition to the cast of one more singer with a fast vibrato (Camilla Rota's La Cieca being another), which might have proved all too much for listeners of more modern times. Stignani, whose young voice was ideal for the part of Laura, is free of it, and Arangi-Lombardi relatively so. But she, the heroine of the recording, is one of the main reasons for acquiring this set, which also includes a selection of her solo recordings, giving a fuller portrait of a highly distinguished artist.

Regarded by her contemporaries as a singer of the old school, she presents a Gioconda more appealing to modern tastes than the overcharged verismo-style of predecessors such as Eugenia Burzio. She brought to the role the refinements heard in her arias from Lucrezia Borgia, I lombardi and La forza del destino. There is also a thrilling intensity about her singing, so that, although Lauri-Volpi in his book Voci parallele (Garzanti: 1955) recalls that as an actress she was never quite able to liberate the impulses of her personality, one would be most unlikely to guess as much from these records.

La Gioconda

Maria Callas sop La Gioconda; Fiorenza Cossotto mez Laura Adorno; Pier Miranda Ferraro ten Enzo Grimaldo; Piero Cappuccilli bar Barnaba; Ivo Vinco bass Alvise Badoerò; Irene Companeez contr La Cieca; Leonardo Monreale bass Zuane; Carlo Forte bass A Singer, Pilot; Renato Ercolani ten Isepo, First Distant Voice; Aldo Biffi bass Second Distant Voice; Bonaldo Giaiotti bass Barnabotto Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Antonio Votto 🄷

EMI mono ③ 556291-2 (167 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1959 ◉

Ponchielli's old warhorse has had a bad press in recent times, which seems strange in view of its melodic profusion, his unerring adumbration of Gioconda's unhappy predicament and of the sensual relationship between Enzo and Laura. But it does need large-scale and involved singing – just what it receives here on this now historic set. Nobody could fail to be caught up in its conviction. Callas was in good and fearless voice when it was made, with the role's emotions perhaps enhanced by the traumas of her own life at the time. Here her strengths in declaiming recitative, her moulding of line, her response to the text are all at their most arresting. Indeed she turns what can be a maudlin act into true tragedy. Ferraro's stentorian ebullience is most welcome. Cossotto is a vital, seductive Laura. Cappuccilli gives the odious spy and lecher Barnaba a threatening, sinister profile, whilst Vinco is a suitably implacable Alvise. Votto did nothing better than this set, bringing out the subtlety of the Verdi-inspired scoring and the charm of the 'Dance of the Hours' ballet. The recording sounds excellent for its age.

La Gioconda

Maria Callas sop La Gioconda; Gianni Poggi ten Enzo Grimaldi; Paolo Silveri bar Barnaba; Maria Amadini mez La Cieca; Giulio Neri bass Alvise Badoero; Fedora Barbieri mez Laura Adorno; Piero Poldi ten Zuàne; Armando Benzi ten Isèpo RAI Chorus and Orchestra, Turin / Antonino Votto

Warner Fonit Cetra ③ 3984-29355-2 (165 minutes: ADD). Notes and text included Ⓜ

Live broadcast 1952

Callas recorded La Gioconda twice, here in 1952 and then, for EMI, in 1959. The choice between these versions is finely balanced. What is beyond doubt is that you must hear her in this part if you want to understand why she was such a great interpreter. Listening to her as Ponchielli's tragic heroine Gioconda must run Violetta pretty close for her best role, even though it wasn't as central to her career on stage; in the final, inspired act of Ponchielli's melodrama, all the tragedy of the wronged woman rising above her jealousy to allow her lover Enzo to escape with Laura, and then commit suicide, is expressed quite indelibly in words and music.

In her EMI recording she refined her interpretation; indeed she declared that anyone who wanted to understand what she was about should listen to the final act. If you take the role as a whole, here she is in stronger, in fact in overwhelming voice throughout, mixing love, fury, pathos, desperation in equal measure as she imprints on our minds the woman at the end of her tether so marvellously described in the score. Above all it is what she does in melding text and notes, and her complete emotional identification with the part that makes Callas's Gioconda the most emotion-laden in the work's history. Barbieri is a fit antagonist in the famous Act 2 duet and on her own a magnificent Laura. As evil incarnate, Silveri is a powerful if unsubtle Barnaba. Neri, as the forceful Alvise, shows what Italian basses used to sound like, rich and firm in tone, imposing in manner: sad that he died so young. The drawback of the set is the ungainly, raw singing of Poggi, a fine voice ill-used by its owner. Apart from his penchant for cutting the score, Votto – as in the 1959 version – makes the most of the work's many strong points and overlooks its weak ones. The refurbished sound is admirable. Don't miss it.

Francis Poulenc

French 1899-1963

GROVE Poulenc's background gave him a musical and literary sophistication from boyhood, and he was already a publicly noted composer by the time he took lessons with Koechlin (1921-4): such works as his Apollinaire song cycle Le bestiaire (1919) and Sonata for two clarinets (1918) had shown the Stravinsky-Satie inclinations that assure him a place among Les Six. His ballet Les biches (1924), written for Dyagilev, established his mastery of the emotions and musical tastes of the smart set, opening a world of suavity and irony that he went on to explore in a sequence of concertante pieces: the Concert champêtre for harpsichord, the Aubade with solo piano and the Concerto for two pianos.

Around 1935 there came a change in his personal and spiritual life, reflected in a sizable output of religious music, a much greater productivity and an important contribution to French song. Yet the basis of his style was unchanged: Stravinsky, Fauré and contemporary popular music continued to be his sources, even in the devotional music and the larger sacred works. The songs include four cycles. But his output of instrumental music, apart from the many piano pieces of a private character, continued to be modest: his most important later orchestral piece is the G minor organ concerto with strings and timpani (1938), which journeys between Bach and the fairground, while his main chamber works were the sonatas for flute, oboe and clarinet.

Music for the stage also continued to occupy him. There was another ballet, Les animaux modèles (1942), scores for plays and films, and a new departure into opera, begun with the absurd Apollinaire piece Les mamelles de Tirésias and pursued with more seriousness in his deeply felt tragedy of martyrdom, Dialogues des Carmélites (1957), as well as a setting of Cocteau's telephone monologue La voix humaine (1959).

Organ Concerto

Concerto for Organ, Strings and Timpani in G minor.
Suite française, d'après Claude Gervaise.
Concert champêtre
Elisabeth Chojnacka hpd Philippe Lefebvre org
Lille Symphony Orchestra / Jean-Claude Casadesus
Naxos 8 554241 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1997

Elisabeth Chojnacka gets off to a head start against most others who have recorded the Concert champêtre by using the right kind of instrument: she understands that it is much sillier to play newish music on a period instrument than old music on a modern one. The effective proportions secured here between her deft playing and the orchestra also owe much to Jean-Claude Casadesus's nice sense of judgement and to the work of an excellent recording team. It was particularly perverse of Poulenc to ask a harpsichord to contend with large brass and percussion sections and then, a decade later, employ only strings and timpani in his concerto for the intrinsically far more powerful organ; and that perversity is underlined here by using the massive organ of Notre Dame, Paris – though once again the recording technicians have skilfully succeeded in producing a string sonority that does not suffer beside the organ's awesome thunders. You can't help wondering whether Poulenc really had such a giant sound in mind, but it is undeniably thrilling; and the quieter moments are captured with commendable clarity and calm. From the interpretative point of view, it's quite a performance. The wind and percussion of the Lille orchestra get a chance to demonstrate their quality in accomplished playing of the spry dances of the Suite française. This is an eminently recommendable disc.

Concerto for Organ, Strings and Timpani in G minor.
Piano Concerto[a]. Double Piano Concerto in D minor
[a]Pascal Rogé, Sylviane Deferne pfs Peter Hurford org Philharmonia Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca 436 546-2DH (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

The Piano Concerto has the right blend of melodic and textural richness, wit and warmth in the hands of these performers. The mood of its expansive first movement is more tender than usual here, with its incisive wit and spiky Stravinskian instrumentation being less in evidence. But the music can take this approach, and the ecstatically chorale-like music near the end of the movement is done to perfection. In the gentle Andante con moto, Rogé and Dutoit are in their element, but here again the powerful passages also make their impact, while the romp of a finale has the right joie de vivre. The Double Piano Concerto comes over with great vivacity, with Deferne and Rogé (playing second piano) skilfully unanimous and crisply recorded. The Organ Concerto, recorded in St Alban's Cathedral, is also successful; Peter Hurford's mastery in Bach serves him well in its more darkly Baroque aspects, but he is equally idiomatic in the uninhibitedly bouncy passages.

Les biches

Poulenc Les biches – suite. Les animaux modèles. Matelote provençale. Pastourelle. Valse. Les mariés de la Tour Eiffel – Discours du Général; La baigneuse

de Trouville. Aubade[a] Satie (orch Poulenc) Fête donnée par les Chevaliers Normands en l'honneur d'une jeune demoiselle. Prélude du Nazaréen No 1. Gnossienne No 3
[a]Pascal Rogé pf French National Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca 452 937-2DH (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

The disc's three main pillars owe their origin to the world of ballet, Les biches (written aged 20 for Diaghilev) being the work that, with its joie de vivre, first put Poulenc in the public eye. Aided by the clearest sound ever produced from the Salle Wagram, Dutoit gives a vivid performance of this Bright Young Things score, less slinky than others in the 'Adagietto' but light-footed in the 'Rag-Mazurka' and spikily brash in the outer movements. There was more maturity of feeling by the time Aubade was composed six years later: with its mood veering between harshly dramatic, gently melancholy and madcap-gay and its stylistic inconsistency, it has never been as popular as his other works, and recordings have often been dogged by problems of balance. The present performance manages to get this right, however, and this is the most satisfactory version currently available.

But for sheer lyrical beauty there is little in Poulenc to match the luscious outer movements of the splendid score for Lifar's 1940 Animaux modèles. Rounding off an exceptionally well-filled and desirable disc is a handful of Poulenc miniatures, ranging from the vulgarity of his early Valse via the farcical Mariés de la Tour Eiffel pieces to the rumbustiously jolly Matelote provençale.

Concert champêtre

Sinfonietta. Concert champêtre. Pièce brève sur le nom d'Albert Roussel. Bucolique. Fanfare. Deux Marches et un Intermède. Suite française
Pascal Rogé hpd
French National Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca 452 665-2DH (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

The Concert champêtre is a difficult work to bring off, and Poulenc is largely to blame: owing to his unfamiliarity with the then little-known harpsichord he miscalculated the balance, employing too large an orchestra, and his many delays in completing the work make themselves manifest in the bitty structure, with abrupt changes of pace in the outer movements that few performances make convincing. On record the concerto has suffered from too puny a harpsichord sound, and even here the instrument could with advantage have been more closely recorded.

Poulenc was equally dilatory in finishing the Sinfonietta. Though the work is more substantial than its title suggests, it does not outstay its welcome, at least in this engaging reading, which Dutoit shapes with vitality and sensitive phrasing, though even he cannot make the finale sound other than a patchwork. This is a vigorous, alert interpretation. The neat, characterful performances of the Suite française for wind, percussion and harpsichord, based on themes by the 16th century Claude Gervaise of the three-movement musique de table for a banquet at the 1937 Exposition Universelle, and of the tributes for the 60th birthday of Roussel and the 75th of Marguerite Long add to the disc's attractions.

Chamber works

Complete Chamber Works
Sextet for Piano and Wind Quintet[a]. Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano[b]. Flute Sonata[c]. Oboe Sonata[d]. Clarinet Sonata[e]. Violin Sonata[f]. Cello Sonata[g]. Sonata for Two Clarinets[h]. Sonata for Clarinet and Bassoon[i]. Sonata for Horn, Trumpet and Trombone[j]. Villanelle[k]. Elégie[l]. Sarabande[m]
The Nash Ensemble (Philippa Davies [ac]fl/[k]picc [abd]Gareth Hulse ob [aehi]Richard Hosford, [h]Michael Harris cls [abi]Ursula Leveaux bn [ajl]Richard Watkins hn [j]John Wallace tpt [j]David Purser tbn [f]Leo Phillips vn [g]Paul Watkins vc [m]Craig Ogden gtr)
[a-g/kl]Ian Brown pf
Hyperion ② CDA672556 (146 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

Invidious as it may seem to pick out just one of these excellent artists, special mention must be made of Ian Brown, who plays in nine of the 13 works included and confirms his standing as one of the most admired and musicianly chamber pianists of our day. He knows, for example, how to control Poulenc's boisterous piano writing in the Sextet without sacrificing the sparkle, and as a result the work coheres better than ever before. Like the Trio (whose opening reveals Stravinskian influence), it is a mixture of the composer's madcap gamin mood and his predominantly melancholy bittersweet lyricism. The latter characteristic is most in evidence in his most enduring chamber works: the solo wind sonatas with piano, all three of which were in the nature of tombeaux , the Flute Sonata for the American patron Mrs Sprague Coolidge, that for clarinet for Honegger, and that for oboe for Prokofiev. All are given idiomatic, sensitive and satisfying performances by the Nash artists.

The Elégie for Dennis Brain was a not altogether convincing experiment in dodecaphony: Poulenc had earlier dabbled in atonality and polytonality in the little sonatas (really sonatinas) for, respectively, two clarinets and for clarinet and bassoon. There is a touching reading of the little Sarabande for guitar. A hint of the guitar's tuning at the start of the second movement is almost the only Spanish reference in the Violin Sonata, which was composed in memoriam the poet Lorca, whose loss is bitterly suggested in the angry finale. In this work Poulenc allotted to the piano (his own instrument) rather more than equal status in the duo – a situation rather paralleled in the lighthearted Cello Sonata, over which the composer dallied longer than any other of his works – but balance in both is finely judged by the performers and the recording team. The whole issue wins enthusiastic recommendation: it bids fair to become the undisputed yardstick for the future.

Poulenc Oboe Sonata. Trio for Oboe, Bassoon and Piano Britten Temporal Variations. Six Metamorphoses after Ovid, Op 49. Two Insect Pieces. Phantasy, Op 2
François Leleux ob Jean-François Duquesnoy bn Guillaume Sutre vn Miguel da Silva va Marc Coppey vc Emmanuel Strosser pf
Harmonia Mundi Les Nouveaux Interprètes Ⓑ
HMN91 1556 (76 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995

The pairing of these composers is apt, for they were friends and their musical high spirits often have a darker side. The oboist here possesses an excellent technique and is a deeply sensitive artist. Both qualities quickly become evident in the flowing and quietly poignant opening melody of Poulenc's Sonata, where Leleux's tone is not only beautiful but also admirably responsive to the subtle dynamic shading and rhythmic flexibility. However, this is far from the whole story, and the grotesquerie of the passage starting at 2'16" shows that there is more to his playing than gentleness – as does the mercurial Scherzo, delivered with delightful point and relish. The final Déploration of this sonata, as played here, is infinitely moving and nothing less than superb.

Fortunately Leleux and his pianist partner, who is equally attuned to Poulenc's world, have been extremely well recorded. This performance and that of the bouncy Trio both give keen pleasure. So do the Britten pieces, three of them early (the characterful Six Metamorphoses being the exception) and edgy. Performed as vividly as this, they are undoubtedly worth having. A fine and generously filled disc.

Solo piano works

Awards 1989/88

Les soirées de Nazelles. Deux Novelettes – No 1 in C; No 2 in B flat minor. Novelette 'sur un thème de M de Falla'. Pastourelle (arr pf). Trois mouvements perpétuels. Valse. 15 Improvisations – No 1 in B minor; No 2 in A flat; No 3 in B minor; No 6 in B flat; No 7 in C; No 8 in A minor; No 12 in E flat, 'Hommage à Schubert'; No 13 in A minor; No 15 in C minor, 'Hommage à Edith Piaf'. Trois Pièces
Pascal Rogé pf
Decca 475 042-2 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1986 ●●●

Humoresque. Nocturnes. Suite in C. Thème varié. 15 Improvisations – No 4 in A flat; No 5 in A minor; No 9 in D; No 10 in F, 'Eloge des gammes'; No 11 in G minor; No 14 in D flat. Two Intermezzos. Intermezzo in A flat. Villageoises. Presto in B flat
Pascal Rogé pf
Decca 425 862-2DH (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989

These beautifully recorded and generously filled discs offer a rich diversity of Poulenc's output. On the first disc, the masterly Soirées de Nazelles were improvised during the early 1930s at a country house in Nazelles as a memento of convivial evenings spent together with friends. It paints a series of charming portraits – elegant, witty and refined. The Trois mouvements perpétuels are, like so many of the works represented here, lighthearted and brief, improvisatory in flavour and executed with a rippling vitality. The Improvisations constantly offer up echoes of the piano concertos with their infectious rhythmic drive – the 'Hommage à Schubert' is a tartly classical miniature in three-time played with just the right amount of nonchalant ease by Pascal Rogé. The 'Hommage à Edith Piaf' is a lyrical and touching tribute – obviously deeply felt. The Humoresque which opens the second recital is open-air and open-hearted in style, yet songlike too in its melodic richness. The simplicity of this music is deceptive, as is that of the warmly caressing C major Nocturne that follows, for both pieces need subtle phrasing, rubato and the kind of textures only obtainable through the most refined use of the sustaining pedal.

Rogé has these skills, and he is also fortunate in having an excellent piano at his disposal as well as a location that gives the sound the right amount of reverberation. There are many delights in this music and the way it is played here: to mention just one, listen to the masterly way that the composer and pianist together gradually bring around the flowing freshness of the C major Nocturne towards the deeply poignant feeling of the close. They should especially delight, and to some extent reassure, anyone who deplores the absence of charm and sheer Romantic feeling in much of our century's music.

Figure humaine

Figure humaine. Sept chansons. Un soir de neige
Accentus Chamber Choir / Laurence Equilbey
Naïve Classique V4883 (39 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●

Poulenc's choral music is particularly treacherous territory. One moment you're singing what sounds like Janequin or Passereau, the next you're into jagged, almost atonal lines and harmonies that seem to tear at the ether. And the contrasts are often abrupt and have to be managed at speed with every syllable of the French in place. Incredibly, the Accentus Chamber Choir under Equilbey's direction meet all these challenges with flying colours. Not only that, but their phrasing is unfailingly sensitive to the verbal shifts of the poems and no less to the harmonic and textural shifts of Poulenc's music. It's unlikely that a non-French choir would be able to achieve these standards.

Tuning and ensemble are impeccable, tone quality excellent and the varied textures sharply characterised within a spacious acoustic and with slightly distant recording.

Mélodies

Banalités. Bleuet. Chansons gaillardes. Chansons villageoises. Dernier poème. Quatre poèmes. Métamorphoses – C'est ainsi que tu es. Montparnasse. Poèmes – C. Priez pour paix. Rosemonde. Tel jour, telle nuit – Bonne journée; Une ruine coquille vide; Une herbe pauvre; Je n'ai envie que de t'aimer;Nous avons fait la nuit
Michel Piquemal bar Christine Lajarrige pf
Naxos 8 553642 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●●

The first time Michel Piquemal met Pierre Bernac, for whom most of these songs were written, Piquemal recalls that Bernac said: 'I am very moved, because what you're doing is exactly what Francis Poulenc was hoping for. He would have been happy.' Afterwards Piquemal studied both with Bernac and Denise Duval, the two singers who were closest to the composer, so this recital is part of a real, authentic tradition. The greatest challenge for a singer comes in the best-known songs, for instance Montparnasse and 'C'. Piquemal doesn't disappoint. He hasn't got the luxurious voice for the lyrical climax of the first, at the words 'Vous êtes en réalité un poète lyrique d'Allemagne /Qui voulez connaître Paris,' but he delivers all the complicated Apollinaire verse in this and the cycle Banalités with a complete understanding of the necessary balance between stressing the irony and maintaining the strict forward-moving musical line.

The one group that wasn't composed for a light baritone is Chansons villageoises, which, although sung and recorded by Bernac, was intended for a Verdi baritone; 'Un tour de chant symphonique' Poulenc called it. Like Bernac, Piquemal doesn't have the opulent vocal quality here that Poulenc was looking for, but instead he has an actor's way with the words that brings personality and humour to a text such as the opening 'Chanson du clair tamis' – très gai et très vite in Poulenc's marking. All the brilliance of Maurice Fombeure's poetry gains clarity from Piquemal's diction and sense of fun, while the ensuing sadness of 'C'est le joli printemps' and the macabre parable of 'Le mendiant' are sharply contrasted.

If you want to sample this disc, try Bleuet, and the 'sensitive lyricism' that Bernac wrote of. It's one of the saddest songs Poulenc composed, with its image of the young soldier, the blue referring to the uniform of the conscript who has seen such terrible things while he is still almost a child. It has to be sung 'intimately', wrote Poulenc; Bernac, however, thought that it should also be 'virile and serious'. The penultimate line in which the boy faces the reality – he knows death better than life – is sung by Piquemal with a natural feel for the simplicity of the poem, never overdoing the emphasis, and never becoming arch.

At Naxos's low price this is a first-rate introduction to Poulenc's songs, but more than that it is an example of the best kind of French singing. Christine Lajarrige is a sensitive accompanist, for Poulenc always acknowledged that his songs are duets, for voice and piano.

Le bestiaire ou Cortège d'Orphée. Cocardes. Trois poèmes de Louise Lalanne. A sa guitare. Tel jour, telle nuit. Miroirs brûlants – Tu vois le feu du soir. Banalités. Métamorphoses. Voyage. Le souris. La dame de Monte-Carlo
Dame Felicity Lott sop Graham Johnson pf
Forlane UCD16730 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994

This programme of mélodies is perfectly chosen and balanced. Juxtaposing song cycles and single numbers from the whole of Poulenc's career, putting them in chronological order, it highlights the extreme modernity of Poulenc's choice of poetry with his universal appeal as a songwriter. Le Bestiaire from 1918, to Apollinaire's verses, is his earliest substantial group and it is remarkable how vivid and strong the Poulenc sound already was, when he was just 19. Of the three early Cocteau settings, Cocardes, Poulenc said he wanted 'the smell of French fries, the accordion, Piver perfume' – once one has that in mind, both pianist and singer do splendidly, with lines such as 'Lionoléum en trompe-l'oeil. Merci. Cinéma, nouvelle muse'. Tel jour, telle nuit was, of course, one of the great cycles composed for Pierre Bernac but the brighter colours of Lott's voice make it more romantic than, for instance, Souzay's interpretation. Graham Johnson as accompanist is the worthy successor to Dalton Baldwin and the composer himself as the perfect interpreter of these mélodies.

Gloria and Stabat mater

Gloria[a]. Stabat mater[a]. Litanies à la vierge noire[b]
[a]Françoise Pollet sop [a]French Radio Choir; [b]Maîtrise de Radio France; French National Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca 448 139-2DH (62 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 Ⓕ

Dutoit, with his sensitivity, vitality and insight, outdoes his recorded rivals in two of these works. The finest performance here is undoubtedly of the Litanies, whose orchestral introduction immediately impresses by its wonderfully hushed sense of reverence. Dutoit respects the composer's desire for the work to be performed with simplicity: this is an intimate, not an exteriorized, plea (occasioned by the death in a horrible accident of Poulenc's friend Ferroud, a composer who is now largely forgotten), and the refrain 'Ayez pitié de nous' is uttered with true intensity by a chorus of unmistakably French timbre.

There is thoughtful phrasing too in the Gloria, again and again marked by Dutoit's vision and care over detail. He accents the deliberately-paced initial movement strongly, is light-footed in the Stravinskian 'Laudamus te', is not too slow and avoids sentimentality in 'Domine Deus Agnus Dei', and gives grandeur to the start of the final movement. Françoise Pollet, warm and sweet-voiced in the repeated 'Qui tollis peccata mundi', is radiant in the final Amens. The Stabat mater presents difficulties of balance which here are satisfactorily solved (the basses' first entry is, for once, not too obscure, and the orchestra does not overwhelm everyone in the fury of 'Quis est homo'). And again Dutoit is illuminating in the vigour of 'Cujus animam' and the well-judged restraint of 'Quae moerebat' (which in Yan Pascal Tortelier's reading sounds inappropriately cheerful). But in this work the chorus, though good in the unaccompanied sections of 'O quam tristis', too often sings on the underside of notes. Ah well, it was perhaps too much to hope that all three works would reach the same level of excellence.

Gloria. Stabat mater
Janice Watson sop BBC Singers; BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9341 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 ●

We are immediately struck, at the start of the Gloria, by the radiantly warm but clean orchestral sonority: only later does an uneasy suspicion arise that, apparently seduced by the sound, the recording engineers may be favouring it at the expense of the chorus, especially at orchestral fortes. But it is committed and thoroughly secure choral singing, perhaps most easily appreciated in some of the unaccompanied passages – tender in the almost mystic 'O quam tristis' and firm-toned at 'Fac ut ardeat' (both in the Stabat mater); it gives real attack at 'Quis est homo' (just holding its own against the orchestra); the sopranos can produce a bright, ringing tone; and only the very first line of the Stabat mater, lying low in the basses, needed to be a bit stronger (as in most performances). Janice Watson is a sweet-voiced soloist with very pure intonation; but she could with advantage have strengthened her consonants throughout. Tortelier gives intensely felt readings of both works – the murmurous ending of the Stabat mater and the thrilling fortissimo chords at 'Quoniam' in the Gloria spring to mind – and fortunately he keeps the vocal 'Domine Deus' entry moving at the same pace as at its introduction. He takes the Stravinskian 'Laudamus te' fast and lightly; the only questionable speed is of 'Quae moerebat', which sounds too cheerful for the words ('mourning and lamenting'). Taken all in all, these are performances of undoubted quality.

Motets

Mass in G. Quatre motets pour un temps de pénitence. Quatre motets pour le temps de Noël. Exultate Deo. Salve regina
Berlin RIAS Chamber Choir / Marcus Creed
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1588 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995

There has never been a more beautiful performance of the Salve regina. And elsewhere this virtuoso choir displays, beyond impeccably pure intonation and chording (chorus-masters everywhere will note with envy the sopranos' clean, dead-sure attacks on high notes), a sensitivity to verbal meaning, dynamics and vocal colour that argues not only skilful direction but a complete ease and absorption into the music's often chromatic nature by all the singers. They bring a bright-eyed tone to the Exultate Deo, awe to 'O magnum mysterium' (in the Christmas motets), and a striking diversity of timbre to 'Tristis est anima mea' (in the penitential motets); in the Mass they interpret to perfection the doucement joyeux indication of the Sanctus. They appear to have been recorded in some large church, but without any problems of resonance and the words are extremely clear throughout. In all, this is a first-class disc.

Complete stage works

Dialogues des Carmélites^{a}
Denise Duval sop Blanche de La Force; Régine Crespin sop Madame Lidoine; Denise Scharley mez Madame de Croissy; Liliane Berton sop Soeur Constance; Rita Gorr mez Mère Marie; Xavier Depraz bass Marquis de La Force; Paul Finel ten Chevalier de La Force; Janine Fourrier sop Mère Jeanne; Gisèle Desmoutiers sop Soeur Mathilde; Louis Rialland ten L'Aumônier; René Bianco bar Le Geôlier; Jacques Mars bar L'Officier; Raphael Romagnoni ten First Commissaire; Charles Paul bar Second Commissaire; Michel Forel ten Thierry; Max Conti bar Javelinot Chorus and Orchestra of the Opera, Paris / Pierre Dervaux

Le gendarme incompris^{b}
Nicolas Rivenq bar Monsieur Médor; Jean-Paul Fouchécourt ten Marquise de Montonson; Jean-Christoph Benoit bar Pénultième
Soloists Ensemble of the Garde Républicaine / François Boulanger

Les mamelles de Tirésias^{c}
Duval sop Thérèse, Fortune-teller; Marguérite Legouhy mez Marchande de journaux, Grosse Dame; Jean Giraudeau ten Husband; cEmile Rousseau bar Policeman; Robert Jeantet bar Director; Julien Thirache bar Presto; Frédéric

Leprin ten Lacouf; Serge Rallier ten Journalist; Jacques Hivert sngr Son; Gabriel Jullia sngr Monsieur barbu
Chorus and Orchestra of the Opéra-Comique / André Cluytens

Les chemins de l'amour[d]
Yvonne Printemps sop orchestra / Marcel Cariven

Fanfare[e]
Toulouse Capitole Orchestra / Stéphane Cardon

L'histoire de Babar[f]
Sir Peter Ustinov narr Paris Conservatoire Orchestra / Georges Prêtre

La dame de Monte Carlo[g]
Mady Mesplé sop Monte Carlo Philharmonic Orchestra / Prêtre

La voix humaine[h]
Duval sop La Femme; Orchestra of the Opéra-Comique, Paris / Prêtre

Le bal masqué[i]
Benoit bar Maryse Charpentier pf Soloists of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra / Prêtre

L'invitation au château[j]
David Grimal vn Romain Guyot cl Emmanuel Strosser pf

Sécheresses[k]
French Radio Choir; French New Philharmonic Orchestra / Prêtre

Figure humaine[l]. Un soir de neige[m]
The Sixteen / Harry Christophers
EMI Poulenc Edition acdmono/stereo ⑤
566843-2 (380 minutes: [acdfhi]ADD/DDD). Texts included. Recorded [a]1958, [b]1998, [c]1953, [d]1941, [e]1998, [f]1965, [g]1985, [h]1959, [i]1965, [j]1998, [lm]1989 Ⓜ ●●

Poulenc's stage works might seem to be divided between those that hark back to his youth as a member of Les Six, and the more pessimistic mood that overtook him after the Second World War. It doesn't really work like that, however, since it was after composing Dialogues des Carmélites that he returned to the work of Jean Cocteau to produce two contrasting monologues – La voix humaine and La dame de Monte Carlo in which the frivolous and the tragic are mixed with exquisite irony. It must have been quite a long-term investment when Les mamelles de Tirésias was recorded in 1953. This classic version under André Cluytens can never be surpassed as a souvenir of the earliest performances of what is still Poulenc's most successful opera, but the orchestral detail is much more vivid on the modern Ozawa set. Denise Duval was Poulenc's favourite soprano and although her voice has that slightly astringent quality in the upper reaches typical of French female singers, her performances are so complete, musically and dramatically. Cocteau wanted Poulenc to compose La voix humaine for Callas but he would only consider Duval. Although many famous divas have tackled it, Duval's 'Elle' is sublime. Public and critics have always been somewhat divided by Dialogues de Carmélites. The Gramophone Award-winning Nagano version boasts an extremely strong cast, but again, Duval, Crespin, Berton and the others have an intensity that it's difficult to imagine ever being equalled.

EMI has provided texts but no translations. Monsieur Poulenc would not have been amused. He insisted that Carmélites should be performed in translation outside France. The other items that make up the set include Poulenc's humorous and really beautiful incidental music for Anouilh's play L'invitation au château. As in so many other instances this finds Poulenc using little quotations and self-quotations. The fourth number 'Mouvement de valse hésitation' is a delicate variation on the Berger-De Féraudy waltz Amoureuse and elsewhere there is a hint of his 15th Improvisation. Similarly in Le bal masqué, there is a little five-note phrase which is a pre-echo of the husband's demand 'Donnez-moi du lard' in Mamelles. At the end of the fourth CD we do get to hear Mme Fresnay, the delectable Yvonne Printemps, in her waltz-song from Anouilh's Léocadia, 'Les chemins de l'amour'. It was Poulenc himself who called her singing 'literally divine'.

La dame de Monte Carlo, composed as a concert number for Denise Duval, is beautifully sung by Mady Mesplé. It's a bit like an opera-composer's take on the 'Let's face the music and dance' scene from the Astaire-Rogers movie Follow the Fleet, the gambler facing ruin outside the casino. The secular cantatas that end the last CD, two of them newly recorded by The Sixteen, provide yet more scope for contrasting Poulenc's shifts of mood between the cabaret and the chapel. Poulenc himself wrote: 'The vocal style of the Stabat or that of Dialogues des Carmélites is in fact as far removed from the song as the string quartet is from the string orchestra.'

Dialogues des Carmélites

Awards 1993

Catherine Dubosc sop Blanche de la Force; Rachel Yakar sop Madame Lidoine; Rita Gorr mez Madame de Croissy; Brigitte Fournier sop Soeur Constance; Martine Dupuy mez Mère Marie; José van Dam bass-bar Marquis de la Force; Jean-Luc Viala ten Chevalier de la Force; Michel Sénéchal ten L'Aumônier; François Le Roux bar Le Geôlier Lyon Opéra Chorus and Orchestra / Kent Nagano
Virgin Classics ② 759227-2 Ⓕ
(152 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included ●●●

Poulenc's chef d'oeuvre is one of the few operas written since Wozzeck that has survived in the repertory – and deservedly so. It is written from, and goes to, the heart, not in any extrovert or openly histrionic way but by virtue of its ability to explore the world of a troubled band of Carmelite nuns at the height of the terrors caused by the French Revolution, and do so in an utterly individual manner. Poulenc unerringly enters into their psyches as they face their fatal destiny. Nagano responds with perceptible keenness to the sombre, elevated mood and intensity of Poulenc's writing and unfailingly delineates the characters of the principals as they face their everyday martyrdom. The magisterial authority of Martine Dupuy's Mère Marie, the agony of Rita Gorr's Old Prioress, the inner torment of Catherine Dubosc's Sister Blanche, the restraint of Rachel Yakar's Madame Lidoine, the eager charm of Brigitte Fournier's Sister Constance are only the leading players in a distribution that is without any doubt admirable in almost every respect. The score is for once given complete. The recording for Virgin Classics is atmospheric and suggests stage action without exaggeration.

Les mamelles de Tirésias

Les mamelles de Tirésias
Barbara Bonney sop Thérèse; Jean-Philippe Lafont bar Director; Jean-Paul Fouchécourt ten Husband; Wolfgang Holzmair bar Policeman; Gordon Gietz ten Journalist; Graham Clark ten Lacouf; Akemi Sakamoto mez Marchande de journaux; Mark Oswald bar Presto; Anthony Dean Griffey ten Son
Tokyo Opera Singers; Saito Kinen Orchestra / Seiji Ozawa

Le bal masqué
Wolfgang Holzmair bar
members of the Saito Kinen Orchestra / Seiji Ozawa
Philips 456 504-2PH (72 minutes: DDD).
Notes, texts and translations included Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

Les mamelles de Tirésias is Poulenc's Così fan tutte. On the surface it can easily be construed as little more than an absurd romp. Poulenc, though, has used Apollinaire's sur-réaliste drama – in 1917 it was the play that gave the word to the language – as a starting-point for a work that is full of emotion – regrets, nostalgia and longing, then finally at the end the rebirth of hope. Poulenc worked sporadically on the piece in the early 1940s, but eventually finished it in a great burst of creative energy after the end of the Second World War. During the German occupation of France, Poulenc mostly being away from Paris, much as the characters in the play are stranded in a mythical Zanzibar, he amused himself with details about the city and its arrondissements – the score is full of little musical references that match Apollinaire's untranslatable puns. This recording is the first to have been made since the classic André Cluytens version, which included several members of the original cast, including Poulenc's favourite soprano, Denise Duval; after she created the part of Thérèse, Poulenc described her as 'stunning Paris with her beauty, her acting talent and her voice'. It's a hard act to follow, but Barbara Bonney succeeds in creating a vivid character without trying to imitate Duval.

Seiji Ozawa has always possessed a special feeling for French opera of this period. The biggest advantage of this recording is the clarity of the orchestral sound – in the 1953 version the voices are so prominent that one loses all the beautiful detail in those heart-catching Poulenc juxtapositions, as the composer put it, 'in the midst of the worst buffoonery a phrase can effect a change in the lyric tone'. The vocal coach, Pierre Valet, deserves considerable recognition for the way in which he has succeeded in getting the Tokyo Opera Singers to articulate the French. As Presto and Lacouf, Mark Oswald and Graham Clark get to sing the wonderful duet about their gambling debts, 'Monsieur Presto, je n'ai rien gagné'. Wolfgang Holzmair is luxury casting as the Gendarme, and in the crucial role of Thérèse's husband, Jean-Paul Fouchécourt is splendidly clear, whether looking after the babies or discussing Picasso's art. Those who already know this opera will delight in this performance, and if you have not yet become acquainted with the taste of the banana leaf and the strawberry together – the symbol Apollinaire offers his lovers at the end – you have a real treat in store. Les mamelles is such a jewel on its own, but Le bal masqué makes a good fill-up.

La voix humaine

La voix humaine. La dame de Monte-Carlo
Felicity Lott sop Suisse Romande Orchestra / Armin Jordan
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1759 Ⓕ
(51 minutes: DDD)

Poulenc was certainly in close touch with his anima. His heroines, often suffering, as in these two works, readily take upon themselves Poulenc's own depressive and even hysterical character. But not only is the rejected woman in La voix humaine Poulenc himself (he admitted as much), she is also Denise Duval, the first interpreter of the work, for whom it was written. Duval has said that both she and the composer were in what the tabloids call 'love tangles' at the time and that the work spoke for both of them. So it's a brave act for any other soprano to compete with her 1959 recording, let alone someone who is not French. Felicity Lott is one of the few British sopranos who could hope to come close. And she does. The voice is in excellent shape, the French likewise. The recording does not place her so firmly in the limelight as Duval's, while Jordan draws fine playing from the orchestra – maybe not quite as explosive as Prêtre in the emotional outbursts, but if anything with more of the sensualité orchestrale that Poulenc asked for.

And if she doesn't quite get the necessary hysteria and vulgarity, she very nearly does. She seems more at home in La dame de Monte-Carlo, also on a Cocteau text but this time in verse. The top of the voice is radiant where Mady Mesplé's is sometimes shrill and marred by heavy vibrato, and throughout she captures exactly the right tone of outraged dignity.

Michael Praetorius German 1571-1621

GROVE

The son of a strict Lutheran, Praetorius was educated at Torgau, Frankfurt an der Oder (1582) and Zerbst (1584). He was organist of St Marien, Frankfurt (1587-90), before moving to Wolfenbüttel, where he was court organist from 1595 and Kapellmeister from 1604. He temporarily served the Saxon court (1613-16), chiefly at Dresden, where he met Schütz and got to know the latest Italian music, and he worked in many other German cities. The most versatile German composer of his day, he was also one of the most prolific. His 21 extant sacred vocal publications include over 1000 Protestant hymn-based works, many for multiple choirs, as well as Latin music for the Lutheran service, motets, psalms and instrumental dances (Terpsichore, 1612). His encyclopedic treatise Syntagma musicum (published 1614-20), with detailed information on instruments and performing practice, is of immense documentary value.

Dances from Terpsichore

Dances from Terpsichore – excerpts
New London Consort / Philip Pickett
L'Oiseau-Lyre Florilegium 414 633-2OH Ⓕ
(51 minutes: DDD)

This is pure sizzle and great fun from beginning to end. The massive collection of French court dances that Praetorius collected and arranged for his volume entitled Terpsichore in 1612 was just one in the extraordinary series of publications he issued within only 15 years. In terms of pure compositional achievement it may be the least interesting of those volumes, but it has always worked well in performance because it is unquestionably the best medium for exploiting the vast range of apparently current instruments that Praetorius later described in the second book of his musical encyclopaedia Syntagma musicum.

Rackets, shawms, Rauschpfeifen, many kinds of stringed instruments and much else are all chronicled here. And the music in Terpsichore is tailor-made for an imaginative and rich display showing the varied sounds of one of music's most colourful eras. In all, there is a massive cast of nearly 40 musicians taking part, among them some of the most admired early-instrument names in London. There is any number of absolutely delicious sounds; and the groups are juxtaposed with quick-silver elegance.

The performances include some imaginative departures from the sketchy details of Praetorius's harmonisations, although it is rather odd that so little embellishment was used. There is an avoiding of the kind of individual showing-off that made some of the earlier Terpsichore recordings so exciting; the excitement is in the vitality and cleanness of the ensemble sound. The CD gives a stunning presence to the dazzling range of instruments too.

Lutheran Christmas Mass

Roskilde Cathedral Boys' Choir and Congregation; Gabrieli Consort; Gabrieli Players / Paul McCreesh Ⓟ
Archiv Produktion 439 250-2AH (79 minutes: DDD)
Text and translation included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

The aesthetic of contrast, so central to early Baroque spectacle (sacred or profane), is inspired here by the traditional part played by the congregation in Lutheran worship. Praetorius's music for the figuraliter (the vocal/instrumental choirs) is greatly influenced by fashionable Venetian techniques. But what is striking is the way the old alternatim practices of the Protestant church blend so naturally with the intricate textures and scorings of a colourful Italian-style canvas, ranging from intimate dialogues to full grandiloquent sonority. What is more, the centrality of the chorale is never compromised. Despite all these ingredients, it is McCreesh's research and imagination that make this service such a powerful testament to the faith expressed by Lutherans of Praetorius's generation, and indeed by subsequent generations to which Bach was so indebted.

The service follows, to all intents and purposes, the Mass of the Roman rite (sung with distinction by the Gabrieli Consort though the sopranos seem a little unsure in the Kyrie) interspersed with a versatile array of motets, hymns, prayers, intoned readings, a superbly conceived and suitably mysterious Pavan by Schein for the approach to Communion and several rhetorically positioned organ preludes. For a congregation, the Gabrieli Consort and players are joined by the boys of Roskilde Cathedral, Denmark and a some local amateur choirs. The effect is remarkable for its fervour in the hymns; now one can see why Von Himmel hoch da komm ich her inspired so many settings in the 17th century.

Other familiar tunes include Quem pastores, Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern in a shimmering prelude by Scheidt followed by a delicately nuanced motet on the same tune. In dulci jubilo is treated to a flamboyant setting by Praetorius featuring six trumpets. The spacious acoustic of the cathedral exhibits McCreesh's acute timbral sense; definition is not ideally sharp but this is a small price to pay for a natural perspective which embraces the sense of community worship essential for this project.

Zbigniew Preisner Polish 1955

A self-taught musician, he studied history of art at Kraków University. From 1978 he worked with the legendary Kraków cabaret Piwnica pod Baranami ('The cellar beneath the sign of the ram'). He made his début as a film composer in 1982 with Prognoza pogody ('Weather Forecast'), and from 1985 collaborated regularly with the film director Krzysztof Kieślowski until the latter's death in 1996. The success of Kieślowski's films, particularly La double vie de Véronique and the trilogy 'Three Colours' led to Preisner's flourishing career in Europe and the USA.

Requiem For My Friend

Elzbieta Towarnicka sop Varsov Chamber Choir; Sinfonia Varsovia / Jacek Kaspszyk
Erato 3984-24146-2 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1998

As the success of his film scores shows, Preisner knows exactly how to compose effective and immediately impressive music with an acute sense of timing. Requiem For My Friend, his first work written specifically for concert performance, also shows this ability, but placed in a new context. Scored for five voices, organ, string quintet and percussion, the first part, 'Requiem', employs words from the Latin Missa pro defunctis, and one feels that the ghosts of chant and the polyphonic tradition are often not far away (particularly in the opening 'Officium' and the Kyrie). A good deal of other music is suggested during the course of the work: one occasionally thinks of the Górecki of the Third Symphony or O Domina nostra, or Pärt, and also other composers of film music such as Vangelis or Jerry Goldsmith. This said, however, the work has its own sense of direction and cohesion and the relatively limited resources are put to very effective use: the only section that does not work is the Agnus Dei, which relies too heavily on sentiment. The most effective movement is the unaccompanied 'Lux aeterna', simple and folk-like, but there are memorable things particularly in the 'Lacrimosa', which attains a real dramatic power with its repetitive melodic tag, and the 'Offertory', whose character is defined by the subtle use of recitative-like vocal writing.

The second part of the work, 'Life', for much larger forces and also in nine movements, is generally less successful in that it has less sense of unity and relies not so much on distinctive musical material as on the kind of symphonic film music gestures which work excellently in context but which fail to sustain interest or to cohere as a concert work. There are nevertheless some fine things, such as the saxophone writing (and playing) in 'The beginning', or the hushed, valedictory 'Prayer'. This is music which wears its heart on its sleeve, and as a personal memorial to a friend (the film director, Krzysztof Kieslowski) that is entirely appropriate.

André Previn German/American 1929

GROVE American conductor, pianist and composer of German birth, Previn studied in Berlin and at the Paris Conservatoire and moved to Los Angeles in 1939. His early career was in the film industry and as a jazz pianist. He made his conducting début in 1963 and was conductor-in-chief of the Houston SO, 1967-70. From 1965 he has been heard with the LSO (principal conductor, 1969-79), notably in strongly coloured late Romantic or early 20th-century music. He conducted the Pittsburgh SO, 1976-86, and became music director of the Los Angeles PO in 1986. He has composed musicals and orchestral and chamber works.

Songs

Diversions[a]. Three Dickinson Songs[b].
The Giraffes go to Hamburg[c]. Sallie Chisum remembers Billy the Kid[d]. Vocalise[e]
[bc]Renée Fleming, [de]Barbara Bonney sops [c]Renée Siebert afl [e]Moray Welsh vc [a]Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; [de]London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn [bc]pf
DG 471 028-2GH (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
[a]Recorded live in 2000

The Prologue of Previn's Diversions for orchestra suggests that he'd been listening to Shostakovich's Eighth Symphony – certainly the motoric allegro non troppo, with its wailing high clarinet like a mortar shell in flight. It's an arresting start, less malignant than the Shostakovich but shot through with the same level of cynicism. The sweetly contrasted second idea, with the odd harmony straight out of Strauss, speaks with an American accent. Britten is in there too: the second-movement Passacaglia is very much in the tradition of Britten and Shostakovich, deeply rooted but searching, with solo riffs for clarinet, piccolo and cello exploring Previn's natural aptitude for the songful line. There's even a fleeting film noir moment where upper strings take up the principal idea as if suddenly drenched in Hollywood twilight. And in the final movement the emergence of a solo string trio hints at the Tippett Triple Concerto.

More at issue, though, is how successfully Previn turns these influences into something uniquely his own. He's an elegant and technically adept craftsman; he knows exactly what he's doing with an orchestra. The music is varied and eventful. But it's also a little sporadic. You long for him to let go, to really run with an idea. A satisfying climax would be nice. But it's almost as if he's a little wary of slipping back into the overkill of those bad old Hollywood days. This is the antidote – just a tad precious.

Not so his word-setting. Previn is up there with the best of them – Barber, Bernstein, Copland. The three Emily Dickinson settings (personalised for Renée Fleming, his radiant Blanche in Streetcar) are special. His understanding of the poetry is reflected in the directness. Previn doesn't get in the way, nor does he inhibit the words. The amazing thing about Dickinson is the imperceptible way she slips from homespun to visionary. In the settings 'As imperceptively as grief' and 'Good morning midnight' the reflectiveness is tempered with an ever-present ecstasy.

Previn's piano original of Sallie Chisum remembers Billy the Kid (also recorded by Barbara Bonney, for Decca) is preferable if only because it concentrates the mind and the imagination on the vocal nuances. Indeed, it's a tribute to Previn's word-setting that the orchestral colour adds so little and even, you might think, distracts so much. The poem's the thing. The voice is enough. More than enough in Vocalise, written in less than two hours when a previous attempt proved too clever for its own good. This, too, is the orchestral version (the piano and cello original has again been previously recorded by Bonney), but with no words to care for, Previn's answer to Rachmaninov can be as plush as it likes. Bonney's voice sinks back into the luxuriant texture, clearly enjoying the extra support. Maybe Previn should always set himself impossible deadlines.

A Streetcar Named Desire

Renée Fleming sop Blanche DuBois; Rodney Gilfry bar Stanley Kowalski; Elizabeth Futral sop Stella Kowalski; Anthony Dean Griffey ten Harold Mitchell; Judith Forst mez Eunice Hubbell; Matthew Lord ten Steve Hubbell; Jeffrey Lentz ten Young Collector; Josepha Gayer mez Flower Woman
San Francisco Opera Orchestra / André Previn
DG ③ 20/21 459 366-2GX3 (163 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes and text included. Recorded live in 1998

Tennessee Williams always resisted the operatic stage. Requests to turn Streetcar into an opera (and there were, not surprisingly, a good many) were always denied. His plays – and Streetcar in particular – were quite operatic enough without being sung. The music of Williams's poetry was always implicit. And yet … in 1964, as a gesture to composer Lee Hoiby, who underscored his ill-fated Slapstick Tragedy, Williams gave Hoiby the option to adapt any of his plays (including Streetcar) as an opera. Hoiby chose Summer and Smoke. But the door was finally open. André Previn came to it only in 1998. The offer, from Lotfi Mansouri of the San Francisco Opera, was nothing if not timely. After almost half-a-century of writing dramatic music for the movies, for the stage, to say nothing of his recent developments as a songsmith, opera was impatient for his touch. But Streetcar? It's perfect and yet not. The greater part of Previn's success has to do with his respect for, and understanding of, the music of Williams's text. Librettist Philip Littell has done an excellent job of adapting it, but his real challenge (and accomplishment) has been to preserve the play's narrative strength while losing more than an hour of its duration. You don't feel as if you've lost anything.

Previn's word-setting is now well practised and very skilled. His acute awareness of Williams's speech rhythms means that you hear every word. The jokes all land (you can hear the audience testify to that). The poetry takes wing. The tone of the play rings true. Previn's Streetcar begins with the ominous lowing of a tuba and a sleezy, twice-sounded, trumpet-laden chord slurred through too much heat and booze. There is no jazz in Previn's score – just the allusion to it, the smell of it, the flavour of it. The sound world is late, late, Romantic. Berg crossed with Barber and suffused with Britten. The threat of violence restlessly, spikily, agitates just below the surface. Previn's score is rich in atmospherics. But richer yet is the way it takes Williams's lead in aspiring to a heady, ready lyricism where the play and players dare to dream of enchantment, tenderness, hope.

Previn is sparing with this music, but when it comes, it floats, unsullied by the grubbiness, the brutality, of the real world below. And just as Blanche retreats more and more into her imagined world, so Previn's music for her grows more fragrant, more voluptuous, transporting her and us to flightier regions. 'I want magic' is everything – and more – that she craves. Renée Fleming must have been such an inspiration for Previn. Indeed, you cannot imagine another singer of this stature who sounds and looks as one might imagine Blanche to sound and look. But then, you've only got to glance at the production photos in the booklet to see just how carefully, and effectively, the opera has been cast – and all are outstanding.

All in all, then, a considerable piece of work. Not everything sits quite as you would like it to sit, not everything comes off the page. But Previn and Littell and their cast have gone further than you would have thought possible towards effecting a theatrically viable transition from page to musical stage. Opera-goers have their own streetcar, which they board fearfully yet hopefully whenever a new opera comes along; it sounds at that moment very much as though they have stopped at a setting-down point they might actually recognise as Desire.

Sergey Prokofiev Russian 1891-1953

GROVE Prokofiev showed precocious talent as a pianist and composer and had lessons from Glier from 1902. In 1904 he entered the St Petersburg Conservatory, where Rimsky-Korsakov, Lyadov and Tcherepnin were among his teachers; Tcherepnin and Myaskovsky, who gave him valuable support, encouraged his interest in Skryabin, Debussy and Strauss. He had made his début as a pianist in 1908, quickly creating something of a sensation as an enfant terrible, unintelligible and ultra-modern – an image he was happy to cultivate. His intemperateness in his early piano pieces, and later in such works as the extravagantly Romantic Piano Concerto No 1 and the ominous No 2, attracted attention. Then in 1914 he left the conservatory and travelled to London, where he heard Stravinsky's works and gained a commission from Diaghilev: the resulting score was, however, rejected (the music was used to make the Scythian Suite); a second attempt, Chout, was not staged until 1921.

Meanwhile his gifts had exploded in several different directions. In 1917 he finished an opera on Dostoyevsky's Gambler, a violently involved study of obsession far removed from the fantasy of his nearly contemporary Chicago opera The Love for Three Oranges, written in1919 and performed in 1921. Nor does either of these scores have much to do with his Classical Symphony, selfconsciously 18th-century in manner, and again quite distinct from his lyrical Violin Concerto No 1, written at the same period and in the same key. There were also piano sonatas based on old notebooks alongside the more adventurous Visions fugitives, all dating from 1915-19.

Towards the end of this rich period, in 1918, he left for the USA; then from 1920 France became his base. His productivity slowed while he worked at his opera The Fiery Angel, an intense, symbolist fable of good and evil (it had no complete performance until after his death, and he used much of its music in Symphony No 3). After this he brought the harsh, heavy and mechanistic elements in his music to a climax in Symphony No 2 and in the ballet Le pas d'acier, while his next ballet, L'enfant prodigue, is in a much gentler style: the barbaric and the lyrical were still alternatives in his music and not fused until the 1930s, when he began a process of reconciliation with the Soviet Union.

The renewed relationship was at first tentative on both sides. Romeo and Juliet, the full-length ballet commissioned for the Bolshoi, had its première at Brno in 1938, and only later became a staple of the Soviet repertory: its themes of aggression and romantic love provided, as also did the Eisenstein film Alexander Nevsky, a receptacle for Prokofiev's divergent impulses. Meanwhile his own impulse to remain a Westerner was gradually eroded and in 1936 he settled in Moscow, where initially his concern was with the relatively modest genres of song, incidental music, patriotic cantata and children's entertainment (Peter and the Wolf, 1936). He had, indeed, arrived at a peculiarly unfortunate time, when the drive towards socialist realism was at its most intense; and his first work of a more ambitious sort, the opera Semyon Kotko, was not liked.

With the outbreak of war, however, he perhaps found the motivation to respond to the required patriotism: implicitly in a cycle of three piano sonatas (Nos 6-8) and Symphony No 5, more openly in his operatic setting of scenes from Tolstoy's War and Peace, which again offered opportunities for the two extremes of his musical genius to be expressed. He also worked at a new full-length ballet, Cinderella. In 1946 he retired to the country and though he went on composing, the works of his last years have been regarded as a quiet coda to his output. Even his death was overshadowed by that of Stalin on the same day.

Piano Concertos

No 1 in D flat, Op 10; No 2 in G minor, Op 16;
No 3 in C, Op 26; No 4 in B flat, Op 53 (left-hand);
No 5 in G, Op 55

Piano Concertos Nos 1-5
Vladimir Ashkenazy pf
London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn
Decca ② 452 588-2DF2 (126 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1974-75 ●●

While it's true that the Prokofiev piano concertos are an uneven body of work, there's enough imaginative fire and pianistic brilliance to hold the attention even in the weakest of them; the best, by common consent Nos 1, 3 and 4, have stood the test of time very well. As indeed have these Decca recordings. The set first appeared in 1975, but the sound is fresher than many contemporary digital issues, and Ashkenazy has rarely played better. Other pianists have matched his brilliance and energy in, say, the Third Concerto, but very few have kept up such a sure balance of fire and poetry. The astonishingly inflated bravura of the Second Concerto's opening movement is kept shapely and purposeful and even the out-of-tune piano doesn't spoil the effect too much. And the youthful First has the insouciance and zest its 22-year-old composer plainly intended.

Newcomers to the concertos should start with No 3: so many facets of Prokofiev's genius are here, and Ashkenazy shows how they all take their place as part of a kind of fantastic story. But there are rewards everywhere, and the effort involved in finding them is small. Why hesitate?

Piano Concertos Nos 1-5
Vladimir Krainev pf
Frankfurt Radio Symphony Orchestra / Dmitri Kitaienko
Teldec Ultima ② 3984 21038-2 (123 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1991

Far too little heard of in the West, Vladimir Krainev shows how sheerly exciting these concertos can be in the hands of a virtuoso on top form. Here are the dash and flamboyance, the spacious and rhythmic grasp, the balletic poise and acrobatic daredevilry which announce a born Prokofiev player. Only in the Third Concerto, far and away the most popular of the five, does Krainev succumb to the temptations of smash-and-grab overstatement. In this case the first movement pushes forward in a crude, attention-grabbing manner, the second is laboured in places, and the finale is again rather roughly handled. Not that pussy-footing is what Prokofiev needs, but here the impression is of a foreground-only portrait of the music.

The finest performances are of the First, Fourth and Fifth Concertos, all of which have a splendid cut and thrust. Krainev revels in their extravagance and physicality, and he is backed up by beautifully prepared, sensitive orchestral playing. The massive Second Concerto is also fine, though here the recorded balance tends to swallow up important woodwind solo lines in a generalized warmth of ambience (elsewhere, for the most part, this warmth is a definite advantage). This set can hold its own against most of the competition.

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 3[a]
Evgeni Kissin pf
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG 439 898-2GH (42 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Item marked [a] recorded live in 1993 ●

Kissin always seems to have time to acknowledge the implications of Prokofiev's harmony, to allow the left hand to converse with the right (always naturally, never tricksily), and to gauge the relationship of his part to the orchestra. He is also scrupulous with dynamics. At the first entry in the C major Concerto he manages, as few pianists do, the piano contrast after the first three notes without losing soloistic presence. And he resists the temptation to shout out forte passages, so that Prokofiev's fortissimos stand in proper relief, as do his carefully placed accents (hear the opening theme of the same concerto's finale). Perhaps none of that strikes you as exceptional, but it is so in Prokofiev, where the sheer athletic demands are extreme and refinement seems like too much to ask. With a technique like his and an orchestra as responsive as the Berlin Philharmonic there are just a few places in the C major Concerto, such as the final pages, where Kissin might have allowed himself to be a bit more carried away. But there is no shortage of exhilaration in the youthful D flat Concerto, which is a model blend of attack, wit, poetry and drive. In fact there is little discernible difference between this studio recording and the live C major, either in accuracy or in excitement.

It would be wrong to say that Kissin surpasses Ashkenazy (reviewed above). Bronfman on Sony Classical is virtually a match for him and offers the Fifth Concerto in addition. But DG's recording is clearer than the 20-year-old Decca set, and Abbado and the Berliners are far superior to Mehta and the Israel Philharmonic. Full price for 42 minutes of music may seem a bit steep; but what Kissin and Abbado have to offer is certainly in the luxury class.

Prokofiev Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 3
Bartók Piano Concerto No 3, Sz119
Martha Argerich pf
Montreal Symphony Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
EMI 556654-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●●

Martha Argerich's return to the studios in two concertos she has not previously recorded is an uplifting moment. As always with this most mercurial of virtuosos, her playing is generated very much by the mood of the moment, and those who heard her in Prokofiev's First Concerto with Riccardo Muti at London's Royal Festival Hall some years ago – a firestorm of a performance – may well be surprised at her relative geniality with Dutoit. Her entire reading is less hard-driven, her opening arguably more authentically brioso than ferocious, her overall view a refreshingly fanciful view of Prokofiev's youthful iconoclasm. The central Andante assai is inflected with an improvisatory freedom she would probably not have risked earlier in her career and in the Allegro scherzando she trips the light fantastic, reserving a suitably tigerish attack for the final octave bravura display. Again, while her performance of the Third Concerto is less fleet or nimble-fingered than in her early legendary disc for DG with Abbado (reviewed below); it is more delectably alive to passing caprice. Part-writing and expressive detail interest her more than in the past and there is no lack of virtuoso frisson in the first movement's concluding quasi-fugal più mosso chase. Once more Argerich is unusually sensitive in the central Andantino, to the fourth variation's plunge into Slavic melancholy and introspection. Personal and vivacious throughout, she always allows the composer his own voice.

This is true to an even greater extent in Bartók's Third Concerto where her rich experience in chamber music makes her often primus inter pares, a virtuoso who listens to her partners with the greatest care. Dutoit and his orchestra achieve a fine unity throughout. The recordings are clear and naturally balanced and only those in search of metallic thrills and rushes of blood to the head will feel disappointed.

Piano Concerto No 3[a]. Violin Concerto No 1 in D, Op 19[b]. Lieutenant Kijé – Suite, Op 60[c]
[a]Martha Argerich pf [b]Shlomo Mintz vn
[a]Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; [bc]Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG Classikon 439 413-2GCL (69 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded [a]1967, [b]1983, [c]1977

There have been others to match the bustle and brilliance of Argerich's Prokofiev, her coloristic range, her drive, her flashiness, her straining at the leash; but none who has so satisfyingly combined all those qualities, who has given us such a rocket-launched recapitulation in the first movement, such circus-routine vividness in the following variations, or such monstrous, hyperbolic fairy-tale imagery in the finale, and all done with the most engaging reckless abandon. Claudio Abbado has a highly-developed feeling for Prokofiev's sound world. Rarely has the fairy-tale atmosphere of the First Violin Concerto been more keenly evoked. He distills a sense of wonder and enchantment that is quite special. Textures are delicately coloured, dynamic nuances scrupulously observed and there are feather-light string sonorities.

Shlomo Mintz phrases with imagination and individuality; you need only hear the way he shapes the first bars for that to register. He plays with great polish and beauty of tone.

Occasionally he colours a phrase by playing on the flat side of the note though his intonation is fine throughout. Abbado's otherwise excellent Lieutenant Kijé is marred by strange lapses of concentration from the Chicago Symphony Orchestra – split horn notes, a misread in the 'Troïka' (which is probably the movement you would most often want to play for friends) and some dicey solos besides. But mostly it's fine. The slightly grubby double-bass and saxophone solos in the 'Romance' are most characterful. The engineers produce a beautifully refined and homogeneous balance and it is very impressive indeed. There is plenty of space round the instruments and the sound is truthful.

Prokofiev Piano Concerto No 5[a] Rachmaninov 🄷
Piano Concerto No 2 in C minor, Op 18[b]
Sviatoslav Richter pf
Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra / [a]Witold Rowicki, [b]Stanislaw Wislocki
DG 415 119-2GH (58 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1959 ●●

Prokofiev was to find no more dedicated an advocate for his keyboard works than Sviatoslav Richter. So how good that this artist's now legendary account of the Fifth Piano Concerto has been granted a new lease of life on CD. Although it has never really enjoyed the popularity of Prokofiev's Nos 1 and 3, here, however, attention is riveted from the very first note to the last. Richter delights in the music's rhythmic vitality and bite, its melodic and harmonic unpredictability. Both piano and orchestra are so clearly and vividly reproduced that it is difficult to believe the recording is actually 35 years old. Though betraying its age slightly more, notably in the sound of the keyboard itself, Rachmaninov's No 2 is certainly no less gripping. Not all of Richter's tempos conform to the score's suggested metronome markings, but his intensity is rivalled only by his breathtaking virtuosity. Never could the work's opening theme sound more laden, more deeply and darkly Russian.

Symphony-Concerto (for cello)

Symphony-Concerto in E minor, Op 125[a]. Cello Sonata in C, Op 119[b]
Han-Na Chang vc [a]London Symphony Orchestra / Antonio Pappano [b]pf Ⓕ
EMI 557438-2 (62 minutes: DDD) ●●●

Chang and Pappano offer a fiercely communicative Symphony-Concerto (nb: EMI has unhelpfully reverted to the outmoded nomenclature of Sinfonia Concertante) and an equally distinctive, though more conventionally ruminative account of the Sonata.

It is fair to assume that the Korean cellist is the youngest exponent of these pieces on disc, and it shows in the best possible way as her youthful vivacity meets Prokofiev's mature style. Although still in her teens, she is an experienced, even mature recording artist with several fine discs under her belt. Her taut, ardent conception of the main work here, music that can often come across as rambling and discursive, is the most radical thing she has done, knocking minutes off the timings of almost every previous recording. The first movement is perfectly pitched, never self-indulgent, and it is easy to forgive any momentary lack of unanimity when editing might have impaired the forward thrust of the music-making. Chang's authoritative style reaps huge rewards from 7'25", where the theme sings out in the very highest register.

The central scherzo is sensationally swift and articulate but deeply felt too, with more emotional as well as physical precision than in previous performances barring Rostropovich's own. Prokofiev's sometimes wan lyricism is revivified by Chang's refined sensibility; her phrasing truly breathes with the music and the vulnerable, confessional quality she reveals may well bring a tear to the eye. Autumnal half-lights are usually more potent for being strictly rationed, and Pappano is forthright as well as 'sensitive', giving us some minatory, Soviet-sounding brass interventions amid the hustle and bustle.

Of course, it's not only the refined direction that brings new colour, clarity and lustre to Prokofiev's orchestral fabric. EMI's sound is genuinely top-notch, and you may be taken aback to discover just how terrific this orchestra can sound in a sympathetic recording studio. The cellist is placed closer than would be the case in live concert, but such technically invulnerable playing can take it.

Han-Na Chang's disc is quite superb.

Violin Concertos

No 1 in D, Op 19; No 2 in G minor, Op 63

Prokofiev Violin Concerto No 2 in G minor, Op 63
Glazunov Violin Concerto in A minor, Op 82
Tchaikovsky Souvenir d'un lieu cher, Op 42 – No 1, Méditation (orch Glazunov)
Nikolaj Znaider vn Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Mariss Jansons
RCA Red Seal 74321 87454-2 Ⓕ
(57 minutes: DDD) ●

Znaider's confident, abundantly characterful account of the Prokofiev is probably the finest since Vadim Repin's similarly stimulating 1995 version with Nagano and the Hallé. Znaider brings an extra lyrical ardour and tender intimacy to Prokofiev's soaring melodies, not to mention a greater rhythmic swagger in the finale. But what really lifts this account to special heights is the chamber-like rapport and concentration Znaider generates with Mariss Jansons and the Bavarian Radio SO, whose playing is a model of scrupulous observation and profound musicality. Time and again, these intelligent artists will have you gasping anew at the giddy beauty and wondrous fantasy of Prokofiev's stunningly inventive inspiration, and theirs is a strongly communicative performance which grips from first measure to last.

The Glazunov receives a reading notable for its refreshing thoughtfulness and unforced, 'old world' charm. By the side of the dazzlingly slick Vengerov, Znaider emerges as an altogether more personable and imaginative story-teller, yet there's heaps of panache and twinkling affection when needed, and his playing has none of the slight technical shortcomings that take the shine off Shaham's less distinctive account.

A slight niggle concerns the slightly up-front solo balance, which imparts a certain nasal wiriness to Znaider's tone in the upper reaches.

Prokofiev Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2[a]
Glazunov Violin Concerto[b]
Maxim Vengerov vn; [a]London Symphony Orchestra / Mstislav Rostropovich; [b]Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
Warner Elatus 0927-49567-2 (DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1994, [b]1995 ●
Prokofiev No 1 is a 1995 Gramophone Award winner

Vengerov and Rostropovich take an unashamedly epic, wide-open-steppes view of Prokofiev's First Concerto rather than the pseudo-Ravelian one posited by Chung/Previn and Mintz/Abbado, but it works at least as well. His tone is gloriously rich, every note hit dead centre. Closely observed digital recording uncovers a wealth of detail, most of it welcome. Towards the end of the first movement, the approach to the reprise of the opening melody on solo flute with harp, muted strings and lightly running tracery from the soloist is very deliberately taken, and the long-breathed finale builds to a passionate, proto-Soviet climax. The central scherzo is predictably breathtaking in its virtuosity. However committed you are to alternative interpretations, this demands to be heard.

No 2 is slightly less successful. The balance is partly to blame – the orchestra a remote presence, the soloist rather too closely scrutinised – but there is also a lack of intimacy in the interpretation itself. Even if the finale has its impressive passages, there isn't quite enough light-hearted Spanishry in a piece written not to Soviet order but for Robert Soëtans to play in Madrid. Vengerov's sometimes 'over- wrought' manner, though, fits this music like a glove.

Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2.
Solo Violin Sonata in D, Op 115
Gil Shaham vn
London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn
DG 447 758-2GH (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Rarely, if ever, have there been performances where soloist, orchestra and conductor all connect with such unerring intuition, where the music is treated so naturally. Previn ushers in the First Concerto's crystalline opening with gentle intensity, thereby raising the curtain for Gil Shaham's warmly tended first entry. Both make great play with the march theme that follows. The effect is almost like spicy gossip being shared between friends; the Scherzo, meanwhile, is equally rich in dialogue. Shaham's tone is at its most expressive at the beginning of the third movement, and at its most delicate just prior to the last big climax. This natural exegesis extends to the darker Second Concerto, even where Shaham or Previn linger about a particular phrase. The recording, too, is very impressive, with well defined string lines and a fine body of winds, brass and percussion. Note how, beyond the raucous happenings of the second movement's central episode, the violins waft back with the principal theme (at 6'56"). Similar felicities occur regularly throughout both concertos, while the Second's finale – a riotous and slightly tongue-in-cheek danse macabre – is here sensibly paced and very well articulated. As if all that weren't enough, Shaham treats us to a substantial encore in the lively Solo Sonata that Prokofiev intended to be performed in unison by a group of young players.

Additional recommendations

Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Coupling: Tchaikovsky Sérénade mélancolique
Josefowicz vn
Montreal Symphony Orchestra / Dutoit
Philips 462 592-2PH (61 minutes: DDD: 12/01) Ⓕ

Thoroughly individualistic playing; Josefowicz is really inside this music and knows exactly the effect she's trying to pull off – at times a little brutal but never bland.

Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2[a]
Couplings: Overture on Jewish Themes. Classical Symphony. March in B flat
Mintz vn; [a]Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Abbado
DG Masters 445 607-2GMA (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1983

An impressive account. With lustrous tone and immaculate technical address, Mintz cuts a commanding figure. Abbado secures immaculate accompaniments, and the sound is bold yet refined to match.

Cinderella

Cinderella[a]. Symphony No 1[b]
London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn
EMI Double Forte ② 568604-2
127 minutes: [a]DDD/[b]ADD). Synopsis included Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1983, [b]1977

Previn's admirable Cinderella appeared originally on LP in 1983 but was never transferred to CD in its entirety, EMI opting for a single-disc 'highlights' compilation. It has come up quite beautifully in this transfer, the Abbey Road production (Grubb/Parker) possessing a most appealing warmth and lustre.

Previn's imaginative, highly sympathetic direction combines warm-hearted affection as well as a most seductive theatrical flair (the whole of Act 2 is particularly memorable in this regard). Throughout, the LSO responds with considerable dash and character: occasionally, the strings are wanting in the last ounce of finesse and absolute technical security, but the woodwind contribution is especially felicitous. Comparing it with the immaculately honed but comparatively chilly Pletnev set, many may prefer this keenly priced reissue. Unfortunately, the 'bonus' item – an enthusiastic, but distractingly scrappy Classical Symphony is far from ideal. No matter, a bargain all the same.

Peter and the Wolf

Peter and the Wolf[a]. Symphony No 1. March in B flat minor, Op 99. Overture on Hebrew Themes, Op 34*bis*[b]
[a]Sting narr [b]Stefan Vladar pf
Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Claudio Abbado
DG 429 396-2GH (50 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1986-90 ●

Abbado and the multi-talented Sting offer a lively and beautifully crafted account of Prokofiev's ever popular Peter and the Wolf. Any fears that the original freshness of Prokofiev's creation may be lost in favour of a less formal approach are soon dispelled – Sting is an effective and intelligent storyteller capable of capturing the imagination of adults and children alike, and there is never a feeling of contrivance or mere gimmickry. (The rest of the set is reviewed under Symphony No 1 overleaf.)

Romeo and Juliet

Cleveland Orchestra / Lorin Maazel
Decca Double ② 452 970-2DF2 (141 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Synopsis included. Recorded 1973 ●●

It was George Szell who made the Cleveland Orchestra into a highly responsive virtuoso body, and when he died in 1970 he was in due course succeeded by Lorin Maazel, himself a renowned orchestral trainer. Here is Maazel's first Cleveland recording of Prokofiev's masterpiece, Romeo and Juliet, notable for a quite outstanding quality of orchestral playing. The strings in particular have a remarkable depth of tone, though they play with great delicacy when it is needed; but then the orchestra as a whole plays with extraordinary virtuosity, tonal weight and exactness of ensemble. If the woodwind have a somewhat piquant blend this suits the music, which is admirably served by Maazel's highly rhythmic, dramatic conducting. This vibrant complete recording, reissued yet again on CD, has the added advantage of being at mid-price and there is a useful synopsis in the notes. If the orchestral playing is a notable feature, so is the high-quality recording, which is well balanced and wide in range. It suffers little beside the best of today and is indeed a tribute to the excellent standards which Decca engineers achieved in the early 1970s. There are many fine versions in the catalogue but none surpasses this for passionate feeling, extraordinary orchestral virtuosity and colour. The Cleveland never made a finer recording than this.

Romeo and Juliet, Op 64
London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn
EMI Double Forte ② 568607-2
(149 minutes: ADD). Notes included Ⓜ
Recorded 1973

It is good to have André Previn's set of Romeo and Juliet restored to circulation at such a reasonable price. The EMI recording (masterminded by Christopher Parker) still sounds pretty sumptuous and the legendary Kingsway bloom remains mercifully intact on CD. Compared with Maazel's dazzlingly assured Clevelanders, Previn's hard-working London Symphony Orchestra can sound just a touch cautious and technically fallible. Yet Previn's affectionate, wittily pointed reading has its place too: many will rightly respond to its sense of easy spontaneity, tender restraint and unaffected honesty. It is, in sum, a more relaxed, less relentlessly high-powered affair than his distinguished transatlantic rivals, but no less compelling for all of that.

Romeo and Juliet, Op 64
Kirov Theatre Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips 50 Great Recordings ② 464 726-2PM2 Ⓜ
(144 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1990

This great ballet score has been very lucky on records. Both Previn's EMI set and the Decca Maazel recording, are very distinguished and make a powerful impression on the listener. This Russian recording could not be more different. It was made in the Kirov Theatre in Leningrad and has the fullness and amplitude characteristic of the finest western recordings, not surprising, as the recording team was from Philips. The orchestral playing, too, is superb by any international standard and has none of the sharp edges or raucousness we used to associate with Soviet fortissimos. Indeed, if there were a criticism of the playing it would be to suggest it is at times almost over-cultivated. The Introduction has a striking grace and flexibility, a sophistication of light and shade that some listeners might not expect. The action of the opening street scene and the sequence of events which follows is delineated with much delicacy of effect, crisp clear rhythms, great energy when called for, in the 'Morning dance', for instance and the most stylish instrumental response from all departments of the orchestra.

Perhaps it is all a shade mellow (Maazel demonstrated how pungent Prokofiev's scoring could sound) and the mood of the 'Balcony scene' is pure romanticism, relaxed and without sexual ardour: the strings float ethereally, there is a beautifully played violin solo, and at the climax the listener is quite carried away. The great climax of 'Juliet's funeral' (track 20) generates richly intense string playing and resoundingly powerful brass. But there is no sense of utter despair. So this is a performance to enjoy for the lyric feeling of Prokofiev's score and for the marvellous orchestral playing, but the starkness of the tragedy is more heartrendingly conveyed elsewhere.

Complete Symphonies

No 1 in D, Op 25, 'Classical'; No 2 in D minor, Op 40; No 3 in C minor, Op 44; No 4 in C, Op 47 (original 1930 version); No 4 in C, Op 112 (revised 1947 version); No 5 in B flat, Op 100; No 6 in E flat minor, Op 111; No 7 in C sharp minor, Op 131

Symphonies Nos 1-7
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Chandos ④ CHAN8931/4 Ⓕ
(260 minutes: DDD) ○○○

Awards 1985

Prokofiev was not a natural symphonist. Albeit successful in emulating Haydn in the Classical Symphony, the Sixth Symphony is his only undisputed integrated symphonic structure (and an epic-tragic utterance as intense as any by Shostakovich). It has been suggested that his symphonies all have a sense of some unstaged scenario, and the Third and Fourth (and to a lesser extent, the Seventh) Symphonies actually rework material from his music for the stage. The Fourth (in both versions) in particular fails to convince as a symphony owing to the profusion and individuality of its often strikingly beautiful thematic ideas – it's a real patchwork quilt of a piece.

Enter Neeme Järvi, nothing if not a man of the theatre, to give maximum dramatic intensity and character to all Prokofiev's ideas, whether they add up symphonically or not; capable of overawing his Scottish forces into playing of aerial lightness and easeful lyricism in the Classical Symphony, and pulling no punches where Prokofiev's inspiration (as in the Second and Third Symphonies) is at its most strident, violent and hysterical.

Make no mistake, though, these are also readings of real stature: where there is symphonic 'line', Järvi unerringly finds it. Drawbacks? Some may feel the need for a deeper pile of string sound, particularly in the Fifth Symphony; and these typically spacious Chandos productions do not always ensure adequate projection for the woodwind, but more often than not one cannot fail to be impressed by the coherence and co-ordination, both musically and technically, of some of this century's most fabulous and fraught orchestral essays. As a cycle, this is unlikely to be challenged for some time.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 5

Symphony No 1. Peter and the Wolf[a]. March in B flat minor, Op 99. Overture on Hebrew Themes, Op 34*bis*[b]
[a]Sting narr [b]Stefan Vladar pf
Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Claudio Abbado
DG 429 396-2GH (50 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1986-90 ●

Abbado's elegant and graceful reading of the Classical Symphony is one of the finest in the catalogue, and is particularly notable for its beautifully shaped phrasing, clarity of inner detail and crisp articulation. He seems to make all the right choices at all the right tempos. His first movement, the right side of measured, is dapper in the best sense and marked by keen detailing in the fugal development: note the clinching flourish in the timpani line – an exciting touch. Everywhere is elegance and rhythmic grace. Abbado's strings tread air through the Larghetto, the finale is indeed molto vivace with quicksilver articulation from the COE woodwinds, chortling and darting in and around the bar-lines. Abbado and the multi-talented Sting offer a lively and beautifully crafted account of Prokofiev's ever popular Peter and the Wolf. Any fears that the original freshness of Prokofiev's creation may be lost in favour of a less formal approach are soon dispelled – Sting is an effective and intelligent storyteller capable of capturing the imagination of adults and children alike, and there is never a feeling of contrivance or mere gimmickry.

The orchestral playing is a real delight too; sharply characterised and performed with great affection. The Overture on Hebrew Themes is more commonly heard in its drier, more acerbic version for clarinet, piano and string quartet, but makes a welcome and refreshing appearance on this disc in Prokofiev's own arrangement for small orchestra. The spry March in B flat is a wartime novelty which seems to scent victory: it's a little like Kijé's Wedding march with a twist from a certain Three Oranges – this version of it will do very nicely.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 5
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan Ⓜ
DG Galleria 437 253-2GGA (71 minutes: ADD). ○○○

The playing throughout the First Symphony is beautifully cultured and there is wonderful lightness and delicacy. The first movement could sparkle more and the same could be said of the finale, yet the slow movement is very beautiful indeed. The sound has marvellous clarity and definition as well as exemplary range. Even more than 30 years after its first release, Karajan's Fifth Symphony still remains incomparable. The playing has wonderful tonal sophistication and Karajan judges tempos to perfection so that the proportions seem quite perfect. The recording, too, is extremely well balanced and has excellent ambience, and this reissue strikes you as smoother and more refined than both the original LP and any previous reissue. No other available version of this symphony begins to match this in distinction and stature. Even at full price this would still sweep the board and at its mid-price level it is a clear first choice.

Prokofiev Symphony No 5^{a}
Stravinsky The Rite of Spring^{b}
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra /
Herbert von Karajan
DG The Originals 463 613-2GOR
(78 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded ^{a}1968 and ^{b}1977 ○○○

Karajan's 1968 Prokofiev Fifth is a great performance. Whenever one compares it with later versions inevitably the DG account holds its place at the top of the list. The analogue recording was uncommonly good for its time. With the advantage of the Jesus-Christus Kirche acoustics, the sound is full and spacious, naturally defined and balanced; there is a slightly leonine quality to the strings and a natural bloom on woodwind and brass. Karajan lived with the work for a decade before he recorded it and this is immediately apparent in the way the first movement unfolds so inevitably. The ironic opening of the Scherzo with its flawless BPO articulation brings a splendid but unexaggerated bite, and in the more lyrical central section every subtle detail of colour comes over. The passionate string threnody of the Adagio (what playing, what intensity!) is superbly underpinned by darker wind murmurings; the tangibly hushed close leads naturally to the mellower opening of the essentially upbeat finale with its throbbing horns and instant echoes of Romeo and Juliet.

Karajan's Rite of Spring came a decade later and is more controversial. Stravinsky had been sarcastically scathing about the conductor's earlier 1964 account, even describing one section as 'tempo di hoochie-koochie'. So, Karajan let the work rest, and when he re-recorded it in January 1977 it was done in one single uninterrupted take. The result has less visceral excitement than the composer's own version and is without the brutally barbaric precision of Muti's Philadelphia account (HMV Classics), or the unrelenting thrust and tautness of Solti. But it is still very rewarding, combining both the symphonic and balletic aspects of this extraordinary score, with the BPO providing much sheer beauty of sound, as in the ravishing melancholy of the opening of Part II and the haunting 'Evocation des ancêtres', although other versions find more pungent drama when the horns enter later (track 17, 1'51"). The Philharmonie sound is excellent and both CD transfers are expertly managed to retain the full character of the originals.

Symphony No 5. Scythian Suite, Op 20
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra /
Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 754577-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

Here is a Prokofiev Fifth as vibrant, intelligent and meticulously prepared as you'd expect from this partnership. In the mighty opening movement, there's real mystery about those fairy-tale slumberings at the start of the development, and how naturally Rattle quickens the pulse during the pages which follow, the sense of expectancy and adventure palpably conveyed. Enter the coda, and Rattle's expertly graduated dynamics ensure a riveting succession of spectacular climaxes. Here, too, EMI's impressive recording opens out magnificently. Rattle's scherzo is a marvellously quick-witted conception, the slow movement etched with genuine tenderness and bustling good humour reigns supreme in the spirited finale. The coupling is a stunning Scythian Suite, combining foundation-threatening pagan spectacle and heart-stopping beauty in ideal equilibrium. Brilliant!

Cello Sonatas etc

Cello Concertino in G minor, Op 132 – Andante. Cello Sonata in C, Op 119. Solo Cello Sonata in C sharp minor, Op 134 (ed Giovale). Adagio in C, Op 97*b* No 10. Ballade in C minor, Op 15. Chout, Op 21*a* (arr Sapozhnikov) – The Buffoon and his Wife; Dance of the Buffoons' Wives; Dance of the Buffoons' Daughters; In the Merchant's Bedroom; Quarrel of the Buffoon and the Merchant
Alexander Ivashkin vc Tatyana Lazareva pf
Chandos CHAN10045 Ⓕ
(68 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002

Captured in the Maly Hall of the Moscow Conservatory where much of Prokofiev's work was first heard, it is surprising to find so many aspects of the composer's style represented, from the Romanticism of the early Ballade through the spiky dissonances of Chout to the elegiac, unfinished Solo Sonata. Aided by characterful piano-playing by Tatyana Lazareva, Ivashkin's recital compares most favourably with his similar programme on Ode for which he was accompanied by a more reticent pianist; although the earlier disc includes the Concertino movement in the guise of Rostropovich's cello quintet arrangement, the absence of the Chout transmogrification makes the Chandos collection appear better value.

We start with the familiar Cello (and piano) Sonata, a highly polished and deeply felt account with Lazareva providing a weighty, authentically Russian accompaniment. The Ballade is surely the best version yet of this increasingly popular work. Good though Wallfisch's expansive reading is, Ivashkin surpasses him in his juxtaposition of the 19th-century style of the opening and the ghostly second idea, hushed to a real pianissimo. Instead of Wallfisch's 'March' from The Love for Three Oranges, we get a Chout selection arranged by the Russian cellist Roman Sapozhnikov; again the rendition is technically spotless. Finally comes the Sonata for cello alone, its nostalgic opening brought off perfectly. Ivashkin's playful treatment of the central gavotte-like section reminds us that he can do humour as well.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas – No 1 in F minor, Op 80; No 2 in D, Op 94*a*. Five Melodies, Op 35*b*
Vadim Repin vn Boris Berezovsky pf
Erato 0630-10698-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

A clear first choice in this repertoire and heartening confirmation of the young Vadim Repin's considerable violinistic skills. Tension sets in right from the First Sonata's opening bars: the tone is bright, sweet, tremulous and warmly expressive, while the music's sombre mood is precisely gauged. Repin phrases with considerable sensitivity and his attack in the work's faster episodes – the Allegro brusco's outer sections and most of the finale – has a Heifetzian 'edge'. Nervous energy is also much in evidence, while the Andante – one of Prokofiev's most haunting creations – has a wistfully distracted air that Boris Berezovsky matches with some notably perceptive piano playing. The Allegrissimo finale, too, is arresting: deftly fingered, percussively insistent and with a truly heartfelt projection of the work's tender closing phrase. One of Repin's leading qualities is his obvious interpretative sincerity; nowhere does one sense the suave affectation that afflicts some of his contemporaries, a fact that registers with particular force in the Second Sonata's opening Moderato. Here lesser artists often sound either matter-of-fact or uninterested, and even superior ones opt for relative coolness. Repin and Berezovsky, on the other hand, are both tender and relaxed; phrasal 'crossfire' and keen inflexion keep sparks flying in the Scherzo, the Allegretto leggiero e scherzando is appropriately limpid, and although the finale could have swaggered more freely, there are magical moments to spare. Both players achieve an impressive range of colour throughout and the five delightful Melodies make for a welcome sequence of encores. Very well recorded.

Prokofiev Violin Sonata in D, Op 94*a* Ⓗ
K Khachaturian Violin Sonata, Op 1
Szymanowski Violin Sonata in D minor, Op 9
David Oistrakh vn Vladimir Yampolsky pf
Testament mono SBT1113 (65 minutes: ADD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1955

David Oistrakh's playing is, at its best, a calming force in an agitated world – intelligent, considered (just occasionally overcalculated), invariably poised, big-toned and confident. You know what to expect and are rarely disappointed; and these excellent refurbishments of key Oistrakh performances from the 1950s lend a characteristic narrative quality to a wide variety of repertoire.

Best perhaps is the Prokofiev sonata, which Oistrakh himself instigated in reaction to hearing the flute-and-piano original. The playing is quietly confidential in the first and third movements, pert in the Scherzo and exuberant in the closing Allegro con brio. Oistrakh's phrasing is incisive without sounding aggressive (most notes retain their full measure of tone, even at speed), while his handling of rhythm is both supple and muscular. Szymanowski's post-Romantic Op 9 is lusciously full-toned and expertly negotiated by Yampolsky, while the reading of Karen Khachaturian's Op 1 – a pleasant piece reminiscent of Kabalevsky, the lighter Shostakovich and, occasionally, Gershwin – proves to be another masterly performance, especially in the delightful Andante.

All in all, this is a quite superb disc, expertly annotated and very well presented. The Prokofiev Second Sonata is as near 'definitive' as anyone has a right to expect, while the remainder is typical of a violinist whose aristocratic playing and artistic diplomacy were – and remain – an inspiration to us all.

Piano Sonatas

No 1 in F minor, Op 1; No 2 in D minor, Op 14; No 3 in A minor, Op 28; No 4 in C minor, Op 29; No 5 in C, Opp 38/135; No 6 in A, Op 82; No 7 in B flat, Op 83; No 8 in B flat, Op 84; No 9 in C, Op 103; No 10 in E minor, Op 137
Prokofiev Piano Sonata No 4 in C minor, Op 29 Rachmaninov Etudes-tableaux, Op 39 – No 3 in F sharp minor; No 4 in B minor
Scriabin Piano Sonata No 9, 'Black Mass', Op 68
Tchaikovsky The Seasons, Op 37a – January; May; June; November
Sviatoslav Richter pf
BBC Legends/IMG Artists BBCL4082-2 Ⓕ
(67 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1966 OO

Recorded live at Richter's beloved Aldeburgh in 1966, this issue shows an incomparable pianist at the height of his powers. Indeed, it would be difficult to imagine a more authentic yet personal voice in Prokofiev's Fourth and Scriabin's Ninth Sonatas. Richter carved out a special niche in Prokofiev's Fourth Sonata, the most cryptic and ambiguous of the series written in a language that can seem oddly exclusive and inaccessible to those born outside Russia. No other pianist in my experience has approached Richter in this work, in his capacity to clarify so much awkward writing while at the same time (in the central Andante assai) acknowledging a wholly individual utterance full of dark confidences and, in the finale, a forced gaiety alive with stiff virtuoso challenges resolved in a mock-triumphant coda.

Few performances of the Scriabin have been more stealthily mobile or breathed a more satanic menace. For once, directions such as avec une douceur de plus en plus caressante et empoisonnée are made meaningful rather than merely idiosyncratic or eccentric. Yet, in more amiable territory Richter is enviably poised, less remote or enigmatic in Mozart's G major Sonata, K283, than one might have expected. His opening Allegro is gently flowing and is memorably contrasted with his brilliantly vivacious finale.

The recordings have come up excellently, allowing us to appreciate Richter's range, unique empathy in Russian music and endlessly thought-provoking musicianship in all their glory.

Prokofiev Piano Sonata No 8. Visions fugitives, Op 22 – Nos 3, 6 and 9
Debussy Estampes. Préludes, Book 1 – Voiles; Le vent dans la plaine; Les collines d'Anacapri
Scriabin Piano Sonata No 5 in F sharp, Op 53
Sviatoslav Richter pf
DG Dokumente 423 573-2GDO Ⓜ
(67 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1963 ●●●

Sviatoslav Richter has long been one of the most dedicated champions of Prokofiev's keyboard music, with the Eighth Sonata always particularly close to his heart. It would certainly be hard to imagine a more profoundly and intensely experienced performance than that to which we are treated here, or indeed one that demonstrates a greater degree of keyboard mastery. After the yearning introspection of the temperamental opening movement and the Andante's evocation of a more gracious past, the rhythmic tension and sheer might of sonority he conjures in the finale make it is not difficult to understand why the composer's biographer, I V Nestyev, suspected some underlying programme culminating in 'heroic troops resolutely marching ahead, ready to crush anything in their path'. In the uniquely Prokofievian fantasy of the three brief Visions fugitives he is wholly bewitching. As for the Fifth Sonata of Scriabin, his impetuous start at once reveals his understanding of its manic extremities of mood. For just these Russian performances alone, this excellently refurbished disc can without any doubt be hailed as a collector's piece. And as a bonus there is Debussy too, with infinite subtleties of tonal shading to heighten atmospheric evocation.

Additional recommendation
Prokofiev Piano Sonatas Nos 7 and 8
Coupling: Romeo and Juliet, Op 75 – Masks; Romeo and Juliet before departing Liszt Impromptu, S191. Mephisto Waltz No 1, S514
Ashkenazy pf
Decca Legends 468 497-2DM (72 minutes: ADD: 10/71 and 10/68) Ⓜ

Ashkenazy's recording of Prokofiev's Seventh Sonata is among the most brilliant on disc, its slow movement less emollient than usual, the outer ones dispatched with fierce motoric energy. Tremendous playing.

Alexander Nevsky

Alexander Nevsky, Op 78. Scythian Suite, Op 20
Linda Finnie sop Scottish National Chorus and Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Chandos CHAN8584 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included

At the chill opening of Järvi's fine version of Alexander Nevsky one can really feel the bitter wind of the Russian winter. The acoustics of the Caird Hall in Dundee where these Chandos recordings were made adds an extra atmospheric dimension to this splendidly recorded performance. The choral entry has an affecting poised melancholy, yet their geniality in the call to 'Arise ye Russian people' has a ring of peasantry. The 'Battle on the Ice' is the enormously spectacular climax, with the bizarre dissonance of the orchestral scherzando effects given tremendous pungency capped by the exhilarating shouts of fervour from the singers. Linda Finnie's contribution is most eloquent too and Järvi's apotheosis very moving. The fortissimo force of Chandos's recording is especially telling. As a coupling, Järvi chooses the ballet Ala and Lolly, originally written for Diaghilev which, when rejected by him, became the Scythian Suite. Its aggressive motoric rhythms are as powerful as anything Prokofiev wrote (indeed, their primitive force has an element of almost brutal ugliness to which you may not wholly respond) but the lyrical music is top-quality Prokofiev. 'It remains one of his most richly imaginative, harmonically sophisticated and wonderfully atmospheric scores', suggests Robert Layton in the notes. Certainly Järvi has its measure and so do the Chandos engineers, but it's not music for a small flat.

Ivan the Terrible, Op 116

Liubov Sokolova mez Nikolai Putilin bar Chorus of the Kirov Opera; Rotterdam Philharmonic Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips 456 645-2PH (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1996

This studio account of Ivan ranks with the best of Gergiev's opera recordings. Of course, recommending just one version for the collection is not easy when the work, rather like the film itself, does not exist in a definitive form. Part 1 of Eisenstein's masterpiece was released in 1946 to worldwide acclaim, although Stravinsky for one did not care for its mix of iconography and melodrama. Prokofiev's health was so poor that he recommended that Gavriil Popov take over as composer for Part 2. Later he was able to resume work on the project – only to find it withheld from distribution. Soviet officials found its portrayal of Ivan's psychological decline too negative and, no doubt, too close to home. Which is not to say that Prokofiev intended to encode any criticism of Stalin in the notes. The film was released in the USSR in 1958 by which time plans to complete the trilogy had been abandoned, its prime movers long dead. Prokofiev thought highly enough of the score to reuse sections of it, but he left no guidelines for presenting it in the concert hall. Reshaping the music to fit a chronological narrative, Abram Stasevich fabricated an overlong oratorio. Gergiev's version is based on Stasevich; only here the music is left to fend for itself without the interpolated Russian texts. The Russian choir and some notably forward timpani help Gergiev to build the right atmosphere. The wide vibrato of his young mezzo is nothing if not authentic and there will be no complaints about the robust singing of Nikolai Putilin. James Agee acclaimed the film as 'A visual opera, with all of opera's proper disregard of prose-level reality' but if you want to experience the music divorced from the images, then Gergiev's account is among the most sheerly dramatic.

Ivan the Terrible – complete film music
Irina Chistyakova contr Dmitry Stepanovich bass
Vesna Children's Choir; Yurlov State Capella; Tchaikovsky Symphony Orchestra / Vladimir Fedoseyev
Nimbus ② NI5662/3 (99 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

The present issue is a must for completists in that it is produced in association with a new edition of the score (1997), collating all that survives of the composer's contribution to the project. Indeed, Fedoseyev goes so far as to include music from the Russian Orthodox Liturgy that occurs in the completed films but is not actually by Prokofiev.

Confused? Let's recap. Part 1 of Eisenstein's masterpiece was released in 1946 to worldwide acclaim, though Stravinsky for one did not care for its mix of iconography and melodrama. In poor health, Prokofiev recommended that Gavriil Popov take over as composer for Part 2. Later he did after all resume work – only to find the film withheld from distribution. Soviet officials found its portrayal of Ivan's psychological decline too negative and, no doubt, too close to home. Which is not to say that Prokofiev intended to encode any criticism of Stalin in the notes. The film was released in the USSR in 1958, by which time plans to complete the trilogy had been abandoned, its prime movers long dead.

We know Prokofiev thought highly enough of the score to re-use sections of it, but he left no guidelines for presenting it in the concert hall. The oratorio we always used to hear was fashioned in 1962 by Abram Stasevich; it provided the missing element of continuity by reshaping the cues to fit a chronological narrative. Muti recorded this to superb effect. Christopher Palmer's solution for Järvi was to dispense with Stasevich's interpolated speaker, whereas Rostropovich revived the melodramatic element in an edition by Michael Lankester with English-language narration (Sony Classical – nla). Gergiev's forceful version left the music to fend for itself, but was still based on Stasevich.

By cutting out the middleman, Fedoseyev now goes to the top of the heap as the most scholarly option. He produces a more convincing, well-prepared performance than many that have come out of Russia of late. Not all of what he presents is familiar even from the films, and there is a certain amount of crudely illustrative material. His orchestra, the present-day manifestation of the USSR broadcasting band with which Rozhdestvensky was associated in the 1960s and 1970s, acquits itself well: crude primary colours predominate, and the brass players avoid inauthentic finesse. Gergiev has only the mock-Soviets of the Rotterdam Philharmonic, though his Kirov chorus are not outclassed by the Yurlov State Capella deployed here. Admittedly, Fedoseyev's contralto is extremely Russian, which you may find difficult in 'The song of the beaver'. Nor does he race in with quite Gergiev's irresistible flair. That said, Nimbus's Moscow-made recording is technically much better than you might expect.

The two-disc package includes a helpful account of the working methods of Prokofiev and Eisenstein, while key episodes are discussed in more depth and cross-referenced to the relevant tracks. Eisenstein's fraught relationship with the authorities and the suppression of Ivan Part 3 are also discussed, an attempt being made to disentangle the score from its inescapably propagandist aspect. True, the project's public role as a glorification of Soviet tyranny need not be as dominant as it can seem to be in Stasevich's oratorio. Whether it is better served here may depend on your attitude to listening to music in short, sharp (albeit authenticated) bursts.

Betrothal in a Monastery

Nikolai Gassiev ten Don Jerome; Alexander Gergalov bar Ferdinand; Anna Netrebko sop Louisa; Larissa Diadkova contr Duenna; Evgeny Akimov ten Antonio; Marianna Tarassova mez Clara; Sergei Alexashkin bass Mendoza; Yuri Shkliar bass Don Carlos
Kirov Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips ③ 462 107-2PH3 (153 minutes: DDD).
Notes, text and translation included. Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1997

Prokofiev's genial Betrothal in a Monastery may not be his most consistently inspired score, but it is immensely likeable. The Bolshoi recording under Alexander Lazarev on Melodiya is sadly no longer available, and though the slightly saltier Bolshoi style feels more appropriate here than the smoother Kirov, Valery Gergiev is more than a match for his colleague.

There's precious little to choose between the two casts, generally speaking the male roles are slightly more successful at the Bolshoi (in particular Alexei Maslennikov's Don Jerome is superior to the initially rather hoarse Nikolai Gassiev), while the female ones are better at the Kirov (this goes especially for Anna Netrebko's mellifluous Louisa). Both Duennas are appropriately fruity. The Moscow chorus savours its chance to cavort as drunken monks in Act 4 even more than do its St Petersburg counterparts. Philips very usefully provide text and translation.

The Fiery Angel

Awards 1996

Galina Gorchakova sop Renata; Sergei Leiferkus bar Ruprecht; Vladimir Galusin ten Agrippa; Konstantin Pluzhnikov ten Mephistopheles; Sergei Alexashkin bass Faust; Vladimir Ognovanko bass Inquisitor; Evgeni Boitsov ten Jakob Glock; Valery Lebed bass Doctor; Yuri Laptev ten Mathias; Mikhail Kit bar Servant; Evgenia Perlasova mez Landlady; Larissa Diadkova mez Fortune teller; Olga Markova-Mikhailenko contr Mother Superior; Yevgeny Fedotov bass Innkeeper; Mikhail Chernozhukov bass First Neighbour; Andrei Karabanov bar Second Neighbour; Gennadi Bezzubenkov bass Third Neighbour; Tatiana Kravtsova sop First Nun; Tatiana Filimoniva sop Second Nun
Chorus and Orchestra of the Kirov Opera / Valery Gergiev
Philips ② 446 078-2PH2 (119 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live in1993 ●●●

The opera is no blameless masterpiece – Prokofiev's indulgence in lurid sensationalism sometimes gets the better of his artistic judgement. But that sounds a pretty po-faced judgement in the face of the overwhelming power which so much of this score exudes. This Maryinsky performance comes live from what is clearly a highly-charged occasion in one of the world's great opera houses. That brings with it the disadvantage of a constrained opera-pit acoustic, which makes some of Prokofiev's over-the-top scoring seem pretty congested. But the immediacy and clarity of the sound, plus the orchestra's rhythmic grasp, ensures that the effect is still blood-curdling. If Leiferkus's distinctive rich baritone at first sounds a touch microphoney, the ear can soon adjust to that too, and Gorchakova brings intense beauty as well as intensity to Renata's hysterics, taking us right inside the psychological drama. The supporting roles are filled with distinction and this makes a huge difference to the sustaining of dramatic tension, the crescendo which Prokofiev aimed to build through his five acts. Considering the extent of the stage goings-on there is remarkably little audience distraction on the recording.

The Gambler

Sergei Alexashkin bass General; Ljuba Kazarnovskaya sop Pauline; Vladimir Galuzin ten Alexis; Elena Obraztsova mez Babulenka; Nikolai Gassiev ten Marquis; Valery Lebed bass Mr Astley; Marianna Tarassova mez Blanche; Victor Vikhrov ten Prince Nilsky, Croupier II; Andrei Khramtsov bass Baron, Tall Englishman; Yuri Laptev ten Potapych; Grigory Karassev bass Casino Director; Vladimir Zhivopistsev ten Croupier I; Gennadi Bezzubenkov bass Fat Englishman
Chorus and Orchestra of the Kirov Opera / Valery Gergiev
Philips ② 454 559-2PH2 (115 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Prokofiev's second opera is his most extreme, in its musical language if not in its story-line. Alexey, the eponymous Gambler, is a noble-born teacher in the service of Babulenka's nephew (the retired General); he has a love-hate relationship with the General's step-daughter Pauline, who makes him gamble with her money and humiliates him by forcing him to insult others for her amusement. She in turn has a love-hate relationship with the Marquis, who has a hold over her via the General's debts. Thinking to rid her of that hold, Alexis wins a colossal fortune and offers it to her. Seeing only further humiliation, however, she scorns the offer, leaving Alexey in despair. Prokofiev set Dostoyevsky's story using the peculiar Russian branch of Dialogue Opera that abandons all set pieces and rounded forms for the sake of supposed Realism and truthfulness to the text. None of the characters steps outside the unfolding events into lyrical self-declaration, and it's left to the orchestra to offer psychological commentary on the goings-on, in the most modernist language Prokofiev could conceive around 1916.

So The Gambler demands a double act of empathy on the part of the western listener: one to engage with a little-known musical tradition where 'normal' operatic expectations are deliberately not gratified; and further, to sense the powerful affinity of the Russian soul with the act of gambling, which it looks on not judgmentally but as symbolic of self-destructive obsession, the workings of Fate, and more. For anyone willing and able to make those leaps, this new recording should be a compelling experience. Gergiev's orchestra play like beings possessed, which is the only way to do justice to a piece like this. The sense of impending doom is powerfully conveyed, and in the big gambling scene of Act 4 the tension is screwed up to an extraordinary pitch. Vladimir Galuzin shows himself as having real stamina and fine dramatic presence as Alexey, and Sergei Alexashkin is appropriately solid as the General. Ljuba

Kazarnovskaya is rather ordinary as Pauline, but when Elena Obraztsova enters as Babulenka, with a voice that would curdle milk at a hundred paces, there's a genuine frisson of theatrical presence at work, and the rest of the performance never looks back from that point. The recording quality is superior to the patched-together live recordings which are the norm for this valuable Russian opera series.

The Love for Three Oranges

Mikhail Kit bass King of Clubs; Evgeny Akimov ten Prince; Larissa Diadkova mez Princess Clarissa; Alexander Morozov bass Leandro; Konstantin Pluzhnikov ten Truffaldino; Vassily Gerello bar Pantaloon; Vladimir Vaneev bass Tchelio; Larissa Shevchenko sop Fata Morgana; Zlata Bulycheva mez Linetta; Lia Shevtsova mez Nicoletta; Anna Netrebko sop Ninetta; Grigory Karasev bar Cook; Feodor Kuznetsov bass Farfarello; Herald; Olga Korzhenskaya mez Smeraldina; Yuri Zhikalov bar Master of Ceremonies; Kirov Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev

Philips ② 462 913-2PH2 (102 minutes: DDD Ⓕ
Texts and translations included)
Recorded live in 1997 and 1998 ●

Goldoni's play of 1761, adapted by Meyerhold in 1914 and set by Prokofiev four years later, was in many respects way ahead of its time. As Lionel Salter pointed out in his review of the Lyon Opera recording under Kent Nagano, it prefigured not only Brecht but also the Theatre of Cruelty and the Theatre of the Absurd. Prokofiev fell with relish on the scenario, seeing in it an opportunity to puncture the pretensions of the opera house, rather as Stephen Sondheim's Into the Woods, working from the opposite direction and with more meagre compositional resources, has more recently used fairy-tale to try to add pretensions to the musical theatre.

Musically The Love for Three Oranges builds on Rimsky-Korsakov's The Golden Cockerel; and in turn Shostakovich's The Nose seeks to build on Prokofiev. It's a fabulously imaginative score, never reliant on cliché, always light on its feet and gloriously orchestrated. All credit to Gergiev and his Kirov players for provoking these observations. This is the fifth of their Prokofiev opera series, and it more than lives up to the high standards already set.

Among the evil conspirators at the court of the King of Clubs there are admittedly some dryish-sounding voices. But the main roles are superbly taken, most notably by tenor Evgeny Akimov as the whining, hypochondriac Prince. Other outstanding contributions come from Grigory Karasev as the giant cook who guards the Three Oranges, Feodor Kuznetsov as the demon Farfarello, and Anna Netrebko as the last of the three Princesses eventually released from the Oranges.

The Kirov recording was made live in Amstersdam in sessions spaced 10 months apart. There are no obvious joins, and the warmer ambience of the Concertgebouw amply compensates for the Maryinsky Theatre's more concentrated atmosphere. Though there is a certain amount of variance in the miking of the voices, this is never more than the action itself invites. Inevitably the audience misses out on the visual element, which is more than usually crucial with this opera. Even so, some of the verbal and situational humour clearly gets across, and the applause is tumultuous.

Semyon Kotko

Tatiana Pavlovskaya sop Sofya; Ekaterina Solovieva sop Lyubka; Lyudmila Filatova mez Semyon's mother; Olga Markova-Mikhailenko mez Khivrya; Olga Savova mez Frosya; Evgeny Akimov ten Mikola; Nikolai Gassiev ten Klembovsky, Workman; Viktor Lutsiuk ten Semyon Kotko; Vladimir Zhivopistev ten German interpreter; Viktor Chernomortsev bar Tsaryov; Yuri Laptev bar Von Wierhof; Gennady Bezzubenkov bass Tkachenko; Grigory Karasev bass Ivasenko; Andrei Khramtsov bass German NCO, German sergeant; Yevgeny Nikitin bass Remeniuk
Kirov Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev

Philips ② 464 605-2PH2 (137 minutes: DDD)
Text and translations included. Ⓕ
Live recording

Valentin Katayev's tale of a local hero getting his girl despite strife with a prospective in-law is the kind of thing an opera-lover would normally take in their stride. What makes Semyon Kotko hard to live with is not the fact that the soldier-boy returning to his village in the Ukraine at the end of the First World War is so unimpeachably virtuous, nor even that the Germans who break up the wedding preparations and lay waste to the village are so one-dimensionally villainous – it's rather that the reactionary-collaborator father-in-law-to-be, Tkachenko, is so obviously a token of Soviet propaganda. Prokofiev would probably never have considered such subject-matter at all had it not been for the political climate of the late 1930s and he did his best to make a working compromise between the order of the day and the kind of melodious simplicity he wanted to cultivate. He took Katayev's prose-draft as it stood and sought to minimise its schematic and propagandist elements. In Act 3 he came up with two of his most effective 'dramatic crescendos', first for the arrival of the reactionary Ukrainian cavalry, then for the burning of Semyon's cottage.

There are more fine moments in Act 4, where the oppositional writing for Soviets and Germans has something of the power of Alexander Nevsky, composed just before the opera. There's also some attractively pungent folk-imitation writing in the second tableau of Act 1. Some less distinguished scenes suggest a rummaging through Prokofiev's cast-off ideas for all-purpose filler material, but such passages are not so extensive or so deadly as to destroy all enjoyment. This splendid recording plugs another major gap in the discography of opera. Gergiev's interpretation is ardent and well paced, his orchestra is in fine fettle, and his soloists are of high quality. Prokofiev gives little or no opportunity for star turns, but Viktor Lutsiuk's Semyon is passionate and youthful-sounding, and Tatiana Pavlovskaya as his beloved Sofya is radiant. The recording is free from the dryness and sudden shifts of perspective that have dogged some previous issues in this Mariinsky series.

War and Peace

Lajos Miller bar Prince Andrei Bolkonsky; Galina Vishnevskaya sop Natasha Rostova; Katherine Ciesinski mez Sonya; Maria Paunova mez Maria Akhrosimova; Dimiter Petkov bass Count Ilya Rostov; Wieslaw Ochman ten Count Pytor Bezukhov; Stefania Toczyska mez Helena Bezukhova; Nicolai Gedda ten Anatol Kuragin; Vladimir de Kanel bass-bar Dolokhov; Mira Zakai contr Princess Maria Bolkonsky; Malcolm Smith bass Colonel Vasska Denisov; Nicola Ghiuselev bass Marshal Mikhail Kutuzov; Eduard Tumagian bar Napoleon Bonaparte
Radio France Chorus; French National Orchestra / Mstislav Rostropovich
Erato Libretto ④ 2292-45331-2 (247 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included.
Recorded 1986 Ⓜ

Over four hours long, 72 characters, 13 scene changes: is it any wonder that Prokofiev's War and Peace, adapted from Tolstoy's famously epic novel, has had few performances and even fewer forays into the recording studio? At the front of the booklet Rostropovich recalls how, as Prokofiev lay dying, he reiterated one wish, that Rostropovich should make this opera known to the world. It comes as no surprise, then, to find a deeply committed performance from both soloists (only 45 of them due to some adroit doubling), chorus and orchestra. Prokofiev adapted the novel into seven 'peace' and six 'war' tableaux, thus sustaining drama through contrast throughout its Wagnerian length. With few exceptions the multinational cast sings in good Russian and among them Lajos Miller is particularly affecting as Prince Andrei, pleasingly ardent in his opening moonlit aria. The central female role of Natasha is taken by Galina Vishnevskaya. She sang the role in the 1959 première and inevitably no longer sounds like an innocent 16 year old. Unfortunately, problems are compounded by a hardness in her tone and a lack of attention to detail in some of the quieter sections. Stefania Toczyska as the treacherous Helena makes a great impression, as does Katherine Ciesinski as Natasha's confidante, Sonya. Of the men, Nicolai Gedda as Prince Anatol sings with character and great style and Eduard Tumagian is an heroic and steadfast Napoleon. An added attraction of the recording are the sound effects, particularly in the war scenes, convincing but never too obtrusive. Good translations are provided in three languages, crowning a laudable achievement.

Francesco Provenzale

Italian 1624-1704

GROVE Active in Naples, Provenzale had operas staged between 1654 and 1674 and became city maestro di cappella in 1665; he was later maestro di capella to the treasury of S Gennaro (1686-99) and served for two periods at the viceregal court. An important teacher, he worked as chief maestro at the conservatories S Maria di Loreto (1663-75) and the Turchini (1675-1701). He was the first prominent Neapolitan musician to compose opera and forerunner of the Neapolitan school of the 18th century. Il schiavo di sua moglie (1671) and La Stellidaura vendicata (1674), which survive complete, are largely modelled on the style of Venetians such as Cesti, but also include melodies of a dance-like, popular character. Provenzale wrote at least six other operas (two may have been adaptations of Cavalli's), secular cantatas and sacred music.

Motets

Provenzale Cantemus, psallamus. P
O Jesu mea spes. Audite caeli. Angelicae mentes
Avitrano Sonate a Quattro, Op 3 – No 2 in D, 'L'Aragona'; No 10 in C, 'La Maddaloni'
Marchitelli Sonata II
Roberta Invernizzi, Emanuela Galli sops Giuseppe de Vittorio ten Cappella de' Turchini / Antonio Florio vc
Opus 111 OP20006 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●

Antonio Florio and Cappella de' Turchini's ambitious survey of the finest Baroque Neapolitan music turns to the well-nigh accepted father of the so-called Neapolitan School, Francesco Provenzale. Whilst scholars have argued that much of what is deemed 'Neapolitan' is really just 'Italian', this series has proved that such a view shows a limited knowledge of both the sources and the sheer range of musical idioms and 'dialects' which became established in the second half of the 17th century. Provenzale's three motets for two sopranos, published in 1689 (Audite caeli is for soprano and tenor) are hardly masterpieces but they are still good.

The bold challenges to the singer's techniques are often thrilling, but the flavour is less one of operatic transplantation than an indigenous sacred virtuosity which Provenzale jealously guarded; both the extensive O Jesu mea spes and Angelicae mentes see both Roberta Invernizzi and Emanuela Galli put through their paces, but they both sail through with well-matched timbres and nonchalant Mediterranean breeziness; only occasionally does their instinct for spontaneous moulding lead to questionable intonation. For the most part, the easy, imitative dialogue of Provenzale's motets are revitalized by textually alert and finely projected singing. Of the instrumental interludes, Marchitelli's Sonata II for three violins is a real winner.

Giacomo Puccini

Italian 1858-1924

Puccini was fifth in a line of composers from Lucca. After studying music with his uncle, Fortunato Magi, and with the director of the Istituto Musicale Pacini, Carlo Angeloni, he started his career at the age of 14 as an organist at S Martino and S Michele, Lucca, and at other local churches. However, a performance of Verdi's Aida at Pisa in 1876 made such an impact on him that he decided to follow his instinct for operatic composition. With a scholarship and financial support from an uncle, he was able to enter the Milan Conservatory in 1880, where his chief teachers were Bazzini and Ponchielli.

While still a student, Puccini entered a competition for a one-act opera. He failed to win, but the opera Le villi came to the attention of the publisher Giulio Ricordi, who arranged a successful production at the Teatro del Verme in Milan and commissioned a second opera. The libretto, Edgar, was unsuited to Puccini's dramatic talent and the opera was coolly received at La Scala in April 1889. It did, however, set the seal on what was to be Puccini's lifelong association with the house of Ricordi.

Manon Lescaut. produced at Turin in 1893, achieved a success such as Puccini was never to repeat and made him known outside Italy. Among the writers who worked on its libretto were Luigi Illica and Giuseppe Giacosa, who provided the librettos for Puccini's next three operas. The first of these, La bohème, widely considered Puccini's masterpiece, but with its mixture of lighthearted and sentimental scenes and its largely conversational style was not a success when produced at Turin in 1896. Tosca, Puccini's first excursion into verismo, was more enthusiastically received by the Roman audience at the Teatro Costanzi in 1900.

Later that year Puccini visited London and saw David Belasco's one-act play Madam Butterfly. This he took as the basis for his next collaboration and he considered it the best and technically most advanced opera he had written. He was unprepared for the fiasco attending its first performance in February 1904, when the La Scala audience was urged into hostility, even pandemonium, by the composer's jealous rivals; in a revised version it was given to great acclaim at Brescia the following May. By then Puccini had married Elvira Gemignani, the widow of a Lucca merchant, who had borne him a son as long ago as 1896. The family lived until 1921 in the house at Torre del Lago which Puccini had acquired in 1891. Scandal was unleashed in 1909 when a servant girl of the Puccinis, whom Elvira had accused of an intimate relationship with her husband, committed suicide. A court case established the girl's innocence, but the publicity affected Puccini deeply and was the main reason for the long period before his next opera.

This was La fanciulla del West, based on another Belasco drama it was given its première at the Metropolitan Opera, New York, in December 1910. In all technical respects, notably its Debussian harmony and Straussian orchestration, it was a masterly reply to the criticism that Puccini repeated himself in every new opera. What it lacks is the incandescent phrase, and this is probably why it has not entered the normal repertory outside Italy.

Differences with Tito Ricordi, head of the firm since 1912, led Puccini to accept a commission for an operetta from the directors of the Vienna Karltheater. The result, La rondine, though warmly received at Monte Carlo in 1917, is among Puccini's weakest works, hovering between opera and operetta and devoid of striking lyrical melody. While working on it Puccini began the composition of Il tabarro, the first of three one-act operas (Il trittico) which follow the scheme of the Parisian Grand Guignol - a horrific episode, a sentimental tragedy (Suor Angelica) and a comedy or farce (Gianni Schicchi). This last has proved to be the most enduring part of the triptych and is often done without the others, usually in a double bill.

In his early 60s Puccini was determined to 'strike out on new paths' and started work on Turandot, based on a Gozzi play which satisfied his desire for a subject with a fantastic, fairy-tale atmosphere, but flesh-and-blood characters. During its composition he moved to Viareggio and in 1923 developed cancer of the throat. Treatment at a Brussels clinic seemed successful, but his heart could not stand the strain and he died, leaving Turandot unfinished. After his wife's death in 1930, his house at Torre del Lago was turned into a museum.

Puccini's choral, orchestral and instrumental works, dating mainly from his early years, are unimportant, though the Mass in A flat (1880) is still performed occasionally. His operas may not engage us on as many different levels as do those of Mozart, Wagner, Verdi or Strauss, but on his own most characteristic level, where erotic passion, sensuality, tenderness, pathos and despair meet and fuse, he was an unrivalled master. His melodic gift and harmonic sensibility, his consummate skill in orchestration and unerring sense of theatre combined to create a style that was wholly original, homogeneous and compelling. He was fully aware of his limitations and rarely ventured beyond them. He represents Verdi's only true successor, and his greatest masterpiece and swansong, Turandot, belongs among the last 20th-century stage works to remain in the regular repertory of the world's opera houses.

Messa di Gloria

Messa di Gloria[a]. Preludio sinfonico. Crisantemi
[a]Antonello Palombi ten [a]Gunnar Lundberg bar
Hungarian Radio Orchestra and [a]Choir / Pier Giorgio Morandi
Naxos 8 555304 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Notes, texts and translations included ●

This recording is to be preferred to Antonio Pappano's very fine account on EMI – and it's not just a question of price. If the recorded sound is not as opulent as EMI's, it is very clear and lets in the light. If the dynamic contrasts are not so big, they are also rather more refined. Generally Giorgio Morandi prefers slightly faster speeds, though not so fast as Pappano when he really gets up some steam in the last sections of the Gloria. But in context Morandi brings out the inherent excitement very effectively and naturally whereas Pappano underlines it. With Pappano the majestic Verdian unisons of the 'Qui tollis' broaden like a great smile across a large face: it's grand fun but tends towards vulgarity. Of the work as a whole, Morandi and his forces give a more youthful performance. There's an easy lightness of step (the Gloria sets off with a dance). The chorus is particularly fresh in tone and response, and the tenor soloist, Antonello Palombi, is more gracefully lyrical and Italianate in timbre than either Alagna (with Pappano) or his predecessor Carreras (with Scimone). The baritone is less apt and certainly no match for Hampson (Pappano) or Prey (Scimone); musical nevertheless, and blending well with his colleague in the Agnus Dei. In the string piece, Crisantemi, Morandi's somewhat quicker tempo, still answering to the marking andante mesto, is welcome, keeping mawkishness at bay and limiting the over-exposure of rather thin material.

Opera arias

La rondine – Chi il bel sogno di Doretta. La bohème – Sì, mi chiamano Mimì; Donde lieta uscì. Gianni Schicchi – O mio babbino caro. Manon Lescaut – In quelle trine morbide; Sola, perduta, abbandonata. Suor Angelica – Senza mamma, O bimbo. Tosca – Vissi d'arte. Madama Butterfly – Un bel dì vedremo; Che tua madre; Tu, tu, piccolo iddio. Turandot – Signore, ascolta!; In questa reggia;
Tu, che di gel sei cinta
Julia Varady sop Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra / Marcello Viotti
Orfeo C323941A (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●●

A lovely and somewhat surprising record by the most fascinating and patrician lyric soprano of the present age: 'surprising' because, though Varady is associated closely enough with Verdi, the Puccini connection is less readily made, 'lovely' because the voice is still so pure, the style so musical and the response so intelligent, immediate and full-hearted. She adjusts wonderfully well to the Italian idiom, lightening the vowels, freeing the upper range, allowing more portamento than she would probably do in other music, yet employing in its use the finest technical skill and artistic judgement.

Her singing of Magda's song in La rondine opens the record and introduces a singer who sounds (give or take a little) half her actual age: Varady's début dates back to 1962. In Mimì's narrative she sings with so fine a perception of the character – the hesitancies, the joy in 'mi piaccion quelle cose' – that Schwarzkopf's exquisite recording comes to mind, just as, from time to time, and especially in the Madama Butterfly excerpts, the finely concentrated, tragic restraint of Meta Seinemeyer is recalled. It is good to hear, too, how sensitively Varady differentiates between characters, Manon Lescaut having that essential degree of additional sophistication in tone and manner. What runs as a thread through all of these characterizations is a feeling for their dignity. Mimì does not simper. Sister Angelica does not sob. Lauretta has resolution in her pleading. Butterfly, Liù and Tosca are what they should be: women whose pathos lies not in their weakness but in a passionate, single-minded fidelity. That leaves Turandot which is a mistake. That is, she is outside the singer's scope and should remain so: it is not merely a matter of vocal thrust, weight and stamina, but also of voice-character, although the performance of her aria has clear merits. None of which should deter purchase; overall this is singing to treasure.

Turandot – Non piangere, Liù!; Nessun dorma!. Gianni Schicchi – Avete torto! Firenze è come un albero fiorito. Il Tabarro – Hai ben ragione; Io voglio la tua bocca ... Folle di gelosia!. La rondine – Parigi! è la citta dei desideri ... Forse, come la rondine; Dimmi che vuoi seguirmi. La fanciulla del West – Una parola sola! ... Or son sei mesi; Risparmiate lo scherno ... Ch'ella mi creda libero. Madama Butterfly – Dipende dal grado di cottura ... Amore o grillo; Addio, fiorito asil. Tosca – Recondita armonia; E lucevan le stelle. La bohème – Che gelida manina. Manon Lescaut – Tra voi, belle; Donna non vidi mai; Ah! Manon, mi tradisce; Ah! non v'avvicinate!; Manon ... senti, amor mio ... Vedi, son io che piango. Edgar – Orgia, chimera dall'occhio vitreo. Le villi – Ecco la casa ... Torna ai felici dì
José Cura ten
Philharmonia Orchestra / Plácido Domingo
Erato 0630-18838-2 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997

For those of us who can feast on a good tenor voice as if there were no tomorrow, this is (to put it crudely) the goods. First, however, a peculiarity of this programme is that it goes backwards. It starts with Turandot and recedes along a strict chronological line to Le villi. That of itself is an attractive idea, but it means that the terminus is a long and somewhat inconclusive excerpt, while the starting-point is 'Nessun dorma!'. We all know what that means these days, and it looks suspiciously like making a bid for the market if not for the kingdom. A dark, rather throaty, big and uncharming voice reiterates the famous command. As it takes the high As we realize that this is special, rising easily and thrillingly out of the baritonal middle register; Cura holds his high B ('vincerò') for the maximum length compatible with holding on to the succeeding A for even longer. But he is a man with surprises in store. 'Non piangere, Liù!' begins quietly and is thoughtfully phrased.

Similarly he shows his unpredictability in the Tosca arias: 'Recondita armonia' is stolid, almost routine, but then 'E lucevan le stelle' becomes the real expression of a man facing up to the prospect of imminent execution, and writing a poem. Throughout, Cura displays a thrilling voice with an individual timbre. His 'face' wears too much of a scowl and he does not give the impression of thinking about the person he is nominally addressing, but this is a solo recital and perhaps it would be different in a complete opera. He is accompanied here with uncommon sympathy by a conductor who has a good deal more experience of singing than has the singer himself.

La bohème

Victoria de los Angeles sop Mimì; Jussi Björling 🄷 ten Rodolfo; Lucine Amara sop Musetta; Robert Merrill bar Marcello; John Reardon bar Schaunard; Giorgio Tozzi bass Colline; Fernando Corena bass Benoit, Alcindoro; William Nahr ten Parpignol; Thomas Powell bar Customs Official; George del Monte bar Sergeant
Columbus Boychoir; RCA Victor Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Thomas Beecham
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono ② Ⓜ
567750-2 (108 minutes: ADD).
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1956 ●●●

The disadvantages of this famous Beecham Bohème are obvious. It is a mono recording and restricted in dynamic range. The sense of space for the complex crowd scene of Act 2 is to emerge with the maximum impact is inevitably lacking; the climaxes here and elsewhere are somewhat constricted; no less important, it is sometimes harder to focus on the subtleties of Puccini's orchestration. It was also made in a great hurry, and this shows in a number of patches of slightly insecure ensemble, even a couple of wrong entries. But there is no other important respect in which it does not stand at least half a head (often head and shoulders) above its more recent rivals. Nobody has ever been so predestinately right for the role of Mimì than Victoria de los Angeles: right both in vocal quality and in sheer involvement with every word and every musical phrase that Mimì utters. Beyond a certain point (usually a certain dynamic level) most sopranos stop being Mimì and simply produce the same sound that they would if they were singing Aida or Tosca. De los Angeles rarely does this; even under pressure (and Beecham's unhurried tempos do put her under pressure at times), the very difficulties themselves are used as an expressive and interpretative resource. Hers is the most moving and involving Mimì ever recorded. And Björling's is the most musical Rodolfo. He has the reputation of having been a bit of a dry stick, dramatically (on stage he looked like the other Bohemians' elderly, portly uncle), but on record he is the one exponent of the role to be credible both as a lover and as a poet. His voice is fine silver rather than brass, it can caress as well as weep, and his love for Mimì is more often confided than it is bellowed for all Paris to hear. This, indeed, is one of the most conspicuous differences between Beecham's account and most others: its simple belief that when Puccini wrote pp he meant it. Beecham (whose spell over his entire cast – in which there is no weak link – extends as far as teaching his Schaunard, John Reardon, an irresistibly funny, cut-glass English accent for the parrot-fancying milord) makes one realize what an intimate opera this is, how much of it is quiet, how many of its exchanges are sotto voce, and he thus enables his singers to use the full range of their voices and to employ subtleties of colour, phrasing and diction that are simply not available to a voice at full stretch (and in the process he largely cancels out the disadvantage of his recording's restricted dynamic range). It is the same with his handling of the orchestra: one would expect Beecham to seem understated, but again and again one turns back to his reading and discovers nothing missing – he has achieved as much or more with less. This is as complete a distillation of Puccini's drama as you are likely to hear.

La bohème
Mirella Freni sop Mimì; Luciano Pavarotti ten Rodolfo; Elizabeth Harwood sop Musetta; Rolando Panerai bar Marcello; Gianni Maffeo bar Schaunard; Nicolai Ghiaurov bass Colline; Michel Sénéchal bass Benoit, Alcindoro; Gernot Pietsch ten Parpignol
Schoenberg Boys' Choir; Berlin German Opera Chorus; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
Decca ② 421 049-2DH2 (110 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1972 ●

Pavarotti's Rodolfo is perhaps the best thing he has ever done: not only the finest recorded account of the role since Björling's on the Beecham set, but adding the honeyed Italianate warmth that even Björling lacked. He cannot quite match Björling's poetic refinement, and he is less willing to sing really quietly, but Pavarotti's sincerity counts for a great deal: his pride as he declares his vocation as a poet, the desperate feigning of his 'Mimì è una civetta' are points that most tenors miss or treat as mere opportunities for a big sing. His latter-day image may tend to hide it, but this recording is a reminder that Pavarotti is an artist of intelligence and delicacy as well as splendour of voice. His Mimì, Freni, sings beautifully and sensitively. Panerai is a strong, vividly acted Marcello. Harwood is an interesting Musetta: her tiny narration, in Act 4, of her meeting with the stricken Mimì is a gripping moment, and her waltz-song in Act 2 is a passionate (and irresistible) avowal to Marcello. Karajan is a great Puccini conductor who can linger over the beauties of orchestration without losing his grip on the drama or relaxing his support of the singers. There are not many operas of which a better case can be made for having more than one account in one's collection. For a modern La bohème to supplement the Beecham this Karajan set must go to the top of the list.

La bohème (sung in English)
Cynthia Haymon sop Mimì; Dennis O'Neill ten Rodolfo; Marie McLaughlin sop Musetta; Alan Opie bar Marcello; William Dazeley bar Schaunard; Alastair Miles bass Colline; Andrew Shore bar Benoit, Alcindoro; Mark Milhofer ten Parpignol; Simon Preece bar Customs Official; Paul Parfitt bass-bar Sergeant
Peter Kay Children's Choir; Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; Philharmonia Orchestra / David Parry
Chandos Opera in English ② CHAN3008
(111 minutes: DDD). Notes and text included Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

The text (Grist and Pinkerton amended by David Parry) is a very acceptable rendering of a libretto which was, after all, first known in England, in English. However well sung, that first performance, at Manchester in 1897, is unlikely to have offered orchestral playing as fine as the Philharmonia's here, and Parry's well-controlled tempo is another strong factor in making this a special recording of the opera irrespective of language.

The singers have that first requisite of a good Bohème cast: they work as a team. Cynthia Haymon is a gentle Mimì, perfectly lovely in the middle register of her voice, just a little worn on top. Dennis O'Neill provides a rare pleasure in this music, singing softly at the right moments; he also produces such a very good top C in his aria that he has no need to give us another at the end of the Act instead of obliging with the composer's harmonies. Marie McLaughlin's Musetta is not quite the sparkler one had in mind, but the fellow Bohemians are capital, in voice as in spirits. The ensemble in Act 2 is first-rate, the contribution of the Peter Kay Children's Choir even better than that. The recording is superb.

Additional recommendations
Carreras Rodolfo Ricciarelli Mimì Putnam Musetta Wixell Marcello Royal Opera House Chorus and Orchestra / C Davis
Philips ② 442 260-2PM2 (106 minutes: ADD: 10/94) Ⓜ
Carreras and Ricciarelli make a wonderful pair of lovers – totally credible, their fresh, supple voices totally suited to the roles – while Davis conducts somewhat coolly.

Tebaldi Mimì Bergonzi Rodolfo
Orchestra dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia, Rome / Serafin
Decca Compact Opera Collection ②
470 431-2DOC2 (ADD: recorded 1959) Ⓜ
Texts and translations accessible via website ○
An all-Italian cast and an extremely fine account that matches and which some would say surpasses Beecham's.

La fanciulla del West

Awards 1978

Carol Neblett sop Minnie; Plácido Domingo ten Dick Johnson; Sherrill Milnes bar Jack Rance; Francis Egerton ten Nick; Robert Lloyd bass Ashby; Gwynne Howell bass Jake Wallace; Paul Hudson bass Billy Jackrabbit; Anne Wilkens sop Wowkle
Chorus and Orchestra of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden / Zubin Mehta
DG ② 419 640-2GH2 (130 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1977 ○○○

This opera depicts the triangular relationship between Minnie, the saloon owner and 'mother' to the entire town of gold miners, Jack Rance, the sheriff and Dick Johnson (alias Ramerrez), a bandit leader. The music is highly developed in Puccini's seamless lyrical style, the arias for the main characters emerge from the texture and return to it effortlessly. The vocal colours are strongly polarised with the cast being all male except for one travesti role and Minnie herself. The score bristles with robust melody as well as delicate scoring, betraying a masterly hand at work. Carol Neblett is a strong Minnie, vocally distinctive and well characterized, whilst Plácido Domingo and Sherrill Milnes make a good pair of suitors for the spunky little lady. Zubin Mehta conducts with real sympathy for the idiom and the orchestra responds well.

Madama Butterfly

Renata Scotto sop Madama Butterfly; Carlo Bergonzi ten Pinkerton; Rolando Panerai bar Sharpless; Anna di Stasio mez Suzuki; Piero De Palma ten Goro; Giuseppe Morresi ten Prince Yamadori; Silvana Padoan mez Kate Pinkerton; Paolo Montarsolo bass The Bonze; Mario Rinaudo bass Commissioner
Rome Opera House Chorus and Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
EMI Great Recordings of the Century ② 567885-2 Ⓜ
(142 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1966 ○

This is Barbirolli's Butterfly; despite Scotto's expressiveness and Bergonzi's elegance it is the conductor's contribution that gives this set its durability and its hold on the affections. The Rome Opera Orchestra is not the equal of the Vienna Philharmonic for Karajan. However, the rapport between conductor and orchestra and their mutual affection for Puccini are evident throughout, and they make this the most Italianate of all readings. It is hugely enjoyable, not just in the big emotional outpourings (like the Act 2 interlude, where Barbirolli's passionate gasps and groans spur the orchestra to great eloquence) but in many tiny moments where you can almost see the conductor and his players lovingly and absorbedly concentrating on subtleties of phrasing and texture.

There is a lot of good singing, too. Scotto's voice will not always take the pressure she puts on it, but her portrayal is a touching and finely detailed one. The ever stylish Bergonzi sings with immaculate phrasing and perfect taste, Panerai is an outstanding Sharpless (beautifully sung, the embodiment of anxious, pitying concern) and di Stasio's Suzuki is attractively light-voiced and young-sounding.

The recording, however, is a bit narrow in perspective, rather close (really quiet singing and playing rarely register as such) and some of the voices are edged or slightly tarnished in loud passages. Barbirolli's set is perhaps for those who find the meticulously refined detail of Karajan studied (also ravishing and stunningly recorded); those, in short, for whom Latin warmth and impulsive open-heartedness are indispensable in this opera. They will find those qualities here, with singing to match, and will not mind the occasional patch of stridency.

Madama Butterfly
Mirella Freni sop Madama Butterfly; Luciano Pavarotti ten Pinkerton; Robert Kerns bar Sharpless; Christa Ludwig mez Suzuki; Michel Sénéchal ten Goro; Giorgio Stendoro bar Prince Yamadori; Elke Schary mez Kate Pinkerton; Marius Rintzler bass The Bonze; Hans Helm bass Commissioner
Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
Decca ③ 417 577-2DH3 (145 minutes: ADD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1974

In every way except one the transfer of Karajan's radiant Vienna recording for Decca could hardly provide a firmer recommendation. The reservation is one of price – this Karajan is on three discs, not two, at full price. However it does allow each act to be self-contained on a single disc, and for such a performance as this no extravagance is too much. Movingly dramatic as Renata Scotto is on the Barbirolli set, Mirella Freni is even more compelling. The voice is fresher, firmer and more girlish, with more light and shade at such points as 'Un bel dì', and there is an element of vulnerability that intensifies the communication. In that, one imagines Karajan played a big part, just as he must have done in presenting Pavarotti – not quite the super-star he is today but already with a will of his own in the recording studio – as a Pinkerton of exceptional subtlety, not just a roistering cad but in his way an endearing figure in the First Act.

Significantly CD brings out the delicacy of the vocal balances in Act 1 with the voices deliberately distanced for much of the time, making such passages as 'Vienna la sera' and 'Bimba dagli occhi' the more magical in their delicacy. Karajan, in that duet and later in the Flower duet of Act 2, draws ravishing playing from the Vienna Philharmonic strings, getting them to imitate the portamento of the singers in an echt-Viennes manner, which is ravishing to the ear. Christa Ludwig is by far the richest and most compelling of Suzukis.

Madama Butterfly
Miriam Gauci sop Madama Butterfly; Yordi Ramiro ten Pinkerton; Georg Tichy bar Sharpless; Nelly Boschkowá mez Suzuki; Josef Abel ten Goro; Robert Szücs bar Prince Yamadori; Alzbeta Michalková mez Kate Pinkerton; Jozef Spaček bass The Bonze; Vladimir Kubovčik bass Commissioner, Registrar
Slovak Philharmonic Chorus; Bratislava Radio Symphony Orchestra / Alexander Rahbari
Naxos ② 8 660015/6 (141 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1991

Though this would never be a first-choice Butterfly, it might serve quite happily as a Butterfly first-choice. That is, coming upon the opera fresh, never having heard it before, one could well find it a good introduction. It is consistently musical, avoids cheapness or exaggerated sentiment, and, while presenting worthily the enchanting and infinitely poignant score, it leaves plenty to be discovered with a widening knowledge of other and greater performances. An attractive feature is the youthfulness of the Butterfly and Pinkerton. The Pinkerton, a Mexican lyric tenor, Yordi Ramiro, gives as likeable, sincere a version of the character as any. And this is not a falsification of the part, at the very heart of which is the painful truth that likeable people may do very unlikeable things. It is a good voice: limited, but well defined and with a youthful freshness in its tone. The Butterfly is also young-sounding: Miriam Gauci, born in Malta. She sings uncompromisingly as a light lyric soprano, with an especially lovely quality in the upper range. The lightness brings limitations in this colossal role, and they are compounded by the immaturity of her acting-portrayal: she does many of 'the right things' but it is rare to find in her the flash of expressiveness that illuminates a character from within. A newcomer to the opera is not likely to be troubled by this, but will on the contrary be delighted by the quality of the voice and touched by the general appeal of the character. Rahbari conducts a performance that captures both the opera's charm and seriousness, not, however, its intensity.

Additional recommendation
Madama Butterfly^a 🅷
Couplings: Arias by Bellini, Bianchini, Donizetti, Mascagni, Sadero and Verdi
Dal Monte Madama Butterfly; Palombini Suzuki; Gigli Pinkerton; Rome Opera Chorus and Orchestra / De Fabritiis
Naxos Historical mono ② 8 110183/4 (153 minutes: ADD). Recorded ^{a}1939, 1928-41 Ⓢ

This is the most complete performance of the role of Butterfly on record. Dal Monte's portrayal moves from 'child Butterfly' to create most movingly the maturing woman whose tragedy loses nothing in nobility as the last scene unfolds. Transfers are bright and clear, a little too relentlessly so sometimes, but not so as to impede enjoyment. This Butterfly is definitely one for the collection.

Manon Lescaut

Mirella Freni sop Manon Lescaut; Luciano Pavarotti ten Des Grieux; Dwayne Croft bar Lescaut; Giuseppe Taddei bar Geronte; Ramon Vargas ten Edmondo; Cecilia Bartoli mez Singer; Federico Davia bass Innkeeper, Captain; Anthony Laciura ten Dancing Master; Paul Groves ten Lamplighter; James Courtney bass Sergeant
Chorus and Orchestra of the Metropolitan Opera / James Levine
Decca ② 440 200-2DHO2 (120 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

With Luciano Pavarotti a powerful Des Grieux, James Levine conducts a comparably big-boned performance of Manon Lescaut, bringing out the red-blooded drama of Puccini's first big success, while not ignoring its warmth and tender poetry in exceptionally full, vivid sound with the voices well in front of the orchestra. In the title-role Freni's performance culminates in an account of the big Act 4 aria, more involving and passionate than any of the others on rival versions, with the voice showing no signs of wear, and with her sudden change of face at the words 'terra di pace' ('a land of peace') bringing a magical lightening of tone. That aria makes a thrilling climax, when too often this act can seem a letdown. In this as in so much else, Levine conveys the tensions and atmosphere of a stage performance in a way that owes much to his experience at the Metropolitan. More completely than other versions, it avoids the feeling of a studio performance. Reactions to Pavarotti as Des Grieux will differ widely. The closeness of balance means that in volume his singing rarely drops below mezzo forte, but there is little harm in having so passionate a portrait of Des Grieux as Pavarotti's. Needless to say, the hero's big emotional climaxes in each of the first three acts come over at full force. The rest of the cast is strong too, with Dwayne Croft a magnificent Lescaut. Many collectors will count this a clear first choice among current versions.

Manon Lescaut H
Maria Callas sop Manon Lescaut; Giuseppe di Stefano ten Des Grieux; Giulio Fioravanti bar Lescaut; Franco Calabrese bass Geronte; Dino Formichini ten Edmondo; Fiorenza Cossotto mez Singer; Carlo Forti bass Innkeeper; Vito Tatone ten Dancing master; Giuseppe Morresi bass Sergeant; Franco Ricciardi ten Lamplighter; Franco Ventrigilia bass Captain
Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Tullio Serafin
EMI ② 556301-2 (120 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1957 Ⓕ ●●

This performance is unique, with Act 4 for once a culmination in Callas's supreme account of the death scene. She may present a rather formidable portrait of a young girl in Act 1, but here the final act with its long duet and the big aria, 'Sola, perduta, abbandonata', is far more than an epilogue to the rest, rather a culmination, with Callas at her very peak. Di Stefano, too, is on superb form and Serafin's pacing of the score is masterly. Di Stefano wipes the floor with most of his rivals past and present: in Act 4 he has a concerned tenderness for Manon that others can only sketch, his debonair charm in 'Tra voi belle' is incomparable and (rarest of virtues among tenors) he never sings past the limits of his voice. Fioravanti as Lescaut and Calabrese as Geronte sing well if not very characterfully.

However, digital CD remastering in this instance loses out. A break has to be made in Act 2 – in a fairly innocuous place before the duet 'Tu, tu, amore tu'. The first two acts make up a total timing only a few seconds over the 75-minute limit, but evidently it was enough to prevent them going on to a single CD. That said, the CD brings the same advantages in refining the original boxy sound without glamorizing it in false stereo, plus the usual advantages of absence of background and ease of finding places. For an account of Manon Lescaut which comes fully to terms with the opera's huge contrasts of colour and mood you will also have to have a modern recording, for with all its improvements the sound here remains very dry.

La rondine

Awards 1997

La rondine. Le Villi – Prelude; L'Abbandono; La Tregenda; Ecco la casa ... Torna ai felice dì. Morire!
Angela Gheorghiu sop Magda; Roberto Alagna ten Ruggero; Inva Mula-Tchako sop Lisetta; William Matteuzzi ten Prunier; Alberto Rinaldi bar Rambaldo; Patricia Biccire sop Yvette; Patrizia Ciofi sop Bianca; Monica Bacelli mez Suzy; Riccardo Simonetti bar Périchaud; Toby Spence ten Gobin; Enrico Fissore bar Crébillon
London Voices; LSO / Antonio Pappano pf
EMI ② 556338-2 (131 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1996 ●●●

It could not be more welcome when a recording transforms a work, as this one does, setting it on a new plane. La rondine ('The Swallow'), Puccini's ill-timed attempt to emulate Lehár in the world of operetta, completed during the First World War, has long been counted his most serious failure. Puccini's cunning has never been in doubt either, for he and his librettists interweave elements not just of La traviata but of The Merry Widow and Die Fledermaus, not to mention earlier Puccini operas. His melodic style may be simpler than before, but one striking theme follows another with a profusion that any other composer might envy. What Pappano reveals far more than before is the subtlety with which Puccini interweaves his themes and motifs, with conversational passages made spontaneous-sounding in their flexibility. Above all, Pappano brings out the poetry, drawing on emotions far deeper than are suggested by this operetta-like subject, thanks also to Gheorghiu's superb performance, translating her mastery as Violetta to this comparable character. Magda's first big solo, 'Che il bel sogno di Doretta', finds Gheorghiu at her most ravishing, tenderly expressive in her soaring phrases, opening out only at the final climax. From first to last, often with a throb in the voice, her vocal acting convinces you that Magda's are genuine, deep emotions, painful at the end, intensified by the ravishing beauty of her voice.

As Ruggero, Alagna has a far less complex role, winningly characterizing the ardent young student. What will specially delight Puccinians in this set is that he is given an entrance aria about Paris, 'Parigi e un citta', which transforms his otherwise minimal contribution to Act 1. The partnership of Gheorghiu and Alagna highlights the way that Puccini in the melodic lines for each of his central characters makes Ruggero's more forthright, Magda's more complex. Among much else, the role of the poet, Prunier, is transformed by the clear-toned William Matteuzzi in what is normally a comprimario role. Not only is his relationship with Magda beautifully drawn, his improbable affair with the skittish maid, Lisetta, is made totally convincing too, mirroring Magda's affair. For the fill-ups, the excerpts from Le Villi, warm and dramatic, make one wish that Pappano could go on to record that first of Puccini's operas, with Alagna giving a ringing account of Roberto's aria, as he does of the song, Morire! – with Pappano at the piano. Originally an album-piece written for a wartime charity, Puccini used it, transposed up a semitone, with different words, as the entrance aria for Ruggero. Altogether a set to treasure.

Il trittico

Il tabarro

Carlo Guelfi bar Michele; Maria Guleghina sop Giorgetta; Neil Shicoff ten Luigi; Riccardo Cassinelli ten Tinca; Enrico Fissore bass Talpa; Elena Zilio mez Frugola; Barry Banks ten Ballad-seller; Angela Gheorghiu sop Lover; Roberto Alagna ten Lover
London Voices; London Symphony Orchestra / Antonio Pappano

Suor Angelica

Cristina Gallardo-Domâs sop Suor Angelica; Bernadette Manca di Nissa contr Princess; Felicity Palmer mez Abbess; Elena Zilio mez Monitoress; Sara Fulgoni mez Mistress of the Novices; Dorothea Röschmann sop Sister Genovieffa; Judith Rees sop Sister Osmina; Rachele Stanisci sop Sister Dolcina; Francesca Pedaci sop Nursing Sister; Anna Maria Panzarella sop First Almoner Sister, First Lay Sister; Susan Mackenzie-Park sop Second Almoner Sister; Deborah Miles-Johnson contr Second Lay Sister; Rosalind Waters sop Novice
London Voices; Tiffin Boys' School Choir; Philharmonia Orchestra / Antonio Pappano

Gianni Schicchi

José van Dam bass-bar Gianni Schicchi; Angela Gheorghiu sop Lauretta; Roberto Alagna ten Rinuccio; Felicity Palmer mez Zita; Paolo Barbacini ten Gherardo; Patrizia Ciofi sop Nella; James Savage-Hanford treb Gherardino; Carlos Chausson bass Betto di Signa; Luigi Roni bass Simone; Roberto Scaltriti bar Marco; Elena Zilio mez La Ciesca; Enrico Fissore bass Spinelloccio; Simon Preece bar Pinellino; Noel Mann bass Guccio
London Symphony Orchestra / Antonio Pappano
EMI ③ 556587-2 (162 minutes: DDD)
Notes, texts and translations included Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

No previous recordings bring such warmth or beauty or so powerful a drawing of the contrasts between each of the three one-acters in Puccini's triptych as these. It is Pappano above all, with his gift for pacing Puccini subtly, who draws the set together. In each opera he heightens emotions fearlessly to produce unerringly at key moments the authentic gulp-in-throat, whether for the cuckolded bargemaster, Michele, for Sister Angelica in her agonized suicide and heavenly absolution, or for the resolution of young love at the end of Gianni Schicchi. It will disappoint some that the starry couple of Angela Gheorghiu and Roberto Alagna do not take centre-stage, but quite apart from their radiant singing as Lauretta and Rinuccio in Gianni Schicchi – not least in that happy ending, most tenderly done – they make a tiny cameo appearance in Il tabarro as the off-stage departing lovers, a heady 45 seconds. It is the sort of luxury touch that Walter Legge would have relished. No doubt Gheorghiu would have been just as persuasive as Giorgetta in Il tabarro and as Sister Angelica, but having different sopranos in each opera sharpens the contrasts. Maria Guleghina makes a warm, vibrant Giorgetta, and the touch of acid at the top of the voice adds character, pointing to the frustration of the bargemaster's wife.

Even more remarkable is the singing of the young Chilean soprano, Cristina Gallardo-Domâs as Sister Angelica. Hers is a younger, more vulnerable Angelica than usual. Her vocal subtlety and commanding technique go with a fully mature portrayal of the nun's agony, her defiance of the implacable Princess as well as her grief over her dead son. As with Gheorghiu, the dynamic shading brings pianissimos of breathtaking delicacy. The Princess is powerfully sung by Bernadette Manca di Nissa, her tone firm and even throughout. Felicity

Palmer, with her tangy mezzo tone, is well contrasted as the Abbess, and she is just as characterful as the crabby Zita in Gianni Schicchi. The casting in Suor Angelica is as near flawless as could be, with Elena Zilio and Dorothea Röschmann outstanding in smaller roles. Zilio is the only singer who appears in all three operas, just as effective as Frugola in Il tabarro, though there her full, clear voice is not always distinguishable from Guleghina as Giorgetta. Among the men Carlo Guelfi makes a superb Michele, incisive, dark and virile. He brings out not just the anger but the poignancy of the bargemaster's emotions, as in the duet with Giorgetta, when they lament what might have been. Neil Shicoff makes a fine Luigi, the nerviness in his tenor tone aptly bringing out a hysterical quality in the character. The male comprimarios are vocally more variable, if always characterful, as they are too in Gianni Schicchi. As Schicchi himself José van Dam's voice perfectly conveys the sardonic side of the character, and the top Gs he has to negotiate are wonderfully strong and steady. Maybe the full voice he uses for the name 'Gianni Schicchi', when in impersonation of old Buoso he is dictating the new will, makes too obvious a contrast with the quavering old man imitation, but it is what Puccini asked for.

Also worthy of praise is the sumptuous and atmospheric sound. Off-stage effects are magical, and always thanks to Pappano and fine playing from both the LSO and Philharmonia, the beauty and originality of the carefully textured instrumentation can be appreciated with new vividness. This is a set to renew one's appreciation of operas that represent Puccini still at his peak. He may have had doubts over the length of his triptych, but in performances such as these they are utterly magnetic.

Il tabarro[a] H

Tito Gobbi bar Michele; Margaret Mas sop Giorgetta; Giacinto Prandelli ten Luigi; Piero De Palma ten Tinca; Plinio Clabassi bass Talpa; Miriam Pirazzini mez Frugola

Suor Angelica[b]

Victoria de los Angeles sop Suor Angelica; Fedora Barbieri mez Princess; Mina Doro mez Abbess, Mistress of the Novices; Corinna Vozza mez Monitoress; Lidia Marimpietri sop Sister Genovieffa, First Almoner Sister; Santa Chissari sop Sister Osmina, Second Almoner Sister, Novice; Anna Marcangeli sop Sister Dolcina; Teresa Cantarini mez Nursing Sister; Silvia Bertona sop First Lay Sister; Maria Huder mez Second Lay Sister

Gianni Schicchi[c]

Tito Gobbi bar Gianni Schicchi; Victoria de los Angeles sop Lauretta; Carlo del Monte ten Rinuccio; Anna Maria Canali mez Zita; Adelio Zagonara ten Gherardo; Lidia Marimpietri sop Nella; Claudio Cornoldi ten Gherardino; Saturno Meletti bass Betto di Signa; Paolo Montarsolo bass Simone; Fernando Valentini bar Marco; Giuliana Raymondi sop La Ciesca Rome Opera Chorus; Rome Opera Orchestra / [a]Vincenzo Bellezza, [b]Tullio Serafin, [c]Gabriele Santini

EMI mono/[c]stereo ③ 764165-2
(161 minutes: ADD)
Texts and translations included Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1955, [b]1957, [c]1958 ●●

Unless you insist on the most up-to-date recorded sound, or on buying the individual operas of Puccini's trilogy separately, this is the classic Trittico. Gobbi's blackly authoritative but pitiful Michele in Il tabarro and his genially authoritative Schicchi (the two outer panels of the triptych do match, in an odd sort of way) have seldom been equalled, let alone surpassed. De los Angeles's Angelica is more purely and movingly sung than any other on record, and her Lauretta in Gianni Schicchi is enchanting.

Could it be said, even so, that Il tabarro is the weak link in this trilogy? It is a three-hander, surely, and neither the soprano nor the tenor are quite in Gobbi's league. Mas is a bit plummy and mezzoish, true, but the slight implication this gives that Giorgetta's liaison with the young stevedore Luigi is her last chance at escape from a hateful life and a marriage that has soured adds an extra twinge of pain to a plot in which all three principals are victims. And in this context Prandelli's slightly strenuous rawness of tone characterizes Luigi rather well. In Gianni Schicchi, Carlo del Monte as Rinuccio also looks like under-casting but in fact he's one of the few tenors who've recorded the part who sounds convincingly young, and his ardent praise of Florence and the 'new men' who are reinvigorating the city is proudly sung. Here, too, Gobbi is surrounded by a constellation of pungent character actors, and de los Angeles in Suor Angelica is teamed with a charmingly girlish, impulsive Genovieffa and with Fedora Barbieri's rigidly implacable Princess. With generally very stylish conducting throughout (only Belezza in Il tabarro is a touch staid, and he omits nearly all of Puccini's off-stage sound effects) only the rather elderly recordings might be seen as a drawback. EMI boldly labels the whole set 'stereo', but both Il tabarro and Suor Angelica sound like minimally 'processed' mono: a touch congested in fuller pasages, a hint of fizzy brightness here and there, but all well worth putting up with for such performances as these.

Tosca

Tosca

Angela Gheorghiu sop Tosca; Roberto Alagna ten Cavaradossi; Ruggero Raimondi bar Scarpia; Maurizio Muraro bass Angelotti; Enrico Fissore bass Sacristan; David Cangelosi ten Spoletta; Sorin Coliban bass Sciarrone; Gwynne Howell bass Un carceriere; James Savage-Hanford treb Un pastore Tiffin Children's Choir; Royal Opera House Chorus and Orchestra / Antonio Pappano

EMI ② 557173-2 (114 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001 ●

Antonio Pappano's conducting alone would make this a Tosca of distinction, whether in big matters (the voicing of those snarling opening chords) or tiny ones: the carefully measured pause after Tosca asks Cavaradossi whether he's happy at the prospect of stealing away to their villa: he's preoccupied and hasn't really been listening. The orchestral sound is splendidly full whenever it needs to be, but never at the expense of fine detail, and Pappano's pacing is admirable: the Act 2 dialogue between Tosca and Scarpia, for example, inexorably builds in tension instead of being feverish from the outset, as is too often the case.

Gheorghiu's Tosca responds to this. She is impetuous, nervously intense, but capable also of a lovely, quiet purity). She is a very complete Tosca, indeed, and intelligently capable of bringing her own perceptions to the role. After the killing of Scarpia, her 'And before him all Rome trembled!' is neither triumphant nor melodramatic but wondering and fearful: she is aghast at what she has done and already suspects that this is not the end of the matter. Her 'Vissi d'arte' is most beautiful, her intimacy in the first scene with Cavaradossi tender and touching.

In that passage Alagna responds to her delicacy, and in Act 3 he receives her acting lesson with a touch of humour. Elsewhere he is in fine, mostly full voice, nowhere near as subtle as Gheorghiu. His tone hardens under pressure once or twice, and his mezza voce can sound thin, but he is never short of vocal glamour: a creditable but not especially interesting Cavaradossi.

Raimondi's Scarpia, on the other hand, is very interesting. The quieter shades of his voice now need careful management (and it is, besides, darker and softer-grained than a true dramatic baritone), but although he may initially seem to lack authority his reading is full of finesse.

A very fine Tosca, in short, not quite in the same league as the celebrated Callas/ di Stefano/Gobbi/de Sabata, but giving all the others an exciting run for their money. The recording is all that could be wished.

Montserrat Caballé sop Tosca; José Carreras ten Cavaradossi; Ingvar Wixell bar Scarpia; Samuel Ramey bass Angelotti; Piero De Palma ten Spoletta; Domenico Trimarchi bar Sacristan; William Elvin bar Sciarrone, Gaoler; Ann Murray mez Shepherd Boy
Chorus and Orchestra of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden / Sir Colin Davis
Philips Duo ② 438 359-2PM2 (118 minutes: ADD). Ⓜ
Recorded 1976

Caballé's Tosca is one of the most ravishingly sung on record, with scarcely a less than beautiful note throughout, save where an occasional phrase lies a touch low for her. She doesn't quite have the 'prima donna' (in quotes, mind) temperament for the part (the coquettish malice of 'but make her eyes black!', as Tosca forgives Cavaradossi for using a blonde stranger as model for his altarpiece of the Magdalen, is not in Caballé's armoury; either that or she knows that her voice would sound arch attempting it), but her portrayal is much more than a display of lovely sounds. She is precise with words, takes minute care over phrasing, and she knows to a split second where dead-centre precise pitching becomes crucial. Carreras's Cavaradossi is one of his best recorded performances: the voice untarnished, the line ample, and if he's tempted at times to over-sing one forgives the fault for the sake of his poetic ardour.

Wixell is the fly in the ointment: a capable actor and an intelligent artist, but his gritty timbre lacks centre and thus the necessary dangerous suavity.

Davis's direction is flexible but dramatic and finely detailed, and the secondary singers are all very good. The recording, despite some rather unconvincing sound effects, still sounds very well, with space around the voices and a natural balance between them and the orchestra. It's pity Philips should have saved space by omitting the libretto.

Tosca
Leontyne Price sop Tosca; Giuseppe di Stefano ten Cavaradossi; Giuseppe Taddei bar Scarpia; Carlo Cava bass Angelotti; Piero De Palma ten Spoletta; Fernando Corena bass Sacristan; Leonardo Monreale bass Sciarrone; Alfredo Mariotti bass Gaoler; Herbert Weiss treb Shepherd Boy
Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
Decca Legends ② 466 384-2DMO2 Ⓜ
(114 minutes: ADD). Text and translation included
Recorded 1962 ●

Karajan's classic version of Tosca was originally issued on the RCA label, but produced by John Culshaw of Decca at a vintage period. The first surprise is to find the sound satisfying in almost every way, with a firm sense of presence and with each voice and each section of the orchestra cleanly focused within the stereo spectrum. What is less surprising is the superiority of this version as an interpretation. Karajan was always a master Puccinian, and this set was a prime example. A typical instance comes at the end of Act 1, where Scarpia's Te Deum is taken daringly slowly, and conveys a quiver of menace that no other version begins to match. An extra nicety is the way that in the instrumental introduction to Cavaradossi's first aria, 'Recondita armonia', he treats it as the musical equivalent of a painter mixing his colours, the very point Puccini no doubt had in mind. Karajan, though individual, and regularly challenging his singers is most solicitous in following the voices. It is fascinating to note what expressive freedom he allows his tenor, di Stefano, and he makes Leontyne Price relax, giving a superb assumption of the role, big and rich of tone; the voice is the more beautiful for not being recorded too closely.

Tosca Ⓗ
Maria Callas sop Tosca; Giuseppe di Stefano ten Cavaradossi; Tito Gobbi bar Scarpia; Franco

Calabrese bass Angelotti; Angelo Mercuriali ten
Spoletta; Melchiorre Luise bass Sacristan; Dario
Caselli bass Sciarrone, Gaoler; Alvaro Cordova treb
Shepherd Boy Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala,
Milan / Victor de Sabata
EMI Great Recordings of the Century ②
567756-2 (108 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1953 ●●●

Few opera recordings have been so widely lauded as this Tosca, so it is small wonder that EMI has issued it in several different guises since it was first transferred to CD in 1985: a great recording it most assuredly is. De Sabata's conducting is without equal: dramatic energy crackles even in the quietest passages, like the orchestral low G when Cavaradossi is ushered into the torture chamber in Act 2 – a single note that conveys palpable dread. And how much life there is in the dance of death that accompanies the Cavaliere's execution at the opera's end.

As for the singing: one might complain about some occasional thickness in the middle-register of Callas's voice, or that quite a few of di Stefano's high notes lack bloom. But there are no quibbles about the vocal characterisations, which have yet to be surpassed for sheer vividness. Di Stefano is at his lyrical best in Act 3, making 'E lucevan le stelle' a truly anguished farewell to life. Gobbi is marvellous throughout, refusing to play Scarpia as a caricature of villainy, and his portrayal is all the more horrifically convincing for it. And Callas? She is a mass of contradictions: haughty and vulnerable, uncompromising and uncertain, yet always passionate – in short, the diva's diva.

The sound has been much improved since its last appearance on disc.

Tosca (sung in English)
Jane Eaglen sop Tosca; Dennis O'Neill ten
Cavaradossi; Gregory Yurisich bar Scarpia; Peter
Rose bass Angelotti; John Daszak ten Spoletta;
Andrew Shore bass Sacristan; Christopher Booth-Jones bass Sciarrone; Ashley Holland bass
Gaoler;Charbel Michael mez Shepherd Boy
Peter Kay Children's Choir; Geoffrey Mitchell
Choir; Philharmonia Orchestra / David Parry
Chandos Opera in English ② CHAN3000
(18 minutes: DDD). Notes and text included Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

This is an issue to delight far more than devotees of opera in English, a gripping account of Puccini's red-blooded drama. Above all, it offers the first major recording to demonstrate the powers of Jane Eaglen at full stretch in one of the most formidable, vocally satisfying portrayals of the role of Tosca in years. Parry here demonstrates his full understanding of Puccini and the bite and energy in the playing of the Philharmonia, not to mention the expressive warmth in the love music, will have you riveted as though hearing the music for the first time. The opulent Chandos sound, cleanly focused with plenty of atmosphere and presence, adds to the impact, whether in the power of the big tuttis or in the subtlety of whispered string pianissimos. Off-stage effects are nicely evocative, though the sequence of bell-sounds at the start of Act 3 is so clear it suggests an orchestra rather than a Roman landscape. Otherwise, the slightly forward balance of voices against orchestra is very well judged. Eaglen is well matched by Dennis O'Neill as Cavaradossi, aptly Italianate in every register, and betraying only a slight unevenness occasionally on high notes under pressure. Gregory Yurisich makes a powerful Scarpia, younger-sounding than most, and therefore a more plausible lover. The others are well cast as well, notably Peter Rose who is as an outstanding, fresh-voiced Angelotti.

Turandot

Dame Joan Sutherland sop Princess Turandot; Luciano Pavarotti ten Calaf; Montserrat Caballé
sop Liù; Tom Krause bar Ping; Pier Francesco Poli
ten Pang, Prince of Persia; Piero De Palma ten Pong; Nicolai Ghiaurov bass Timur; Sir Peter Pears
ten Emperor Altoum; Sabin Markov bar Mandarin
Wandsworth School Boys' Choir; John Alldis Choir;
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Zubin Mehta
Decca ② 414 274-2DH2 (117 minutes: ADD). Notes, Ⓕ
text and translation included. Recorded 1972 ●●

Turandot is a psychologically complex work fusing appalling sadism with self-sacrificing devotion. The icy Princess of China has agreed to marry any man of royal blood who can solve three riddles she has posed. If he fails his head will roll. Calaf, the son of the exiled Tartar king Timur, answers all the questions easily and when Turandot hesitates to accept him, magnanimously offers her a riddle in return – 'What is his name?'. Liù, Calaf's faithful slave-girl, is tortured but rather than reveal his identity kills herself. Turandot finally capitulates, announcing that his name is Love. Dame Joan Sutherland's assumption of the title role is statuesque, combining regal poise with a more human warmth, whilst Montserrat Caballé is a touchingly sympathetic Liù, skilfully steering the character away from any hint of the mawkish. Pavarotti's Calaf is a heroic figure in splendid voice and the chorus is handled with great power, baying for blood at one minute, enraptured with Liù's nobility at the next. Mehta conducts with great passion and a natural feel for Puccini's wonderfully tempestuous drama. Well recorded.

Turandot 🄷
Maria Callas sop Princess Turandot; Eugenio
Fernandi ten Calaf; Dame Elisabeth Schwarzkopf
sop Liù; Mario Borriello bar Ping; Renato Ercolani
ten Pang; Piero De Palma ten Pong; Nicola
Zaccaria bass Timur; Giuseppe Nessi ten Emperor
Altoum; Giulio Mauri bass Mandarin
Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan /
Tullio Serafin

EMI mono ② 556307-2 (118 minutes: ADD) Notes, text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded 1957 ○○

To have Callas, the most flashing-eyed of all sopranos as Turandot, is – on record at least – the most natural piece of casting. Other sopranos may be comparably icy in their command, but Callas with her totally distinctive tonal range was able to give the fullest possible characterization. With her, Turandot was not just an implacable man-hater but a highly provocative female. One quickly reads something of Callas's own underlying vulnerability into such a portrait, its tensions, the element of brittleness. With her the character seems so much more believably complex than with others. It was sad that, except at the very beginning of her career, she felt unable to sing the role in the opera house, but this recording is far more valuable than any memory of the past, one of the most thrillingly magnetic of all her recorded performances, the more so when Schwarzkopf as Liù provides a comparably characterful and distinctive portrait, far more than a Puccinian 'little woman', sweet and wilting.

Next to such supreme singers it was perhaps cruel of Walter Legge to choose so relatively uncharacterful a tenor as Eugenio Fernandi as Calaf, but at least his timbre is pleasingly distinctive. What fully matches the singing of Callas and Schwarzkopf in its positive character is the conducting of Serafin, which is sometimes surprisingly free, but in its pacing invariably capturing rare colour, atmosphere and mood as well as dramatic point. The Ping, Pang and Pong episode of Act 2 has rarely sparkled so naturally, the work of a conductor who has known and loved the music in the theatre over a long career.

The conducting is so vivid that the limitations of the mono sound hardly seem to matter. As the very opening will reveal, the CD transfer makes it satisfyingly full-bodied. Though with its rich, atmospheric stereo the Mehta set remains the best general recommendation, it is thrilling to have this historic document so vividly restored.

Additional recommendation
Turandot (sung in English)
Eaglen Turandot; O'Neill Calaf; Plazas Liù; Bayley Timur; New London Children's Choir; Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; Philharmonia Orchestra / Parry
Chandos/Peter Moores Foundation Opera in English ② CHAN3086 (135 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Libretto and translation included. Recorded c2002

The great glory of this set is Jane Eaglen's Turandot. There's a total absence of strain even in the most taxing passages, a firmness and a clarity – thanks to Chandos's exemplary soundstage – that hasn't always marked her recordings. O'Neill gives a strong, heroic reading, but with the occasional moment of strain. And Parry carries the performance forward magnetically. Thoroughly recommended.

Henry Purcell

British 1659-1695

GROVE Purcell was a chorister in the Chapel Royal until his voice broke in 1673. He was then made assistant to John Hingeston, whom he succeeded as organ maker and keeper of the king's instruments in 1683. In 1677 he was appointed composer-in-ordinary for the king's violins and in 1679 succeeded his teacher, Blow, as organist of Westminster Abbey. From 1680 he began writing music for the theatre. In 1682 he was appointed an organist of the Chapel Royal. His court appointments were renewed by James II in 1685 and by William III in 1689, and on each occasion he had the duty of providing a second organ for the coronation. The last royal occasion for which he provided music was Queen Mary's funeral in 1695.

Purcell was one of the greatest composers of the Baroque period and one of the greatest of all English composers. His works include the fantasias for viols (masterpieces of contrapuntal writing in the old style) and some of the more modern sonatas for violins which reveal an acquaintance with Italian models. In time Purcell became increasingly in demand as a composer, and his theatre music in particular made his name familiar to many who knew nothing of his church music or the odes and welcome songs he wrote for the court. During the last five years of his life Purcell collaborated on five semi-operas in which the music has a large share, with divertissements, songs, choral numbers and dances. His only true opera (ie with music throughout) was Dido and Aeneas, written for a girls school at Chelsea; despite the limitations of Nahum Tate's libretto it is among the finest of 17th-century operas.

Complete Ayres for the Theatre

The History of Dioclesian, or The Prophetess, Z627[b]. King Arthur, Z628[b]. The Fairy Queen, Z629[b]. The Indian Queen, Z630[b]. The Married Beau, Z603[a]. The Old Bachelor, Z607[b]. Amphitryon, Z572[a]. The Double Dealer, Z592[a]. Distressed Innocence, Z577[a]. The Gordian Knot Unty'd, Z597[a]. Abdelazer, Z570[a]. Bonduca, Z574[a]. The Virtuous Wife, Z611[a]. Sonata While the Sun Rises in 'The Indian Queen'[b]. Overture in G minor[a]. Sir Anthony Love, Z588 – Overture[a]. Timon of Athens, Z632[a]. The Indian Queen, Z630 – Symphony[b]
[a]The Parley of Instruments; [b]The Parley of Instruments Baroque Orchestra / Roy Goodman
Hyperion ③ CDA67001/3 (209 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

All these works were published within 18 months of Purcell's death. The 13 suites of choice movements from plays and semi-operas, entitled A Collection of Ayres, compos'd for the Theatre, and upon other occasions, may well have been the editing work of Purcell's brother, Daniel. Whoever it was had a rare combination of musical integrity and commercial flair: the pieces lifted from Purcell's interpolations to plays are often reordered and arranged with a deftness and charm which conveys the spirit of the theatre as well as heightening the loss and poignancy of Purcell's passing. How moving the Rondeau Minuet from The Gordian Knot Unty'd must have seemed to those who knew and loved Purcell.

As a major retrospective of Purcell's life in the theatre, the Ayres for the Theatre mainly comprise instrumental dances from their original sources, though there are several movements readapted from sung airs, such as 'Fairest isle' from King Arthur and 'If love's a sweet passion' from The Fairy Queen. The tunes are wonderful and varied, the inner part-writing skilful and the rhythmic imagination knows no bounds. Even so, this is not music where more than a suite at a time can be recommended for ultimate satisfaction: stop while you still want more. And more you will most certainly want with Roy Goodman's alert and distinctive direction. If a few of the movements sound a touch mundane and lack dynamism as one follows on from another, the positive side is that the performances are never forced and rarely mannered. For the semi-opera 'suites', Goodman employs a full orchestra. What The Parley of Instruments has in abundance is a cordiality of expression which seems so absolutely right, especially in the slower airs.

Fantasias

Awards 1997

Fantasias – three part, Z732-4; four part, Z735-43; five part, 'upon one note', Z745. In Nomines – G minor, Z746; G minor, 'Dorian', Z747 Ⓟ
Joanna Levine, Susanna Pell, Catherine Finnis viols Phantasm (Laurence Dreyfus, Wendy Gillespie, Jonathan Manson, Markku Luolajan-Mikkola viols)
Simax PSC1124 (51 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●●●

Purcell's contrapuntal mastery is dazzling, with the points of imitation in the various sections of each fantasia treated in double or triple counterpoint, inversion, augmentation and all other technical devices – for instance, the initial subjects of fantasias Z739, 742 and 743 at once appear in mirror images of themselves – but the music's deep expressiveness and the dramatic tension created by its chromaticisms and unpredictable harmonies make it clear that he certainly had performance in mind (a matter of some dispute), even if, because of the king's dislike of such intellectual pursuits, only privately by conservative-minded music-lovers. It is this expressiveness which Phantasm emphasizes in this recording, both in their varied dynamics and in their use of vibrato. Speeds here are in general fast and there is great variety of bowing and hence of articulation.

Fantasia in F, Z745, 'Upon one note'. Ⓟ
Fantasias – three part, Z732-34; four part, Z735-43. In Nomines – G minor Z746; G minor, Z747, 'Dorian'
Hespèrion XX (Sophie Watillon, Eunice Brandao, Sergi Casademunt, Wieland Kuijken, Marianne Müller, Philippe Pierlot viols) / Jordi Savall treb viol
Auvidis Astrée ES9922 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1994 ●

Purcell's music for viols represents the final flowering of the English consort tradition. Viol consorts had been out of fashion for at least 20 years, ousted by the Italian violin sonatas and French ballet music. Purcell's polished essays in this antique form were neither published nor, apparently, widely circulated. Nevertheless, we cherish them today for their sublime expressiveness and craftsmanship. Jordi Savall and his group have achieved a state of abstraction seldom experienced in music. It almost goes without saying that Hespèrion's playing is always extremely beautiful: the music demands it. But any need to be rhetorical, to lean on a dissonance or pronounce a cadence, has been outgrown and discarded. The scale within which these features and more are articulated is so minimal, so subtle and yet ultimately so compelling, that from the first track the listener is transported into a rarefied aural dimension usually reserved for single movements or even phrases. Don't miss it.

Anthems and Services

Complete Anthems and Services, Volume 7 Ⓟ
I was glad when they said unto me[b]. I was glad when they said unto me, Z19[a]. O consider my adversity, Z32[b]. Beati omnes qui timent Dominum, Z131. In the black dismal dungeon of despair, Z190. Save me, O God, Z51[b]. Morning and Evening Service in B flat, Z230 – Te Deum; Jubilate. Thy Way, O God, is Holy, Z60. Funeral Sentences for the death of Queen Mary II[b] – Drum Processional; March and Canzona in C minor, Z860; Man that is born of Woman, Z27; In the midst of Life, Z17[b]; Thou know'st Lord, Z58*b*; Thou know'st Lord, Z58*c*
Mark Kennedy, Eamonn O'Dwyer, James Goodman trebs Susan Gritton sop James Bowman, Nigel Short countertens Rogers Covey-Crump, Charles Daniels, Mark Milhofer tens Michael George, Robert Evans basses [a]New College Choir, Oxford; [b]The King's Consort Choir; The King's Consort / Robert King
Hyperion CDA66677 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993
Also available on Hyperion CDS44141/51 (11 discs) Ⓑ

This recording is made up predominantly of anthems, devotional songs and a morning service (a functional, though not perfunctory, setting of the Te Deum and Jubilate) most of which disclose the range and quality of the composer's sacred oeuvre near its best. Of the two settings of I was glad, the first was, until not long ago, thought to be the work of John Blow. This full anthem more than whets our appetite with its agreeable tonal and melodic twists; when the Gloria arrives, we are assured that this is vintage Purcell by the sensitive pacing as much as an exquisite contrapuntal denouement. The earlier setting is more poignant. Opening with a string symphony in the spirit of a Locke consort, the music blossoms into a deliciously Elysian melodic fabric. Good sense is made of the overall shape and the soloists are, as ever, excellent. Beati omnes is a positive gem; this may well have been written for the composer's wedding. Of the small-scale pieces, In the black dismal dungeon is the real masterpiece and it is delivered astutely by the secure and musicianly voice of Susan Gritton.

Finally to the funeral pieces. Here we have an ominous procession from the Guild of Ancient Fifes and Drums and the first appearance of four 'flatt' trumpets – as opposed to two plus two sackbuts; the effect of this subtle timbral change makes extraordinary sense of the music, engendering a new grandeur and uncompromising clarity as would have befitted such an occasion. The vocal performances are earthy and impassioned.

Odes for St Cecilia's Day

1692, Hail, bright Cecilia, Z328; 1683, Welcome to all the pleasures, Z339

Hail, bright Cecilia; Welcome to all the pleasures
Susan Hamilton, Siri Thornhill sops Robin Blaze, Martin van der Zeijst countertens Mark Padmore ten Jonathan Arnold, Peter Harvey, Jonathan Brown basses Collegium Vocale / Philippe Herreweghe
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1643 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1997

The two famous St Cecilian Odes reflect a remarkable polarity in the composer's creative priorities: the shorter of the two, Welcome to all the pleasures, is a supreme amalgamation of Fishburn's words and Purcell's music, bursting with contained subtlety and enchantment. There is also a unique sense of conveying something novel, in this case an inaugural tribute on November 22, 1683, to the patron saint of music, henceforth annually celebrating 'this divine Science'. Hail, bright Cecilia from 1692 is three times longer and explores all the startling orchestral sounds which changed English music towards something approaching a Handelian palette. It is also truly fin de siècle (some might say Newtonian) in ambition and the imagery is as breathtakingly splendid now as it was when the Victorians first revered it for its boldness and scale. Such qualities clearly animate Herreweghe and he shapes this music with rapture and precision. The whole is infectiously fresh and never rushed. If not as brilliant or as full as McCreesh, Herreweghe is rather more sensitive to the nuances which irradiate from Purcell's colouring of words. He largely uses English voices. 'Hark! hark! each tree' boasts the versatile and effortless alto of Robin Blaze who, with the assured Peter Harvey, achieves a delightfully naturalistic lilt. This version certainly rivals McCreesh (for whom Peter Harvey also sings 'Wondrous machine' splendidly) for elevated characterization. One blip here is the piping soprano in 'Thou tun'st this world' (Susan Hamilton) where the voice seems technically and expressively limited. For beauty of sound, then, Herreweghe is your man. For dramatic immediacy and excitement, McCreesh.

Welcome to all the pleasures. Hail, bright Cecilia. Funeral Sentences for the death of Queen Mary. Birthday Ode, Z323, 'Come ye sons of art away'. March and Canzona in C minor, Z860.
Emily Van Evera sop Timothy Wilson counterten John Mark Ainsley, Charles Daniels tens David Thomas bass Taverner Consort, Choir and Players / Andrew Parrott
Virgin Classics Veritas Double ② 561582-2 Ⓑ
(111 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998

While McCreesh makes the score sparkle with his energetic view of tempos, Andrew Parrott parades his smooth and integrated forces with less instant theatricality. Instead we have a typically homogeneous and unfolding scenario which complements McCreesh's more effervescent and lush reading. The reappearance of Parrott's recordings of Purcell's earlier Cecilian ode, Welcome to all the pleasures and the time-honoured and particularly accessible Come ye sons of art away is also received with open arms. Some may distrust the low pitch (A=392) but the high tenor of Charles Daniels and the satisfying registral blend of Timothy Wilson and John Mark Ainsley in 'Sound the trumpet' are more than adequate recompense and the former's mellifluous rendering of 'Here the deities approve' is a real gem to be savoured.

Songs

She loves, and she confesses, Z413. Amintas, to my 🅿 grief I see, Z356. Corinna is divinely fair, Z365. Amintor, heedless of his flocks, Z357. He himself courts his own ruin, Z372. No, to what purpose, Z468. Sylvia, 'tis true you're fair, Z512. Lovely Albina's come ashore, Z394. Spite of the godhead, pow'rful love, Z417. If music be the food of love, Z379/3. Phyllis, I can ne'er forgive it, Z408. Bacchus is a pow'r divine, Z360. Bess of Bedlam, Z370, 'From silent shades'. Let formal lovers still pursue, Z391. I came, I saw, and was undone, Z375. Who can behold Florella's charms?, Z441. Cupid, the slyest rogue alive, Z367. If prayers and tears, Z380. In Chloris all soft charms agree, Z384. Let us, kind Lesbia, give away, Z466. Love is now become a trade, Z393. Ask me to love no more, Z358. O Solitude! my sweetest choice, Z406. Olinda in the shades unseen, Z404. Pious Celinda goes to prayers, Z410. When Strephon found his passion vain, Z435. The fatal hour comes on apace, Z421. Sawney is a bonny lad, Z412. Young Thirsis' fate, ye hills and groves, deplore, Z473
Barbara Bonney, Susan Gritton sops James Bowman counterten Rogers Covey-Crump, Charles Daniels tens Michael George bass Mark Caudle,

Susanna Pell vas da gamba David Miller
lte/theorbo / Robert King org/hpd
Hyperion CDA66730 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1993-94

This third and last volume of Purcell's non-theatrical secular songs consummates a most rewarding survey of 87 songs with more of the same: a vocal palette of six singers who are by now so steeped in the nuances of Purcell's strains that even the slightest offering sparkles with something memorable. The treasure is shared between Barbara Bonney and Susan Gritton who complement each other superbly. Gritton, becoming more refined in characterization and tonal colour by the day, is allotted the free-style and dramatic pieces whilst to Bonney's fluid and sensual melisma is designated the more strophic or cantabile settings. Lovely Albina's come ashore is one of the composer's most mature creations, tantalizingly hinting at a new, tautly designed and classically balanced type of song. This work, If music be the food of love (the best of the three versions) and I came, I saw are striking examples of how exceptionally Bonney negotiates Purcell's skipping and curling contours and makes these songs sound even finer creations than we previously thought. From silent shades ('Bess of Bedlam') is Purcell's quintessential mad-song and Gritton has the measure of it all the way; packed full of incident, imagery and musical detail, her narration is clear and finely judged, reporting the tale with irony and change of colour. The CD is beautifully documented.

Odes and Welcome Songs, Volumes 6-8
Gillian Fisher, Mary Seers, Susan Hamilton, Tessa Bonner sops James Bowman, Nigel Short, Michael Chance countertens Mark Padmore, Andrew Tusa, Rogers Covey-Crump, Charles Daniels, John Mark Ainsley tens Michael George, Robert Evans basses New College Choir, Oxford; The King's Consort / Robert King

Love's goddess sure was blind, Z331. Raise, raise the voice, Z334. Laudate Ceciliam, Z329. From those serene and rapturous joys, Z326 🅿
Hyperion CDA66494 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1991

Of old, when heroes thought it base, Z333. Swifter, Isis, swifter flow, Z336. What, what shall be done on behalf of the man?, Z341 🅿
Hyperion CDA66587 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1991

Come ye sons of art, away, Z323. Welcome, viceregent of the mighty king, Z340. Why, why are all the Muses mute?, Z343 🅿
Hyperion CDA66598 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1991

These three CDs represent the final instalments in Hyperion's complete recording of Purcell's Odes and Welcome Songs. Purcell composed a number of these celebratory works between 1680 and 1695, and 24 survive. They were written for a wide range of events: most for royal birthdays, of King James II and Queen Mary, but also for a royal wedding, educational celebrations, and the 'Yorkshire Feast' of 1689. Hyperion's edition is to be warmly welcomed, not only for bringing to the catalogue such magnificent music, but also for the extremely sympathetic performances by the The King's Consort under the direction of Robert King. Of all the works on these dises, probably the most well known is Come ye sons of art, away written for Queen Mary in 1694 (Volume 8). This joyous work contains some of Purcell's most ebullient music, typified by the duet for two countertenors, 'Sound the trumpet'. Like all of the works in the set this is surrounded by a well contrasted group of solos and duets for individual voices, instrumental interludes, and the occasional chorus. Less famous, but equally full of Restoration pomp and ceremony is the Yorkshire Feast song (Volume 7).

Volume 6 contains four of the least well known if no less rich and varied odes, two of which are dedicated to the patron saint of music, St Cecilia. While composed for slightly smaller forces than the more ceremonial odes, these contain music which is equally jaunty and exhilarating. Throughout all three volumes the most striking fact is Purcell's extraordinary inventiveness, and his incredible facility at word setting: even the most lame texts come alive in his hands, and the variety of expression throughout is astonishing. Robert King's direction is always sensitive to both the broad span and individual nuances of Purcell's kaleidoscopic writing for voice and instruments. The King's Consort plays with great understanding throughout and has clearly absorbed the often elusive style of this music, in which many influences are combined. The vocal soloists are uniformly excellent, but special mention must be made of the soprano Gillian Fisher, and the countertenor James Bowman. The recordings are without fault, achieving both excellent internal balance and appropriate atmosphere and perspective.

Dioclesian

Dioclesian, Acts 1-4 🅿
Catherine Pierard sop James Bowman counterten John Mark Ainsley, Mark Padmore tens Michael George bass Collegium Musicum 90 Chorus; Collegium Musicum 90 / Richard Hickox
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0568 Ⓕ
(54 minutes: DDD). Text included. Recorded 1994

It was Dioclesian, the least known of the four semi-opera masterpieces of Purcell, for which the composer initially earned a reputation for writing stage music. The 'opera' was by all accounts a roaring success, though music played a less important part in the stage works of the 1690s than it did in the masque-related works of the previous decades – ironically just at the time when England could at last boast a dramatic master who could stand tall amongst the 'greats' of France and Italy. If the paucity of tableaux means a less atmospheric scenic context, such as we experience in The Fairy Queen or King Arthur, there is still much fine music which deserves to be highly regarded. Hickox is evidently committed to this score: the instrumental movements are all disciplined and yet display the buoyancy and variety of expression of one who senses the freshness of Purcell's first foray into the theatre. His soloists are authoritative Purcellians and they never disappoint and he manages to sustain the tension and climate he sets from the start.

Dido and Aeneas

Stephen Wallace counterten Second Witch; Gerald Finley bar Aeneas; Rosemary Joshua sop Belinda; Lynne Dawson sop Dido; John Bowen ten First Sailor; Dominique Visse counterten First Witch; Maria Cristina Kiehr sop Second Woman; Susan Bickley mez Sorceress; Robin Blaze counterten Spirit; Clare College Choir, Cambridge; Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / René Jacobs 🅿

Harmonia Mundi HMX290 1683 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Text and translation included. Recorded 1998 ●

Dido is a conveniently short piece and arguably one whose concentrated musical language and quicksilver dramatic juxtapositions are especially well suited to the recorded medium, giving full rein to Purcell's imagination and raising it out of its habitually stilted stage conventions. This is where Charles Mackerras's 1967 Archiv recording (nla) succeeded, especially in Tatiana Troyanos's exquisite pacing of Dido's noble and tragic demise; also successful in bringing out the work's full imaginative impact were the recent smaller-scale but atmospheric accounts from Andrew Parrott (Emma Kirkby as Dido) and Ivor Bolton (Della Jones on Teldec – nla) and – the pick of the crop until now – Christopher Hogwood, with the sensual immediacy of Catherine Bott as Dido.

René Jacobs is one of the very few luminaries of the current Baroque dramatic scene not to have tackled this singular masterpiece until now, and he does so, like Hogwood, with a gaggle of top-class singers; when you can casually call on Maria Cristina Kiehr to sing her tuppenceworth of Second Woman, not to mention Robin Blaze as Spirit and Dominique Visse as First Witch, it augurs well for a new benchmark recording. Rosemary Joshua's Belinda is a straightforward, dramatically unobtrusive but essential presence, never manipulated to be more of an influence in Dido's life than Purcell clearly relates in the lady-in-waiting's gut offerings of advice, revealed in 'Pursue thy conquest love'. Of course, Act 2 is where things really get going, after the fairly perfunctory introduction to the solid hunk that is Aeneas. Whether you choose to cast your Sorceress as male (Hogwood plumps for David Thomas) or as a crooning hag, he or she has a crucial part in the overall 'temperament' of a performance, neither to be camped up unduly nor, similarly, made too earnest in delivery. Susan Bickley is a fine Sorceress of the old school, precise and yet retaining an authority through quality of tone rather than mere pantomime.

Jacobs' richly paletted, pacey and boldly theatrical reading will prove to be a breath of fresh air to those who feel that Purcell's music in general can withstand being 'un-Englished' for want of new approaches to colour, characterisation and the composer's inimitable lyrical undercurrent. The odd instrumental dance seems a touch lacking in native roughage, but the finely proportioned Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment bound through the Grove's Dance are even more purposeful in the First Sailor's song which opens Act 3. Lynne Dawson will disappoint few in her devastated, long-breathed and honest 'Lament', elegantly turned (if not vocally peerless) and, crucially, consequential of so much that has passed before. The last chorus is more beautifully sung than you've ever heard: a true funeral rite. These are the elusive ingredients of a compelling and truly involved reading. Imaginative and invigorating, Jacobs has revitalised Dido, taking it further away from the banks of Chelsea to a more universal world where this masterpiece surely belongs.

Dido and Aeneas 🅿

Catherine Bott sop Dido; John Mark Ainsley ten Aeneas; Emma Kirkby sop Belinda; David Thomas bass Sorceress; Elizabeth Priday sop First Witch; Sara Stowe sop Second Witch; Julianne Baird sop Second Woman; Daniel Lochmann treb First Sailor; Michael Chance counterten Spirit; Academy of Ancient Music Chorus and Orchestra / Christopher Hogwood

L'Oiseau-Lyre 436 992-2OHO (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Notes and text included. Recorded 1992 ●●

Emma Kirkby (whose Dido, for Parrott on Chandos, remains one of the finest on record) sings Belinda for Hogwood; David Thomas (whose Aeneas, on the same recording, was outstanding) sings the Sorceress; Michael Chance takes the tiny part of the Spirit, thereby putting its moment into centre stage as the gloriously conceived turning-point of the story. A few innovations, too. Following the arguments that the Sorceress could be a man, Hogwood's choice of Thomas has offered us perhaps the most eloquent version on disc so far.

Thomas gives full value to the words and the music. Less convincing is the use of a boy for the sailor's song; despite direct and spirited singing, its text is quite inappropriate for a boy. Much more successful is the use of the Drottningholm wind-machines to interpret the various stage-instructions and give the entire performance a real sense of verisimilitude. Catherine Bott is a fine Dido, even-voiced across the range and powerfully expressive if occasionally a touch free with the rhythms. John Mark Ainsley easily stands as the finest Aeneas since David Thomas. This is a very difficult role to handle dramatically, because its moods change so fast; and Ainsley handles all this with heartbreaking ease. This is a classic interpretation. So too is Hogwood's reading of the score, with his faultless sense of the right speed and the right rhythm as well as his ability to see the moment when everything must be interrupted in order to give the required space to the drama.

Dido and Aeneas P
Véronique Gens sop Dido; Nathan Berg bass-bar Aeneas; Sophie Marin-Degor sop Belinda; Claire Brua sop Sorceress; Sophie Daneman sop Second Woman, First Witch; Gaëlle Mechaly sop Second Witch; Jean-Paul Fouchécourt ten Spirit, Sailor; Les Arts Florissants / William Christie
Erato 4509-98477-2 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1994

William Christie's reading of Dido is very much in terms of the reputed French influence on Purcell. Overdotting, reverse dotting and inégalité are used throughout; the lines are often heavily embellished in the manner of Lully. This is a perfectly justifiable approach to the music, since there is little direct evidence to say exactly how much the French style dominated in England. This version – with single strings, an excellent small choir and a slightly obtrusive harpsichord – stands well alongside what is otherwise available: if you prefer Dido in the French manner this is the record you will want; if not, you will probably still want it as a very different view of a major work. Apart from a few moments' inattention in Belinda's 'Haste, haste to town', you would hardly notice that most of the cast are Francophone, except in that Nathan Berg's imposing bass-baritone finds it slightly easier to exploit the colour and the meaning of Aeneas's words. Véronique Gens is a lucid and sensible Dido, partnered by a sprightly Belinda from Sophie Marin-Degor and a good Second Woman from Sophie Daneman. Claire Brua's Sorceress is a splendidly insinuating conception, with a slithering melodic style.

Perhaps the main musical distinction of this version is the way Christie presents the final paragraphs. Up to this point he has taken generally quick speeds, and he runs the final confrontation of Dido and Aeneas at a headlong tempo, which works very well. Then he comes almost to a standstill at the moment when Aeneas leaves the stage, choosing an unusually slow speed for the chorus 'Great minds against themselves conspire'. This makes way for a dangerously slow Lament, which is heart-stopping, and the final chorus, which is not.

Additional recommendation
Baker Dido Herincx Aeneas Clark Belinda
English Chamber Orchesta / A Lewis
Decca 466 387-2DM Ⓜ
(53 minutes: ADD: 5/00)

A very early recording (1961) by Janet Baker in a role she was to make her own. Lewis directs a traditional but sensitive account of the score.

The Fairy Queen

Gillian Fisher, Lorna Anderson sops P
Ann Murray mez Michael Chance counterten
John Mark Ainsley, Ian Partridge tens Richard Suart, Michael George basses
The Sixteen Choir and Orchestra / Harry Christophers
Coro ② COR16005 (133 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes and texts included. Recorded 1991 ●

The Fairy Queen is hardly an 'opera' in the conventional sense: its musical virtues lie in the composer's uncanny ability to summon a discrete, potent atmosphere whose capacity to move the listener lies outside a sustained dramatic context. The masques draw heavily on vernacular situations and a form of tragicomedy which requires a crafty hand in performance.

Harry Christophers allows the music to breathe with a warm spontaneity, encouraged by a strong and diverse vocal cast. Gillian Fisher is, on re-acquaintance, a touch disappointing, but the likes of Ann Murray (who is both radiant and a misfit in one), Michael Chance, John Mark Ainsley, Ian Partridge, Richard Suart and Michael George present a greater array of characterisation than any other extant reading. Just sample the wonderful slapstick between Mopsa and Coridon.

It's clear from Sir Roger Norrington's rival account on Virgin Veritas that he has thought about The Fairy Queen a great deal but he can never really let the human touch prevail. This is his greatest Achilles' heel. The whole feels rather studio-made, each scene a graceful vignette of layered perceptions. Overall, Christophers strikes most imploringly at the heart of Purcell's native sensibilities (Partridge's Phoebus sums it up) for a satisfying performance capturing both the indigenous humour, grandeur and poignancy of Purcell's exquisite score.

The Indian Queen

Emma Kirkby, Catherine Bott sops John Mark Ainsley ten Gerald Finley bar David Thomas bass P
Tommy Williams sngr Chorus and Orchestra of the Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood
Also includes additional Act by Daniel Purcell
Decca 475 052-2 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1994

Christopher Hogwood makes us realise that for all the constraints, this score is not inherently small-scale and that it warrants all the subtlety of colour that can be achieved using 12 soloists and a decent-sized choir and orchestra. Needless to say, Hogwood conveys a consistent, logical and meticulous understanding of the score. The orchestral playing is crisp and transparent, the AAM's articulation allowing the integrity of the inner parts to be heard to the full without compromising blend. Among a distinguished line-up of singers, John Mark Ainsley gets the lion's share and is perhaps marginally more effective as the Indian Boy than as Fame, but such gloriously mellifluous and controlled singing can only enhance the reputation of this work.

Emma Kirkby is in fine fettle and she executes the justly celebrated song 'I attempt from love's sickness' with her usual communicative panache. Then comes the pleasurably contrasted voice of Catherine Bott: 'They tell us that your mighty powers' could not be in better hands. David Thomas as Envy, with his two followers in the Act 2 masque, highlights this brilliant scene as the work of a true connoisseur of the theatre. Mature Purcell is most strongly felt in the deftly ironic invocation by the conjurer, Ismeron, whose 'Ye twice 10,000 deities' is delivered authoritatively by Gerald Finley, though the lulling to sleep, before the God of Dream's gloomy non-prediction, is unconvincing. On the whole, the quality of music shines very brightly in this reading, though the performance is perhaps a touch calculated in places. Recommended.

The Indian Queen
Tessa Bonner, Catherine Bott sops Rogers Covey-Crump ten Peter Harvey bass Purcell Simfony Voices; Purcell Simfony / Catherine Mackintosh vn
Linn Records CKD035 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

If The Indian Queen is less ambitious than the other three 'operas' there is the sure touch here of the composer at his most mature and adept. The Prologue, in which he had the rare opportunity to set an extended dialogue, is beautifully balanced, and the music in Act 3 – when Zempoalla's ill-fated love is prophesied by Ismeron the magician in 'Ye twice 10,000 deities' – ranks alongside the finest moments in Purcell's output. The small-scale character of the work, compared to its siblings, is taken a stage further by the Purcell Simfony, which employs a minute chamber-size group of four strings, doubling oboe and recorder, single trumpet and drums. The soloists sing with airy restraint but each responds to these Hilliard-esque proportions with a rhythmic buoyancy and direct intimacy which projects a finely gauged overall conception of the work.

If the expressive power of the music is at times rather glazed, there is a sure atmosphere which is captured by recorded sound that is both warm and yet never imposing. The ensemble is not always first-rate but there is nothing too worrisome and the instrumental numbers are elegantly shaped. Tessa Bonner gets the lion's share of the solo soprano numbers, ahead of the more colourful Catherine Bott, though the former's comparatively brittle sound has a crystalline quality which suits Catherine Mackintosh's consistent, if austere strategy. In short, this release is consistently touching, one which in a paradoxical way gets under the skin despite the recessed emotional climate it conveys.

King Arthur

Awards 1995

Véronique Gens, Claron McFadden, Sandrine Piau, Susannah Waters sops Mark Padmore, Iain Paton tens Jonathan Best, Petteri Salomaa, François Bazola-Minori basses Les Arts Florissants Chorus and Orchestra / William Christie P
Erato ② 4509-98535-2 Ⓕ
(90 minutes: DDD). Notes and text included
Recorded 1995 ○○○

If the co-operation with John Dryden led to a unity of vision in terms of music's expressive role in the overall drama, Purcell was limited to a historical patriotic fantasy with little room for the magic and pathos of, say, the superior Fairy Queen. Yet in the context of a stage presentation, Purcell's music shines through strongly. On disc though, with just the music, not even the dramatic powers of William Christie can restore its place in the overall scheme. But never mind, this is a score with some magnificent creations and Christie is evidently enchanted by it. The choral singing is richly textured, sensual and long-breathed, yet always alert to a nuance which can irradiate a passage at a stroke, as Christie does in the bittersweet close of 'Honour prizing' – easily the best moment in Act 1. The instrumental movements are finely moulded so that sinewy counterpoint and rhythmic profile are always strongly relayed. The songs, too, have been acutely prepared and are keenly characterised without resorting to excess. All the basses deliver their fine music with aplomb. If there is one drawback to extracting the musical numbers from the 'opera' when they have so clearly been delivered within a theatrical context, it is that the contextual characterisations lend themselves less well to the musical continuity of a CD. But King Arthur without the play is dramatically a nonsense so why try to pretend? Christie does not but makes the strongest case yet for this music.

The Tempest

The Tempest[a]. Suite in G minor, Z770 – Overture[b]. Chaconne for Strings in G minor, Z730[c]. Sonata for Trumpet and Strings No 2 in D, Z850[d]. If ever I more riches did desire, Z544[e]. The Indian Queen – Trumpet Overture[f] P
[a]Michael Colvin ten Aeolus; [ae]Meredith Hall sop Amphitrite; [a]Rosemarie van der Hooft mez Ariel; [ae]Gillian Keith sop Dorinda; [a]Brett Polegato bar Neptune, First Devil; [ae]Paul Grindlay bass-bar Second Devil; [a]Robert Stewart voc Third Devil; [e]Nils Brown ten [df]Norman Engel tpt

Aradia Baroque Ensemble / Kevin Mallon vn
Naxos 8 554262 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Texts included. Recorded 1997

There is so much pleasure to be had from Purcell's semi-operas that it is easy to wish we had more of them. Much of The Tempest is thought to have been written by other hands, but that is no reason for refusing to give it shelf-room. The score is cast in the same mould as Purcell's fully accredited dramatic works and offers a similar range of music. Director Kevin Mallon does not fuss over shaping the slower music, and the fast numbers go with plenty of zest. The ensemble includes oboes, recorders and bassoons, quite sparingly used, and bells for the setting of Ariel's 'Full fathom five'. The line-up of solo singers has no weak links and a few real strengths. Brett Polegato may lack authority in the role of Neptune, but sings with a fine, warm, well-rounded tone. Meredith Hall brings a winning sensitivity to the long solo 'Halcyon days' and finds an ideal soprano partner in the young Gillian Keith. Purcell's setting of 'If ever I more riches did desire' and his Trumpet Sonata No 2 are substantial makeweights. The recording acoustic is more church than theatre, but lively enough. Recommended.

Sergey Rachmaninov

USSR/American 1873-1943

GROVE Rachmaninov studied at the Moscow Conservatory (1885-92) under Zverev (where Scriabin was a fellow pupil) and his cousin Ziloti for piano and Taneyev and Arensky for composition, graduating with distinction as both pianist and composer (the opera Aleko, given at the Bolshoi in 1893, was his diploma piece). During the ensuing years he composed piano pieces (including his famous C sharp minor Prelude), songs and orchestral works, but the disastrous première in 1897 of his Symphony No 1 brought about a creative despair that was not dispelled until he sought medical help in 1900: then he quickly composed his Second Piano Concerto. Meanwhile he had set out on a new career as a conductor, appearing in Moscow and London; he later was conductor at the Bolshoi, 1904-6.

By this stage, and most particularly in the Piano Concerto No 2, the essentials of his art had been assembled: the command of the emotional gesture conceived as lyrical melody extended from small motifs, the concealment behind this of subtleties in orchestration and structure, the broad sweep of his lines and forms and loyalty to the finer Russian Romanticism inherited from Tchaikovsky and his teachers. During the remaining years to the Revolution these provided him with the materials for a sizable output of operas, liturgical music, orchestral works, piano pieces and songs. In 1909 he made his first American tour as a pianist, for which he wrote the Piano Concerto No 3.

Soon after the October Revolution he left Russia with his family for Scandinavia; in 1918 they arrived in New York, where he mainly lived thereafter, though he spent time in Paris, Dresden and Switzerland. There was a period of creative silence until 1926 when he wrote the Piano Concerto No 4, followed by only a handful of works over the next 15 years, even though all are on a large scale. During this period, he was active as a pianist on both sides of the Atlantic (though never again in Russia). As a pianist he was famous for his precision, rhythmic drive, legato and clarity of texture.

Complete Piano Concertos

No 1 in F sharp minor, Op 1; No 2 in C minor, Op 18; No 3 in D minor, Op 30; No 4 in G minor, Op 40. Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini, Op 43

Piano Concertos Nos 1-4. Paganini Rhapsody
Earl Wild pf Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Jascha Horenstein
Chandos ② CHAN10078 (134 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1965 ●

Such is the luxuriance of sound revealed in these remasterings, it is difficult to believe the recording date; and such is the quality of the piano playing that it is easy to understand why Chandos should have wanted to go to such trouble. There are not so many Rachmaninov pianists who dare to throw caution to the wind to the extent that Earl Wild does in the outer movements of the First Concerto, fewer still who can keep their technical poise in the process. The improvisatory feel to the lyricism of the slow movement is no less remarkable. Wild's panache is every bit as seductive in No 4, and the Paganini Rhapsody is a rare example of a performance faster than the composer's own – devilishly driven in the early variations and with tension maintained through the following slower ones so that the famous eighteenth can register as a release from a suffocating grip, rather than an overblown, out-of-context exercise in grandiosity. Because of his lightness and touch Wild's tempos never seem excessive. Undoubtedly he shifts the balance from languishing pathos and overwhelming grandeur towards straightforward exuberance; but that may be no bad thing for refreshing our view of the composer. It keeps us in touch with an earlier tradition. The RPO appears to be revelling in the whole affair, in a way one would not have immediately associated with Horenstein. To pick on the very few weaknesses, the very relaxed clarinet tone in the slow movement of Concerto No 2 rather misses the character, and elsewhere in this work the balance engineers rather crudely stick a microphone under the cello section's nostrils. But then the solo playing in this concerto is generally a little disappointing too, as though Wild had actually played the piece rather too often. In No 3 there are the hateful cuts to contend with, and one senses that the performance has been rather thoughtlessly modelled on the composer's own, idiosyncrasies and all. None the less, for the sake of the outstanding performances of Nos 1 and 4 and the Rhapsody, and for the unique combination of old-style bravura and modern sound, this issue earns a strong recommendation.

Piano Concertos Nos 1-4
Vladimir Ashkenazy pf London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn
Double Decca ② 444 839-2DF2 (135 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1970-72 ●●

Despite the recording dates, the sound and balance are superb and there is nothing to cloud or impede one's sense of Ashkenazy's greatness in all these works. From him every page declares Rachmaninov's nationality, his indelibly Russian nature. What nobility of feeling and what dark regions of the imagination he relishes and explores in page after page of the Third Concerto. Significantly his opening is a very moderate Allegro ma non tanto, later allowing him an expansiveness and imaginative scope hard to find in other more 'driven' or hectic performances. His rubato is as natural as it is distinctive and his way of easing from one idea to another shows him at his most intimately and romantically responsive. There are no cuts, and his choice of the bigger of the two cadenzas is entirely apt, given the breadth of his conception. Even the skittering figurations and volleys of repeated notes just before the close of the central Intermezzo cannot tempt Ashkenazy into display and he is quicker than any other pianist to find a touch of wistfulness beneath Rachmaninov's occasional outer playfulness (the scherzando episode in the finale).

Such imaginative fervour and delicacy are just as central to Ashkenazy's other performances. His steep unmarked decrescendo at the close of the First Concerto's opening rhetorical gesture is symptomatic of his Romantic bias, his love of the music's interior glow. And despite his prodigious command in, say, the final pages of both the First and Fourth Concertos, there is never a hint of bombast or a more superficial brand of fire-and-brimstone virtuosity. Previn works hand in glove with his soloist. Clearly, this is no one-night partnership but the product of the greatest musical sympathy. The opening of the Third Concerto's Intermezzo could hardly be given with a more idiomatic, brooding melancholy, a perfect introduction for all that is to follow. If you want playing which captures Rachmaninov's always elusive, opalescent centre then Ashkenazy is hard to beat. (The Second Concerto, our first choice in this work, is available on a single disc and is reviewed below.)

Piano Concertos Nos 1- 4. Paganini Rhapsody. Vocalise
Zoltán Kocsis pf San Francisco Symphony Orchestra / Edo de Waart
Philips Duo ② 468 921-2PM2 (DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1982 ●

Few if any readings of the piano concertos and the Paganini Rhapsody spark or scintillate with such daredevilry, are of such unapologetic virtuoso voltage, as these. True, Kocsis can sometimes be more voluble than poised, breezing through the Third Concerto's haunting opening theme at the fastest flowing tempo and – for lovers of the ever-romantic Var 18 from the Paganini Rhapsody, in particular – sometimes sacrificing heart's-ease for high-octane bravura. Again, you may question his near allegretto spin through the Second Concerto's central Adagio, eagerly glimpsing so many dazzling athletic opportunities ahead. Even so, try him in the Third Concerto's cadenza (the slimmer and better of the two) and you will hear it topped and tailed with a ferocious and almost palpable aplomb. Listen to him snapping off phrase ends in the intricate reel of the Paganini Rhapsody's Var 15 or flashing fire in the Allegro leggiero from the First Concerto's finale and you may well wonder when you last encountered such fearless brilliance, pace and relish. Even those attuned to the darker, more introspective Rachmaninov of Ashkenazy will surely pause to wonder. Edo de Waart and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra are no match for the LSO for Previn; yet, overall, this is the most propulsive and exciting set of the complete concertos. Kocsis's whirlwind tempos even allow him time for an encore – his own ardent elaboration of the Vocalise, a performance sufficiently ecstatic to set even the least susceptible heart a-flutter.

Piano Concerto No 1

Piano Concerto No 1[a]. Paganini Rhapsody[b]
Vladimir Ashkenazy pf [a]Concertgebouw Orchestra; [b]Philharmonia Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca 417 613-2DH (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Showpiece that it is, with its lush romantic harmonies and contrasting vigorous panache, the First Concerto has much to commend it in purely musical terms and although its debts are clear enough (most notably perhaps to Rimsky-Korsakov), it stands on its own two feet as far as invention, overall design and musical construction are concerned. The Paganini Rhapsody is one of the composer's finest works and arguably the most purely inventive set of variations to be based on Paganini's catchy tune ever written. The wealth of musical invention it suggested to Rachmaninov is truly bewildering and his control over what can in lesser hands become a rather laboured formal scheme is masterly indeed. Ashkenazy gives superb performances of both works and the Concertgebouw and the Philharmonia are in every way the perfect foils under Bernard Haitink's sympathetic direction.

There is weight, delicacy, colour, energy and repose in equal measure here and it is all conveyed by a full-bodied and detailed recording.

Piano Concerto No 2

Piano Concerto No 2. Paganini Rhapsody
Vladimir Ashkenazy pf London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn
Decca Ovation 417 702-2DM (58 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1970-72 OO

What emerges most obviously here is the keen poetic individuality of Ashkenazy as a Rachmaninov interpreter. The composer himself is far rougher with his music than Ashkenazy ever is. Those who like Rachmaninov concertos to sound forceful above all will no doubt have reservations, but rarely has this work sounded so magically poetic. That is not just Ashkenazy's doing – his rubato is consistently natural – but the work of Previn and his players. Orchestral detail emerges more clearly than on other recordings, but thanks to finely balanced orchestral recording (no exaggeration of big violin tone) there are no gimmicks. The playing of both Ashkenazy and the LSO continually conveys the impression not of a warhorse but of a completely new work; even such a favourite passage as the return of the slow-movement main theme just before fig 26 is pure and completely unhackneyed. But the performance which clinches the success of this delightful venture is that of the Paganini Rhapsody, magical from beginning to end in its concentrated sense of continuity, with the varying moods over the 24 variations leading inevitably from one to another. There is no great splurge of emotion on the great eighteenth variation, but instead there is a ripe sense of fulfilment, which is utterly tasteful. Although the final surprising quiet cadence could be pointed with more wit, the rest has so much delicacy that it is a marginal reservation.

Piano Concerto No 3

Piano Concerto No 3 in D minor, Op 30[a]. Cello Sonata in G minor, Op 19 – Andante (arr Volodos). Morceaux de fantaisie, Op 3 – No 5, Sérénade in B flat minor. Morceaux de salon, Op 10 – No 6, Romance in F minor. Preludes – F minor, Op 32 No 6. Prelude in D minor. Etudes-tableaux, Op 33 – No 9 in C sharp minor
Arcadi Volodos pf [a]Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / James Levine
Sony Classical SK64384 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 and [a]live in 1999 OO

Straight into the top flight of Rachmaninov Thirds goes Arcadi Volodos's recording, live from the Berlin Philharmonie last year. No doubt about that. To the top of the top flight? Not quite. And no doubt about that either.

So many things about it are distinguished and thrilling. The flowing tempo of the opening bars and the subtle assertion of soloistic presence augur well. The way Volodos slows the end of the first mini-cadenza won't appeal to everyone, but at least Levine ensures that the following orchestral transition keeps moving. Otherwise Volodos's phrasing is consummately tasteful, all the way through to the cadenza. His textures are superbly graded, his tone never glaring, even under the pressure of torrents of notes. So what if he doesn't feel obliged to follow the tempos the composer chose for his 1939-40 recording? Why should he, when he has such a fine grasp of the structure? There is the feeling of a deep intake of breath as the development starts, and the cadenza (the 'big' original one) opens with a darkly idiomatic frown, suggesting limitless strength.

All is well, in fact, until mid-way in the cadenza, where Volodos inserts a hiatus before the Allegro molto (at 11'08"). It sounds terribly calculated, as does the way he steers the cadenza towards its main climax. Of course, a couple of mannerisms in a performance are neither here nor there. And if Volodos takes the end of the first-movement subito più mosso, rather than poco accelerando al fine, that's no more cavalier than many of the great exponents of the past. What is bothersome – and this is increasingly noticeable in the slow movement and the finale – is that such initiatives don't always feel part of an organically conceived interpretation (the composer himself remains the touchstone here). Nor do they register as spontaneous expressions of temperament or inspiration. Just a whiff of self-consciousness can be enough to cancel out a host of poetic or virtuosic touches. So while as a listener you may be amazed, and as a pianist envious, at the clarity and velocity Volodos can bring to the toccata from 7'20" in the finale, in the overall context it feels like a gratuitous display. That's just the most conspicuous example. In some ways it is surprising to hear applause at the end, since the performance, fine though it is, has the feel of the studio rather than a live occasion, not least because it is so fantastically clean.

Overall then this is not a world-beater, but certainly one to assess at the highest level. Nothing but praise can be showered upon the BPO for their wonderfully cushioned but never complacent accompaniment and upon Levine for his avoidance of all the usual pitfalls. The piano is quite forwardly balanced, so that every tiniest note emerges bright as a new pin; and given how wonderfully Volodos shapes everything, it's fine, although you do occasionally feel that you aren't hearing the orchestra in its full glory. One or two woodwind solos sound artificially spotlit, but not outrageously so.

As for the solo pieces, the Cello Sonata arrangement is a marvel. It floats ecstatically, with air seemingly blowing through the textures as if through a Chekhovian country house on a cool summer evening. It is heavenly, and the other solos are little short of that.

Piano Concerto No 3 in D minor, Op 30[a]. Suite No 2 for Two Pianos, Op 17[b]
Martha Argerich, [b]Nelson Freire pfs
[a]Berlin Radio SO / Riccardo Chailly

Philips 50 Great Recordings 464 732-2PM Ⓜ
(62 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in 1982 ○○○

Rarely in her entire and extraordinary career has Argerich sounded more exhaustingly restless and quixotic, her mind and fingers flashing with reflexes merely dreamt of by other less phenomenally endowed pianists. Yet her Rachmaninov is full of surprises, her opening Allegro almost convivial until she meets directions such as più vivo or veloce, where the tigress in her shows her claws and the music is made to seethe and boil. The cadenza (the finer and more transparent of the two) rises to the sort of climax that will make all pianists' hearts beat faster and her first entry in the 'Intermezzo' interrupts the orchestra's musing with the impatience of a hurricane. But throughout these pages it is almost as if she is searching for music that will allow her virtuosity its fullest scope. In the finale she finds it, accelerating out of the second movement with a sky-rocketing propulsion. Here the music races like wildfire, with a truly death-defying turn of speed at 7'21" and an explosive energy throughout that must have left audience, conductor and orchestra feeling as if hit by some seismic shock-wave.

Rachmaninov Piano Concerto No 3 Ⓗ
Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No 1 in
B flat minor, Op 23
Vladimir Horowitz pf New York Philharmonic
Symphony Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
APR mono APR5519 (66 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1940-41 ○○○

This is the Rachmaninov Third to end all Rachmaninov Thirds, a performance of such super-human pianistic aplomb, pace and virtuosity that it makes all comparisons, save with Horowitz himself, a study in irrelevance. It was Horowitz's 1930 recording with Albert Coates that made Artur Rubinstein pale with envy; goodness knows how he would have reacted had he heard Horowitz and Barbirolli! Taken from a 1941 New York broadcast (with apologies from the producer for snaps, crackles, pops and the like) Horowitz's tumultuous, near-apocalyptic brilliance includes all his unique and tirelessly debated attributes; his swooning rubato, thundering bass and splintering treble, his explosive attack, his super-erotic inflexions and turns of phrase. Try the skittering scherzando variation just before the close of the central Intermezzo and note how the pianist's velocity eclipses even his legendary recording with Fritz Reiner. This ultimate wizard of the keyboard is in expansive mood in the Tchaikovsky. There are ample rewards, too, for those who rejoice in Horowitz at his most clamorous, for the thunder and lightning of this 'Tornado from the Steppes'. The performance ends in what can only be described as a scream of octaves and an outburst by an audience driven near to hysteria. Barbirolli and the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra are equal to just about every twist and turn of thei volatile soloist's argument and so thes performances (and most notably the finale o the Rachmaninov) are simply beyond price.

Piano Concerto No 4

Rachmaninov Piano Concerto No 4
Ravel Piano Concerto in G
Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli pf Philharmonia
Orchestra / Ettore Gracis
EMI Great Recordings of the Century
567238-2 (47 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1957

In crude and subjective terms Michelangel makes the spine tingle in a way no others ca approach. How does he do it? Of course this i the secret every pianist would love to know, an which no writer can ever pin down. But it i possible to give some general indications. It i not a question of technique, at least no directly, because Ashkenazy, for example (o Decca) can match their most virtuosic feats indirectly, yes, it is relevant, in that there ar dimensions in Michelangeli's pianism whic allow musical conceptions to materialise whic might not dawn on others. It is not a questio of structure, in the narrow sense of th awareness of overall proportions, judiciou shaping of paragraphs, continuity of thought but the way structure is projected and the way i is transmuted into emotional drama; of cours these things are critical.

In one way or another most of the recording in this section respond vividly to the excitemen of Rachmaninov's dramatic climaxes; but wit Michelangeli these climaxes seem to burs through the music of their own volition, a though an irresistible force of nature has bee released. It is this crowning of a structure b release, rather than by extra pressure, whic gives the performance a sense of exaltation an which more than anything else sets it on different level. It enables him to be freer in man details, yet seem more inevitable as a whole.

The impact of all this would be negligibl without a sympathetically attuned conducto and orchestra. Fortunately that is exactly wha Michelangeli has. Michelangeli's Ravel is ope to criticism, partly because many listeners fee uncomfortable with his persistent left-before right mannerism in the slow movement an with his unwarranted textual tinkerings (lik changing the last note). But he is as finel attuned to this aloof idiom as to its tempera mental opposite in the Rachmaninov.

And although the recording cannot entirel belie its vintage, it does justice to one of th finest concerto records ever made.

The Complete Symphonies

No 1 in D minor, Op 13; No 2 in E minor, Op 27;
No 3 in A minor, Op 44. Symphonic Dances, Op 45

Symphonies Nos 1, 2^a and 3^b. Symphonic Dances, Op 45^b. The isle of the dead, Op 29. Vocalise (arr cpsr). Aleko – Intermezzo; Gipsy Girls' Dance
London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn
EMI ③ 764530-2 (227 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1974-76 OO

Items marked ^{ab} are also available on HMV Classics ^{a}HMV5 72833-2 and ^{b}HMV5 73475-2 Ⓑ

Rachmaninov's three symphonies reflect three very different phases in his creative development: the first (1895) is a stormy synthesis of contemporary trends in Russian symphonic music, the Second (1906-07), an epic study in Tchaikovskian opulence, and the third (1935-36) a seemingly unstoppable stream of original ideas and impressions. The Second was the first to gain wide acceptance, and with good reason. It shares both the key and general mood of Tchaikovsky's Fifth. Cast in E minor, its initial gloom ultimately turns to triumph, and the symphony includes enough glorious melodies to keep Hollywood happy for decades.

The First Symphony had a difficult birth, largely through the incompetent musical midwifery of Alexander Glazunov whose conducting of the work's première apparently left much to be desired. It is, however, an immensely promising piece and although undeniably the product of its times, prophetic not only of the mature Rachmaninov, but of other Northern voices, including – occasionally – the mature Sibelius. Both the Third Symphony and its near-contemporary, the Symphonic Dances find Rachmaninov indulging a fruitful stream of musical consciousness, recalling motives and ideas from earlier compositions, yet allowing gusts of fresh air to enliven and rejuvenate his style. Both works have yet to receive their full due in the concert hall, although the strongly evocative Isle of the dead is more securely embedded in the repertory.

What with these and a trio of warming shorter pieces, André Previn's mid-1970s LSO package is an excellent bargain. The performances are entirely sympathetic, avoiding familiar interpretative extremes such as slickness, bombast and emotional indulgence. Previn shows particular understanding of the Third Symphony, the Symphonic Dances and The isle of the dead, works that represent Rachmaninov at his most innovative and assured. The Second Symphony is played without cuts (not invariably the case, even today) and the recordings are generous in tone and revealing of detail.

Symphonies Nos 1-3
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Vladimir Ashkenazy
Double Decca ② 448 116-2DF2 (140 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1980-82 OO

Ashkenazy has made few more distinguished discs as conductor than his Rachmaninov symphony recordings of the early 1980s. The downside of the repackaging in this 2CD format is that you have to put up with a change of disc half-way through the Second Symphony and lose the shorter orchestral works included in the Previn set. Previn is the most natural but not always the most electrifying of Rachmaninov interpreters and many will find Ashkenazy preferable, particularly in No 1. Although some of Ashkenazy's speeds seem unnaturally pressed – he fairly tips us into the first movement reprise having declined to cap the climax with unvalidated bells – the excitement is infectious. Previn's LSO is not at its best in the Larghetto, but in the corresponding movement of the Second Symphony the boot is on the other foot. Not that Ashkenazy isn't convincing too – so long as you can forget the Previn. Ashkenazy's volatile approach is at its most extreme in the Third, the mood much less autumnal than it usually is, with the fruity Concertgebouw brass unconstrained. Such an unashamedly episodic rendering of the score has its drawbacks, but the virtuosic energy and Romantic gush are hard to resist. The recordings sound very well indeed.

Symphony No 2

Symphony No 2. The Rock, Op 7
Russian National Orchestra / Mikhail Pletnev
DG 439 888-2GH (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 OO

Mikhail Pletnev's achievement is to make us hear the music afresh: a performance characterised by relatively discreet emotionalism, strong forward momentum and a fanatical preoccupation with clarity of articulation. When there is no Slavic wobble, it scarcely matters that his winds display an individuality which once or twice fails to transcend mere rawness – so much the better in this music! The strings, forceful and husky (with separated violin desks) are beyond reproach. The most remarkable playing comes in the finale. The lyrical effusions are superbly characterised without undermining the sense of inexorability, the climaxes not just powerful but affecting too. The closing pages bring a rush of adrenalin of the kind rarely experienced live, let alone in the studio. This is great music-making, the rubato always there when required, the long phrases immaculately tailored yet always sounding spontaneous.

DG's unexpected coupling is The Rock, a rather bitty piece which is however very deftly scored and intriguingly Scriabinesque in places. In Pletnev's hands, the central climax is surprisingly powerful, and the fabulous delicacy elsewhere is alone worth the price of admission.

Symphony No 3

Symphony No 3. Symphonic Dances
St Petersburg Philharmonic Orchestra / Mariss Jansons

EMI 754877-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●

This is one of the more distinguished Rachmaninov issues of recent years. While no Rachmaninov Third unfolds as inexorably as Previn's (reviewed above), it is refreshing to hear the opening 'motto' theme played perfectly in tune by an orchestra on even more dazzling form than the LSO, and Jansons unearths such exquisite details of sonority and texture that all criticism is silenced. There have been more haunting, more fundamentally pessimistic accounts, but none with such an ear for Rachmaninov's sometimes risky orchestral effects. The Symphonic Dances are even more impressive. The insinuating waltz movement is irresistible, very free with idiomatic-sounding rubato, while the dynamic outer portions of the finale are superbly articulated, dazzling in the closing stages. EMI's close-miking of instrumental lines may inhibit the sort of tonal blend implied by Rachmaninov's scoring, but the distinctive heft and huskiness of Mravinsky's string section is not betrayed. In its lush, extrovert way, this disc is unbeatable.

Symphony No 3. Morceaux de fantaisie, Op 3 – No 3, Mélodie in E; No 4, Polichinelle in F sharp minor (both orch anon) National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / Alexander Anissimov
Naxos 8 550808 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996

Can Anissimov hope to compete in a field that includes Ashkenazy's high-octane digital accounts in sundry bargain formats? Perhaps surprisingly the answer is yes, for the conductor produces a highly distinctive performance of the Third, inspiring his orchestra to playing of considerable warmth and flair. Sound quality is excellent, too.

String tone is crucially important with this composer, and here again any worries prove unfounded. Not for Anissimov the 'neurotic' Russian-ness of Ashkenazy's Rachmaninov. Like Jansons, he disregards the first-movement exposition repeat, but he makes the orchestral voices speak with a gentler tone. There are shattering climaxes when the music calls for them, and the symphony ends in rousing style; elsewhere the sophisticated languor and careful phrasing recall Previn's famous recording. Although some will be disappointed with the generally slow tempos, there is an unusual wholeness of musical vision and pacing which never sacrifices the needs of the larger structure to the lure of momentary thrills.

Despite the short measure, this is thoroughly recommendable at the price.

Trios élégiaques

Trio elegiaques in G minor; D minor, Op 9
Copenhagen Trio (Søren Elbaek vn Troels Svane Hermansen vc Morten Mogensen pf)
Kontrapunkt 32187 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

The shade of Tchaikovsky haunts both these works. In the first, there are turns of phrase from his Trio, and much of the style and the textural approach to the problems derive from his example – not always a very good one, when it came to dealing with a virtuoso piano part against the weaker sound of the strings. Rachmaninov is ingenious, and handles his material expertly in a long, shapely movement. Tchaikovsky is more consciously the exemplar of the second Trio. Deeply impressed by the younger composer's The Rock, he had agreed to conduct the first performance in January 1894, a rare gesture of appreciation. On Tchaikovsky's death in October, the shocked Rachmaninov wrote his Trio 'in memory of a great artist', just as Tchaikovsky had once written a Trio in memory of another great artist, Nikolay Rubinstein. And here, too, there is a substantial variation movement, on a theme from The Rock. It is lyrically varied, not with conscious allusions after the manner of Tchaikovsky's elegy but with a sense of indebtedness that is unmistakable. Rachmaninov initially intended to have the opening statement of the theme played on the harmonium; he later revised the work, and it is the second version which is recorded here – and well, in a fine performance that does full justice to a lengthy but affecting piece.

Complete Piano Music

Variations on a Theme of Chopin, Op 22. Variations on a Theme of Corelli, Op 42. Mélodie in E, Op 3 No 3. Piano Sonatas – No 1 in D minor, Op 28; No 2 in B flat minor, Op 36 (orig version); No 2 in B flat minor, Op 36 (rev version). 10 Preludes, Op 23. 13 Preludes, Op 32. Prelude in D minor. Prelude in F. Morceaux de fantaisie, Op 3. Morceau de fantaisie in G minor. Song without words in D minor. Pièce in D minor. Fughetta in F. Moments musicaux, Op 16. Fragments in A flat. Oriental Sketch in B flat. Three Nocturnes – No 1 in F sharp minor; No 2 in F; No 3 in C minor. Quatre Pièces – Romance in F sharp minor; Prélude in E flat minor; Mélodie in E; Gavotte in D. 17 Etudes-tableaux, Opp 33 and 39. Transcriptions – Bach Solo Violin Partita No 3 in E, BWV1006 – Preludio, Gavotte, Gigue Behr Lachtäubchen, Op 303 (pubd as Polka de VR) Bizet L'Arlésienne Suite No 1 – Menuet Kreisler Liebesleid. Liebesfreud Mendelssohn A Midsummer Night's Dream, Op 61 – Scherzo Mussorgsky Sorochinsky Fair – Gopak Rachmaninov Daisies, Op 38 No 3. Lilacs, Op 21 No 5. Vocalise, Op 34 No 14 (arr Kocsis) Rimsky-Korsakov The Tale of Tsar Saltan – The Flight of the Bumble-bee Schubert Die schöne Müllerin, D957 – Wohin? Tchaikovsky Cradle Song, Op 16 No 1
Howard Shelley pf
Hyperion ⑧ CDS44041/8 (449 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1978-91 ●

This Hyperion set is a significant testament to Howard Shelley's artistry. Pianistically impeccable, he understands what Rachmaninov was about. The original piano works span 45 years of the composer's life. The earliest pieces here, the Nocturnes, strangely owe allegiance neither to Field nor Chopin, but are very much in the mid- to late 19th-century Russian salon style. The Third, in C minor, has nothing whatever to do with its title. Nicely written too, but still uncharacteristic, are four pieces from 1888, which amply demonstrate that from his early teens the composer had something individual to say. The Mélodie in E major is memorable for its hypnotic use of piano tone. Hyperion's recording quality can be heard at its very best here; there is real bloom and colour. Written shortly after his First Piano Concerto in the early 1890s, the Morceaux de fantaisie, Op 3 bring us to familiar Rachmaninov. The ubiquitous Prelude in C sharp minor is the second number but Shelley tries to do too much with it; he is more effective in the Sérénade with its Spanish overtones. In the E flat minor Moment musical, Op 16 one feels that he is able to master Rachmaninov's swirling accompaniments idiomatically. In Variation No 15 of the Variations on a Theme of Chopin he succeeds in bringing the notes to life, getting his fingers around the fleet scherzando writing.

The first set of Preludes is, of course, mainstream repertoire. In the warmly expressive D major Prelude he lends the piece a strong Brahmsian feel and it emerges as very well focused. He transforms the C minor into a restless mood picture. The First Sonata is often dismissed as being unwieldy but Shelley gives it a symphonic stature and allows it to be seen in conjunction more with the composer's orchestral writing. Shortly after the Third Concerto Rachmaninov wrote the Op 32 Preludes. Shelley conjures up an exquisite moonlit scene for the G major, but he is not as impressive in the B minor. However, with him it is always the music that dictates the course of the interpretation. In the two sets of Etudes-tableaux he excels, as he does too in the Second Sonata. He draws together the disparate elements of the finale with terrific mastery and is the equal of the 'Horowitz clones' for technique. In the Corelli Variations he is not quite in tune with the scope of the work but is outstanding in the transcriptions, if a little straight-faced. The recorded sound is never less than serviceable and is sometimes excellent.

Piano Works

Piano Sonata No 2 (original version). Preludes – Op 23: No 1 in F sharp minor; No 7 in C minor; Op 32: No 2 in B flat minor; No 6 in F minor; No 9 in A; No 10 in B minor. Etudes-tableaux – Op 39: No 2 in B minor; No 7 in C minor; F minor, Op 33 No 1. Morceaux de fantaisie, Op 3 – No 3 in E, 'Mélodie'; No 5 in B flat minor, 'Sérénade'

Zoltán Kocsis pf

Philips 446 220-2PH Ⓕ

(61 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994 ●●

This richly exploratory recital – far removed from a popular or commercial programme – contradicts at every turn stale, still prevailing notions concerning Rachmaninov. For not only is the Second Sonata played in its original 1913 version rather than the stitched-together 1931 revision, but the shorter items include many of the composer's finest works. The seventh rather than the first C minor Etude-tableau, Op 39, for example, is an elegy of the most startling modernity with its lamentoso outcries, its memory of the Russian liturgy and its massive central carillon. How refreshing, too, to open with the Brahmsian syncopation and expressive richness of the A major Prelude, Op 32 No 9 and to mix mood and key to such kaleidoscopic and dazzling effect. Throughout, Kocsis's performances are as bold and stimulating as his choice of works, gloriously free-spirited and of an immense pianistic brio and command. Indeed his performance of the Second Sonata is as fulminating and rhapsodic as any on record. Action-packed in an exhausting and enthralling way, his reading never sounds arch or contrived. Kocsis possesses a stupendous technique, stepping out in dazzling style in the ultra-Russian Etude-tableau, Op 33 No 1 and clarifying the Siberian whirlwind of the F minor Prelude, Op 32 No 6 with a breathtaking clarity and focus. The recording is magnificent.

Piano Sonata No 2 in B flat minor, Op 36. Etudes-tableaux, Op 39

Freddy Kempf pf Ⓕ

BIS CD1042 (67 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ●

Freddy Kempf's second disc in his series for BIS offers an enthralling example of that moment when early talent blossoms into fullness and individuality. Even if he lacks the concentrated intensity and force of more seasoned Rachmaninov pianists in the Second Sonata, his youthful play of light and shade, his innate musical grace and fluency are rich compensation for an occasional diffidence (the opening of the second and, more surprisingly, third movements show him at his least engaged). But in the Op 39 Etudes he comes entirely and superbly into his own. He paces No 2 more generously than on a previous occasion in New York, showing a nice sense of Rachmaninov's volatility (poco più vivo) beneath his despondent Dies irae surface. His rhythmic poise and vivacity in the reluctantly festive No 4 show an authentic feel for its bustle and urgency, and his deeply welling – rather than merely hectoring – start to No 5 leads to an inclusive sense of its appassionata rhetoric and declamation. And in No 7, an elegy that gives the lie to Rachmaninov's supposed conservatism), he achieves the sort of expressive freedom and elasticity that usually come to pianists far beyond his years. No 8 finds hims clarifying Rachmaninov's ornate polyphony with rare artistry and, finally, his way with the Liebesleid, quite without preening idiosyncrasy or mannerism, recreates a magical and touching sense of Rachmaninov's affection for Kreisler. BIS's sound is superb, fully capturing Freddy Kempf's dynamic range from whispering pianissimos to sonorous fortissimos. This is a very special record.

Etudes-tableaux

Etudes-tableaux – Op 33[a]:No 5 in D minor; No 6 in E flat minor; No 9 in C sharp minor; Op 39: No 1 in C minor; No 2 in A minor; No 3 in F sharp minor; No 4 in B minor; No 7 in C minor; No 9 in D. Preludes – Op 23: No 1 in F sharp minor; No 2 in B flat; No 4 in D; No 5 in G minor; No 7 in C minor; No 8 in A flat; Op 32: No 1 in C; No 2 in B flat minor; No 6 in F minor; No 7 in F; No 9 in A; No 10 in B minor; No12 in G sharp minor
Sviatoslav Richter pf
Olympia OCD337 (74 minutes: DDD/ADD) Ⓕ
Items marked [a] recorded 1983, others 1971

As in previous volumes in this valuable series, sound quality is on the dry side. But Richter's is the sort of playing which positively benefits from close analytical scrutiny, and serious collectors of piano recordings should need no further encouragement. Recorded in 1971 and 1983 they show a Richter in transition. Still in evidence is the prime-of-life virtuoso who burst on to the Western scene in the 1960s; but increasingly taking over is the uncompromising, ascetic philosopher-pianist of the 1980s. Metaphysics in Rachmaninov? Certainly. And not just the apparently superhuman fingerwork in the E flat minor Etude-tableau or the first C minor of Op 39. What comes across is something beyond expression. It is an overriding fatalism, a sense of the immense sadness of Russia, broken only by moments of heroic resistance. The Preludes are more resonantly recorded, with a rather disappointing tubby bass. If you can live with that there is a quite unique Rachmaninov to be heard here – a brave, noble spirit, expressed in writing of an unquenchable fervour and orchestral solidity.

Etudes-tableaux, Opp 33 and 39
John Lill pf
Nimbus NI5439 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

The Etudes-tableaux are known to be musical evocations of various pictorial or perhaps narrative ideas, though quite rightly Rachmaninov did not let on where the stimuli came from; there is certainly no sign that John Lill is much preoccupied with such matters. He is a powerful keyboard technician, which is the first necessity in approaching these virtuoso studies, and this puts him in a strong position for dealing with the bold assertiveness of some of them, for instance the first piece of all. He also has a very vivid sense of tempo (balancing speed and texture sympathetically), and equally a sense for the slight lifting of pressure as well as slowing up, or the reverse, which is the essence of true romantic rubato. Where he can seem less responsive than some of his colleagues is with the more delicate pieces, whose fantasy he perhaps underrates. But if he also loses something in introspection, he can command admiration with his magisterial delivery. In sum, a very strong set of performances of some fascinating music.

Etudes-tableaux – Op 33: No 2 in C; No 8 in G minor; Op 39: No 3 in F sharp minor; No 4 in B minor; No 5 in E flat minor. Preludes – Op 23: No 1 in F sharp minor; No 3 in D minor; No 5 in G minor; No 7 in C minor; No 10 in G flat; Op 32: No 6 in F minor; No 8 in A minor; No 10 in B minor; No 12 in G sharp minor. Five Morceaux de fantaisie, Op 3
Nikolai Demidenko pf
Hyperion CDA66713 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Nikolai Demidenko's performances couple immense pianistic tact and skill, though the rushes of adrenalin, when they come (the searing central climax of the Op 3 'Elégie' or the A minor Prelude, Op 32 where a tiny motif is tempest-tossed seemingly in all directions at the same time)are almost palpable. The C major Etude-tableau, Op 23 No 2 rises and falls with supreme naturalness and impetus and the absence of all lushness or luxuriance in the G minor Etude-tableau, Op 32 No 8 is a pointed reminder of Rachmaninov's serious, religious inspiration. He creates a magnificent carillon of Moscow bells in the great B minor Prelude (the one Moiseiwitsch made so peculiarly his own) and his E flat minor Etude-tableau, Op 39 is arrestingly sombre and dry-eyed, its conclusion articulated with a rare sense of ebbing drama, of all passion spent. If you prefer Rachmaninov's emotional storms viewed acutely but from a distance then Demidenko is your man. The recordings faithfully mirror this pianist's very distinctive sound world.

24 Preludes

24 Preludes, Opp 23 and 32. Prelude in D minor. Morceaux de fantaisie, Op 3. Lilacs. Daisies. Mélodie in E. Oriental Sketch in B flat. Moments musicaux, Op 16
Dmitri Alexeev pf
Virgin Classics ② 561624-2 Ⓑ
(138 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1987-89 ●

Alexeev's all-Russian mastery has seldom been heard to such advantage and his technical force and authority throughout are unarguable. True, he hardly wears his heart on his sleeve in the quixotic Minuet of Op 23 No 3, is less than poetically yielding in the Chopinesque tracery of Op 23 No 4. He does, however, capture the Slavonic malaise of No 1 with rare insight and his punishing weight and rhetoric in Op 23 Nos 2 or 7 will make even the most sanguine listener's pulse beat faster. He unleashes the central build-up of Op 32 No 7 with the impact of a Siberian whirlwind and time and again his icy, determinedly unsentimental approach gives added strength and focus to the composer's brilliant fury. Alexeev is more convincing in the more vertiginous numbers from the Moments musicaux, in Nos 2, 4 and 6 rather than in the opening rhythmic play of No 1 where he sounds altogether too literal and austere. Yet you only have to hear his way of making even Polichinelle's well-worn phrases come up as fresh as paint or his trenchancy in Oriental Sketch to realise that you are in the presence of a master pianist.

The recordings are of demonstration quality and the accompanying essay mirrors the rare toughness and integrity of these performances; the essential nobility of Rachmaninov's genius.

Additional recommendation

Preludes, Op 23 – Nos 1, 2, 4, 5, 8; Op 32 – Nos 1, 2, 6, 7, 10, 12

Couplings: Beethoven Piano Sonata No 11. Variations and Fugue on an Original Theme, 'Eroica'. Chopin Nocturnes – Op 72 No 1; Op 15 No 1. Haydn Piano Sonata in E, HobXVI:22. Schumann Symphonic Etudes

Richter pf

BBC Legends/IMG Artists ② BBCL4090-2 (144 minutes: ADD: recorded live in 1967-69) Ⓜ ●

These performances took place at a time when Richter was as his height, his early insecurity resolved in playing of imperious mastery. Richter's empathy for his great compatriot is overwhelming and the sound is excellent. This is phenomenal playing.

The Bells

Rachmaninov The bells[a] Prokofiev Alexander Nevsky, Op 78[b]. Ivan the Terrible (arr Stasevich) – film music, Op 116[c]

[a]Sheila Armstrong sop [b]Anna Reynolds, [c]Irina Arkhipova mez [a]Robert Tear ten [a]John Shirley-Quirk, [c]Anatoly Mokrenko bar [c]Boris Morgunov narr [ab]London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / [ab]André Previn; [c]Ambrosian Chorus; [c]Philharmonia Orchestra / [c]Riccardo Muti

EMI Double Forte ② 573353-2 (78 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Recorded [b]1971, [a]1975 and [c]1977 ●●

The previous EMI Studio reissue of these fine André Previn accounts of The bells and Alexander Nevsky has now been superseded by this EMI Double Forte release with Ivan the Terrible – one of Riccardo Muti's finest recordings. Made in the Indian summer of London's Kingsway Hall it is a performance not to be missed. Of course, the fragmentary nature of the music – much more evidently a collection of film score links than Alexander Nevsky – is, to a degree, frustrating, but such is the fervour of the performance, the fulsome theatricality of Boris Morgunov's narration, that one is simply carried along by the 'visual' excitement of it all. The Ambrosian Chorus contribute an impressive imitation of the genuine Russian article, summoning up the requisite ballast for the big numbers, amply filling out one of the greatest of all Prokofiev 'tunes' in the 'Storming of Kazan' sequence: this is the noble cantilena that would later feature so prominently in War and Peace. If you would rather sample this re-release before buying, try the raucous 'Dance of the Oprichniki' and the finale. Was there ever a more resplendant final chord? All 28 seconds of it!

As for The bells and Alexander Nevsky, the soloists are first-rate. Sheila Armstrong is especially fine in The bells and Anna Reynolds provides genuine Slavonic intensity in her contribution to the Prokofiev. The chorals singing too, if without the special vocal timbre and enunciation of a Russian group, has undoubted fervour, while in the famous 'The Battle on the Ice' sequence in Alexander Nevsky, the orchestral playing has thrilling pungency and bite. The original analogue recordings were exceptionally well balanced and on LP the combination of ambient effect and sharpness of detail was ideally judged. The remastering increases the clarity and projection of the sound with, perhaps, a slight loss of warmth and atmosphere. However, the overall effect is vividly spectacular and compulsively dramatic. This disc is a real bargain for all three performances are very fine indeed.

Vespers, Op 37

Olga Borodina mez Vladimir Mostowoy ten St Petersburg Chamber Choir / Nikolai Korniev

Philips 442 344-2PH (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993

The St Petersburg Chamber Choir sing the Vespers, or All-Night Vigil, dramatically. Korniev follows the composer's markings carefully, but he is evidently concerned to give a concert performance endowed with vivid immediacy, and there are places where this departs from the reflective or celebratory nature of music that is so strongly grounded in Orthodox tradition. This is most marked with Olga Borodina, who is not the first fine singer to bring too operatic a note to her solo in 'Blagoslovi, dushe moya' ('Bless the Lord, O my soul'); Vladimir Mostowoy is more discreet in 'Blagosloven esi' ('Blessed art Thou').

The choir itself is excellent, with particularly fine sopranos who can chant high above the others in beautifully pitched thirds; while there is, as ever in Russian church choirs, a splendid bass section that can underpin the textures with effortlessly rich low Cs, and find no difficulty with the famous descending scale down to a sonorous bottom B flat at the end of 'Nyne otpushchayeshi' (the Nunc dimittis). The recording is not always as clear as it could be with the textures and especially the words. A strength of the issue, which distinguishes it from almost all others available, is the booklet, which includes not only the full text in transliteration (with English, German and French translations), but also excellent essays.

Additional recommendation
Vespers
National Academic Choir of Ukraine 'Dumka' / Savchuk
Regis Records RRC1043 (62 minutes: DDD: 8/01) Ⓢ

A first-rate bargain issue to compete with the very best. The Ukrainian choir are a superb body of singers, producing a beautifully warm, dark-hued sound and with an extraordinary sense of pacing. Most impressive is their piano singing, unrivalled on disc.

Songs

12 Songs, Op 21. 15 Songs, Op 26: Were you hiccoughing?. Night
Joan Rodgers sop Maria Popescu mez Alexandre Naoumenko ten Sergei Leiferkus bar Howard Shelley pf
Chandos CHAN9451 (72 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994-95 Ⓕ ●

Two figures in particular haunt this second volume of Chandos's survey of Rachmaninov's songs – Feodor Chaliapin and Rachmaninov himself. They had become friends in the years when they worked together in an opera company and when Rachmaninov was concentrating on developing his piano virtuosity. As a result the Op 21 songs are dominated by an almost operatic declamatory manner coupled with formidably difficult accompaniments. Leiferkus rises splendidly to the occasion, above all in 'Fate' (Op 21 No 1), and so throughout the songs does Howard Shelley. He is unbowed by the technical problems and he understands the novel proportions of songs in which the piano's participation has an unprecedented role. He also enjoys himself in the roisterous exchanges with Leiferkus in what is really Rachmaninov's only lighthearted song, Were you hiccoughing?

The songs for the other voices are less powerful, in general more lyrical and intimate. Alexandre Naoumenko only has five songs, and they are not, on the whole, among the more striking examples, but he responds elegantly to 'The fountain' (Op 26 No 11). Maria Popescu gives a beautiful account of one of the most deservedly popular of them all, 'To the children' (Op 26 No 7), and of the remarkable Merezhkovsky setting, 'Christ is risen' (Op 26 No 6). Joan Rodgers is enchanting in 'The Lilacs' (Op 21 No 5) and moving in the song acknowledging that love is slipping away, 'Again I am alone' (Op 26 No 9). She has complete mastery of the style, and nothing here is finer than her arching phrase ending 'How peaceful' (Op 21 No 7) – 'da ty, mechta moya' (and you, my dream) – with Shelley gently articulating Rachmaninov's reflective piano postlude from the world of Schumann.

14 Songs, Op 34. Letter to K S Stanislavsky. From the Gospel of St John. Six Songs, Op 38. A prayer. All wish to sing
Joan Rodgers sop Maria Popescu mez Alexandre Naoumenko ten Sergei Leiferkus bar Howard Shelley pf
Chandos CHAN9477 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994-95 ●

This set opens with a powerful dramatic outpouring, Letter to K S Stanislavsky. It is in fact a formal letter of apology, for unavoidable absence from a gathering, which Rachmaninov sent for Chaliapin to sing to Stanislavsky; and one of the most touchingly elegant phrases is simply the date on the letter, October 14, 1908. Perhaps he was showing a rare touch of irony in using his full lyrical powers in such a context; but at any rate, the piece nicely prefaces the two collections of his last phase of song-writing, before he left Russia for exile.

Some of his greatest songs are here, coloured in their invention by the four great singers whose hovering presence makes the disposition of this recital between four similar voices a highly successful idea.

The Chaliapin songs go to Sergei Leiferkus, occasionally a little overshadowed by this mighty example (as in 'The raising of Lazarus', Op 34 No 6) but more often his own man, responding to the subtly dramatic, sometimes even laconic melodic lines with great sympathy for how they interact with the words, as with the Afanasy Fet poem 'The peasant' (Op 34 No 11). Alexandre Naoumenko inherits the mantle of Leonid Sobinov, and though he sometimes resorts to a near-falsetto for soft high notes, he appears to have listened to that fine tenor's elegance of line and no less subtle feeling for poetry. Pushkin's 'The muse' (Op 34 No 1) is most tenderly sung, and there is a sensitive response to line with 'I remember this day'.

Maria Popescu has only two songs, 'It cannot be' and 'Music' (Op 34 Nos 7 and 8), but she has a light tone and bright manner. Joan Rodgers is exquisite in the most rapturous and inward of the songs (the great Felia Litvinne was the original here). Of the Op 38 set, Rachmaninov was particularly fond of 'The rat-catcher' (No 4), and especially of 'Daisies' (No 3), which she sings charmingly, but it is hard to understand why he did not add 'Sleep'. He might have done had he heard Rodgers's rapt performance with Howard Shelley, the music delicately balanced in the exact way he must have intended between voice and piano as if between sleep and waking.

Operas

Aleko
Sergei Leiferkus bar Aleko; Maria Gulegina sop Zemfira; Anatoly Kocherga bass Old Gypsy; Ilya Levinsky ten Young Gypsy; Anne Sofie von Otter mez Old Gypsy Woman
DG 453 453-2GH (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

The Miserly Knight
Anatoly Kocherga bass Servant; Sergei Aleksashkin bass Baron; Sergei Larin ten Albert; Ian Caley ten Jew; Vladimir Chernov bar Duke
DG 453 454-2GH (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Francesca da Rimini
Sergei Leiferkus bar Lanciotto Malatesta; Maria Guleghina sop Francesca; Ilya Levinsky ten Dante; Sergei Aleksashkin bass Virgil; Sergei Larin ten Paolo
DG 453 455-2GH (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Gothenburg Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Notes, texts and translations included Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

Rachmaninov's three one-act operas that survive give evidence of real dramatic talent. Who else has written so accomplished a graduation exercise as Aleko? Tchaikovsky was dazzled, no doubt also flattered, by some suggestions of imitation. It is a number opera, based on Pushkin's dramatic poem The Gypsies, warning that the urban sophisticate cannot recapture pristine wildness, and has at its centre a superb soliloquy of lost love.

Leiferkus takes a lyrical approach; this is a beautiful, tragic performance, ironically set against Ilya Levinsky's carelessly superficial charm as the Young Gypsy. Zemfira is sung with fierce spirit by Maria Guleghina, especially in her cruel 'Old husband' song, and at the end with a lingering caress that seems to be for neither man but for Death itself.

The other operas are different matters, both tinged with Bayreuth experiences that Rachmaninov had absorbed more thoroughly than is sometimes allowed. The Miserly Knight is one of the 'little tragedies' in which Pushkin presents a moral issue but does not offer a solution. Here, it is the contrast between the old knight, claiming that his devotion to gold has taken him beyond passion into a realm of serenity, and his son, who merely needs the ready. The long central soliloquy, perhaps Rachmaninov's finest piece of dramatic writing, is superbly delivered by Sergei Aleksashkin, with the wide range of his eloquence drawing sympathy to the miser. Sergei Larin portrays his son Albert as a selfish extrovert; and Ian Caley does what he can to make the Jewish moneylender more human than an unpleasant caricature.

Francesca da Rimini requires Rachmaninov to triumph over an inept libretto by Modest Tchaikovsky. This he does to a remarkable degree, using Modest's inability to produce a text for the chorus of the damned to good advantage with wordless wails, and filling out the sketchy love duet with some 50 bars of a sensuous orchestral kiss. However, he should have rejected the banal placing of the final line, about the lovers reading no more that day, in favour of its breathtaking place in Dante, when their poring over Lancelot and Guinevere reveals their own love to them. Ilya Levinsky brings a more intensely lyrical line and manner to this than in Aleko, and Guleghina ranges from docility before Lanciotto to rapture in the love duet.

Neeme Järvi leads all three operas, as the orchestra should do for much of the time, and the beautiful playing he draws from the orchestra helps to make these three records a set extolling Rachmaninov's operatic talent.

Jean-Philippe Rameau

French 1683-1764

GROVE Rameau's early training came from his father, a professional organist; he went to a Jesuit school, then had a short period of music study in Italy. In 1702 he was appointed maître de musique at Avignon Cathedral, and spent the next 20 years in various organist posts in France.

By 1722 he was in Paris, where he was to remain; he had left his organist post at Clermont Cathedral to supervise the publication of his Traité de l'harmonie, a substantial and controversial work about the relationship of bass to harmony. The Traité brought him to wide attention. As a composer, he was known only for his keyboard music (a second collection appeared in 1729-30) and his cantatas, though he had written some church music.

His ambitions, however, lay in opera and at the age of 50 he had his first opera, Hippolyte et Aricie, given at the Opéra. It aroused great excitement, admiration, bewilderment and (among the conservative part of the audience) disgust. It was fairly successful, as were the operas that followed, including the opéra-ballet Les Indes galantes.

In 1745 Rameau was appointed a royal chamber music composer; thereafter several of his works had their premières at court theatres. Nine new theatre works followed in the mid-late 1740s, beginning with La princesse de Navarre and the comedy Platée; but from 1750 onwards only two major works were written, for Rameau was increasingly involved with theory and a number of disputes, with Rousseau, Grimm and even former friends, pupils and collaborators such as Diderot and D'Alembert. When Rameau died he was widely respected and admired, though he was seen too as unsociable and avaricious.

Rameau's harpsichord music is notable for its variety of texture, originality of line and boldness of harmony. But his chief contribution lies in his operas, especially those in the tragédie lyrique genre. He anticipated Gluckian reform by relating the overture to the ensuing drama. He brought to the numerous dances a wide range of moods using a richly varied orchestral palette and bold melodic lines. He wrote many fine pathetic monologues, usually at the beginnings of acts, with intense, slow-moving vocal lines and rich, sombre accompaniments. His recitative, while following the Lullian model, is more flexible in rhythms and more expressive in its declamation. Such tragédies as Hippolyte et Aricie and Castor et Pollux stand among the great creations of French musical drama.

Ouvertures

Awards 1998

Les fêtes de Polymnie; Les indes galantes; Zäis; Castor et Pollux; Naïs; Platée; Les fêtes d'Hébé; Zoroastre; Dardanus; Les paladins; Hippolyte et Aricie; Le temple de la gloire; Pygmalion; Les surprises de l'Amour; Les fêtes de l'Hymen et de l'Amour; Acante et Céphise P
Les Talens Lyriques / Christophe Rousset
L'Oiseau-Lyre 455 293-2OH Ⓕ
(70 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●●●

Rameau was an orchestrator of rare and individual genius and his operas, ballets and smaller entertainments are generously provided with some of the most original and alluring dance music to emerge from the 18th century. Roughly speaking, the music on this disc was written between 1733, the date of Rameau's first opera Hippolyte et Aricie, and 1761, when he produced his comédie-lyrique, Les Paladins.

Lovers of Rameau's music will be thoroughly familiar with most of the music played on the disc but will be delighted to find some rarities, too. The most remarkable of these is the overture to the pastorale-héroïque, Acante et Céphise. The overture to Acante et Céphise is different again, with its inclusion of specific 'occasional' references. Its three sections are marked 'Voeux de la Nation', 'Feu d'Artifice' (whose bass-line is punctuated by cannon-fire) and 'Fanfare'. Les Talens Lyriques responds admirably to this music, relishing every bar of it in performances which are refined in ensemble and articulate in speech. Rousset proves himself a fine exponent of this rewarding repertoire.

Suites

Les fêtes d'Hébé; Acante et Céphise P
Orchestra of the Eighteenth Century / Frans Brüggen
Glossa GCD921103 (67 minutes: DDD) ●
Recorded live in 1996-97 Ⓕ

Frans Brüggen's affection for Rameau's orchestral music is confirmed by the many previous issues of dances from his operas. Those are on the Philips label but, for this programme of suites from Rameau's opéra-ballet, Les fêtes d'Hébé and the pastorale-héroïque, Acante et Céphise, Brüggen has defected to the Spanish label, Glossa. In respect both of presentation and sound, this recently established label has, as they say, done him proud, for this is certainly the most satisfying issue so far in Brüggen's occasional series. While the music of Les fêtes d'Hébé, one of Rameau's most successful operas, is comparatively well known, that of Acante et Céphise is not. It is an unjustly neglected piece, making Brüggen's suite of the overture and 15 dances all the more welcome.

The Orchestra of the 18th century responds atmospherically if not always unanimously to Brüggen's sensitive direction. He is a wonderfully rhythmic musician whose imagination is clearly and understandably fired by some of the most innovative and evocative orchestration to have emerged from the first half of the 18th century. Acante et Céphise was one of the earliest pieces in which Rameau introduced clarinets and these are at once heard to great effect in the brilliant overture, whose horn writing sometimes foreshadows Gluck. It is a splendid pièce d'occasion which many readers will find sufficient enticement to explore further. A captivating programme.

Naïs – Orchestral Suites[a]. Zoroastre – Orchestral Suites[b]
Orchestra of the Eighteenth Century / Frans Brüggen
Glossa GCD921106 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in [a]1998 and [b]2000

No corner of the operatic repertory offers a greater wealth of freestanding orchestral dances than the French Baroque, and no composer wrote such a rich and enjoyable array of them as Rameau, that master blender of melodic inspiration, rhythmic irresistibility and orchestral colour. While Rameau's dances tend to be integrated into the action more than most, you do not really need to study the plots of these operas too much to enjoy the music they deliver. In the end the music is just there to be enjoyed, and in any case Rameau himself was not always that particular; those familiar with his harpsichord pieces will recognise a few old friends wearing hastily chosen new clothes.

As for the performances, little needs to be said about them save that they meet the Orchestra of the Eighteenth Century's normal high standards – impressively weighted sound, tight ensemble and excellent style – and are all the more admirable for being recorded live in concert, as usual.

Pièces de clavecin en concerts

Pièces de clavecin en concerts
Trevor Pinnock hpd Rachel Podger vn Jonathan Manson va da gamba
Channel Classics CCS19098 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●

Rameau's 1741 collection represents a major and entirely logical departure from the trio sonata and suite traditions that had held sway in Western European chamber music since the beginning of the 17th century. Rameau's textures are uniquely complex, demanding of the players a heightened awareness of their role in the musical texture at hand.

These are balanced and refreshingly musical performances that will draw you back again and again to savour the gracefulness and the kaleidoscopic blending of instrumental colours they bring to the music. Pinnock's playing is lively and engaging, inspiring and inspired. His accuracy is breathtaking, his ornamentation jewel-like. Podger and Manson respond with clarity and shapely phrasing, even in the hair-raising 'Tambourins' (Troisième Concert).

A movement such as 'La Boucon' (Deuxième Concert) is made wonderfully languid, 'La Timide' (Troisième Concert) sinuous but never oppressively so; and 'La Pantomime' (Quatrième Concert) is altogether civilised. And 'La Marais' (Cinquième Concert), which concludes the CD, reminds us how well the tone of a violin and viol can blend when produced by players of this calibre.

Pièces de clavecin

Premier Livre de pièces de clavecin (1706) – 🅿
Suite in A minor. Pièces de clavecin (1724, rev 1731)
– Suite in E minor, Suite in D
Sophie Yates hpd
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0659 Ⓕ
(71 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ○○

The release of a CD devoted to Rameau's harpsichord music is relatively rare. But it is less Rameau, and much more French keyboard music in general, that suffers neglect from an over-cultivated image. However, if Rameau's music is highly allusive, it is also possessed of an immediacy that makes it approachable today. Sophie Yates's firmly grounded yet sensitive and spirited playing will quickly dispel any lingering reservations, and she writes with authority and charm in the accompanying booklet (and plays here a copy of a 1749 Goujon harpsichord made by Andrew Garlick).

Yates's astute selection from Rameau's output is bound to please. The first suite, in A minor, is from the book of Pièces de clavecin published shortly after Rameau arrived in Paris in 1706, and displays a youthful brilliance that relies heavily on ornamentation (as, for example, in the Allemande 1 and the Courante) and, delightfully, occasionally reveals a certain provincialism – although Rameau never travelled to Italy, he clearly made certain assumptions about life there: his 'La Vénitienne' makes particular allusion to the beggars' bagpipe and hurdy-gurdy.

The second and third suites, from his later book of 1724 (rev 1731), are altogether more stylish and sophisticated. The E minor Suite begins sedately and with the gravitas befitting an Allemande, but is otherwise shot through with fashionable, pastoral rondeaux, and includes two of Rameau's best-known party pieces, 'Le rappel des oiseaux' and 'Tambourin'. The D minor Suite amuses with pièces de caractère (the flirtatious 'La follette', the devious 'Le lardon' and the pathetic 'La boiteuse') and amazes with the virtuosity of 'Les tourbillons' and 'Les Cyclopes'. But only a player of Yates's calibre can address the musical subtleties of 'Les soupirs', the deceptive 'Les niais de Sologne' and the sensuous 'L'entretien des muses'. A tour de force in every sense.

Awards 1992

Premier livre de pièces de clavecin. 🅿
Pièces de clavecin en concerts. Nouvelles suites de pièces de clavecin. Les petits marteaux de M Rameau. La Dauphine
Christophe Rousset hpds
L'Oiseau-Lyre ② 425 886-2OH2 Ⓕ
(129 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1989 ○○○

This recording of Rameau's solo harpsichord music outdistances most of the competition. Rousset does not include everything that Rameau wrote for the instrument but he does play all the music contained in the principal collections of 1706, 1724 and *c*1728 as well as La Dauphine. Rousset's phrasing is graceful and clearly articulated, the inflexions gently spoken and the rhythmic pulse all that one might wish for. Tempos are, for the most part, well judged and the playing admirably attentive to detail and delightfully animated. Only occasionally does Rousset perhaps just miss the mark with speeds that are uncomfortably brisk and lacking that choreographic poise which is such a vital ingredient in French Baroque music.

However, when he is at his strongest he is irresistible and this is how we find him in 'Les niais de Sologne' and its variations, the reflective 'L'entretien des Muses', the animated 'Les cyclopes', 'La poule', 'L'enharmonique' and the dazzling A minor Gavotte and variations. In these and in many other of the pieces, too, Rousset's impeccable taste and seemingly effortless virtuosity provide the listener with constant and intense delight.

The quality of the recording is ideal as are the two instruments which Rousset has chosen to play.

Motets

Awards 1995

Deus noster refugium. In convertendo. 🅿
Quam dilecta
Sophie Daneman, Noémi Rime sops Paul Agnew ten Nicolas Rivenq bar Nicolas Cavallier bass Les Arts Florissants / William Christie
Erato 4509-96967-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1994 ○○○

All three motets date from relatively early in Rameau's career, before he had really made a name for himself, yet all show to a certain extent some of the characteristics that 20 years or so later would so thrillingly illuminate his operas. Deus noster refugium, for instance, features impressive depictions of nature in turmoil that would not sound out of place in Hippolyte et Aricie, and all three begin with long, expressive solos not unlike the opening of an act from a tragédie-lyrique. Quam dilecta does sound a little more 'churchy' than the others, with its impressive, rather Handelian double fugue, but In convertendo – a work which Rameau heavily revised well into his operatic Indian summer in 1751 – absolutely reeks of the theatre.

Drop anyone familiar with the composer's operas into the middle of this piece, and surely only its Latin text would give away that this is church music. It comes as no surprise to find Christie going to town on this dramatic element. The slightly dry acoustic of the Radio France studio is a help, as are the forceful, penetrating qualities of the solo and choral singers. But it is Christie's command of gesture, pacing and contrast which really gives these performances such an invigorating character.

Castor et Pollux

Howard Crook ten Castor; Jérôme Corréas bass 🅿 Pollux; Agnès Mellon sop Télaïre; Véronique Gens sop Phebe; René Schirrer bar Mars, Jupiter; - Sandrine Piau sop Venus, Happy Spirit, Planet; Mark Padmore ten Love, High Priest; Claire Brua sop Minerve; Sophie Daneman sop Follower of Hebe, Celestial Pleasure; Adrian Brand ten First Athlete; Jean-Claude Sarragosse bass Second Athlete; Les Arts Florissants / William Christie
Harmonia Mundi ③ HMC90 1435/7
(173 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation Ⓕ
included. Recorded 1992 ●
Extracts available on HMA195 1501 Ⓑ

Castor et Pollux was Rameau's second tragédie en musique. Its first performance took place in October 1737 but the opera was greeted with only moderate enthusiasm. It was only with the composer's thoroughly revised version of 1754 that the opera enjoyed the popularity that it deserved. The revision tautened a drama which had never been weak but it dispensed with a very beautiful Prologue. Christie and Les Arts Florissants perform Rameau's first version complete with its Prologue. The librettist, Pierre-Joseph Bernard, was one of the ablest writers with whom Rameau collaborated and his text for Castor et Pollux has been regarded by some as the best of 18th-century French opera. Bernard focuses on the fraternal love of the 'heavenly twins' and specifically on the generosity with which Pollux renounces his immortality so that Castor may be restored to life. Christie's production was staged at Aix-en-Provence in the summer of 1991 and recorded by Harmonia Mundi a year later. This performance realises the element of tragedy, above all in the First Act, and Christie's singers sound very much at home with French declamation. A very beautiful score, affectionately and perceptively interpreted.

Dardanus

John Mark Ainsley ten Dardanus; Véronique Gens sop Iphise; Mireille Delunsch sop Venus; Françoise Masset sop Cupid; Pleasure; Phrygian Woman; Magdalena Kožená mez Shepherdess; Phrygian Woman; A Dream; Jean-François Lombard counterten A Dream; Russell Smythe bar Teucer; Jean-Louis Bindi bass Phrygian; Jean-Philippe Courtis bass Isménor; Laurent Naouri bass Anténor; Marcos Pujol bass A Dream; Choeur des Musiciens du Louvre; Les Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski
Archiv Produktion ②.463 476-2AH2
(156 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded live in1998 ●

Between the Paris première of Dardanus in 1739 and its first revival in 1744, Rameau and his librettist revised the work so much, wrenching the plot in a different direction from Act 3 onwards, that to combine its two versions is near impossible. Though the dramatic problems in the score perhaps remain insurmountable, for a recording a conductor can choose whichever version has the best music. For Minkowski, that is the 1739 original, but he cannot resist importing a few numbers from 1744, even if they are mainly relatively unimportant. The exception is the superbly intense monologue 'Lieux funestes' for Dardanus in chains, which here resurfaces at the opening of Act 4. Minkowski describes it as 'the finest haute-contre aria ever written', and it has to be said it suits its new place very well.

Dardanus, son of Jupiter, is in love with Iphise, the daughter of his enemy Teucer – a love which, though forbidden, is reciprocated. Iphise is in fact promised to Teucer's ally Anténor, and much of the action concerns his and Dardanus's rivalry and Iphise's anguish. There is much use of the supernatural, something for which the opera was criticised in its day and which indeed prompted its revision. There is also a sea-monster, and the scene in which Anténor and Dardanus fight with the monster provides one of the more convincingly performed passages of dialogue on this recording, a significant point because ensemble acting is actually one of the least successful areas. This is a recording of a concert performance, and as so often the vital spark of dramatic continuity and urgency which can result from the performers having lived their parts on stage is not quite there. Laurent Naouri turns in a vivid performance as the hapless Anténor, Véronique Gens is noble and moving as the love-torn Iphise, and Mireille Delunsch is a powerful Venus, but the remaining singers, though vocally strong enough (especially Ainsley and Kožená), often struggle to bring their characters to life. What we get instead is more like a series of highlights, but what highlights they are. They include two ravishing monologues for the troubled Iphise; the already mentioned monologue for Dardanus, sung with beauty and poise by Ainsley; a solar eclipse (no less); and a truly lovely sleep divertissement in Act 4, full of feathery lightness and drowsy tranquillity. And then there are the dances, always such an enjoyable feature of Rameau's scores. Minkowski conducts with an appropriate mixture of drive and tenderness, and is rewarded by responsive and sound playing and singing from his orchestra and chorus. A major release for Rameau fans certainly, well loaded with superb dramatic music.

Les fêtes d'Hébé

Sophie Daneman sop Hébé, Une Naïde, Eglé; Gaëlle Méchaly sop L'amour; Paul Agnew ten Momus, Le ruisseau, Lycurgue; Sarah Connolly mez Sapho, Iphise; Jean-Paul Fouchécourt ten Thélème, L'oracle, Mercure; Luc Coadou bass Alcée; Laurent Slaars bar Hymas; Matthieu Lécroart bar Le fleuve; Maryseult Wieczorek mez Une Lacédémonienne, Une bergère; Thierry Félix bar Tirtée, Eurilas; Les Arts Florissants / William Christie 🅿

Erato ② 3984-21064-2 (148 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included. ○○○
Recorded 1997

Rameau produced one of his most engaging scores for Les fêtes d'Hébé. The entertainment comprises a prologue and three entrées. All is prefaced with a captivating two-movement Overture whose playful second section has much more in common with a Neapolitan sinfonia than a traditional opera overture in the French mould. The dances belong to one of the composer's fruitiest vintages and Christie has capitalised upon this with a sizeable band which includes, where appropriate, a section of musettes, pipes and drums. The singers are carefully chosen for their contrasting vocal timbres and the line-up, by and large, is strong.

The leading roles in each of the opera's four sections are fairly evenly distributed between Sophie Daneman, Sarah Connolly, Jean-Paul Fouchécourt, Paul Agnew and Thierry Félix. The first three of this group are consistently engaging; their feeling for theatre, and their intuitive ability to seek out those aspects of Rameau's vocal writing which enliven it, seldom fail, and they bring considerable charm to their performances. Agnew, too, is on strong form though in the lower end of his vocal tessitura, required for the role of Momus in the Prologue, he sounds less secure than in his more accustomed haute-contre range. That can be heard to wonderful effect elsewhere and, above all, in a duet for a Stream and a Naiad (first Entrée) in which he is joined by Daneman. This beguiling little love-song is proclaimed with innocent fervour and tenderness. Félix has a rounded warmth and resonance and his occasional weakness of poorly focused tone has here been largely overcome. Les fêtes d'Hébé contains a wealth of inventive, instrumentally colourful and evocative dances. Small wonder that audiences loved it so much in the 1720s: with music of such vital originality, how could it be otherwise? Christie and Les Arts Florissants have possibly never been on crisper, more disciplined form than here, revelling in Rameau's beguiling pastoral images, tender and high-spirited in turn. A ravishing entertainment, from start to finish.

Hippolyte et Aricie

Mark Padmore ten Hippolyte; Anne-Maria Panzarella sop Aricie; Lorraine Hunt sop Phèdre; Laurent Naouri bass Thésée; Eirian James mez Diane; Gaëlle Mechaly sop L'Amour, Female Sailor; Nathan Berg bass Jupiter, Pluton, Neptune; Katalin Károlyi mez Oenone; Yann Beuron ten Arcas Mercure; François Piolino ten Tisiphone; Christopher Josey ten Fate I; Matthieu Lécroart bar Fate II; Bertrand Bontoux bass Fate III; Mireille Delunsch sop High Priestess; Patricia Petibon sop Priestess, Shepherdess; Les Arts Florissants / William Christie 🅿

Erato ③ 0630-15517-2 (182 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1996 ○○○

William Christie adheres throughout to the 1733 original (Rameau revised the start of Act 2 in 1757), in so doing opening up some passages previously omitted. He uses an orchestra with a good string weight and it plays with security both of ensemble and intonation, and with splendidly crisp rhythms. Despite the opera's title, the main protagonists are Theseus and his queen Phaedra, whose guilty passion for his son Hippolytus precipitates the tragedy. Phaedra is strongly cast with a passionate Lorraine Hunt who is particularly impressive in the superb aria, 'Cruelle mère des amours', which begins Act 3. Throughout the opera, one is also struck by the profusion of invention, the unobtrusive contrapuntal skill, the charm and colour of the instrumentation and the freedom allotted to the orchestra. The work's final scene, for example, set in a woodland, is filled with a truly enchanting atmosphere, ending, after the customary chaconne, with 'Rossignols amoureux' (delightfully sung by Patricia Petibon). Anna-Maria Panzarella makes an appealingly youthful Aricia, and Mark Padmore is easily the best Hippolytus on record, making the most of his despairing Act 4 aria, 'Ah, faut-il, en ce jour, perdre tout ce que j'aime?'. Pains have been taken with the whole cast over the expressive delivery of words and over neatness of ornamentation; and production values such as the proper perspective for the entry of the crowd rejoicing at Theseus's return have been well considered. All told, this is one of William Christie's best achievements.

Zoroastre

Zoroastre
Mark Padmore ten Zoroastre; Nathan Berg bar Abramane; Gaëlle Méchaly sop Amélite; Anna Maria Panzarella mez Erinice; Matthieu Lécroart bar Zopire; God of Revenge; François Bazola bass Narbanor; Eric Martin-Bonnet bass Oramasès; Ariman; Stéphanie Revidat sop Céphie; Les Arts Florissants / William Christie

Erato ③ 0927-43182-2 (157 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ ○○
Notes, text and translation included. Recorded c2002

To describe Zoroastre as one of Rameau's most uncompromising music-dramas may seem strange when you consider that when it was revived in 1756, seven years after its première had met a rather lukewarm reception, it was in a heavily revised version in which the love interest had been stepped up. The story is of the endless struggle between good and evil which dominates the religion Zoroastre himself has founded.

Rameau's prime concern, however, is not really with Zoroastrianism; his responses are first and foremost to the elemental magic scenes and the intensely human emotions of love, jealousy, vengeance and rage thrown up by the story. But even so there is a concentrated seriousness of intent about this work which sets it apart from standard French tragédie lyrique. The French practice of blurring the distinction between recitatives and arias is intensified, so that choruses and snatches of melody fly past in a breathless, flexible flow of incident. And most effectively of all, Rameau's music conjures massive dramatic contrasts, ranging from ineffably tender love scenes for Zoroastre and Amélite in Acts 3 and 5 to the almost oppressive demonic power of the subterranean incantations of Act 4, led by the strongly drawn characters of Abramane and Erinice.

To have a master of French Baroque opera of William Christie's calibre set loose among such pages is a mouth-watering prospect, and sure enough he does not disappoint. The cast is not an especially starry one, but it is in the best Les Arts Florissants tradition of dramatic commitment and intelligent treatment of text. Mark Padmore has the perfect high tenor voice for Zoroastre, able to charm in tender moments yet rage in the confrontational scenes without losing any of its essential sweetness, while Nathan Berg makes a strong and fearsome-sounding Abramane. Even more impressive, however, are the two principal sopranos: Anna Maria Panzarella gives her all as the tormented Erinice, while Gaëlle Méchaly is wonderfully bright and clear as Amélite.

There are odd moments of vocal weakness among some of the other roles, but they cause no serious damage. The chorus and orchestra both perform with great vigour, the former contributing memorably to the underworld scenes, and the latter performing delightfully in the opera's many dances. A set to be relished.

Opéra-ballets

Les Indes galantes – Prologue P
Claron McFadden sop Hébé; Jérôme Corréas bar Bellone; Isabelle Poulenard sop L'Amour

Le Turc généreux
Nicolas Rivenq bass Osman; Miriam Ruggieri sop Emilie; Howard Crook ten Valère

Les Incas du Pérou
Bernard Deletré bass Huascar; Isabelle Poulenard Phanie; Jean-Paul Fouchécourt ten Carlos

Les fleurs
Fouchécourt Tacmas; Corréas Ali; Sandrine Piau sop Zaïre; Noëmi Rime sop Fatime

Les sauvages
Rivenq Adario; Crook Damon; Deletré Don Alvar; McFadden Zima

Les Arts Florissants / William Christie
Harmonia Mundi ③ HMC90 1367/9 Ⓕ
(203 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included ●

Les Indes galantes was Rameau's first opéra-ballet. He completed it in 1735 when it was performed at the Académie Royale in Paris. Opéra-ballet usually consisted of a prologue and anything between three and five entrées or acts. There was no continuously developing plot but instead various sections might be linked by a general theme, often hinted at in the title. Such is the case with Les Indes galantes whose linking theme derives from a contemporary taste for the exotic and the unknown. Following a prologue come four entrées, 'Le Turc généreux', 'Les Incas du Pérou', 'Les fleurs' and 'Les sauvages'. William Christie and Les Arts Florissants give a characteristically warm-blooded performance of one of Rameau's most approachable and endearing stage works. Christie's control of diverse forces – his orchestra consists of some 46 players – his dramatic pacing of the music, his recognition of Rameau's uniquely distinctive instrumental palette and his feeling for gesture and rhythm contribute towards making this a lively and satisfying performance. The choir is alert and the orchestra a worthy partner in respect of clear textures and technical finesse; this can be readily appreciated in the spaciously laid out and tautly constructed orchestral Chaconne which concludes the work. The booklet contains full texts in French, English and German and the music is recorded in a sympathetic acoustic.

Einojuhani Rautavaara Finnish 1928

GROVE Rautavaara studied with Merikanto at the Helsinki Academy (1948-52), where from 1966 he taught, and with Persichetti at the Julliard School (1955-56). His large output shows a variety of stylistic resource (Russian nationalists, Hindemith and advanced serialism) and he has written in many genres; notable is The True and False Unicorn (1971) for chorus, orchestra and tape.

Flute Concerto, Op 63

Flute Concerto, Op 63, 'Dances with the Winds'[a]. Anadyomene. On the Last Frontier[b]
[a]Patrick Gallois fl [b]Finnish Philharmonic Choir; Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra / Leif Segerstam
Ondine ODE921-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

Anadyomene (1968) suggests a Turner canvas recast in sound. It opens restlessly among undulating pastels, the tone darkens further, there are brief comments from flute and bass clarinet, the brass prompts a swelling climax, then the mood gradually becomes more animated before we are ferried back whence we came. It is 'a homage to Aphrodite, born of the sea foam, the goddess of love', and a very appealing one at that. The colourful Flute Concerto Dances with the Winds is a more extrovert piece with Nielsen as a fairly certain forebear. It shares its material between ordinary flute, bass flute, alto flute and piccolo. The action-packed opening movement withstands some fairly aggressive interjections from the brass, the brief second movement recalls the shrill sound world of fifes and drums; the elegiac Andante moderato offers plenty of jam for the alto flute, and the finale's striking mood-swings have just a hint of Bernsteinian exuberance. Rautavaara's prompt for On the Last Frontier (1997) was an early encounter with The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym by Edgar Allan Poe. He calls it 'a seafaring yarn in the typical boys' reading mould' and responds accordingly with a 24-minute slice of descriptive musical reportage, not of Poe's exact 'narrative', but of an imagined Last Frontier based on ideas from the story's closing section. It is an eventful, majestic, slow-burning tone-poem, nourished further by some distinctive instrumental solos and with telling use of a full-blown chorus. No texts are provided, and yet the aura of unexplored maritime depths and a sense of mystery associated with them carry their own wordless narrative. All three works are expertly performed and exceptionally well recorded.

Piano Concerto No 3

Piano Concerto No 3, 'Gift of Dreams'[a]. Autumn Gardens
Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra / Vladimir Ashkenazy [a]pf
Ondine ODE950-2 (68 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1999. Includes a conversation between Einojuhani Rautavaara and Vladimir Ashkenazy Ⓕ ●

Autumn Gardens extends the Rautavaarian experience at least one step beyond the Seventh Symphony. You sense it especially in the animated finale, which begins giocoso e leggiero before a Baroque-style, four-note figure slowly makes its presence felt. The figure is first heard on the bassoon, then shifts timbre and focus (timpani and bells play a crucial role later on), inspiring the strings to lyrical heights. The piquantly scored first movement conjures a gentle beating of wings, with glowing modulations that sometimes darken, though they never cloud the issue. The reflective central movement follows without a break.

The Piano Concerto (1998), Rautavaara's Third and an Ashkenazy commission, is stronger meat. More meditative than its predecessors though visited by some cluster-like dissonances, it seems to take its principal stylistic cue from the middle movement of Bartók's Second Piano Concerto. The opening string chord motive is simple, austere, the piano writing bold or decorative rather than overtly pianistic. Viewed as a whole, it is cast vaguely in the manner of Delius or Debussy, more an orchestral tone-poem with piano than a display piece. The most striking movement is the second, which incorporates some fairly harsh brass writing and memorably beautiful closing pages. The Energico finale calls in the big guns and is well served by Ondine's recording team, but one could imagine a more forceful performance. Otherwise, things go well. Rautavaara's annotation explains the thematic geneses of both works and offers some poetic guidelines for listeners. The disc closes with an interview, a disarmingly natural slice of dialogue where the composer relates to Ashkenazy how he views his works as received phenomena. That, for the most part, is precisely how his music sounds – like audible episodes drawn from nature, messages that, in a world seduced by banal artifice, are all-too-easily ignored.

Cantus arcticus, Op 61

Cantus arcticus, Op 61 (Concerto for Birds and Orchestra) with taped birdsong. Piano Concerto No 1, Op 45[a]. Symphony No 3, Op 20
[a]Laura Mikkola pf Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Hannu Lintu
Naxos 8 554147 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1997 ●

No other new music stands to benefit more from extensive exposure, not so much because of its quality (which is beyond question), as because of an almost tangible connection with nature, than that by Rautavaara. One constantly senses the joy of a man alone with the elements: awe-struck, contented, inspired. Bird-song comes from all directions, literally in the 'Concerto for birds and orchestra' or Cantus arcticus, which sets taped bird-song against a rustic orchestral backdrop. The piece ends with the reassuring cacophony of 'Swans Migrating', excellently recorded here. The young Finnish conductor, Hannu Lintu, directs a fine performance. The bird-song tape blends well with the music and is very atmospheric. The First Piano Concerto and Third Symphony (out of seven) receive good performances, most notably the Brucknerian Symphony, an impressive and often dramatic work that begins and ends in the key of D minor. Rautavaara's orchestration incorporates four Wagner tubas, though some of the finest material is also the quietest. The slow movement is sullen but haunting, the Scherzo occasionally suggestive of Nielsen or Martinů and the finale brings the parallels with Bruckner fully within earshot.

The First Piano Concerto has a brilliance and immediacy that should please orchestral adventurers and piano aficionados. The solo writing employs clusters and much filigree fingerwork, but it is the noble, chorale-like second movement that leaves the strongest impression. Laura Mikkola gives a good performance. Naxos gives a full sound picture and overall, this is an excellent CD, concisely annotated by the composer.

Symphony No 7, 'Angel of Light'

Symphony No 7, 'Angel of Light'. Annunciations
Kari Jussila org Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra / Leif Segerstam
Ondine ODE869-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

The Seventh Symphony's opening Tranquillo evokes a calm though powerful atmosphere, with many Sibelian points of reference – most especially in recognizable echoes of the Largo fourth movement from Sibelius's Fourth Symphony, whereas the closing Pesante-cantabile is more in line with the symphonic world of Alan Hovhaness. The Angel idea originates in a series that already includes a number of other works (Angels and Visitations and Angel of Dusk, for instance), the reference being (as the composer himself explains) to 'an archetype, one of mankind's oldest traditions and perennial companions'. This Jungian axis is reflected in monolithic chords, ethereal harmonic computations (invariably broad and high-reaching) and an unselfconscious mode of musical development. Readers schooled in the more contemplative works of Górecki, Pärt and Tavener will likely respond to this spatially generous essay, though Rautavaara's language is more a celebration of nature than any specific religious ritual.

Comparisons with the Annunciations (for organ, brass quintet, wind orchestra and percussion) find the earlier work far harsher in tone, much more demanding technically (it calls for a formidable organ virtuoso) and more radical in its musical language. Here the style ranges from the primeval drone that opens the work through canon, 'bird forest' activity and the novel effect of having the 'notes of a dense chord weirdly circulating in the room' when the organ motor is switched off. Kari Jussila rises to the various challenges with what sounds like genuine enthusiasm (his fast fingerwork is amazing) while Leif Segerstam and his orchestra fully exploit the tonal drama of both works. The recordings are warm and spacious.

String Quartets

String Quartets Nos 1 and 2. String Quintet, 'Unknown Heavens'
Jan-Erik Gustafsson vc Jean Sibelius Quartet (Yoshiko Arai-Kimanen, Jukka Pohjola vns Matti Hirvikangas va Seppo Kimanen vc)
Ondine ODE909-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Here we encounter not one Rautavaara, but three: the fledgling student captivated by folklore; the dodecaphonic zealot stretching the expressive potential of 'the system'; and the triumphant melodist basking in his own unique brand of harmonic complexity. The stylistic leap from Rautavaara's Second Quartet to his Quintet, or Unknown Heavens is more a matter of tone than temperament. All three works are ceaselessly active, the First (1952) being perhaps the leanest, and the last (1997) the richest in texture.

Unknown Heavens takes its name from an earlier work for male chorus, which Rautavaara quotes, initially in the second bar of the first movement ('when the second violin answers the question opposed by the first,' as Rautavaara writes), many times thereafter, and then significantly revised ('in inverted intervals') at the start of the fourth movement. The third begins as a cello duet, sure justification of why – and how – five players are employed where the Kuhmo Music Festival originally commissioned a piece for four. 'The work seemed to acquire a will of its own,' writes Rautavaara. The equally well-performed string quartets are stylistically rather more challenging. The First Quartet plays for just over 11 minutes and inhabits a mildly rustic world roughly akin to Kodály. Best here is the Andante's haunting coda, whereas the 1958 Second Quartet is at its most inventive for the faster second and fourth movements. The current Rautavaara is more relaxed, more contemplative, wiser and softer-grained than his former self. He seems happier reflecting nature than organizing abstract patterns: you sense that the Quintet is authentically self-expressive, whereas the quartets speak interestingly about nothing in particular. The recordings are full-bodied and well balanced.

Piano Works

Etudes, Op 42. Icons, Op 6. Partita, Op 34. Piano Sonatas – No 1, 'Christus und die Fischer', Op 50; No 2, 'The Fire Sermon', Op 64. Seven Preludes, Op 7
Laura Mikkola pf
Naxos 8 554292 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

The most interesting aspect of hearing piano music by a composer known primarily for his orchestral work is in spotting those inimitable harmonic fingerprints that help define his musical personality. Rautavaara's piano music is full of tell-tale signs, even in an early work like the Op 7 Preludes, where the composer indulged a sort of clandestine protest against the 'neo-classical' confines he experienced both in Helsinki and America. Rautavaara was studying with Copland at the time but chose to keep his Preludes to himself. And yet it is Copland's Piano Sonata that spontaneously comes to mind during the austere opening of his 'The Black Madonna of Blakernaya' from Icons, perhaps the most striking of all Rautavaara's solo piano works. The translucent colours in 'The Baptism of Christ' make a profound effect, and so does the serenity of 'The Holy Women at the Sepulchre'. Aspects of 'angels' seem prophetically prevalent – whether consciously or not – in the Etudes of 1969. Each piece tackles a different interval: thirds in the first, sevenths in the second, then tritones, fourths, seconds and fifths. The third is reminiscent of Messiaen, and the fifth of Bartók, but Rautavaara's guiding hand is everywhere in evidence. Spirituality is an invariable presence, especially in the two piano sonatas, though the Second ends with an unexpected bout of contrapuntal brutality. Perhaps the most instantly appealing track is the brief but touching central movement of the three-and-a-half minute Partita, Op 34, with its gentle whiffs of Bartók. Laura Mikkola plays all 28 movements with obvious conviction, and Naxos's recorded sound is excellent.

A Requiem in Our Time

A Requiem in Our Time, Op 3[a]. Playgrounds for Angels[b]. Tarantará[c]. Independence Fanfare[d]. A Soldier's Mass[e]. Octet for Winds[f]. Hymnus[g]
[f]Petri Alanko fl [f]Jussi Jaatinen ob [f]Harri Mäki cl [f]Otto Virtanen bn [f]Esa Tapani, [f]Mika Paajanen hns [d]Jouko Harjanne, [cg]Pasi Pirinen, [d]Jorma Rautakoski, [df]Aki Välimäki tpts [df]Valtteri Malmivirta tbn [g]Seppo Murto org [abe]Finnish Brass Symphony / Hannu Lintu
Ondine ODE957-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999-2000 ●

There's little hint here of the escapist aura that frames most of Rautavaara's recent orchestral work. Latest to arrive is the atmospheric Hymnus for trumpet and organ, composed in 1998 for Barry Millington's Hampstead and Highgate Festival. Hymnus opens and closes in darkness, courting sunlight for a faster central section and couched in a language that is at once florid and austere. Six years earlier Rautavaara had produced a cantata in celebration of the 75th Anniversary of Finland's independence, and his unusually expressive, half-minute Independence Fanfare is fashioned from the same work's concluding hymn. Solo trumpet is represented by the ruminative but technically demanding Tarantará, superbly played – as is Hymnus – by Pasi Pirinen.

Rautavaara calls A Requiem in Our Time for brass and percussion his 'breakthrough work' in that it won him an international composition competition in Cincinnati. That was back in 1953, prior to his studies with Copland, and the musical language seems to give at least half a wink in Vaughan Williams's direction. Dedicated to Rautavaara's mother (who had died during the war), it's a rather beautiful piece, more sorrowful than mournful and with some ingeniously crafted faster music.

A Soldier's Mass (1968) is the Requiem's nearest musical relation. Rautavaara thinks of it as a 'companion work', though the forces called for are more generous and the overall spirit is far more extrovert. The 1962 Octet subscribes to an expressively varied dodecaphony, and the superb 12-minute Playground for Angels (1981) is a sort of musical hide-and-seek with lurking low brass and much quick-witted instrumental interplay. It reminds one at times of Janáček's Capriccio. It's a brilliant piece, fun to hear and probably just as much fun to play. The Finnish Brass Symphony does Rautavaara proud and Ondine's sound quality is spectacularly fine.

Vigilia

Pia Freund sop Lilli Paasikivi mez Topi Lehtipuu ten Petteri Salomaa bar Jyrki Korhonen bass Finnish Radio Chamber Choir / Tino Nuoranne
Ondine ODE910-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1997 ●

Although grounded in the faith of the Finnish Orthodox Church, Vigilia somehow manages to excavate a spiritual path beyond the confines of denominational dogma. Rautavaara's delicious blend of ancient and modern modes is pointedly exemplified in the 'First Katisma', where soprano and contralto, then tenor and baritone, proclaim 'Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly'. There, the harmonic drift is decidedly 'post-renaissance', whereas the 'Alleluias' that follow update to 'post-romantic' and the subsequent assurance that 'the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous' brings us on line with the wistful, nature-loving Rautavaara of the Seventh Symphony and Cantus arcticus.

The a cappella Vigilia was a joint commission from the Helsinki Festival and the Finnish Orthodox Church; the original Evening and Morning Services date from 1971 and 1972, respectively, with this concert version following on later. Possible influences include Bartók, Stravinsky and Messiaen, though early music is a more palpable prompt and Rautavaara himself is always the leading voice.

Rautavaara's employment, or rather absorption, of ancient modes runs roughly parallel with Steve Reich's in works such as Tehillim and Proverb, though by contrast with Reich, harmonic colouring takes its lead from poetic imagery rather than from the sounds of specific words. Vigilia uses variation technique to impressive effect; it is a refreshingly open-hearted piece, one that – whether sombre or celebratory, traditional or innovative – grants ritual narrative a vibrant voice and should earn its composer wide-scale recognition. The performance is beautifully sung and the recording bold and realistic.

Aleksis Kivi

Jorma Hynninen bar Aleksis Kivi; Lasse Pöysti spkr August Ahlqvist; Eeva-Liisa Saarinen mez Charlotta; Helena Juntunen sop Hilda; Gabriel Suovanen bar Young Aleksis; Marcus Groth buffo JL Runeberg; Lassi Virtanen ten Mikko Vilkastus; Jaako Kietikko bass Uncle Sakeri; Jyväskylä Sinfonia / Markus Lehtinen

Ondine ② ODE1000-2D (98 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Libretto and translation included. Recorded c2002

Idyll turned to nightmare, optimism to disillusionment, creative fruitfulness to barren schizophrenia and premature death. The tragic fate of the founder of Finnish-language literature has haunted Rautavaara ever since his youth. This is the most recent of the composer's operas, bar one (it was composed 1995-96). Indeed, Aleksis Kivi is the melodious crystallisation of a lifetime's pondering.

Kivi lived between 1834 and 1872: he was active while Swedish words still predominated in Finnish literature, the Finnish poet Johan Ludvig Runeberg having been the best-known Swedish-language exponent of the genre. Kivi's descent from lyrical flights of pastoral fancy to mental derangement was caused in part by damning assessments of his work from the poet and aesthetician August Ahlqvist, the only speaking role in the opera. Ahlqvist is portrayed here by the actor Lasse Pöysti, whose rhythmically inflected recitation is utterly bewitching. It was Hynninen who reawakened Rautavaara's childhood desire to write a 'Kivi' opera and one couldn't have hoped for a more authoritative, impassioned or vocally beguiling 'creator'.

Musically Aleksis Kivi calls on a varied array of styles. The Prologue depicts Kivi as despondent, despairing and deranged, the music dark and grainy, with a reptilian clarinet in the foreground and a skilfully deployed synthesiser. Rautavaara's scoring is fairly economical throughout (strings, clarinets, percussion) but those who gravitate most readily to his 'angel' orchestral works will likely respond best to the First Act, music filled with mellow light which reflects, in its rich, constantly shifting hues, the protagonist's inspirational flights.

Little need be said about the performance save that it is consistently good, the mezzo Eeva-Liisa Saarinen excelling as Charlotta. Confidently conducted, keenly played and vividly recorded, Aleksis Kivi is a powerful narrative written with the kind of descriptive facility that Bartók employed for Bluebeard's Castle.

Maurice Ravel

French 1875-1937

GROVE Ravel's father's background was Swiss and his mother's Basque, but he was brought up in Paris, where he studied at the Conservatoire, 1889-95, returning in 1897 for further study with Fauré and Gédalge. In 1893 he met Chabrier and Satie, both of whom were influential. A decade later he was an established composer, at least of songs and piano pieces, working with luminous precision in a style that could imitate Lisztian bravura (Jeux d'eau) or Renaissance calm (Pavane pour une infante défunte); there was also the String Quartet, somewhat in the modal style of Debussy's but more ornately instrumented. However, he five times failed to win the Prix de Rome (1900-05) and left the Conservatoire to continue as a freelance musician.

During the next decade he was at his most productive. There was a rivalry with Debussy but Ravel's taste for sharply defined ideas and closed formal units was entirely his own, as was the grand virtuosity of much of his piano music from this period, notably the cycles Miroirs and Gaspard de la nuit. Many works show his fascination with things temporally or geographically distant, with moods sufficiently alien to be objectively drawn: these might be historical musical styles, as in the post-Schubertian Valses nobles et sentimentales, or the imagination of childhood, as in Ma mère l'oye, the East (Shéhérazade) or on Spain (Rapsodie espagnole, the comic opera L'heure espagnole) or even ancient Greece in the languorous ballet Daphnis et Chloé, written for Diaghilev.

Diaghilev's Ballets Russes were also important in introducing him to Stravinsky, with whom he collaborated on a version of Mussorgsky's Khovanshchina, and whose musical development he somewhat paralleled during the decade or so after The Rite of Spring. The set of three Mallarmé songs with nonet accompaniment were written partly under the influence of Stravinsky's Japanese Lyrics and Schoenberg's Pierrot lunaire, and the two sonatas of the 1920s can be compared with Stravinsky's abstract works of the period in their harmonic astringency and selfconscious use of established forms.

However, Ravel's Le tombeau de Couperin predates Stravinsky's neo-classicism, and the pressure of musical history is perhaps felt most intensely in the ballet La valse where 3/4 rhythm develops into a dance macabre: both these works, like many others, exist in both orchestral and piano versions, testifying to Ravel's superb technique in both media (in 1922 he applied his orchestral skills tellingly to Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition). Other postwar works return to some of the composer's obsessions: with the delights and dangers of the child's world (the sophisticated fantasy opera L'enfant et les sortilèges), Spanishness (Boléro and the songs for a projected Don Quixote film), and the exotic (Chansons madécasses). His last major effort was a pair of piano concertos, one exuberant and cosmopolitan (in G), the other (for left hand only) more darkly and sturdily single-minded. Ravel died after a long illness.

Piano Concertos

Awards 1999

Piano Concerto in G[ab]. Piano Concerto for the Left Hand[ac]. Valses nobles et sentimentales (orch cpsr)[b]

[a]Krystian Zimerman pf [b]Cleveland Orchestra, [c]London Symphony Orchestra / Pierre Boulez

DG 449 213-2GH (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1994 ○○○

Zimerman's pianism is self-recommending. His trills in the first movement of the G major Concerto are to die for, his passagework in the finale crystal-clear, never hectic, always stylish. For their part Boulez and the Clevelanders are immaculate and responsive; they relish Ravel's neon-lit artificiality and moments of deliberate gaudiness. That goes equally for the Valses nobles, which have just about every nuance you would want to be there, and none that you wouldn't. The recording is generous with ambience, to the point where some orchestral entries after big climaxes are blurred. Otherwise detail is razor-sharp and one of the biggest selling-points of the disc. Zimerman's humming may be a slight distraction for some listeners, especially in the Left-Hand Concerto, where you may not be always convinced that the LSO knew quite what it was supposed to do with the long notes of the main theme, and where there is a slight lack of tension in exchanges between piano and orchestra. There again, had the G major Concerto not been so wonderful those points might not have registered at all, for this is playing of no mean distinction. In the Left-Hand Concerto, Zimerman's phenomenal pianism sets its own agenda and brings its own rich rewards.

Orchestral Works

Le tombeau de Couperin. Pavane pour une infante défunte. Ma mère l'oye. Une barque sur l'océan. Alborada del gracioso
Orchestra of the Opéra National de Lyon / Kent Nagano
Erato 0630-14331-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

The fairytale wonders and crystalline textures of Ma mère l'oye rarely fail to bring out the best in performers and sound engineers. And Nagano joins the score's other master magicians of the past decade, namely, Dutoit, Rattle and Boulez. But no consideration would be complete without putting into the frame Monteux's 1964 recording – it takes but a few seconds to hear 'through' a moderate degree of tape hiss to a group of crack musicians gathered around the revered maître and producing sublime chamber music, with the most finely gauged seeking out and savouring of expressive colour, character and period charme. Nagano enjoys perhaps the most present and tactile recorded sound of all available versions, with a fine bloom, if not quite the depth of the Dutoit or Boulez, or the focus for detail of the Rattle. Interpretatively, Nagano shares most with Rattle, preferring a wide variety of tempo; not as slow as him in Beauty's 'Pavane', though one might complain that 'Tom Thumb' suggests more movement than Nagano's tempo allows (he turns it into a dreamy woodland interlude). 'Pagodaland', by contrast, is more lively than usual, with the opening piccolo solo nicely inflected. Both the Boulez and Nagano discs offer Une barque sur l'océan, and Nagano's account is one of the most most gripping ever heard. It is a piece whose transcription tends to find more apology than advocacy among Ravel commentators, and is a less frequent inclusion among Ravel anthologies on disc. A pity, as its alternating gentle sunlit sway (and what enchantment lies in the dappled detailing) and the huge waves of sound that arise from it are a gift to conductors who fancy themselves as Poseidon for eight minutes. The 'Prelude' of Le tombeau de Couperin is reminiscent of water music (an enchanted babbling brook?). Here Nagano eschews Dutoit's gentle rapids, facilitating more precise articulation and lovely colouring (wonderfully liquid woodwinds, so well caught by the recording). And in the 'Forlane', precise accentuation and articulation give the main theme a real lift. Questions of balance in Le tombeau between Baroque manners and romantic warmth tend to find different answers from different interpreters, and different expectations from listeners. And some may feel that Nagano's 'expressive' haltings in the central sections of the 'Forlane' and 'Rigaudon' are more affectation than affection. Still, it would be wrong to end with a complaint. This is a distinguished Ravel collection.

Boléro. Ma mère l'oye. Rapsodie espagnole. Une barque sur l'océan. Alborada del gracioso
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
DG 439 859-2GH (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●●

You would hardly recognise Boulez's Ravel here from its previous chilly, chiselled self. Those early 1970s collaborations with the Cleveland and New York orchestras on Sony Classical are superseded on all grounds, not least on account of their close, contrived balances. But most striking of all is the clear superiority of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra's playing, which says more about Boulez's development as a podium technician than any relative deficiency in either of the American orchestras.

If Boulez's earlier manner might have been likened to that of an investigative pathologist at a post-mortem, his 1990s role could be described as a layer on of hands (with the occasional hint of the micro-surgeon; no bad thing in Ravel). In Ma mère l'oye, he is among the master magicians: subtleties of nuance and timing (previously in short supply) now abound; here is playing of a wholly different order of grace and beauty. A sense of drama and proportion are held in perfect equilibrium, with a moderate range of tempos for the set pieces, but slower tempos than before for the scene-setting 'Prélude' and linking interludes in order to realise their atmosphere and sheer sorcery. In the Spanish items, some may find the Berlin woodwinds too cultured in tone and artful in phrasing for their various improvisatory solos: it is rare to hear the first few minutes' solos in Boléro quite as strongly contoured as this (they are, too, predictably legato; do these players ever draw breath?). You may find yourself craving a hint of abandon from the brass, particularly in the 'Féria' from the Rapsodie; and here and in the Alborada, as before, tempos remain slower than average (the 'Habanera' is utterly hypnotic), strikingly so in the 'Féria' which now, aptly, sounds as much like Chabrier as Ravel: festive as opposed to driven and explosive. The sound is both present and resonant in the right degrees. Boulez's Ravel was always provocative; it is now evocative.

Fanfare pour 'L'éventail de Jeanne'. Shéhérazade. Alborada del gracioso. Miroirs – La vallée des cloches (arr Grainger). Ma mère l'oye. La valse
Maria Ewing mez City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 754204-2 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1989 ●

In the past there have been instances of Rattle's intensive preparation for setting down a much loved masterpiece precluding spontaneity in the end result. Not here. Along with the customary refinement and revelation of texture, there is a sense of Rattle gauging the very individual fantasy worlds of this varied programme with uncanny precision: an aptly childlike wonder for Ma mère l'oye's fairy tale illustrations; the decadence and decay that drive La valse to its inevitable doom; and the sensual allure of the Orient in Shéhérazade providing a vibrant backdrop for Maria Ewing's intimate confessions. The three shorter items that make up this indispensable (and generously filled) disc are equally successful, all recorded with stunning realism.

Rapsodie espagnole. Menuet antique. Ma mère l'oye. La valse
Boston Symphony Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips 454 452-2PH (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Alborada del gracioso. Le tombeau de Couperin. Valses nobles et sentimentales. Boléro
Boston Symphony Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips 456 569-2PH (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Haitink returns here to Ravel pieces he recorded two-and-a-half decades ago (Haitink's 1970s Amsterdam Concertgebouw Ravel is still available on a Philips Duo). Are there good reasons for preferring Haitink's newer recordings to the old? The answer has to be 'yes'. The sound balance is close but captures enough of Boston Symphony Hall's very open acoustic. That said, there isn't quite the spatial dimension and ambient warmth of Haitink's previous recordings (where one has to tolerate a degree of analogue tape hiss). Also, some listeners may be alarmed by the vivid presence for both Boston's principal flute – generously phrased playing requiring 'generous' intakes of breath – and the very high incidence of platform noise (sample track 10 of Ma mère l'oye from 4'32"). As to Haitink's own contribution, the differences are small, but taken as a whole, justify the venture. Here or there you will find a rubato more easefully achieved, or a passage pointed or shaded with more imagination or emotion; and here or there, a marginally faster or slower tempo, mainly to the music's benefit. The newer La valse avoids most of the stretchings and slowings, except the marked ones, of the old, its sights more firmly set on the final climax. And the tempo is more successfully maintained in Boléro – definitely 'a class act' with a veiled, silky blend of muted trumpet and flute tone and wonderfully suave but streetwise solos from the saxophones and trombone.

In short, other interpreters might live a little more dangerously, might sometimes 'hear' the music in more interesting ways, might evoke more period charm. But for a modern collection, these discs deserve to be taken very seriously. Haitink's new-look Ravel is central. And it is Ravel of great conviction and composure.

Daphnis et Chloé

Daphnis et Chloé. Rapsodie espagnole. Ⓗ
Pavane pour une infante défunte
Chorus of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden; London Symphony Orchestra / Pierre Monteux
Decca The Classic Sound 448 603-2DCS Ⓜ
(74 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1959-61 ●●

Diaghilev's ballet Daphnis et Chloé, based on a pastoral romance by the ancient Greek poet Longus, was first produced in June 1912, with Nijinsky and Karsavina in the title roles and choreography by Mikhail Fokine. Pierre Monteux conducted the first performance, and 47 years later he recorded his peerless interpretation for Decca. Though the Second Suite from the ballet is familiar to concert-goers and makes an effective piece in its own right, the full score, with wordless chorus, conveys still greater atmosphere and magic. No work of more sheer sensual beauty exists in the entire orchestral repertoire, and Monteux was its perfect interpreter. He conducts with wonderful clarity and balance: every important detail tells, and there is refinement of expression, yet inner strength too. The LSO plays with superlative poetry and skill, and the chorus is magnificent. The Rapsodie espagnole and Pavane are also given ideal performances, and the recordings show off Decca's exceedingly high standards during the late 1950s and early 1960s.

Daphnis et Chloé. La valse
Berlin Radio Chorus; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
DG 447 057-2GH (71minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993-94 ●

Increasingly, for considering modern recordings of Daphnis, it seems you must banish memories of 1959 Monteux; put behind you the most playful, mobile, texturally diaphanous, rhythmically supple account of the score ever recorded; one that is uniquely informed by history and selfless conductorial wisdom. For some, Monteux's view may remain a rather moderate one – certainly in terms of basic tempo and basic dynamic range; and Ravel's score suggests tempos and dynamics which modern performances, and especially recordings, have more faithfully reproduced.

Boulez has, of course, acquired a vast wealth of experience of conductorial wisdom since his first New York recording of Daphnis. And here he has the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra – on top form – to sustain and shape melody within some of his strikingly slow tempos (such as the opening, and Part 3's famous 'Daybreak'), and who remain 'composed' in his daringly fast ones (the 'Dance of the young girls around Daphnis' and the 'Danse guerrière' – one of the most exciting on disc). Just occasionally, you feel that there are parts of the work that interest him less than others. But anyone who doubts Boulez's ability to achieve, first, a sense of ecstasy should hear this 'Daybreak'; secondly, a refined radiance, should try the first embrace (track 5, 2'49"; at this point, this is also one of the very few recordings where you can hear the chorus); or, thirdly, to characterise properly the supernatural, listen to the 'flickering' accents he gives the string tremolo chords in the 'Nocturne'.

The chorus work, not least in the so-called 'Interlude', is outstanding; the harmonic boldness of this passage was just as startling in New York, but the Berlin chorus, unlike the New York one, is here properly set back.

In general, DG's recording strikes exactly the right compromise between clarity and spaciousness, much as Decca's did for Dutoit. With the added lure of an expansive and often massively powerful La valse (spectacular timpani), this is now the most recommendable modern Daphnis available.

Daphnis et Chloé 🄷
New England Conservatory Choir; Boston Symphony Orchestra / Charles Munch
RCA Victor Living Stereo 09026 61846-2 Ⓜ
(54 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1955 ●

This landmark Daphnis, made in stereo, sounds quite astonishing in this transfer. Robert Layton, writing in Gramophone, and comparing Monteux with Munch 'succumbed more readily to the heady intoxication, the dazzling richness of colour and virtuosity' of the Munch. Both Monteux and Munch understood the dangers of extremes and excessive lingering in this score; of sentiment turning into syrup and Ravel's 'Choreographic Symphony' (his own term) falling apart. It should be noted that, though their recordings balance Ravel's complex score more skilfully and imaginatively than most modern contenders, the score's huge range of dynamics could not be fully realised by the technology of the time.

Additional recommendation
Daphnis et Chloé
Coupling: Rapsodie espagnole. Pavane pour une Infante défunte. La valse
London Symphony Orchestra and Chorus / Claudio Abbado Ⓜ
DG Trio ③ 469 354-2GTR3 (200 minutes: DDD) ●

A very desirable set, with the LSO putting on its best, and totally convincing, French accent. Abbado's Daphnis et Chloé is reminiscent of that other great LSO interpretation, from Monteux (reviewed above). The sophistication and power of these performances is something to marvel at.

String Quartet in F

String Quartet in F[a]. Violin Sonata in G[b].
Piano Trio in A minor[c]
[a]Quartetto Italiano (Paolo Borciani, Elisa Pegreffi vns Piero Farulli va Franco Rossi vc); [b]Arthur Grumiaux vn [b]István Hajdu pf; [c]Beaux Arts Trio (Daniel Guilet vn Bernard Greenhouse vc Menahem Pressler pf)
Philips Solo 454 134-2PM (ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1968, [bc]1965 ●

The playing by the Quartetto Italiano in the String Quartet is superb. The first movement is very languorous and though there is not quite enough contrast in the Scherzo between the loud pizzicato at the start and the soft bowed music a few seconds later – it sounds more like mf than Ravel's pp and ppp – the movement goes well and the slow music in the middle is most sensitively managed. In the slow movement, the main tune on the viola (it comes 14 bars from the start) is covered by the second violin, and this happens later on as well whenever the tune recurs. Yet here again most of the movement is beautifully played. The balance of the recorded sound is splendid. (Incidentally, this same recording is also reviewed with the Debussy String Quartet – see the review under Debussy).

The Beaux Arts Trio is very much at home in Ravel. The account of the Trio is a fine one, sensitively paced and perceptive of the music's volatile ebb and flow, of its refined textures. The recording has the wide dynamic range this work needs and there is a good stereo balance between the three instruments. The sombre dignity of the Passacaille is particularly moving.

It is still one of the best performances of this work in the catalogue. Grumiaux is very communicative in the Violin Sonata, maintaining a beautifully long line in the first movement, although here he could have sometimes employed a little more of a sense of fantasy. Both he and Hajdu make a convincing job of this work's central Blues section.

Additional recommendation
String Quartet in F
Couplings: Debussy String Quartet in G minor
Dutilleux Ainsi la nuit...
Belcea Quartet
EMI Debut 574020-2 (71 minutes: DDD: 4/01;

recorded 2000) Ⓜ
Gramophone Award winner 2001 ●●●

An exceptional début by a highly talented quartet. They find a near ideal transparency in the Ravel; the Debussy too is perfectly weighted. These performances fizz with life. (See under Debussy String Quartet for full review.)

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas – 1897; 1927. Tzigane. Pièce en forme de Habanera. Berceuse sur le nom de Gabriel Fauré. Sonata for Violin and Cello. Kaddisch (trans Garban)
Chantal Juillet vn Truls Mørk vc Pascal Rogé pf/pf luthéal
Awards 1997
Decca 448 612-2DH (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●●●

The piano luthéal, used at the Paris première of Tzigane, is an instrument modified to sound like a cimbalom. Its timbre isn't quite the same, but Pascal Rogé produces a wonderful range of sparkling metallic sounds, lending an exciting and exotic atmosphere to the performance. The violin playing in Tzigane is special too – Chantal Juillet's gipsy style is absolutely convincing, the opening solo passage delivered with brilliantly characterised rhythms and a fine sense of timing.

The other performances aren't far behind. The short pieces are especially enjoyable – the velvety tone Juillet produces for Kaddisch, the elegant variations of tone in the Pièce en forme de Habanera, and the delicate textures and gentle phrasing of the Berceuse. In the two Violin Sonatas with piano the playing is fastidious and very well balanced. Rogé never dominates – in the loudest passages he produces a clear sound, with resonance carefully controlled. In the 'big' passages of the 1927 Sonata there's no attempt to rival the barnstorming excitement or the Romantic warmth and urgency of some of the many other recommendable versions. Juillet's and Rogé's playing is cooler, but always expressive, with imaginative and beautiful variations of tone colour. Juillet and Mørk match each other excellently in the Sonata for Violin and Cello. Again, there's a wide range of sonorities, including some suitably grotesque sounds in the second movement, and infectious élan in the finale. The recording is clear and bright.

Complete Solo Piano Works

Angela Hewitt pf
Hyperion ② CDA67341/2 (138 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001 ●

Angela Hewitt's set of Ravel's piano music is a remarkable feat of the most concentrated imaginative delicacy, wit and style. Fresh from her success in Bach she shows how such prowess – namely a scrupulous regard for the score, an acute ear for part-writing, for polyphony, and for meticulous clarity and refinement – can bring extensive rewards. Everything in her performances betokens the greatest care and a special empathy for Ravel's neo-Classicism, for his way of paying affectionate tribute to the past while spicing its conventions with a wholly modern sensibility. Everything in the Pavane is subtly graded and textured, the pedalling light and discreet, with a special sense of luminous poetry when the theme makes its final and magical reappearance. No distorting idiosyncrasy is allowed within distance of Le tombeau de Couperin, yet nothing is taken for granted.

Her Gaspard is a marvel of evocation through precision. Gone are old-fashioned vagueness and approximation: her 'Le gibet' is surely among the most exquisitely controlled on record. Again, her opening to 'Scarbo' is alive with menace because all four of Ravel's directions are so precisely observed; and if she is too sensible to yearn for, say, Martha Argerich's chilling virtuoso frisson she makes no concessions to wildness, impetuosity or telescoped phrasing. Nothing is done in the heat of the moment; she keeps Ravel's nightmare under control rather than allowing it to engulf her.

Yet Hewitt can be as romantically yielding as she is exact. In the return of the principal idea from 'Oiseaux tristes' (Miroirs) she achieves an extraordinary sense of stillness, of 'birds lost in the sombre torpor of a tropical forest'.

Hyperion's sound is of demonstration quality. Hewitt joins Gieseking, Rogé, Thibaudet and Lortie among the most distinguished if entirely different Ravel cycles on record, and easily withstands comparison.

Gaspard de la nuit

Ravel Sonatine[b]. Gaspard de la nuit[a]
Schumann Fantasiestücke, Op 12[a]
Martha Argerich pf
EMI 557101-2 (52 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in [a]1978 and [b]1979 ●●

From the first note of 'Des abends' we are floating, thanks partly to Argerich's finely graded singing tone and partly to her taking the score's extraordinary pedal markings at something close to their face value. Once airborne, it seems all the worlds of Schumann's fantastical imagination are open to us. 'Aufschwung' is the epitome of ardour – a note of desperation never far beneath the surface. 'In der Nacht' skirts even closer to the borders of insanity, its post-Appassionata swirlings founded on staggeringly articulate fingerwork. Yet there is still room for an extra touch of dazzlement in the dartings of 'Traumes-Wirren'. Perhaps 'Ende vom Lied' might have relaxed a little more and offered a measure of consolation rather than more of the same kind of intensity; but the Coda is perfection.

The element of Latin American caprice in Argerich's Ravel Sonatine may not be everyone's idea of appropriate style; what it does, though, is take us close to the heart, if not of Ravel, then of the art of musical recreation itself. Everything here seems dictated by the feeling of the moment; yet the sheer beauty of sound, with textures once again bathed in fabulously imaginative pedalling, is no less overpowering. At the opening of the finale, Argerich's enthusiasm momentarily gets the better of her fingerwork, and around 0’50” to 0’55” her memory falters for an instant, an extra beat being added to put things back on course (in the parallel passage from 2’37” almost the opposite happens, and two beats are lost).

All this sits oddly with Bryce Morrison's perfectly reasonable description of the Sonatine in his essay as ‘classically based, the epitome of distilled grace and Gallic understatement’. Yet he surely hits the nail on the head when he describes these performances as complementary to Argerich's studio accounts. For one thing her Gaspard is an astonishing four minutes faster than her by no means sedate DG recording from three years earlier. In expression it is polarised towards demonic flair and abandon, in a way scarcely imaginable under studio conditions. ‘Ondine’ flickers ravishingly and improvisatorily, but the later stages feel more like white-water rafting than the contemplation of a seductive water-nymph, and the big climax won't stand close scrutiny. On the other hand ‘Le gibet’ is as effective in its restraint as in its hallucinatory colourings – the passage from 2’23” is truly ‘pp sans expression’. Unsur-prisingly, there is no shortage of horripilating malevolence in ‘Scarbo’; the final stages have to be heard to be believed.

The sound picture may not be to all tastes, combining as it does a close-up image with a generous amount of ambience. This gives us simultaneously the clamorous impact of a super-pianist projecting to the back of a big hall and the atmosphere of a spellbound auditorium.

Gaspard de la nuit. Valses nobles et sentimentales. Jeux d'eau. Miroirs. Sonatine. Le tombeau de Couperin. Prélude. Menuet sur le nom de Haydn. A la manière de Borodine. Menuet antique. Pavane pour une infante défunte. A la manière de Chabrier. Ma mère l'oye^{a}
Pascal Rogé, ^{a}Denise-Françoise Rogé pfs
Double Decca ② 440 836-2DF2 (142 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1973-1994 ●●

Everything is expressed with a classic restraint, elegance and economy, an ideal absence of artifice or idiosyncrasy. Rogé knows precisely where to allow asperity to relax into lyricism and vice versa, and time and again he finds that elusive, cool centre at the heart of Ravel's teeming and luxuriant vision. True, those used to more Lisztian but less authentic Ravel may occasionally find Rogé diffident or laissez-faire. But lovers of subtlety will see him as illuminating and enchanting. How often do you hear Ma mère l'oye given without a trace of brittleness or archness, or find Jeux d'eau presented with such stylish ease and tonal radiance? Rogé may lack something of Thibaudet's menace and high-flying virtuosity in ‘Scarbo’ (also on Decca) but how memorably he re-creates Ravel's nocturnal mystery. Even if one misses a touch of cruelty behind Ondine's entreaty, few pianists can have evoked her watery realm with greater transparency. Arguably one of the finest Ravel recordings available.

Songs

Shéhérazade^{bl}. Vocalise en forme de habanera^{dj}. Chants populaires^{abdefj}. Sur l'herbe^{ej}. Histoires naturelles^{ej}. Cinq mélodies populaires grécques^{bj}. Tripatos^{bj}. Ballade de la reine morte d'aimer^{bj}. Manteau de fleurs^{bj}. Rêves^{bj}. Don Quichotte à Dulcinée^{efj}. Ronsard à son âme^{fj}. Sainte^{fj}. Les grands vents venus d'outre-mer^{fj}. Un grand sommeil noir^{fj}. Deux mélodies hébraïques^{fj}. Trois poèmes de Stéphane Mallarmé^{al}. Noël des jouets^{aj}. Deux épigrammes de Clément Marot^{aj}. Chansons madécasses^{cgh}. Chanson du rouet^{cj}. Si morne^{cj}
^{a}Dame Felicity Lott, ^{b}Mady Mesplé, ^{c}Jessye Norman sops ^{d}Teresa Berganza mez ^{e}Gabriel Bacquier bar ^{f}José van Dam bass ^{g}Michel Debost fl ^{h}Renaud Fontanarosa vc ^{j}Dalton Baldwin pf ^{k}Toulouse Capitole Orchestra, ^{l}Orchestre de Paris Chamber Ensemble / Michel Plasson
EMI Rouge et Noir ② 569299-2
(136 minutes: DDD) French texts included. Ⓜ
Recorded ^{c}1982 ●

Despite the enormous popularity of Ravel's music, many of his songs remain comparatively little known and seldom recorded. This collection was the last in the series of editions of French song that Dalton Baldwin recorded for EMI. The first CD opens with Berganza's performance of Shéhérazade. Very accomplished, beautifully accompanied by Plasson and the Toulouse orchestra, it makes an interesting contrast to some of the versions done by sopranos. Berganza follows it with a splendid rendition of the Vocalise en forme de habanera, and the ‘Chanson espagnole’ from the Chants populaires. These last are divided among four singers – Gabriel Bacquier sings the ‘Chanson française’, José van Dam the Italian and Hebrew songs, while Dame Felicity Lott sings the least known, the Scottish.

Bacquier and van Dam really steal the show on this set. This is the most enjoyable performance ever recorded of Histoires naturelles. The smile in Bacquier's voice, his exquisite diction and timing make this the highlight of the first CD. Mady Mesplé's performance of the five Greek songs are splendid, and the four songs that follow – Tripatos, Ballade de la reine morte d'aimer, Manteau de fleurs and Rêves – are all rarities.

The second CD has van Dam's celebrated performance of the three Don Quichotte songs. His version with piano is very characterful. Norman contributes the Chansons madecasses; she has so often included this cycle in her recital programmes that it is now closely associated with her voice and personality. Dame Felicity Lott's group includes the Mallarmé songs, the early Clémont Marot songs (very good) and the charming Noël des jouets, and then the 'Chanson écossaise' – the fifth popular song, reconstructed by Arbie Orenstein in the 1970s.

This set is well worth acquiring for the sake of near completeness (it does not include Fascination, the slow waltz-song Ravel composed for Paulette Darty) and above all for the contributions from Gabriel Bacquier and José van Dam and, of course, Dalton Baldwin himself, sensitive, eloquent as always.

Alan Rawsthorne British 1905-1971

GROVE Rawsthorne studied as a pianist at the Royal College of Music and abroad with Petri; only at the end of the 1930s did he begin to make a name as a composer. Influenced by Hindemith, he developed a highly crafted and abstract style, chiefly in concertos and other orchestral works. His inclination towards motivic thinking and variation structures brought some approximation to 12-note techniques, but tonal centres remained important. He wrote three symphonies (1950, 1959, 1964), two piano concertos (1939, 1951), two violin concertos (1948, 1956), three string quartets (1939, 1954, 1964) and sonatas for viola, cello and violin.

Cello Concerto

Symphonic Studies. Oboe Concerto[a]. Cello Concerto[b]
[a]Stéphane Rancourt ob [b]Alexander Baillie vc
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / David Lloyd-Jones
Naxos 8 554763 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1999 ●●

David Lloyd-Jones directs a swaggering, affectionate and ideally clear-headed account of Rawsthorne's masterly Symphonic Studies (1939), one of the most stylish and exuberantly inventive products of British music from the first half of the last century. The work displays a formal elegance, impeccable craftsmanship and healthy concision that are mightily exhilarating. It is indeed, as John Belcher observes in his thoughtful booklet-essay, an impressively assured orchestral début, its tightly knit 20-minute span evincing a remarkable emotional scope. The present performance must be deemed a great success – a worthy successor, certainly, to both Constant Lambert's classic 1946 Philharmonia version (now happily restored on Pearl) and Sir John Pritchard's admirable 1975 Lyrita recording with the LPO (nla).

First heard at the 1947 Cheltenham Festival, the Concerto for Oboe and String Orchestra was composed for Evelyn Rothwell. Brimful of gentle melancholy, it's another delectably clean-cut creation, whose touchingly eloquent first movement is succeeded by a wistfully swaying, at times cryptic Allegretto con morbidezza and a spirited, though never entirely untroubled Vivace finale. Impeccable solo work from RSNO principal oboe Stéphane Rancourt and a spick-and-span accompaniment to match.

There's another first recording in the guise of the Cello Concerto (1965). This is a major achievement, a work to rank beside Rawsthorne's superb Third Symphony and Third String Quartet of the previous year in its unremitting concentration and nobility of expression. A strongly lyrical vein runs through the notably eventful, ever-evolving opening movement (subtitled 'Quasi Variazioni'), whereas the central Mesto mixes dark introspection with outbursts of real anguish. The clouds lift, however, for the energetic, even rumbustious finale. A substantial, deeply felt utterance, in short, which will surely repay closer study. Suffice it to say, soloist Alexander Baillie gives a stunningly idiomatic rendering; Lloyd-Jones and the RSNO offer big-hearted, confident support.

Apart from a hint of harshness in the very loudest tuttis of the Symphonic Studies, Tim Handley's engineering is immensely vivid and always musically balanced. Overall, a wonderfully enterprising triptych.

Violin Concertos

Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2.
Cortèges – fantasy overture
Rebecca Hirsch vn BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Lionel Friend
Naxos 8 554240 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●

Rawsthorne enthusiasts should waste no time in snapping up this disc, containing as it does music-making of perceptive dedication and impressive polish. He completed his First Violin Concerto in 1947, dedicating the score to Walton (listen for the tongue-in-cheek quotation from Belshazzar's Feast just before the end). Cast in just two movements, it is a lyrically affecting creation that weaves quite a spell, especially in a performance as dignified and consistently purposeful as this. However, the revelation comes with the Second Concerto of 1956. Rebecca Hirsch and Lionel Friend locate a deceptive urgency and symphonic thrust in the opening Allegretto that genuinely compel. If anything, the succeeding Poco lento wears an even more anguished, nervy demeanour, the music's questing mood very well conveyed. By contrast, the finale proceeds in serene, almost carefree fashion, its witty coda forming a delightfully unbuttoned conclusion to a genuinely striking, much-underrated work.

As a curtain-raiser, Naxos gives us the fantasy overture, Cortèges. Commissioned by the BBC and premièred at the 1945 Proms by the LSO under Basil Cameron, it is a well-wrought essay, pitting an eloquent Adagio processional ('wistfully expressive rather than tragic in tone', as annotator Sebastian Forbes astutely observes) against an irrepressible Allegro molto vivace tarantella. The composer develops his material with customary skill, and Friend draws a committed and alert response from the BBC Scottish SO. Boasting a spacious, bright and admirably balanced sound picture (no attempt to spotlight the soloist), here is an enormously rewarding issue and a bargain of the first order.

Further listening

Piston Violin Concerto Nos 1 and 2
Coupling: Fantasia for Violin and Orchestra
Buswell vn National Symphony Orch of Ukraine / Kuchar
Naxos 8 559003 (61 minutes: DDD: 10/99) Ⓢ

The First Concerto has much in common with Barber's, including a similar abundance of melody, and it should be better known. Fine readings: a must-buy disc.

Piano Concertos

Piano Concertos – No 1; No 2. Improvisations on a theme by Constant Lambert 🏵
Peter Donohoe pf Ulster Orchestra / Takuo Yuasa
Naxos 8 555959 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded c2002 ●

Rawsthorne's First Piano Concerto, originally written with just strings and percussion accompaniment, was introduced in its later full orchestral form at a 1942 Promenade Concert by Louis Kentner. The Second was commissioned by the Arts Council for the 1951 Festival of Britain and premièred by Clifford Curzon in the then new Royal Festival Hall. He later recorded it with Sargent and the LSO on a 10-inch LP for Decca. The Record Guide's review commented on the 'open air tune in the finale with an instant appeal' and suggested the work would achieve the 'wide popularity it certainly deserves'. Alas that never came about.

Peter Donohoe plays the First with an effervescent lightness of touch that emphasises the scherzando element of the first movement. Yuasa provides witty orchestral detail – there is an engaging contribution from the bassoon – and yet still finds the underlying lyrical melancholy. He opens the Chaconne hauntingly, and the following dialogue with the piano has a compelling delicacy. The Tarantella finale brings an infectious élan and splendid momentum. Donohoe's brilliant solo contribution has all the sparkle you could want, and the gentle pay-off of the brief coda is neatly managed.

In the Second Concerto the fluidity of Donohoe's playing is particularly appealing, and the overall balance – though the opening flute solo is perhaps a little recessive – is mostly admirable. As the movement proceeds the surge of passion and thrust from soloist and orchestra alike pretty well matches the striking ardour Moura Lympany generates (on EMI), while again there is some delightful woodwind detail. Donohoe and Yuasa then deftly manage the quixotic changes of mood of the initally 'rather violent' Scherzo (the composer's description) and lead naturally into the wistful Adagio semplice, with its nostagic clarinet cantilena answered so exquisitely by the piano.

The Improvisations are based on a seven-note theme from Lambert's last ballet, Tiresias. They are widely varied in mood and style, and, even though Rawsthorne flirts with serialism, the variations are friendly and easy to follow, and the listener's attention is always fully engaged. Certainly this Naxos disc can be strongly recommended, especially to those who have not yet before encountered Rawsthorne's always rewarding music.

Concerto for String Orchestra

Concertante pastorale[a]. Concerto for String Orchestra. Divertimento. Elegiac Rhapsody. Light Music. Suite for Recorder and String Orchestra[b] (orch McCabe)
[a]Conrad Marshall fl [a]Rebecca Goldberg hn [b]John Turner rec Northern Chamber Orchestra / David Lloyd-Jones 🏵
Naxos 8 553567 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●

The most substantial offering here – the resourceful and magnificently crafted Concerto for String Orchestra – dates from 1949, and David Lloyd-Jones and his admirably prepared group givea performance which, in its emotional scope and keen vigour, outshines Sir Adrian Boult's (now-deleted) 1966 radio recording with the BBC Symphony Orchestra. Not only does Lloyd-Jones achieve a more thrusting urgency in the outer movements, he also locates an extra sense of slumbering tragedy in the Lento e mesto. He gives a sparkling account of the immensely engaging Divertimento, written for Harry Blech and the London Mozart Players in 1962; the rumbustious concluding 'Jig' (track 13) is as good a place as any to sample the spick-and span response of the Northern Chamber Orchestra. The Concertante pastorale, written for the Hampton Court Orangery Concerts, is an atmospheric, beautifully wrought 10-minute essay for solo flute, horn and strings. It's succeeded by the perky Light Music for strings, composed in 1938 for the Workers' Music Association and based on Catalan folk-tunes.

Then there's McCabe's expert orchestration of the miniature Suite for recorder and strings, the second of whose four linked movements is a reworking of a ballad from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book. But the most exciting discovery has to be the 1963-64 Elegiac Rhapsody, a deeply felt threnody for string orchestra written in memory of Rawsthorne's friend, the poet Louis MacNeice. Not only does it pack a wealth of first-rate invention and incident into its 10-minute duration, it attains a pitch of anguished expression possibly unrivalled in this figure's entire output.

Further listening

Honegger Symphony No 2
Couplings: Pacific 231. Rugby. Mouvement Symphonique No 3. Pastorale d'ete. Monopartita
Zurich Tonhalle Orchestra / Zinman
Decca 455 352-2DH (70 minutes: DDD: 5/99) Ⓕ

If you like Rawsthorne's Concerto for String Orchestra then try Honegger's Symphony No 2. Karajan's and Janson's accounts may be finer but these couplings are very persuasive.

Film Music

The Captive Heart – Suite. Lease of Life – Main Titles and Emergency. Burma Victory – Suite. Saraband for Dead Lovers – Saraband and Carnival (all arr Schurmann). West of Zanzibar – Main Titles. The Cruel Sea – Main Titles and Nocturne. Where No Vultures Fly – Suite. Uncle Silas – Suite. The Dancing Fleece – Three Dances (all arr and orch Lane)
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Rumon Gamba
Chandos CHAN9749 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Incapable of shoddy craftsmanship and truly a 'composer's composer', Alan Rawsthorne brought a professional integrity, great clarity of expression and unerring economy of thought to every field of music in which he worked, not least the 27 film scores he penned between 1937 and 1964. Here there are selections from nine scores in all, the arranging and orchestrating duties being shared by the indefatigable Philip Lane and Gerard Schurmann.

The Cruel Sea (1953) remains the best-known offering, its evocative, slumbering power and noble defiance as eloquent as ever. Bernard Herrmann, who knew a thing or two about the genre, rated Uncle Silas (1947) one of the greatest film scores he had ever encountered: try the delightfully flirtatious 'Valse caprice'. The charming 'Three Dances' from The Dancing Fleece (a Crown Film Unit production promoting British wool) can almost be viewed as a 'trial run' for Madame Chrysanthème, the one-act ballet Rawsthorne wrote in 1955for Sadlers Wells. The first track is an extended (18-minute) suite from the 1946 POW drama, The Captive eart, and there are also generous excerpts from Where No Vultures Fly and the documentary Burma Victory (full of decidedly superior, stirring invention). Keller was especially complimentary about Lease of Life (1954), a Robert Donat vehicle for which Rawsthorne supplied a 'rich miniature score' lasting about 13-and-a-half minutes, and the collection concludes with a flourish in the shape of the superbly swaggering 'Prelude and Carnival' from Saraband for Dead Lovers (1948). Gamba draws playing of panache and infectious enthusiasm from the BBC Philharmonic, with spectacularly wide-ranging Chandos sound. Not to be missed!

Chamber Works

Piano Quintet[a]. Concertante for Violin and Piano[b]. Piano Trio[c]. Viola Sonata[d]. Cello Sonata[e]
[abc]Nadia Myerscough, [a]Mark Messenger vns [a]Helen Roberts, [d]Martin Outram vas [ace]Peter Adams vc [a]John McCabe, [bce]Yoshiko Endo, [d]Julian Rolton pfs 🏵
Naxos 8 554352 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1997 ●●

Here's a disc brimming with high-quality music and superlative performances. The Piano Quintet, from 1968, is cast in a single continuous movement divided into four contrasting sections. Although only 15 minutes long, the quintet abounds with musical ideas and interest. Much of the material is vigorous, powerful and concisely presented, but there is much poetry, too, particularly in the Lento non troppo section and the brief epilogue that closes the energetic opening section. The Concertante for violin and piano is a much earlier work dating from the mid-1930s and, although early influences such as Shostakovich and even Busoni in 'Faustian' mood can be detected, it is perhaps among the earliest of Rawsthorne's works in which his own voice begins to emerge. First performed by the distinguished Menuhin-Cassadó-Kentner Trio, the Piano Trio of 1963 contains much impressive and finely crafted material, as well as a good deal of colourful soloistic writing. The Viola Sonata dates from 1937, but the score was lost shortly after its première only to be rediscovered in a Hampstead bookshop and revised in 1954. The Sonata is something of a watershed in Rawsthorne's early output, and shows a considerable advance in style and technique from the Concertante of only a few years earlier, and both this and the equally fine Cello Sonata of 1948 are particularly valuable additions to the catalogue. Performances throughout are first-class.

Theme and Variations

Rawsthorne Theme and Variations[d]. Violin Sonata[c]
McCabe Maze Dances[a]. Star Preludes[b]
Peter Sheppard Skaerve[d], [d]Christine Sohn vns
[bc]Tamami Honma pf
Metier MSV CD92029 Ⓕ
(62 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2001

Alan Rawsthorne's Theme and Variations for two violins not only ranks as one of his masterpieces, but can also be considered as amongst the finest string writing for violin duo this century. One of the major strengths of the work lies in the equality of writing and invention in the two solo parts and the way in which Rawsthorne treats the material as an homogenous whole rather than two separate contrapuntal strands. Quite why the work has been so neglected is something of a mystery, which makes this new and exceptionally fine account by Peter Sheppard Skaerved and Christine Sohn all the more welcome. Another Rawsthorne work that deserves much wider recognition is the Violin Sonata of 1958. Originally written for Joseph Szigeti (though never performed by him) the sonata is full of invention and memorable ideas while at the same time conveyed with the most economical of means. Skaerved and pianist Tamami Honma give us a particularly thoughtful, spirited reading of this important Rawsthorne work.

The music of John McCabe (himself a longtime champion and biographer of Rawsthorne) makes an ideal coupling. Good recording. A must for all admirers of Rawsthorne's music.

Jean-Féry Rebel

French 1661-1747

GROVE After serving the Count of Ayen in Spain, 1700-5, Rebel became a leading member of the French king's 24 Violons and the Académie Royale de Musique orchestra. He later held court posts including that of chamber composer (from 1726) and was active as a harpsichordist and conductor. An innovatory and esteemed composer, he wrote various vocal works, string sonatas, 'symphonies' for the Académie Royale dancers including Les caractères de la danse (1715), Terpsichore (1720) and the much admired Les élémens (1737), which begins with a famously alarming dissonance to represent chaos.

Violin Sonatas

No 1 in A; No 3 in A minor; No 4 in E minor; No 5 in D; No 6 in B minor; No 7 in G minor; No 8 in D minor; No 9 in F P
Andrew Manze vn Jaap ter Linden va da gamba
Richard Egarr hpd
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7221 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

This is Andrew Manze's first foray into the French Baroque repertory with eight of Rebel's 12 seldom-heard violin sonatas of 1713. Manze, never short of genius or fire in the Italian and Austrian repertory, here relaxes his sound, making gentle and subtle use of tempo and dynamics and only occasionally breaking out into impassioned lyricism. But that does not mean to say that he has simply plugged into the fashionable French Baroque sound with its easy grace and polite twiddles; one can easily imagine these sonatas being played in just such a pretty manner, but Manze has instead looked deep into the music and extracted from it a great variety of expression, including in many places an unexpected darkness, a brooding restraint immediately apparent in the Grave movements with which some of these sonatas open, but seldom far away even in the apparently carefree musettes, rondeaux or allemandes. It brings to the music an unexpected emotional edge, even a touch of menace. It would be a mean spirit who could not admire the intelligence and imagination which is so lovingly brought to this neglected music. Combined with the sympathetic contributions of Richard Egarr and Jaap ter Linden, this is Baroque chamber music-making of the highest order.

Max Reger

German 1873-1916

GROVE Reger studied with Riemann (1890-95) in Munich and Wiesbaden (where his drinking habits began); in 1901 he settled in Munich and in 1907 moved to Leipzig to take a post as professor of composition at the university, though he was also active internationally as a conductor and pianist. He was appointed conductor of the court orchestra at Meiningen in 1911 and in 1915 moved to Jena.

During a composing life of little more than 20 years, he produced a large output in all genres, nearly always in abstract forms. He was a firm supporter of 'absolute' music and saw himself in a tradition going back to Bach, through Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms; his organ music, though also affected by Liszt, was provoked by that tradition. Of his orchestral pieces, his symphonic and richly elaborate Hiller Variations and Mozart Variations are justly remembered; of his chamber music the lighter-textured trios have retained a place in the repertory, along with some of the works for solo string instruments. His late piano and two-piano music places him as a successor to Brahms in the central German tradition. He pursued intensively, and to its limits, Brahms's continuous development and free modulation, often also invoking the aid of Bachian counterpoint. Many of his works are in variation and fugue forms; equally characteristic is a great energy and complexity of thematic growth.

Four Symphonic Poems, Op 128

Four Symphonic Poems after Arnold Böcklin, Op 128. Variations and Fugue on a Theme of J A Hiller, Op 100
Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Chandos CHAN8794 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989 ●

Mention of Reger's name in 'informed' circles is likely to produce a conditioned reflex: 'Fugue!'. In his day he was the central figure of the 'Back to Bach' movement, but he was also a romantic who relished all the expressive potential of the enormous post-Wagnerian orchestra. Chandos exploits the open spaces of the Concertgebouw, forsaking some healthy transparency for an extra spatial dimension; a more sumptuous glow. With Järvi's instinct for pacing in late romantic music, and his great orchestra's evident delight in the copious riches of the discovery, for the Hiller Variations, this disc is very tempting.

Anyone who warms to Vaughan Williams's Tallis Fantasia will immediately respond to the 'Hermit playing the violin', the first of the four Böcklin tone-poems; Debussy's 'Jeux de vagues' from La mer was obviously in Reger's mind for the second poem 'At play in the waves'; and the 'Isle of the dead' is Reger's no less doom- and gloom-laden response to the painting that so captured Rachmaninov's imagination. The final painting, 'Bacchanal', was described as a Munich beer festival in Roman costume – an entirely fitting description for Reger's setting of it!

Clarinet Quintet

String Quartet in E flat, Op 109.
Clarinet Quintet in A, Op 146ᵃ
ᵃKarl Leister cl Vogler Quartet (Tim Vogler, Frank Reinecke vns Stefan Fehlandt va Stephan Forck vc)
Nimbus NI5644 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

Who could fail to smile at the winding lyricism that opens both these works, or at the self-possessed fugue that potters gleefully at the end of the Op 109 String Quartet? This is music that simply had to be written, complex music maybe, but with so much to say at so many levels that once you enter its world, you're hooked. Previous recordings of the gorgeous Clarinet Quintet have included two with Karl Leister, though for sheer naturalness, musicality and team spirit, this new production will be hard to beat.

Reger's frequent allusions to early musical modes inspire playing of rare sensitivity. Humour surfaces in the scherzo's rough and tumble, a downward scale idea backed by lively pizzicatos, teasingly discursive and with a sunny, song-like Trio. The slow movement recalls Brahms's Quintet but without the gypsy element, while the theme-and-variation finale reminds us that Reger's homage to Mozart extends beyond the chosen key of A major. The String Quartet is more openly argumentative than the Quintet, especially in the first movement. Hints of Taranto inform the tarantella-like scherzo (with its powerful muted viola writing, at 1'56"), whereas the slow movement combines hymn-like nobility with more echoes of Brahms. The closing fugue is the work of a joyful creator drunk on counterpoint, though there's plenty to engage the heart as well as the mind. The Vogler commands a wider range of tonal colour than the Berne Quartet (in their complete Reger quartet cycle) but the present coupling is ideal for all Doubting Thomases who would have you believe that Reger is a bore.

Piano Trios

Piano Trios – B minor, Op 2; E minor, Op 102
Gunter Teuffel va Parnassus Trio (Wolfgang Schröder vn Michael Gross vc Chia Chou pf)
Dabringhaus und Grimm MDG303 0751-2 Ⓕ
(67 minutes: DDD) ◉

It was very wise to programme the masterly E minor Trio before its B minor predecessor. Unsuspecting listeners who jump straight in at Op 2 will discover a pleasing if discursive piece, forged in the shadow of Brahms, with an opening Allegro appassionato which, although half the length of its disc-companion's first movement, seems twice as long. The Scherzo is frumpish, the closing Adagio con variazioni sombre and somewhat long-winded. And yet the use of viola in place of a cello has its attractions, and there are numerous telling glimpses of the mature Reger.

The E minor Trio is something else again, a rugged masterpiece, with a finely structured opening Allegro moderato, ma con passione (the three stages of its argument are divided equally within a 15-minute framework), a mysterious Allegretto that opens in the manner of later Brahms then suddenly lets in the sunlight, and a noble, hymn-like Largo that recalls 'The Hermit with the Violin' from the Böcklin Portraits. Reger's Second Trio is full of audacious modulations and striking dramatic gestures; it is long (something in excess of 40 minutes), but never outstays its welcome. No one could reasonably ask for more than the Parnassus Trio offers, either in terms of drama or of interpretative subtlety. If you love Brahms and fancy diving in among a plethora of stimulating musical complexities, invest without delay.

Organ Works

Chorale Fantasias, Op 52 – Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme. Pieces, Op 145 – Weihnachten. Organ Sonata No 2 in D minor, Op 60. Symphonic Fantasia and Fugue, Op 57
Franz Hauk org
Guild GMCD7192 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Played on the Klais organ of Ingolstadt Minster
Recorded 1996 ◉

Opinions about Reger's music tend to be polarised between admirers and detractors. The latter group would say of him, as Emperor Joseph II famously said of Mozart, that he wrote too many notes. Even in this new century the complexity of his scores still presents an awesome challenge to performers and listeners alike. Yet the rewards are immense; Reger is arguably even as great a composer as Liszt. His radical, eclectic approach took organ music to new dimensions, and he fully deserves a whole CD to himself. He's well served here by an inspired choice of player, instrument and venue. Hauk's performances are amazingly virtuosic; he brings clarity of rhythm and articulation to the faster passages and a serene poetry to the quieter moments. He plays the spectacular Klais organ of Ingolstadt Minster, which must be one of the best instruments in Europe. Its brilliant tutti, combined with a 12-second reverberation, does full justice to Reger's epic climaxes, and there are some ravishing colours in the softer sections. As resident organist, Hauk knows this instrument intimately, and he exploits all the available colours and dynamics with mastery.

Guild's fine recording stops the reverberation from becoming excessive, and at the same time captures the organ's full dynamic range. Whatever your views on Reger, this disc can be unreservedly recommended as an overwhelming and uplifting experience.

Piano Works

Six Morceaux, Op 24. Silhouetten, Op 53.
Blätter und Blüten, Op 58
Jean Martin pf
Naxos 8 550932 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994

A valuable treat for all inquisitive piano buffs and dedicated Regerians, even if some of the music is of variable quality. Least impressive, perhaps, are the Six Morceaux, Op 24 (1898) – all of them fairly derivative, especially of Chopin (No 2), Schubert (No 4) and Brahms (No 5). Whether they quite repay their taxing demands is open to some doubt, whereas the Silhouetten Op 53 (1900) and Blätter und Blüten Op 58 (1900-02) are quite another matter. Both sets are rich in playful modulations and lyrical ideas. Op 53's opening 'Ausserst lebhaft' anticipates the mischievous Reger of the Hiller Variations; the Ninth recalls the Grieg of the Lyric Pieces, the 10th, Reger's own Ballettsuite (of some 13 years later), and the 12th, Brahms's late Intermezzos. All could enrich any programme of late-romantic piano music, while the more aphoristic (and technically simpler) Blätter und Blüten are lighter in tone, their highpoints being (at least on first acquaintance) a charming 'Frühlingslied' and a thoughtful pair of 'Romanzen', the second of which recalls Smetana's piano music at its finest.

Seventy-nine minutes constitute a fair chunk out of anyone's leisure timetable but, with the present context, 44 of them (that is, Op 53 and 58) could be happily spent listening. Certainly Jean Martin plays well and is realistically recorded.

Violin Works

Solo Violin Sonata No 7 in A minor, Op 91[a].
Three Solo Viola Suites, Op 131d[b]
Luigi Alberto Bianchi [a]vn/[b]va
Dynamic CDS383 (56 minutes: bADD/aDDD) Ⓕ
Recorded [a]1992, [b]1977

Violin Sonata in C, Op 72. Little Sonata in A, Op 103*b* No 2. Tarantella in G minor. Albumblatt in E flat
Ulf Wallin vn Roland Pöntinen pf
CPO CPO999 857-2 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded c2001 ●●●

The sheer variety of Reger's music could hardly be better suggested than by this pair of discs. Reger the wild modernist (by the standards of 1903) is vividly before us in the headlong, turbulent, disconcertingly chromatic outer movements of the Op 72 Sonata, with their huge variety of moods and frequent abrupt changes of direction. But the Little Sonata of only six years later is almost Classical by comparison; it is much more direct, economically worked and tightly argued. And in all the unaccompanied music in Luigi Alberto Bianchi's recital we meet Reger paying sincere and often touching homage to Bach.

Bianchi's disc is beautiful but poignant. The three Suites for viola were recorded in 1977 on a large and sumptuously rich-toned viola by the brothers Amati, the Medicea. It was stolen three years later; Bianchi began playing the violin instead and eventually acquired a fine Stradivari, the Colossus, upon which in 1992 he recorded the unaccompanied Violin Sonata. That too was stolen six years thereafter, and apart from the interest of the music and the eloquence of the playing this disc has the sad value of being perhaps the last that we shall hear of two exceptional instruments.

Reger's love for the violin is as evident in the Op 91 Sonata as is his reverence for Bach. All the movements are like Bach in late-Romantic dress, and the finale is a magnificent chaconne.

Ulf Wallin plays with a slightly narrower tone than Bianchi, which works well in the tumultuous gestures of Op 72. But he and Roland Pöntinen are just as alive to Reger's moments of withdrawn pensiveness and his at times admirably long lines, which need care if their chromatic shifts are not to make them seem diffuse; they never do here. The recordings, as in earlier volumes in this series, are excellent.

Six Preludes and Fugues, Op 131a. Preludes and Fugues, Op 117 – No 1 in B minor; No 2 in G minor; No 3 in E minor; No 5 in G; No 6 in D minor; No 7 in A minor; No 8 in E minor
Mateja Marinkovič vn
ASV ② CDDCA876 (82 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1993 ●

Reger's knowledge of, and feeling for, the violin were all-embracing, and although his winding melodic lines can sometimes prove maddeningly discursive, there is much beauty in the writing – the A minor Prelude, or the E minor Prelude, Op 131*a* providing particularly good sampling points. Bach is of course an overwhelming presence: quite apart from direct quotations there is the all-pervasive influence of the unaccompanied Sonatas and Partitas, especially with regard to Reger's fugues, which invariably start with a hint of Bachian déjà-vu before modulating way beyond the Baroque's customary orbit. All 13 works here are surprisingly varied in theme and tone, although even the most enthusiastic listener is advised not to take in more than a few at a time. The prize-winning violinist Mateja Marinkovič is professor at both the Royal Academy of Music and the Guildhall School of Music, and his warm-centred, tonally true performances serve Reger handsomely. A major addition to the solo violin repertory on CD, and a must for all Regerians.

Choral Works

Drei geistliche Gesänge, Op 110. 3 Gesänge, Op 39
Danish National Radio Choir / Stefan Parkman
Chandos CHAN9298 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1993-94

Visions of myriad notes covering the page would frighten most choirs away, but these singers are made of sterner stuff. For them complex contrapuntal structures, devious chromatic harmonies and textures so thick you need a forage knife to get through them, hold no terrors. Rather they not only weave their way through Reger's characteristically tangled scores without a moment's doubt, but illuminate the paths so clearly one hardly notices the dense musical undergrowth all around. Parkman has a clear-sighted view of what is wanted and, aided by singers whose pure, perfectly blended tone is in itself a joy to hear, he follows his vision unfalteringly: everything falls neatly into place making real musical sense. The hefty Op 110 Motets (ostensibly in five, but often diverging into as many as nine independent parts) can, and usually do, sound oppressively heavy, but here offer some of the most sublimely beautiful moments yet captured on CD. A triumph of skill over adversity.

Steve Reich

American 1936

GROVE Reich studied drumming when he was 14 with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra timpanist; later he took a degree in philosophy at Cornell (1953-57) and studied composition at the Juilliard School (1958-61) and at Mills College (1962-63) with Milhaud and Berio, also becoming interested in Balinese and African music. In 1966 he began performing with his own ensemble, chiefly of percussionists, developing a music of gradually changing ostinato patterns that move out of phase, creating an effect of shimmering surfaces; this culminated in Drumming (1971), a 90-minute elaboration of a single rhythmic cell. From c1972 he added harmonic change to his music, and later (Tehillim, 1981) melody. He has also worked with larger orchestral and choral forces (The Desert Music, 1983). Different Trains (1988), for string quartet and tape, won a Grammy for best new composition.

City life

Proverb. Nagoya marimbas. City life
Bob Becker, James Preiss marimbas
Theatre of Voices (Andrea Fullington, Sonja Rasmussen, Allison Zelles sops Alan Bennett, Paul Elliott tens)
Steve Reich Ensemble / Paul Hillier; Bradley Lubman
Nonesuch 7559-79430-2 (42 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

The Wittgenstein quotation 'How small a thought it takes to fill a whole life' serves as the basis of Proverb for three sopranos, two tenors, vibraphones and two electric organs, a composition that was premièred as a partial work 'in progress' at a 1995 Prom.

The complete piece (it plays for some 14 minutes) holds together very well. Three sopranos 'sing the original melody of the text in canons that gradually augment, or get longer', whereas Perotin's influence can be heard in the tenor parts.

Reich's skill at inverting, augmenting and generally transforming his material has rarely sounded with such immediacy. After a virtuosic, pleasantly up-beat Nagoya marimbas lasting four-and-a-half minutes comes City life, probably Reich's best piece since Different Trains. The sound-frame includes air brakes, pile drivers, car alarms, boat horns and police sirens, all of which are loaded into a pair of sampling keyboards and played alongside the instrumental parts.

The first movement opens with what sounds like a distant relation of Stravinsky's Symphonies of Wind Instruments then kicks into action on the back of a Manhattan street vendor shouting 'Check it out'. The second and fourth movements witness gradual acceleration – the second to a pile driver, the fourth to a heartbeat – and the third has the two sampling keyboards engaging in top-speed crossfire based on speech samples. The last and most dissonant movement utilises material taped when the World Trade Centre was bombed in 1993.

City life is a tightly crafted montage, formed like an arch (A-B-C-B-A), lean, clever, catchy and consistently gripping. In fact the whole disc should thrill dyed-in-the-wool Reichians and preach convincingly to the as-yet unconverted. The sound is excellent.

Drumming

Drumming
Synergy Vocals; Ictus / Georges-Elie Octors
Cyprès CYP5608 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

Drumming is from 1971, but it has lost none of its strength. The players of Ictus here put their hearts and souls into a work that demands ferocious concentration (though other approaches are possible – a composer friend once said that it was quite the best music for building bookcases), and which rewards accordingly. Now, we know that nobody likes the label 'minimalist' any more, but with music of this quality it is very hard to find that description insulting. This performance is quite the equal of, and possibly more colourful than, Reich's second version, on Nonesuch, and clearly outstrips the original, less trim DG version.

Electric Guitar Phase

Electric Guitar Phase (arr Frasca)[a]. Music for Large Ensemble[b]. Tokyo/Vermont Counterpoint (arr Yoshida)[c]. Triple Quartet[d]
[a]Dominic Frasca gtr [c]Mika Yoshida mari
[d]Kronos Quartet (David Harrington, John Sherba vns Hank Dutt va Jennifer Culp vc) [b]Alarm Will Sound; [b]Ossia / Alan Pierson
Nonesuch 7559-79546-2 Ⓕ
(54 minutes: DDD) ●

Triple Quartet is Reich's first new work for the Kronos Quartet since writing his masterpiece Different Trains in 1988. It may disappoint – there doesn't appear to be anything particularly new or different happening here.

Electric Guitar Phase, on the other hand, shows precisely what is missing in Triple Quartet. The American guitarist Dominic Frasca has arranged Violin Phase, originally composed for four violins in the heady days of 1967, for four overdubbed guitars, and the result is sheer joy. Such is Frasca's sensitivity to every nuance of phrasing between the four lines that this recording is a classic for the minimalist genre, easily eclipsing the violin original in terms of intensity and tonal variety.

Up to now performances of Reich's music have been dominated by the composer's participative presence, even in larger concert works such as The Desert Music. His predilection for earthy, well-grounded tempos set the norm for performances of his music throughout the 1970s and '80s.

Two recordings here are fascinating because they were made without Reich's active participation. In this recording of Music For Large Ensemble, the melodic invention at this jazzy, vibrant tempo sounds almost as if Reich had been listening to Ghanaian and Scottish folk music. Yet this is nothing compared to Tokyo/Vermont Counterpoint where Mika Yoshida's articulation is so fast that at times you feel helium had escaped in the studio.

This is compulsory listening for anyone who appreciates a little perversity now and again.

Music for 18 Musicians

Anonymous Ensemble / Steve Reich pf
ECM New Series 821 417-2 (57 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1978 ●

Reich's first recording of Music for 18 Musicians was a landmark release in the history of new music on record and confirmed what a towering masterpiece it is. The recording was actually produced by Rudolf Werner for DG, following the release of a three-LP set of Drumming, Six Pianos and Music for Mallet Instruments, Voice and Organ. Legend has it that Roland Kommerell, at that time head of German PolyGram, foresaw the commercial potential of Reich's piece but realised that DG was not the best vehicle to market the recording. Kommerell therefore offered the recording instead to Manfred Eicher of ECM, a company which had hitherto only released jazz and rock.

The ECM release sold well over 100,000 copies, around 10 times higher than might be expected of a new music disc. This episode changed the nature of ECM and signalled a new approach to marketing new music that has since been taken up by other companies.

The 1978 recording still sounds beguilingly fresh. When Steve Reich and Musicians came to re-record Music for 18 Musicians for Nonesuch's 10-CD box set in 1996, their performance was amazingly 11 minutes longer than the ECM version. Normally, you would expect such a big difference to come from a slower tempo, but in fact the underlying pulse of both recordings is virtually identical. This is because of the unusual structure of Music for 18 Musicians, where the gradual fading-in and fading-out of different elements are not given a fixed number of repetitions but are played simply as long as it takes for this process to happen. In the 1996 version, these fade-ins and fade-outs are more finely graded and require more repetitions than in the 1978 version.

Violin Phase

Violin Phase[c]. Eight Lines[b]. New York Counterpoint[a]. City Life[d]
[a]Roland Diry cl [c]Jagdish Mistry vn
[bd]Ensemble Modern / [b]Bradley Lubman, [d]Peter Rundel
RCA Red Seal 74321 66459-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

The most focused work here, Violin Phase (1977), wears its purposefulness on its sleeve. Jagdish Mistry scintillates as the soloist, never letting go of the tension for a second, so when the end comes, you wait expectantly for that thread to be picked up again. Eight Lines, the reworked version of the Octet (1979/83) is also purposeful, moving gently from the early phase style to the melodic chanting-inspired style of the later Tehillim. While it is undeniably exciting, New York Counterpoint (1985) doesn't quite have that edge-of-the-seat adrenalin-powered quality that one can feel so clearly in Violin Phase.

City Life, though beautifully written and, in many senses, a witty work (something that is caught wonderfully in the Ensemble Modern's sharp-edged performance), leaves one adrift, without any clear idea of its purpose.

If you want unforgettable performances of Violin Phase and Eight Lines, Ensemble Modern's account is the one to go for.

Ottorino Respighi Italian 1879-1936

GROVE Respighi studied with Torchi and Martucci at the Liceo Musicale in Bologna (1891-1901), then had lessons with Rimsky-Korsakov during visits to Russia (1900-03). In 1913 he settled in Rome, teaching and composing. He is best known as the composer of highly coloured orchestral pieces, capitalising on the most brilliant aspects of Rimsky-Korsakov, Ravel and Strauss: Fontane di Roma (1916), Pini di Roma (1924), Vetrate di chiesa (1925), Trittico botticelliano (1927), Gli uccelli (arrangements of pieces by earlier composers, 1927) and Feste romane (1928). His interest in the past is to be heard not only in his arrangements of Arie antiche for orchestra but in the use of plainchant and the church modes in such pieces as the Concerto gregoriano (for violin, 1921) and the Quartetto dorico (1924). He also wrote operas (La bella dormente nel bosco, 1921) and vocal works. He was greatly helped by his wife, Elsa (b 1894), herself a composer.

Piano Concerto in A minor

Piano Concerto in A minor. Toccata. Fantasia slava
Konstantin Scherbakov pf Slovak Radio Symphony Orchestra / Howard Griffiths
Naxos 8 553207 (51 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994

All these pieces are otherwise available in decent performances, but at this price how could anyone with the slightest weakness for Respighi hesitate? Scherbakov and Griffiths do a good deal more than dutifully go through the motions, the soloist in particular playing with delicacy and affection, grateful for the opportunities to demonstrate how well he would play Liszt or Rachmaninov, but in the Toccata he is interested as well in Respighi's more characteristic modal vein; as a Russian, he demonstrates that this too, like so much in Respighi, was influenced by the time he spent in Russia.

Russian soloist, English conductor and Slovak orchestra all enjoy the moment in the Fantasia slava where Respighi presents a morsel of Smetana in the evident belief that it's a Russian folk-dance, but the Concerto and the Fantasia, both very early Respighi, are not patronised in the slightest. The central slow section of the Concerto, indeed, achieves something like nobility, and although there is a risk of the pianism in this work seeming overblown, Scherbakov's fondness for Respighi's more fleet-footed manner doesn't let this happen often.

The Toccata is not so much an exercise in the neo-Baroque, often though its dotted and florid figures promise it, more of an essay on how far one can be neo-Baroque without giving up a post-Lisztian keyboard style and comfortable orchestral upholstery. But in a slow and florid central section, a rather melancholy aria that passes from the soloist to the oboe, to the strings and back again, there is a real quality of Bachian utterance translated not unrecog-nisably into a late Romantic language. Scherbakov sounds touched by it, and obviously wants us to like it. The recordings are more than serviceable, but each work is given only a single track.

Roman Trilogy

Pines of Rome; Fountains of Rome; Roman Festivals

Roman Trilogy
Oregon Symphony Orchestra / James DePreist Ⓕ
Delos DE3287 (66 minutes: DDD) ●

The first essential of any new version of this ideal coupling is to have brilliant recording to bring out the splendour and atmospheric beauty of Respighi's three musical picture-postcards. That term may have been used disparagingly once, but no longer when the glories as well as the limitations of these highly attractive pieces have long been recognised.

On that first count of recording quality, Delos offers a triumph. The sound has a sensuously velvety, wrap-around quality that is both warmly atmospheric and finely detailed, helped by a sharp terracing of textures to make the sound both immediate and vividly realistic. Where usually the Pines of Rome, with its thrusting first movement of children-at-play, is presented first, DePreist has preferred the Fountains of Rome, with its gentle opening, and the clean separation of the recorded sound immediately conveys a fine sense of presence.

DePreist, over the years since he became music director of the Oregon orchestra in 1980, has built it into a virtuoso band more than able to hold its own in any international company, presenting these showpieces with just the sort of panache that they need. DePreist and his players are no less brilliant than their rivals. Often they gain from the extra weight of the bass response, as when, in the second movement of the Fountains, 'The Triton Fountain in the Morning', the pedal-notes from the organ have the tummy-wobbling quality usually experienced only in live performance. The brash last movement of Roman Festivals has sound slightly less vivid and immediate than the rest, but on any count this is among the finest versions of a much-duplicated coupling.

Roman Trilogy
Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra / Lorin Maazel
Sony Classical SK66843 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994-96 ●●

In ripely committed performances like Maazel's, there are few works to match Respighi's trilogy in showing off the glories of a modern orchestra in full cry. Maazel's is an exceptionally fine recording. The orchestral sound is perfectly natural and perfectly believable; the acoustic is perceptible and credible; Respighi's textures are satisfyingly rich but always comprehensible; instruments are in the right perspective, and when a solo line is prominent there is no sense that it has been artificially spotlit or moved forward. Once you've got over the pleasurable relief of hearing such a sound again, you notice what a splendid orchestra this is: in Pines alone, what wonderfully velvety strings to evoke the shadows of the pines near a catacomb, what sensitive woodwind soloists as companions to the nightingale (poetically distant but beautifully clear) on the moonlit Janiculum! And then you enjoy not only the fine control of Maazel's big crescendos, but the fact that you don't have to fiddle with the volume controls to appreciate them.

Roman Trilogy
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Enrique Bátiz
Naxos 8 550539 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1991 ●

This Naxos disc is an extraordinary bargain. It has such excitement and verve that one can accept an extra degree of brazen extroversion, indeed revel in it. In Roman Festivals the opening 'Circuses' is immensely spectacular, its character very much in the unfettered gladiatorial tradition of the Coliseum: the trumpets and drums are quite thrilling. The gossamer opening of 'The Jubilee' leads to the most dramatic climax. In the 'October Festival' the strings play their Latin soliloquy very exotically for Bátiz. The closing section brings a gentle mandolin serenade. The great clamour of the Epiphany celebrations which follow unleashes a riotous mêlée from the RPO, which sounds as if it is enjoying itself hugely, and the obvious affinity with the final fairground scene of Petrushka is all the more striking when the strings have that bit more bite.

The Pines and Fountains are also very fine. When the unison horns signal the turning on of the Triton Fountain, and the cascade splashes through the orchestra, the RPO unleashes a real flood. Yet the lovely, radiant gentle evocation of the central movements of The Pines, and the sensuous Italian light of the sunset at the Villa Medici, are most sensitively realised by the RPO, and at the very beginning of the finale, 'The Pines of the Appian Way', the ever present sound, with its growling bass clarinet, gives a sinister implication of the advancing Roman might.

Church Windows

Church Windows. Brazilian Impressions.
Roman Festivals Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra / Jesús López-Cobos Ⓕ
Telarc CD80356 (71 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993 ●

One could easily argue that neither Church Windows nor Brazilian Impressions is quite as successful as the 'essential' Respighi of Pines, Fountains and Festivals. The only answer to that, López-Cobos seems to suggest, is to take the music perfectly seriously and pay scrupulous attention not just to its potential for sonorous spectacle but to its wealth of beautifully crafted detail. The gong at the end of the second movement of Church Windows is magnificently resonant, as is the organ in the finale, and the work is given an extra inch or two of stature by sensitive handling of those moments that need but don't always get delicacy. He pays such care to character and detail in 'Butantan', that creepy depiction of a snake-farm in Brazilian Impressions, that you can not only recapture the real, crawling horror that Respighi experienced there, but discover in the music also a queer sort of Debussian grace as well. And as for Roman Festivals, well, what's wrong with 20-odd minutes of wide-screen spectacular once in a while? But if every colour is precisely rendered, the quiet passages as affectionately turned as they are here, what skill there is to be found in it, what a gift for immaculately precise instrumental detail. With that sort of handling all three pieces sound quite worthy of sharing shelf space with Pines and Fountains. The recording is spectacular.

Songs

Cinque canti all'antica. Sei liriche. Deità silvane. Ballata alla luna. Stornello. Stornellatrice. Contrasto. Tanto bella. Invito alla danza. L'ultima ebbrezza. Notturno. Luce
Leonardo de Lisi ten Reinild Mees pf
Channel Classics CCS9396 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996

Leonardo de Lisi is a lyric tenor of real quality with a Lieder singer's subtlety, taste and responsiveness to words. In fact by the colour of the voice you might not take him to be an Italian and his French diction is almost impeccable in the two settings by Respighi (among the Sei liriche) of French texts, the quite magical 'Le repos en Egypte' and the striking 'Noël ancien'. If you have not so far thought of Respighi as a song composer you are in for a surprise. Sopranos quite often programme his charming Stornellatrice as an encore but it has equals and indeed superiors here. Tanto bella, for example: ample grateful melody over a lilting accompaniment, with a haunting middle section. The Canti all'antica are fresh and very simple. But with the Sei liriche of 1912 we reach audible French influence and by 1917 and Deità silvane Respighi's smooth lines have become flexible and his idiomatic keyboard writing is now filled with vivid imagery. Reinild Mees is obviously as fond of Deità silvane as de Lisi is. Both are excellently recorded.

La sensitiva

La sensitiva[b]. Deità silvane[a]. Nebbie[b]. Aretusa[b]
[a]Ingrid Attrot sop [b]Linda Finnie mez

BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9453 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995 ●

In some of Respighi's comparatively neglected pieces, his accustomed richness and subtlety of orchestral colour go with a certain lack of melodic individuality. Once or twice in Deità silvane ('Woodland gods'), for example, one wishes that the poems' classical imagery would lead him towards an evocation or even a direct quotation from Italian music's 'classical' past of the kind that so often renders his better-known music so memorable. In La sensitiva ('The sensitive plant'), however, his care for the imagery and especially the prosody of Shelley's poem (in Italian translation) was so responsive that striking melodic invention was the result. The orchestral colour of the piece is exquisite, the succession of ideas (the sensitive plant is image both of unhappy lover and spurned artist) a good deal more than merely picturesque. In a performance as expressive as this it seems one of Respighi's best works, and a good deal more sophisticated than he is generally given credit for. Aretusa is fine, too, with bigger dramatic gestures, even richer colour and some magnificent sea music. The much better-known Nebbie is another example of Respighi finding a genuinely sustained melodic line in response to a text which obviously meant a great deal to him. Everything here is played with a real care for Respighi's line as well as his sumptuous but never muddy colours. First-class recording.

Wolfgang Rihm

German b1952

GROVE Rihm studied first at Karlsruhe (1968-72), where Fortner was among his teachers, and later at Darmstadt, in Cologne under Stockhausen, and with Huber and Nono. An atonal, post-expressionist composer who favours pungent, hard-edged sonorities and uses tonality in moments of repose (for example in the opera Jakob Lenz, 1980), he has written a ballet (Tutuguri, 1982) and orchestral works including symphonies, a series of pieces (some with voices) under the title Abgesangsszene, Segmente for 18 strings (1974) and Cuts and Dissolves, a concerto for 29 players (1977), as well as chamber music, lieder and organ music. His recent opera, Die Eroberung von Mexiko (1992), has been admired for its wide range of musical expressions, its use of massed choral and orchestral effects and its sustained dramatic scheme.

Jagden und Formen

Ensemble Modern / Dominique My
DG 20/21 471 558-2GH (51 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001

Jagden und Formen is as fresh as it comes. It has evolved over several years, but Wolfgang Rihm put the finishing touches to it only in 2001. Even now, subsequent revisions are not out of the question, since Rihm's approach to composing is open-ended, with large-scale pieces growing out of related, smaller essays. That is certainly true of Jagden und Formen, which has affinities with a number of recent orchestral scores bearing similar titles. So this new work stands at the provisional end of a long-term process in which ideas and materials are revisited.

Rihm is a composer who writes very fast, so that the title's curious metaphor of the hunt to describe the immediacy of the compositional act is in many ways apposite. There is certainly a sense of relentless forward motion, of breathlessness almost. The obsessive dotted rhythms and surging quavers that punctuate the work are a concrete example of this (they relate back to Gejagte Form). But for a figure as eclectic as Rihm, Jagden und Formen is remarkably single-minded, cast in what one could call a modernist idiom. Only at the end of the piece does Rihm introduce brash, chordal utterances clearly reminiscent of tonal (or pre-atonal) orchestral music. Jagden und Formen is one of the strongest of Rihm's scores, and holds the listener throughout its 50-odd minutes.

Although Rihm claims not to have conceived of Jagden und Formen as a Concerto for Orchestra, there is no denying that certain instruments take centre stage for extended periods. Ensemble Modern show themselves no less adept than their Viennese counterparts. Both the individual contributions and the sense of ensemble under Dominique My are very impressive, and the sound recording nicely mediates between the two. Among available recordings of Rihm's music, this ranks very high. Those unfamiliar with his music (or with his recent output, certainly) could do worse than start here.

Nicolay Rimsky-Korsakov

Russian 1844-1908

GROVE Apart from piano lessons, a love for the music of Glinka and a fascination with opera orchestras, Rimsky-Korsakov had little preparation for a musical career – he trained as a naval officer – until he met Balakirev (1861), who captivated him, encouraging his attempts at composition, performing his works and introducing him to Borodin, Dargomïzhsky, Cui and Mussorgsky. He wrote songs, orchestral works and an opera (The Maid of Pskov, 1873) before becoming professor at the St Petersburg Conservatory (1871) and inspector of naval bands (1873-84), teaching himself harmony and counterpoint, conducting at Balakirev's Free School and collecting folksongs. His next opera, May Night (1880), engaged his full creative powers with its blend of the fantastic and the comic (the realm in which he was to score most of his greatest successes), while Snow Maiden (1882) evoked a deeper world of nature-mysticism. Official duties at the imperial chapel (1883-91), work on the deceased Mussorgsky's and Borodin's manuscripts and advising for the publisher Belyayev interrupted composition, but he did produce the three colourful orchestral works by which he is best known, Sheherazade, the Spanish Capriccio and the Russian Easter Festival Overture, during 1887-88, after which he devoted himself to opera. Of the 12 dramatic works from Mlada (1892) to The Golden Cockerel (1909), Kitezh (1907) stands out for its mystical and psychological depths. Rimsky-Korsakov's operas far out-weigh in importance his other compositions, for both their brilliant scoring and fine vocal writing. If they lack dramatic power and strong characterisation, they nevertheless set delightful fantastic puppets in the context of musico-scenic fairy tales, using a dual musical language to delineate 'real' from 'unreal'. He transmitted his pellucid style to two generations of Russian composers, from Lyadov and Glazunov to Stravinsky and Prokofiev, all of whom were his pupils.

Scheherazade, Op 35

Rimsky-Korsakov Scheherazade, Op 35
Balakirev Islamey (arr Lyapunov)
Borodin In the Steppes of Central Asia
Kirov Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips 470 840-2PH (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●

Recorded under live conditions but without an audience in St Petersburg's Mariinsky Theatre, this Scheherazade is the most red-blooded, exciting account of Rimsky-Korsakov's orchestral warhorse currently available, helped by full, immediate sound of a richness rare in Russian recordings.

The magnetism is established from the start, with Gergiev completely dispelling the feeling that this is a work which keeps stopping and starting too often for its own good. Consistently you register that these are players who have the music in their blood, with rubato naturally inflected. In expressive freedom Gergiev is often less extreme than Reiner or Karajan, as in the quasi recitando bassoon solo near the start of the second movement or the espressivo oboe solo which follows, in which Gergiev notes also the a tempo marking, keeping it steady. The virtuosity of the St Petersburg soloists conveys an edge-of-seat tension, particularly when Gergiev opts for challengingly fast speeds in the climactic passages of the second and fourth movements.

This is a work which Rimsky-Korsakov wrote over only a few weeks, and far more than usual this is a performance that, defying the many changes of tempo, conveys that urgency of inspiration. Yet Gergiev brings out points of detail in the brilliant instrumentation normally bypassed, as in the upward glissando for the cellos in the opening section of the third movement (3'41" into track 3), either ignored or merely hinted at by others.

There remain two points that might be counted controversial. Gergiev's tempo for that opening section of the third movement, 'The Young Prince and Princess', is markedly slower than with the others. Yet in context Gergiev conjures extra contrast with the other movements. The other controversial point is that though the recorded sound has spectacular weight and power over the widest range, it is clear that reverberation has been added to a recording made in a relatively dry theatre acoustic. Happily, it does not get in the way of orchestral detail. Both performance and recording, however, whatever the acoustic juggling, have a power that pins you back in your seat, making this a demonstration disc in every way.

Scheherazade[a]. Capriccio espagnol[b]. Russian Easter Festival Overture[c]
Herman Krebbers vn [ac]Concertgebouw Orchestra / [a]Kyrill Kondrashin; [b]London Symphony Orchestra / [bc]Igor Markevitch
Philips Solo 442 643-2PM (74 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1980, [b]1963, [c]1965 ●●

Kondrashin's performance of Scheherazade is one of the very finest made of Russian music in the Concertgebouw; it has glamour and brilliance, and the resonance brings a wonderful feeling of spaciousness in the first movement and adds a thrill to the spectacle of the finale. Kondrashin has the full measure of this colourful score, while the finale builds up to a feeling of excitement which leads to a riveting climax at 'The Shipwreck'. Of course, any performance of this masterpiece stands or falls by the portrayal of Scheherazade herself by the solo violin, and here the Concertgebouw's leader, Herman Krebbers, dominates the action from the gentle, beguiling opening to his exquisite closing solo.

A brilliant performance of Rimsky's Capriccio espagnole follows, very well played by the London Symphony Orchestra under Igor Markevitch; indeed, the 1963 recording sounds far more lustrous than it did on LP. It is upstaged, however, by Markevitch's performance of the composer's Russian Easter Festival Overture, made two years later, when again the aura of the Concertgebouw ambience adds a glow to more remarkable playing from this great orchestra. Altogether a superb disc, and generously full.

Scheherazade[a]. Capriccio espagnol[a]
Mussorgsky[b] Night on the Bare Mountain. Khovanshchina – Prelude. Mussorgsky (orch Ravel)[b] Pictures at an Exhibition
[a]London Philharmonic Orchestra; [b]Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra / Mariss Jansons
EMI Double Forte ② 575172-2 (DDD) Ⓜ
[a]Recorded 1994, b 1989 (concert) ●●

This has got to be one of EMI's finest recordings, not as analytically transparent as some but vivid and immediate with a thrillingly wide dynamic range. As to Jansons's interpretation of the main work, he follows up the big bold, brassy opening with a surprisingly restrained account of the main theme as it develops, keeping power in reserve, building up more slowly than usual. What then is consistently striking in all four movements is Jansons's pointing of rhythm, lilting, bouncy and affectionate in a way that distinguishes this from most other versions. This is a Scheherazade that dances winningly, less earnest than usual, often suggesting a smile on the face. That is very welcome in a work that, for all its exotic colour and memorable themes, needs persuasive handling if it is not to seem like a lot of introductions leading to introductions, and codas leading to codas, with little meat in the middle. Jansons's control of structure leads to a masterly sense of resolution at the great climax towards the end of the finale, as the main theme returns fortissimo. Nowhere does this seem like a virtuoso exercise, brilliant as the playing of the LPO is, not least that of the warmly expressive violin soloist, Joakim Svenheden. Rather, emotionally involved, Jansons finds a rare exuberance in Rimsky-Korsakov's stream of ideas and colours, leading compellingly from one to another. The Capriccio espagnol brings a similar combination of expressive warmth and exuberance. In the brilliant 'Alborada' at the beginning of the Capriccio Jansons's speed is less hectic than some, and with springy rhythms it is made to sound relaxed, jolly rather than fierce. Not that in either work is there any shortage of biting excitement.

A Night on the Bare Mountain is given a strong, pungent performance, its elemental diabolism well conveyed, as is the Khovanshchina Prelude with its haunting evocation of dawn over the Moscow River, the sinuous basic melody reminding us that the sun rises in the East.

Scheherazade. The Tale of Tsar Saltan, Op 57 – Tsar's farewell and departure; Tsarina in a barrel at sea; The three wonders
Philharmonia Orchestra / Enrique Bátiz
Naxos 8 550726 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992 ◉

Bátiz proves an impulsive, purposeful interpreter. In the second movement, his performance is more lilting Ozawa's, with rubato more persuasive, helped by superb Philharmonia wind-playing. The fanfares which interrupt in echelon (track 2) are brisk rather than weighty, confirming a more volatile approach than Ozawa's. In the third movement the Philharmonia strings may not be quite as rich as the Viennese, but with the excellent, well-balanced recording revealing more inner detail the result is more refined, with a delectably lilting clarinet entry on the grazioso dance-rhythm (track 3). David Nolan's violin solos are more individually rhapsodic, if not always as immaculate tonally as the Viennese. In short, this budget issue is at least as compelling and just as exciting as its full-priced rival, and rather better recorded. The fill-up can be warmly recommended too, three movements from the five which Rimsky included in the orchestral suite of musical pictures from Tsar Saltan, starting with the delectable march entitled the 'Tsar's farewell and departure'. The other movements are 'Tsarina in a barrel at sea' and 'The three wonders', with the over-played 'Flight of the Bumble-Bee' hardly missed.

Scheherazade. Capriccio espagnol
London Symphony Orchestra /
Sir Charles Mackerras Ⓕ
Telarc CD80208 (60 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1990 ◉

Sir Charles Mackerras throws himself into this music with expressive abandon, but allies it to control so that every effect is realised and the London Symphony Orchestra plays these familiar works as if it was discovering them afresh. Together they produce performances that are both vivid and thoughtful, while the solo violin in Scheherazade is seductively and elegantly played by Kees Hulsmann, not least at the wonderfully peaceful end to the whole work. The finale featuring a storm and shipwreck is superbly done, the wind and brass bringing one to the edge of one's seat.

This sensuous and thrilling work needs spectacular yet detailed sound, and that is what it gets here, the 1990 recording in Walthamstow Town Hall being highly successful and giving us a CD that many collectors will choose to use as a demonstration disc to impress their friends. The performance and recording of the Capriccio espagnol is no less of a success.

Kashchey the Immortal

Konstantin Pluzhnikov ten Kashchey; Marina Shaguch sop Princess; Larissa Diadkova mez Kashcheyevna; Alexander Gergalov bar Ivan Korolevitch; Alexander Morozov bass Storm Knight; Kirov Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips 446 704-2PH (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1995 ◉

Rimsky-Korsakov's 'autumnal parable' is a strange and fascinating work. Cast in one act (three linked scenes), it tells of the evil sorcerer Kashchey who has imprisoned the Princess, eventually rescued by her lover Prince Ivan; the secret of Kashchey's immortality is discovered to lie held in the frozen tears of his daughter Kashcheyevna, and these flow when her failure to seduce the Prince touches the heart of the Princess, who embraces her. Human warmth can destroy even the fiercest sorcery. There was clearly an opportunity here for a contrast which had served Russian composers ever since Glinka's Ruslan and Lyudmila: that of the weirdly sinister and chromatic versus the comfortingly human diatonic. By 1902, the pattern might have come to seem a little threadbare, were it not for the fact that Rimsky-Korsakov had been impressed by what some aspects of Wagner's harmony might hold for him. The outcome was his own most advanced harmony, astonishing and terrifying in the portrayal of Kashchey, a powerful role sung here with magnificent villainy by Konstantin Pluzhnikov: this is a real tour de force. The human diatonics cannot help but be weaker, though Larissa Diadkova manages very affectingly the Kundry-like transition from seductress to suppliant under the Princess's compassionate embrace: she has considerably the more interesting part, and makes more of it than does Marina Shaguch of hers. Alexander Gergalov, too, is at his best in the seduction duet with Kashcheyevna. Perversely, the opera was a success in the 1905 uprising as a metaphor of humanity overcoming frigid authority, and retained some of that popularity in Communist times. A splendid version, well worth hearing.

The Legend of the Invisible City...

Nicolai Ohotnikov bass Prince Yury Vsevolodovich; Yuri Marusin ten Prince Vsevolod Yur'yevich; Galina Gorchakova sop Fevroniya; Vladimir Galusin ten Grishka Kuter'ma; Nikolai Putilin bar Fyodor Poyarok; Olga Korzhenskaya mez Page; Evgeni Boitsov ten First Upright Citizen; Evgeny Fedorov bass Second Upright Citizen; Mikhail Kit bass Bard; Nikolai Gassiev ten Bear Trainer; Grigory Karasev bar Beggar; Bulat Minzhilkiev bass Bedyay; Vladimir Ognovienko bass Burunday; Tatiana Kravtsova sop Sirin; Larissa Diadkova mez Alkonost; Kirov Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev

Philips ③ 462 225-2PH3 (181 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live in 1994

Rimsky-Korsakov's penultimate opera was never popular at home in Soviet times, partly because of unease about its religious nature and perhaps also because of its Wagnerian elements. Yet it is not the Russian Parsifal, as it has been foolishly described; rather, it draws upon the magical, the fantastic, the legendary and the religious, finding exciting and sometimes moving contact between them.

The plot has at its centre the woodland maiden Fevroniya and her betrothal to Prince Vsevolod. There are ceremonies, a Tartar abduction, and a final transfiguration when the mysterious city of Kitezh welcomes the lovers to eternal life. It is a beautiful score, and one of Rimsky-Korsakov's subtlest. Fevroniya is not an easy role. The original producer, Vassily Shkafer, was puzzled as to why the composer had written the central part 'for a dramatic soprano whereas the figure of Fevroniya is actually ... designed to be ... light, ethereal, disembodied.' Galina Gorchakova has the dramatic power, but, skilfully as she phrases the music, she lacks the simplicity first revealed in the forest and sustained throughout Fevroniya's trials. She has steady support from her tenor, Yuri Marusin who is a strong and lyrical Vsevolod, while Vladimir Galusin gives a hectic performance of the drunkard Grishka Kuter'ma. The live recorded sound occasionally seems to biff the microphones – the chorus, which sings excellently, is not always clear, and there is a great deal of clumping. However, the orchestra, which matters a great deal, is lucid.

Sadko

Vladimir Galusin ten Sadko; Valentina Tsidipova sop Volkhova; Sergei Alexashkin bass Okean-More; Marianna Tarassova mez Lyubava Buslayevna; Larissa Diadkova contr Nezhata; Bulat Minjelkiev bass Viking Merchant; Gegam Grigorian ten Indian Merchant; Alexander Gergalov bar Venetian Merchant; Vladimir Ognovenko bass Duda; Nikolai Gassiev ten Sopel; Nikolai Putilin bar Apparition; Yevgeny Boitsov ten Foma Nazarich; Gennadi Bezzubenkov bass Luka Zinovich; Kirov Opera Orchestra / Valery Gergiev

Philips ③ 442 138-2PH3 (173 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live in 1993

For all its drawbacks, this complete version of Sadko from the Maryinsky company is a welcome addition to the catalogue. Sadko is a panoramic work, packed with numbers, rather less packed with event or with character. The various characters delivering themselves of a song or a ballad or an address are reasonably well contrasted, partly because of Rimsky-Korsakov's skills in drawing on different Russian influences and in differentiating between a simple tonal language for the real world and a more chromatic idiom for the seductive realm of the Sea King (Okean-More) and his daughter Volkhova.

Sadko is sung by Vladimir Galusin pretty steadily at full volume. He settles down a little as the opera proceeds, and by Act 3 is finding a more pacific manner. Valentina Tsidipova returns his advances, and makes her own, with a good feeling for line, if one can overcome resistance to the steady vibrato. The Sea King is strongly sung by Sergei Alexashkin, truculent at first but warming his tone as he comes to accept Sadko. But it is a pity that the best-known number from the opera, the song of the Indian Merchant, should be sung as half-heartedly as it is by Grigorian. Gergiev leads his forces well, and draws some vigorous, colourful singing from the choruses. There is, however, a good deal of noise from the many stage comings and goings, as well as tunings-up and applause. The recording has difficulty in catching all the singers equally, but for the most part this is a fair representation of a colourful score.

The Tsar's Bride

Gennadi Bezzubenkov bass Vasily Sobakin; Marina Shaguch sop Marfa; Dmitri Hvorostovsky bar Grigory Gryaznoy; Sergei Alexashkin bass Grigory Malyuta-Skuratov; Evgeny Akimov ten Ivan Likov;

Olga Borodina mez Lyubasha; Nikolai Gassiev ten Bomelius; Irina Loskutova sop Saburova; Olga Markova-Mikhailenko mez Dunyasha; Liubov Sokolova mez Petrovna; Yuri Shkliar bass Stoker; Lyudmila Kasjanenko sop Servant; Victor Vikhrov ten Young lad; Kirov Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips ② 462 618-2PH2 (148 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included.
Recorded 1998 ●

The plot of The Tsar's Bride is awkward, turning on the search by Tsar Ivan the Terrible for a wife. His eye lights on Marfa, betrothed to Ivan Likov but also desired by Grigory Gryaznoy, who is trying to discard his lover Lyubasha in her favour. There is a sinister German, Bomelius, who deals in poisons and love potions: confusion and substitution here lead to Marfa's madness. The Tsar does not sing, but is represented, motivically, by the folk-tune familiar from Boris Godunov and Beethoven's Second Razumovsky Quartet. Tchaikovsky is the most potent influence on the work, not least since his death in 1893 seems to have freed Rimsky-Korsakov, though grieving personally, from a creative block; but the influence does not extend to subtle characterization. Particularly on record, however, there is much to relish, drawing as the work does on the kind of elegant, song-like melodic line of which Tchaikovsky was a supreme master.

Olga Borodina makes a Lyubasha both touching and commanding, eloquent in her response to the subtle melodic inflexions of her first, virtually unaccompanied, song, proud in her confrontation with the slimy Bomelius (a clever sketch by Nikolai Gassiev), then allowing her line and her rich tone to weaken as resolve collapses. Marina Shaguch is more of a problem as her rival Marfa. Initially her tone is oddly strident, and she does herself no favours by forcing it when she is supposedly anxious or in distress rather than enraged. She comes into her own in the eerie final aria, lost in her madness.

Hvorostovsky is a superb Gryaznoy, not an easy part. He delivers it skilfully, phrasing starkly and with a kind of compacted passion. Gergiev paces the score intelligently, allowing the singers to make the most of the set numbers and relishing the colour and energy of the dramatic confrontations.

Joaquin Rodrigo Spanish 1901-1999

GROVE Rodrigo, blind from the age of three, studied with Antich in Valencia and Dukas in Paris (from 1927), also receiving encouragement from Falla. His Concierto de Aranjuez for guitar and orchestra (1939) made his name and established his style of tuneful and smoothly colourful Hispanicism: his later works include similar concertos for violin, piano, cello, harp and flute as well as songs and small instrumental pieces, several for guitar.

Various Concertos (including 'de Aranjuez')

Concierto de Aranjuez[a]. Concierto andaluz[a]. Fantasía para un gentilhombre[b]
[a]Ricardo Gallén gtr [b]EntreQuatre Quitar Quartet (Jesús Prieto, Roberto Martínez, Carlos Cuanda, Manuel Paz gtrs); Asturias Symphony Orchestra / Maximiano Valdes
Naxos 8 555841 (68 minutes: DDD) ⓢ

Concierto en modo galante[b]. Canconeta[a]. Concierto como un Divertimento[b]. Concierto de estío[a]
[a]Mikhail Ovrutsky vn [b]Asier Polo vc Castille and León Symphony Orchestra / Max Bragado-Darman
Naxos 8 555840 (78 minutes: DDD) ⓢ

Piano Concerto (Concierto heroico – ed Achúcarro)[a]. Juglares. Homenaje a la Tempranica. Música para un jardín
[a]Daniel Ligorio Ferrándiz pf Castille and León Symphony Orchestra / Max Bragado-Darman
Naxos 8 557101 (60 minutes: DDD) ⓢ
All recorded c2002

The focus of these three volumes is on concertos, the most popular and arguably the best segment of Rodrigo's orchestral music. The best known are those for guitar and orchestra, of the very numerous recordings of which these are 'good enough to keep'.

Lest anyone might think that the Concierto para piano y orquesta listed on Volume 4 is a previously overlooked work, it is in fact the Concierto heroico in modestly repackaged form. The revision by Achúcarro was made (with the composer's consent) in order to make the work 'slightly more dynamic'. This is now the definitive form and performance of this work.

The 'symphonic essay' Juglares (1923) was Rodrigo's first orchestral work, brief but characteristic of the music of Valencia, where he lived prior to going to Paris to study. It has no other current recording. All the remaining works on these three discs have alternative recordings but though one may prefer the warmer-sounding version of the Concierto de estío by Agustín León Ara, the composer's son-in-law, on the EMI set, these new recordings are in every respect comparable with the 'opposition'. This low-priced Naxos collection is an excellent way of achieving a complete Rodrigo archive.

Concierto de Aranjuez

Concierto de Aranjuez[a]. Three Piezas españolas[b]. Invocacíon y danza[c]. Fantasía para un gentilhombre[d]
Julian Bream gtr [a]Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Sir John Eliot Gardiner; [d]RCA Victor Chamber Orchestra / Leo Brouwer
RCA Victor 09026 61611-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded [abc]1982-83, [d]1987 ●●●

In the early 1980s Bream had entered a phase in which both his musical and technical powers were at their height, which he too recognised and celebrated in this remarkable album. With it he confirmed that he is Segovia's truest and best successor, though in no sense his imitator, and established a benchmark in the history of the guitar on record. Everything he touched turns to music and is here recorded with the utmost reality. If anyone is wondering why he should here have taken his third bite at Aranjuez's cherry, it was in order to 'go digital' but in the event this proved a subsidiary raison-d'être. At the time the COE was no casual band assembled for a session but a newly-formed orchestra of young players from several countries, greeting the concerto as a fresh experience and playing it with splendid precision and vitality. John Eliot Gardiner's conducting is unfailingly idiomatic. Who catalysed whom is hard to say but Bream certainly responded with the Aranjuez of his life, eloquently phrased and passionate; nothing is lost in the recording and the guitar is 'prestidigitalised' into unfailing audibility. Aranjuezs come and go but this one must remain as the touchstone for a very long time, reaffirming the thoroughbred character of a warhorse that so often sounds tired through overworking.

Leo Brouwer is a man of so many musical parts that the loss of one of them – his role as a virtuoso guitarist – has passed almost unnoticed; here he plays one of the others – that of conductor. What better than to provide the ammunition for others to fire, and to direct the campaign yourself? Fantasía para un gentilhombre has its own merits and demerits, with Bream stressing the musical rather than the virtuosic elements, adopting somewhat slower tempos than other interpreters in most of the movements – that of the final 'Canarios' is more in keeping with the character of the dance itself. Brouwer's splendid control of the orchestra reflects his experience of both sides of the concerto 'fence'. This disc is a 'must'.

Rodrigo Concierto de Aranjuez
Castelnuovo-Tedesco Guitar Concerto No 1 in D, Op 99 Villa-Lobos Guitar Concerto
Norbert Kraft gtr
Northern Chamber Orchestra / Nicholas Ward
Naxos 8 550729 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992 ●

The time has long passed when it was possible to point to any one recording of any of these concertos (the Rodrigo in particular) as 'The Best'; as with players, one can only discern a 'top bracket' within which choice depends finally on personal preference – or allegiance to one's favourite performer, or indeed with the other works on the disc. Norbert Kraft's accounts of these concertos takes its place therein. In this recording Kraft is placed forwardly enough for every detail to be heard, but not to create an impression of artificiality. The Northern Chamber Orchestra plays with freshness and is alert to every detail and the beautifully clear recording catches it faithfully. At super-budget price this disc is a bargain.

Concierto de Aranjuez[ac]. Fantasía para un gentilhombre[ac]. Cançoneta[bc]. Invocacíon y danza[a]. Tres Pequeñas piezas[a]
[a]Pepe Romero gtr [b]Augustín Léo Ara vn
[c]Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner
Philips 438 016-2PH (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●●

What we have here is simply one of the best: Pepe Romero, a close friend of Rodrigo, has the technique to do whatever he pleases, though his capacity for high speed does not tempt him to display it for its own sake. There is elegance and a certain nobility in his interpretations, though he lacks the warmth of Bream, for instance, and the 'flamenco steeliness' of his rasgueados does perhaps stand in uncomfortable contrast with the rest. The ASMF must know these scores by heart but, perhaps stimulated by the presence of a soloist who is so completely in command of his material, its immaculate support bears no trace of staleness. The Cançoneta (1923) is one of Rodrigo's earliest works, a small (just under three minutes) island of peaceful romantic dreams in a sea of guitar music, sweetly played by Ara (Rodrigo's son-in-law) and ignored in the annotation. There is no better recording of the Invocacíon y danza, and only one other (also by Romero) of the Tres Pequeñas piezas, in the last of which the steely rasgueados are entirely in character. If you are not already liberally provided with recordings of the two main items you may rightly be tempted by this outstanding recording.

Concierto de Aranjuez. Fantasía para un gentilhombre. Un tiempo fue Itálica famosa. Zarabanda lejana. Adela. Villancicos – Pastorcito Santo; Coplillas de Belén. Coplas del pastor enamorado
Manuel Barrueco gtr Philharmonia Orchestra / Plácido Domingo ten
EMI 556175-2 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translation included. Recorded 1995-97
Concierto de Aranjuez. Fantasía para un gentilhombre. Concierto para una fiesta
David Russell gtr Naples Philharmonic Orchestra (Florida) / Erich Kunzel
Telarc CD80459 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

Both of these discs are amongst the best recordings of the Concierto de Aranjuez and Fantasia para un gentilhombre. Barrueco and Russell are members of the guitar's top-drawer élite – giving performances of crystalline clarity – and they are both excellently supported by their orchestras. In both these recordings the guitar is foregrounded to the extent that it achieves greater dominance than it ever does in the concert hall. One might regard this as a distortion, but as it more faithfully represents what was/is in the composer's inner ear it should be enjoyed in its own right. Neither do these comments apply only to the guitar and orchestra works of Rodrigo. If you already have top-rated versions of either or both of these pieces you may rest content with them, but if you decide to add one of these new recordings to your collection then your choice may depend on the other items they contain. In Russell's case it is the Concierto para una fiesta. The thought 'where have I heard this before?' may cross your mind – in relation to both musical elements and the mode of orchestration. But you may find these familiar echoes lovably welcome. Barrueco adds two solos, neither one yet dulled by overfamiliarity.

The Zarabanda lejana is given with the utmost expressivity, and Un tiempo fue Itálica famosa is delivered with panache. Barrueco has one more trump card to play – his partnership with Plácido Domingo in four songs, selected from those for which Rodrigo himself has made adaptations for the guitar of the original piano accompaniments (the texts are given in four languages). Both are longstanding devotees of Rodrigo's music, and it shows. Domingo also conducts the orchestra, an exercise in which both parties demonstrate their happy meeting of minds.

Concierto madrigal

Concierto madrigal. Danza de la Amapola[a]. Evocaciones – Mañana en Trianae[a]. Gran marcha de los subsecretarios[a]. Piezas – Fandango del ventorrillo[a]. Serenata española[a]. Sonada de adiós, 'Hommage à Paul Dukas'[a]. Tonadilla ([a]arr Peter Katona, Zoltán Katona)
Peter Katona, Zoltán Katona gtrs Rotterdam Chamber Orchestra / Conrad van Alphen
Channel Classics CCS16698 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001 ●

The best of the established guitar duos have consisted of players who are/were either married or blood-related – favourable conditions for in-built empathy. Presti-Lagoya set the pace in the 1960s, one which has still to be fully matched. Now we have the Hungarian duo of the Katona twins, possessed of the technique most others can only dream of. Their needle-sharp unanimity of thought and attack is such that listening 'blind' one might wonder how one player could possibly have so many digits.

Rodrigo wrote only two works for two guitars, the Tonadilla and (with orchestra) the Concierto madrigal. Both have been recorded several times but never better than here. In the latter the recorded balance often tips slightly in favour of the orchestra, but this is a minor quibble. In order to flesh out the all-Rodrigo programme the Katonas have made admirable arrangements of six piano pieces written between 1931 and 1981, and these magnificently played versions for two guitars should keep Rodrigo aficionados happy enough.

The Katonas have yet to parallel the emotional depth and warmth of Presti-Lagoya, but they have youth on their side and, being in total command of every other necessary 'tools', they may well become world-beaters. This is a stunning disc, to which the orchestra and recording engineers have made fitting contributions.

Concierto madrigal. Concierto para una fiesta
Ricardo Gallén, Joaquín Clerch gtrs
Asturias Symphony Orchestra / Maximiano Valdés
Naxos 8 555842 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded c2002

The Concierto madrigal is, like the Fantasía para un gentilhombre, a tribute to times past though, since the first movement briefly tugs a forelock to Monteverdi, and the madrigal O felici occhi miei plays a key role, it is not an exclusively Spanish one. It is a fascinating work, with 10 movements full of diversity and maybe the one of the 'family' that deserves a place on that distant desert island. As with the Concierto para una fiesta, this is a recording that can hold its own with any of its rivals – finely played with good sound on the part of all concerned, excellently balanced and faithfully recorded.

The Concierto para una fiesta was commissioned by a wealthy Texan, as a 'coming-out-party' present for his daughters, admirers of Pepe Romero. He and the composer were reported at the time to be chuckling at the thought of listening (in Heaven) to others struggling to play it. Time passes, however, and there are now several good recordings of the work by others of whom Ricardo Gallén is now one. Technical skills have been steadily on a rising curve for decades and, whether or not the curve is asymptotic, its highest point has yet to be attained indefinitely by one single guitarist. Around every corner there may be an equally fast or even faster 'gun'. It is not the most riveting of Rodrigo's concertos for solo guitar but it is notable for its slow movement, a clear souvenir of that of the Concierto de Aranjuez, and Gallén's performance certainly does it justice.

Per la flor del lliri blau

Per la flor del lliri blau. A la busca del más allá. Palillos y Panderetas. Dos danzas españolas[a]. Tres viejos aires de danza
[a]Lucero Tena castanets
Castilla y León Symphony Orchestra / Max Bragado Darman
Naxos 8 555962 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded c2002

At the heart of this volume are two of Rodrigo's finest orchestral works – Per la flor del lliri blau (1934) and A la busca del más allá (1976). The former is a symphonic poem based on a Valencian legend in which the three sons of a dying king go in search of a blue lily whose magic powers can save their father. The outcome is successful but tragic, as clearly depicted as that of the eponym of Elgar's Falstaff.

A la busca del más allá was commissioned by the Houston Symphony for the bicentennial celebrations in the US. Their choice of composer may seem curious but it proved a wise one. Its title ('In search of what lies beyond') reflected Houston's status as the centre of space exploration. How would Rodrigo, who had until then devoted his attention to all things Spanish and was then 75, deal with such an unfamiliar demand? The answer was that he did so with great skill and imagination, leaving little or no trace of Spanishry. The curtain rises and falls with a long roll on an undamped cymbal, and the principal motif of what separates these events contains a 'questioning' tritone.

The performances of all the 'fillers' are exemplary but it is the two large works that make this recording indispensable to Rodrigo lovers.

Solo Piano Works

Complete Solo Piano Works
Sara Marianovich pf
Sony Classical ② S2K89828 Ⓕ
(155 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002 ●

Rodrigo greatly valued his piano music and was disappointed that it was so seldom performed. His daughter tells us that Sarah Marianovich played this music for him and received his imprimatur. Understandably so, as she is very sensitive to its stylistic changes. In her hands, the innocent early Suite of 1923 has just the right simplicity, and she also catches the winning charm of the Pastoral (1926), a siciliana, and two delicate Berceuses, while the Preludio al gallo mañero glitters in the manner of Debussy.

Much of Rodrigo's early music is eclectic in style, and the Cinco Piezas del Siglio XVI are arrangements for piano of pieces by Milán, Cabezón and Mudarra. But what character they have! The ambitious Sonatas de Castilla con toccata a modo de pregón (1950/51) brilliantly and hauntingly exploit the same basic material throughout, with each episode dedicated to a Spanish musician. Not surprisingly, the Tres evocaciones (remembering Turina) are the most atmospheric pieces of all, with the third, Mañana en Triana idealising Spanish dance rhythms with plenty of sparkling bravura. Rodrigo's final piano work (from 1987), the romantic Preludio de Añoranza ('Nostalgia'), is associated with Artur Rubinstein, and makes a magical postlude.

Rodrigo could hardly have a more persuasive advocate. Highly recommended.

Philippe Rogier Flemish 1561-1596

GROVE Rogier was a chorister at Philip II of Spain's chapel from 1572; he was ordained, becoming vice-maestro in 1584 and maestro de capilla in 1586. Of his large output (at least 250 works), only 16 motets (1595), five masses (1598) and a few chansons and other sacred works survive.

Missa 'Ego sum qui sum'

Rogier Missa 'Ego sum qui sum'. Laboravi in gemitu meo. Heu mihi Domine. Vias tuas. Taedet animam meam. Peccavi quid faciam tibi. Dominus regit me
Gombert Ego sum qui sum
Magnificat / Philip Cave
Linn Records CKD109 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●

Philippe Rogier's death at the age of 35 in 1596 cut short a prolific stream of music. Worse was to come. In 1734, a fire destroyed the library of the Spanish royal chapel, which must have held a large number of his compositions (at the time of his death he was chief court musician to Philip II). How large a number can be gauged from the terrible earthquake that struck Lisbon in 1755, swallowing up the royal library along with 243 works. Today we are left with only 51, of which the present recital represents a sizeable proportion.

Rogier's music has Palestrina's imposing solidity and classical feel, but is more florid, and freer in its use of dissonance. In this sense it looks forward to later Iberian music of the 17th century, achieving a sustained intensity in the motets. The Mass is a consummate demonstration, the skilful working out of a motet by Gombert, whose influence is very audible. The booklet-note rightly points out how Rogier develops his model in very different directions: the sequences that conclude most movements are persuasively managed, but sound utterly unlike Gombert. Rogier's Mass Domine Dominus noster appears in a fine recording on Ricercar. But Magnificat's interpretation is of a different order. This is singing in the English tradition, but with greater warmth and richness than one is used to from mixed choirs of this kind. Given Rogier's predilection for fully scored writing, that richness pays dividends, as does the relatively large cast of 18 singers. Interpretation and music are well matched in more ways than one. Neither are strikingly original, but both make a striking impression.

Cipriano de Rore Flemish 1515-16;1565

GROVE Rore was in Italy by the 1540s; he was associated with Willaert and others in Venice. He was established as a composer by 1547, when he was maestro di cappella at the Ferrarese court. In 1559 he moved to Brussels to serve Margaret of Parma, governor of the Netherlands, in 1561 to Parma, to enter Ottavio Farnese's service, and in 1563 to Venice, where he was briefly maestro di cappella at St Mark's. He returned to Parma in 1564. The most influential of the earlier madrigalists, he produced over 120 Italian madrigals (mainly in 10 bks, 1542-66), as well as c80 sacred motets (5 bks, 1544-63, 1595, and MSS), masses, a Passion, secular motets and chansons. His early madrigals, mainly serious in tone, show a masterly fusion of sophisticated Franco-Flemish polyphony and Italian lyricism, with controlled use of imagery, while his later ones include marked progressive elements; these were much admired by Monteverdi.

Missa Praeter rerum seriem

Missa Praeter rerum seriem. Calami sonum ferentes. Mon petit cueur. Plange quasi virgo. Dissimulare etiam sperasti. Il secondo libro de madrigali – Mia benigna fortuna; Schiet'arbuscel. Il quarto libro de madrigali – Se ben il duol
Huelgas Ensemble / Paul van Nevel
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1760 Ⓕ
(65 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded c2002

The Huelgas Ensemble have recorded a masterly recital of works by Cipriano de Rore, subtitled 'Music, Mirror of the text'. That is an apt description of much of de Rore's output, but the inspired and truly brilliant way in which he achieves his goal is what has left his mark upon future generations of composers. The major work of the collection is de Rore's seven-part 'parody-cum-cantus-firmus' Missa Praeter rerum seriem, with its flowing melody and showers of taut little imitations. Based on a motet by Josquin and dedicated to Duke Ercole d'Este, in whose service de Rore was enrolled in 1547, the composer hails his master by name in the tenor part of every movement.

The remainder of the programme includes such widely different pieces as the charming little eight-part love-song Mon petit cueur, with its full canonic imitation and wonderful final cadence, and the slow-moving five-part responsary for Holy Saturday Plange quasi virgo. Another striking piece is the four-part madrigal Calami sonum ferentes, which exploits the lowest range of the basses in slowly rising chromatic scales. But possibly the most original and forward-looking of all are the last two pieces, in which de Rore promotes his own, very personal, technique of chordal homophony. The anguished experimental Se ben il duol is a small masterpiece, and so is the fully-developed motet on a text from Virgil, Dissimulare etiam sperasti. Huelgas rises to the challenge of interpreting, with colour and genius, this amazing music describing Dido's despair.

Ned Rorem

American 1923

GROVE Rorem studied with Sowerby in Chicago (1938-39) and with Thomson (1944) and Diamond in New York, also attending the Curtis Institute (1943) and the Juilliard School. From 1949 to 1958 he was based in Paris, though spent two of those years in Morocco: his published diaries of this and later periods are flamboyantly candid. His large output includes symphonies, instrumental pieces and choral music, though he has been most productive and successful as a composer of songs.

Chamber Works

Book of Hours[a]. Bright Music[b].
End of Summer[c]
The Fibonacci Sequence ([ab]Anna Noakes fl [c]Julin Farrell cl [a]Gillian Tingay hp [bc]Kathron Sturrock pf [bc]Jonathan Carney, [b]Ursula Gough vns [b]Michael Stirling vc)
Naxos American Classics 8 559128 Ⓢ
(60 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002 ●●

In Ned Rorem's End of Summer (1985) for clarinet, violin and piano, dramatic juxtapositions seem to be the work's organising principle. Without postmodern trickery, Rorem shows us that seemingly disparate elements can coexist quite happily.

One hears a similar kind of musical détente going on in parts of Bright Music (1987) for flute, two violins, cello and piano – particularly in the opening Fandango, inspired by the image of a rat inside a rubbish bin. This is a substantial, delightful suite, centered on a brilliant scherzo movement ('Dance- Song-Dance') that enfolds one of Rorem's loveliest tunes. The slow movement (entitled 'Another Dance') is an expansive, aching song without words, and the whirlwind finale a clever and ultimately unsettling take on the last movement of Chopin's Funeral March Sonata.

Book of Hours (1975), for flute and harp, is structured on the timetable of monastic prayer, beginning with Matins and continuing through Lauds all the way to Vespers and Compline. There are few sweet melodies here, though Rorem's language is always expressive. 'Sext (Noon)' is especially touching, with the flute's shakuhachi-like glissandi sighing over the harp's exquisitely fragile song.

The performances by the Kingston University-based Fibonacci Sequence are consistently polished and persuasive. Clear recording, too, though the instruments are placed very close to the microphones. Very strongly recommended.

Sun

Sun[a]. String Quartet No 3[b]
[a]Lauren Flanigan sop [b]Mendelssohn Quartet (Nicholas Eanet, Nicholas Mann vns Ulrich Eichenauer va Marcy Rosen vc) [a]Manhattan School of Music Symphony / Glen Barton Cortese
Newport Classic NPD85657 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. ●

Like the concerto grosso, Sun was composed in 1966, and this cycle for soprano and orchestra was intended by Rorem as a companion piece to his earlier Poems of Love and the Rain. 'The indicated need now seemed for songs of hate and the sun,' he quips in the introductory note. The opening song, based on an ancient Egyptian text credited to King Ikhnaton (*c*1360 BC) gives way to more modern musings on sunrises and sleepless nights, and copious sounds of ticking clocks. Rorem seems to have been going through a Russian phase when he composed this, the sonorities and rhythms suggest Stravinsky and Prokofiev. It is a magnificent, large-scale enterprise to which those high sopranos who for years have made do with Strauss's Four Last Songs should look. Lauren Flanigan, who is fast becoming America's new prima donna, delivers it all with considerable aplomb.

Rorem's Third String Quartet completes the CD. This is a much later work (1990) in five movements and, unusually for Rorem, who often refers to the 'serial killers', it opens with a movement based on a 12-note row. From this teasingly dissonant opening develops a luxuriously tuneful second movement called 'Scherzo-Sarabande-Scherzo'.

This CD gives a portrait of one of the most consistently surprising and individual composers of our time. Rorem cannot be bracketed with any school; he's just himself, with a breadth of vision and imagination that transcends labels.

Songs

Santa Fé – No 2, Opus 101; No 4, Sonnet; No 8, The wintry mind; No 12, The sowers. Clouds. Early in the morning. The serpent. Now sleeps the crimson petal. I strolled across an open field. To a young girl. Jeanie with the light brown hair. Ode. For Poulenc. Little elegy. Alleluia. Look down, fair moon. O you whom I often and silently come. I will always love you. The tulip tree. I am rose. The Lordly Hudson. O do not love too long. Far far away. For Susan. A journey. Sometimes with one I love. Love. Orchids. Stopping by woods on a snowy evening. Do I love you more than a day? Ferry me across the water. That shadow, my likeness

Susan Graham sop Malcolm Martineau pf with Ensemble Oriol (Christiane Plath vn Sebastian Gottschick va Friedeman Ludwig vc)

Erato 8573-80222-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts included. Recorded 1999 OO

If Rorem's songs are not as well known as those of Copland or Cole Porter it's probably because they're more difficult to sing. The earliest here is from 1947 (The Lordly Hudson, on a poem by Paul Goodman), the latest from 1983 (That shadow, my likeness, one of several Walt Whitman settings). Most of the others, though, were composed in the 1950s when Rorem was living in France. One could look for obvious French influences – Rorem was a close friend of Auric and Poulenc – but strangely it is the later songs, from the cycle Santa Fé on poems by Witter Bynner, that have a more Gallic sound, the piano and string trio accompaniment having that aching, nostalgic mood which Rorem himself describes as 'a period removed from Time and, like the act of love, [it] has no limits, no beginning nor end.' The only song in French is a poem by Ronsard, an ode to peace, but two songs are about Paris. Early in the morning, a poem by Robert Hillyer, is an evocation of a young poet in love in and with Paris, its accompaniment a homage to all the sad waltzes that murmur their recollections of the city from Satie to Kosma. For Poulenc, written especially by Frank O'Hara for Rorem to set as part of an album of songs in memory of Poulenc, describes all the city in mourning.

Rorem called his autobiography Knowing when to stop, and it is a wonderful description of his own songs. The strength and beauty of Rorem's settings lies in their directness and candour. He doesn't linger, the poem and song are one, the melody growing from the accompaniment into the vocal line, but just as one seems able to grasp it, it's gone. Martineau plays with an unfailing sensitivity, giving the tiny shifts of mood from exuberance to elegiac melancholy their exact weight. In their conversation (see the booklet), Rorem says that he would like to compose a cycle for Susan Graham and another singer, perhaps a baritone, but adds, he would need a little encouragement. The triumphant success of this recital ought to be enough.

Alleluia. Are you the new person?. As Adam early in the morning. Ask me no more. Early in the morning. Far-Far-Away. Full of life now. I am Rose. I strolled across an open field. Little Elegy. Love in a Life. Lullaby of the Woman of the Mountain. Memory. My Papa's Waltz. Nantucket. Night Crow. The Nightingale. Now sleeps the crimson petal. O you to whom I often and silently come. Orchids. Root Cellar. Sally's Smile. See how they love me. The Serpent. Snake. Spring. Stopping by Woods on a Snowy Evening. Such beauty as hurts to behold. Visits to St Elizabeth's. The Waking. What if some little pain… Youth, Day, Old Age and Night

Carole Farley sop Ned Rorem pf

Naxos 8 559084 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

Seventeen of these 32 songs are not otherwise available on disc, and they include some of Ned Rorem's finest and most haunting. The utter simplicity that weaves a magic spell in Nantucket, the beautiful paralleling of Gerard Manley Hopkins's ecstatic imagery in Spring, the bare but deeply eloquent Such beauty as hurts to behold, the amiable contemplation of old age and possible immortality in Full of life now – all these are warmly welcome, and it is good to have for the first time a complete recording of Rorem's nine settings of Theodore Roethke. Carole Farley's diction is so immaculate that you will hardly need the booklet of texts, and her acute response to words must be one reason why Rorem so willingly collaborated with her on this recording. About the voice itself some might have a reservation. Although Farley fines her tone down for the most part effectively her sound is basically operatic. But rejecting this disc on that account would mean foregoing the infectious lilt of The Nightingale, the amply lyrical, movingly expressive Love in a life, the beautiful long lines of Ask me no more and all the others mentioned. No, admirers of Rorem's unique talent (there is no finer living writer of songs) will simply have to have this collection. His piano-playing is beautifully supportive.

Gioachino Rossini Italian 1792-1868

GROVE Rossini's parents were musicians, his father a horn player, his mother a singer. He learnt the horn and singing, and as a boy sang in at least one opera in Bologna, where the family lived. He studied there and began his operatic career when, at 18, he wrote a one-act comedy for Venice. Further commissions followed, from Bologna, Ferrara, Venice again and Milan, where La pietra del paragone was a success at La Scala in 1812. This was one of seven operas written in 16 months, all but one being comic.

This level of activity continued in the ensuing years. His first operas to win international acclaim come from 1813, written for different Venetian theatres: the serious Tancredi and the farcically comic L'italiana in Algeri, the one showing a fusion of lyrical expression and dramatic needs, the other moving easily between the sentimental, the patriotic, the absurd and the sheer lunatic. Two operas for Milan were less successful. In 1815 Rossini went to Naples as musical and artistic director of the Teatro San Carlo, which led to a concentration on serious opera. But he was allowed to compose for other theatres, and from this time date two of his supreme comedies, written for Rome, Il barbiere di Siviglia and La Cenerentola. The former has claims to be considered the greatest of all Italian comic operas, eternally fresh in its wit and its inventiveness. It dates from 1816; initially it was a failure, but quickly became the most loved of his comic works. The next year saw La Cenerentola, a charmingly sentimental tale in which the heroine moves from a touching folksy ditty as the scullery maid to brilliant coloratura apt to a royal maiden.

Rossini's most important operas in the period that followed were for Naples. The third act of his Otello (1816), with its strong unitary structure, marks his maturity as a musical dramatist. The Neapolitan operas, even though much dependent on solo singing of a highly florid kind, show an enormous expansion of musical means, with more and longer ensembles and the chorus an active participant; the accompanied recitative is more dramatic and the orchestra is given greater prominence. Rossini abandoned traditional overtures as well. In 1822 he married Naples' leading soprano Isabella Colbran, but it proved an ill match.

Among the masterpieces from this period are Maometto II (1820) and Semiramide (1823). In 1823 Rossini left for London and Paris where he took on the directorship of the Théâtre-Italien, composing for that theatre and the Opéra. Some of his Paris works are adaptations (Le siège de Corinthe and Moïse et Pharaon); the opéra comique Le Comte Ory is part-new, Guillaume Tell wholly. This last, widely regarded as his chef d'oeuvre, is a rich tapestry of his most inspired music, with elaborate orchestration, many ensembles, spectacular ballets and processions in the French tradition, opulent orchestral writing and a new harmonic boldness.

At 37, he retired from opera composition. He left Paris in 1837 to live in Italy, but suffered prolonged and painful illness there. Isabella died in 1845 and the next year he married Olympe Pélissier, with whom he had lived for 15 years. He composed hardly at all during this period (the Stabat mater belongs to his Paris years); but he went back to Paris in 1855, and his health, humour and urge to compose returned. He wrote a quantity of pieces for piano and voices, with wit and refinement, that he called Péchés de vieillesse ('Sins of Old Age'), including the graceful and economical Petite messe solennelle (1863). He died, universally honoured, in 1868.

Overtures etc

'Discoveries'

Robert Bruce – Overture (arr Niedermeyer). Péchés de Vieillesse, Book 3, 'Morceaux réservés' – Le chant des Titans. Grande Fanfare (Le Rendez-vous de chasse). Guillaume Tell – Final du Divertissement; Pas de deux. Ermione – Sinfonia. Moïse et Pharaon – Ouverture et Introduction[b]. La Siège de Corinthe – Ballabile-Galop. Inno alla pace, 'È foriera la Pace'[cd]. Hymne, 'De l'Italie et de la France'[ac]. Hymne à Napoléon III et à son vaillant peuple[b]

[a]Laura Giordano sop [b]Ildar Abdrazakov, [c]Michele Pertusi bars [d]Nelson Calzi fp

Giuseppe Verdi Chorus and Symphony Orchestra, Milan / Riccardo Chailly

Decca 470 298-2DH (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included

Recorded c2002 ●●

Philip Gossett calls this 'a Rossinian curio cabinet'. 'A banquet made with leftovers from the Rossini kitchen' would do as well. Whatever the analogy, the art is as much in the assembling of the materials as in the materials themselves.

The most familiar music – gleanings from Zelmira, Armida and La donna del lago – is to be found in the very first item, the overture to the Rossinian pastiche Robert Bruce, assembled for the Paris Opéra in 1846 by the composer Louis Niedermeyer.

The other orchestral items are all echt-Rossini. The splendid Le Rendez-vous de chasse for four hunting horns and orchestra dates from the time of the composition of Guillaume Tell and could almost be a pendant to it. But the pillars of the anthology are the splendid Le Chant des Titans and three of Rossini's grand but little known occasional hymns. The earliest of these is De l'Italie et de la France, written in 1825 for Charles X's coronation; the latest, written in 1867 when Rossini was 75, is the grandiose Hymne à Napoléon III à Son Vaillant Peuple. It all goes with a tremendous swing and the cannon-and-church-bells end is spectacular.

The voltage of Chailly's performances is unremittingly high, as is the attention to shading and fine detail. This is conducting Toscanini or De Sabata would have been hard-pressed to better. The recordings, in Milan's new Auditorium di Milano, are also spectacularly good, vivid yet sensitive to the smallest detail.

String Sonatas

Rossini Sonate a quattro – No 1 in G; No 2 in A; No 3 in C; No 4 in B flat; No 5 in E flat; No 6 in D
Bellini Oboe Concerto in E flat Cherubini Horn Sonata in F Donizetti String Quartet in D (1828)
Roger Lord ob Barry Tuckwell hn Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner
Double Decca ② 443 838-2DF2 (112 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1964-68 ●

Rossini's six string sonatas are usually heard performed by a string orchestra, although they were in fact composed for a quartet of two violins, cello and double bass. The sonatas, which display amazing musical dexterity and assurance, may date from as early as 1804. The world of 18th-century opera is never far away, with the first violin frequently taking the role of soprano soloist, particularly in the slow movements. Written for Rossini's friend Agostino Triosso, who was a keen double bass player, the sonata's bass parts are full of wit and suavity. There are other thoroughly recommendable modern digital versions, yet there is something very special about Marriner's Academy set, made for Argo in the late 1960s. The playing has an elegance and finesse, a sparkle and touch of humour that catches the full character and charm of these miraculous examples of the precocity of the 12-year-old composer. Among the substantial bonuses here are Donizetti's String Quartet, sounding elegant in its string-orchestra version, Bellini's Oboe Concerto, played stylishly by Roger Lord and Cherubini's mini-concerto for horn and strings is dispatched with aplomb by by Barry Tuckwell. Highly recommendable.

Le nozze di Teti, e di Peleo

Le nozze di Teti, e di Peleo[a]. Il pianto d'Armonia sulla morte di Orfeo[b]
[a]Elisabetta Scano sop [a]Cecilia Bartoli mez [a]Daniela Barcellona contr [a]Juan Diego Flórez, [a]Luigi Petroni, [b]Paul Austin Kelly tens La Scala Philharmonic Orchestra and Chorus, Milan / Riccardo Chailly
Decca 466 328-2DH (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

The wedding cantata was Rossini's first formal court commission after his arrival in Naples in the autumn of 1815. It was an astonishing year: Il barbiere in February, the cantata in April, another comic opera, La gazzetta in September, and after that Otello and La Cenerentola.

None of the music Rossini used in the cantata was new to him. But it was new to the Neapolitans and much of it will be new to present-day audiences. Decca has assembled a mixture of stellar and sub-stellar talent for their recording. Cecilia Bartoli's Ceres will be the principal selling point. She appears in a sensuous duet with the goddess Juno (Daniela Barcellona), as well as the cantata's big showpiece aria (an astonishing reworking of the Count's Act 2 aria from Il barbiere, partly redeployed as 'Non più mesta' in La Cenerentola) and in the grand finale. Her singing is formidably, ferociously fine. The other star, a Rossini tenor of real pedigree, is Juan Diego Flórez; he sings Peleo, Giovanni David's role. The Teti, Elisabetta Scano, is the only slight disappointment – rather too soubrettish.

All in all, this is a richly entertaining anthology of not-entirely-minor Rossini. The orchestra and chorus of the La Scala Philharmonic play and sing like angels and both recordings are superb.

Petite messe solennelle

Daniella Dessì sop Gloria Scalchi mez Giuseppe Sabbatini ten Michele Pertusi bass Chorus and Orchestra of the Teatro Comunale, Bologna / Riccardo Chailly
Decca ② 444 134-2DX2 (82 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1993 ●

A proper representative of the orchestrated version has been long overdue. Chailly's performance is a glorious heart-warming affair. Not that you are likely to be convinced right away. To ears accustomed to the Kyrie in its original form, the texturing here is pure suet. Nor does the sound of the largish and here rather distantly placed choir seem especially well focused in the Christe eleison. Gradually, though, the ear adjusts, the musicians warm to their task, the performance gets into its stride. The Bologna Chorus sings the Gloria and Credo with passion, clarity and love. The tenor is adequate, the bass superb, the two girls absolutely fabulous. If the Crucifixus can never be as painful as it is in the sparer original version, this is amply offset by the sheer beauty of Daniella Dessì's singing and by the hair-raising force of the 'Et resurrexit' (superbly recorded) as Chailly and his choir realise it. By the end, after Gloria Scalchi's deeply affecting account of the Agnus Dei, you begin to wonder whether the orchestral version wasn't more than a match for the original. It isn't, but it is an indication of the cumulative eloquence of this utterly inspired performance that it comes to seem so.

Stabat mater

Luba Orgonasova sop Cecilia Bartoli mez Raúl Giménez ten Roberto Scandiuzzi bass Vienna State Opera Concert Choir; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Myung-Whun Chung
DG 449 178-2GH (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1995 ●

Chung's conducting of this work is somewhat Karajanesque: extremely beautiful orchestral playing; a choir which sings expressively but who yields something in focus and clarity of sound to the best rival English choirs; a strong dramatic sense with some unusual tempos that lead to the performance occasionally seeming mannered; and much fine solo singing, the singers encouraged to sing with great inwardness, with a special kind of quiet beauty. This is where the performance differs markedly from Richard Hickox's account. There the soloists sing their solo numbers in far more open and extrovert manner. Between Della Jones (Hickox) and Cecilia Bartoli there is simply no comparison; for Jones and Hickox 'Fac ut portem' is a dramatic oration, for Bartoli and Chung it is a private meditation. You pay your money and you take your choice.

The integration of singers, orchestra and acoustic is not quite as well managed as on the Chandos recording, where we have a church acoustic as opposed to the more secular sounding Vienna Musik-verein. Nor is Chung's reading as straight-forward, as right-sounding as Hickox's. Never-theless this recording can be regarded as first among equals.

Stabat mater Ⓟ
Krassimira Stoyanova sop Petra Lang mez Bruce Fowler ten Daniel Borowski bass RIAS Chamber Choir, Berlin; Academy for Ancient Music, Berlin / Marcus Creed
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1693 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1999 ●

One of the first, and best, recordings of this splendid but interpretatively elusive work was made in Berlin in 1954 under the direction of Ferenc Fricsay. Like the present recording, it featured the RIAS (Berlin Radio) Chamber Choir, though in those days the fledgling choir was supplemented in the full choruses by the famous St Hedwig's Cathedral Choir. Now on its own, it acquits itself superbly in all movements and dimensions with its own conductor, the English-born Marcus Creed. That this recording uses period instruments might seem in so obviously 'vocal' a piece to be of no particular moment. In practice, the work's prevailingly dark orchestral colours are memorably realised by the instrumentalists of Berlin's Academy for Ancient Music.

In the grand opening movement, the four soloists are recorded uncomfortably far forward; but if you can establish an agreeable level for this movement, the rest of the performance sounds very well indeed. Choir and orchestra are themselves unfailingly well balanced. Creed's reading is full of character: immensely strong but always sensitively paced. Rossini might have raised an eyebrow at Creed's fondness for romantically protracted codas; equally, he would have applauded his sensitive moulding of the accompaniments, matched shrewdly but never indulgently to the singers' (and the music's) needs. The soloists themselves, highly talented, are excellent, more than a match for most rival teams.

Opera Arias

Cecilia Bartoli
Zelmira – Riedi al soglio. Le nozze di Teti e di Peleo – Ah, non potrian reistere. Maometto II – Ah! che invan su questo ciglio; Giusto ciel, in tal periglio. La donna del lago – Tanti affetti in tal momento. Elisabetta, Regina d'Inghilterra – Quant' è grato all'alma mia; Fellon, la penna avrai. Semiramide – Serenai vaghirai ... Bel raggio lusinghier
Cecilia Bartoli mez Chorus and Orchestra of the Teatro La Fenice, Venice / Ion Marin
Decca 436 075-2DH (59 minutes: DDD). Texts and Ⓕ
translations included. Recorded 1991 ●

This sparkling disc brings together a collection of arias composed by Rossini for one of the great prima donnas of the 19th century, who was also his wife, Isabella Colbran. It is tempting to wonder whether even she had a voice to match that of Cecilia Bartoli, one of the most luscious, most exciting voices in opera. All those dazzling chromatic runs, leaps, cadenzas and cascading coloraturas are handled with consummate ease. Throughout, Bartoli sounds as if she's enjoying the music; there is always an engaging smile in the voice, although she is properly imperious in the extracts from Elisabetta and disarmingly simple in the prayerful 'Giusto ciel, in tal periglio' ('Righteous heaven in such danger') from Maometto II. The orchestral and choral forces provide a delightful intimacy, with some cheeky woodwind solos and fruity brass passages. The recording, produced at the Teatro La Fenice by Decca veteran Christopher Raeburn, favours the voices but gives it just enough distance to accommodate high Cs and astounding A flats at the bottom of the range. The orchestral perspective is changeable but satisfactory. For Rossini and Bartoli fans, this disc is a must.

Nelly Miricioiu
Elisabetta, Regina d'Inghilterra – Qant'è grato all'alma mia[a]. Aureliano in Palmira – Se tu m'ami, o mia regina[b]. Bianca e Falliero – Cielo, il mio labbro ispira[c]. Zelmira – Riedi al soglio[d]. Mosè in Egitto – Mi manca la voce[e]; Porgi la destra amata[h]. Semiramide – Se la vita[f]. Armida – Dove son io![g]. Vallace – Viva Vallace! Vallace Viva[i]
Nelly Miricioiu with [ehi]Patrizia Biccire sops [bc]Enkelejda Shkosa mez [i]Antonia Sotgiù voc [ceg]Bruce Ford, [dehi]Barry Banks, [h]Dominic Natoli tens [cdhi]Gary Magee, [hi]Dean Robinson bars [f]Alastair Miles bass [i]Simon Bailey voc [acdhi]Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; Academy of St Martin in the Fields / David Parry
Opera Rara ORR211 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●

Rossini is a difficult composer to anthologise. I have no doubt that Callas and Walter Legge or Sutherland and Bonynge could have come up with something fascinating and fabulous had they been so minded. Caballé did, of course: the eminently collectable Rossini Rarities disc she produced for the Rossini bicentenary in 1968 (RCA, 11/92). For the rest, successful recitals have been few and far between, indifferent singing or poor planning principally to blame.

Not so Opera Rara's Rossini Gala. Patric Schmid's inventive programme focuses on Rossini's Naples period and the extraordinary array of roles he created for the great Spanish soprano, Isabella Colbran. What distinguishes this recital is that it doesn't only anthologise set-piece arias. Rossini gave Colbran some grand entrances and some even grander exits, and there are examples of both here: Queen Elizabeth's arrival and Zelmira's final florid song of thanksgiving. But we are also given two wonderful quartets, two exquisite duets, a famous coup de théâtre (the Act 2 finale of Mosè in Egitto with its terrific lightning-strike), and one of Rossini's finest pieces of music-theatre: the scene near the start of Act 2 of Semiramide where the Queen and her lover, the adulterous regicide Assur, have rows worthy of the Macbeths over events which are beginning to overshadow them.

Subscribers to the Chelsea Opera Group will remember Nelly Miricioiu's powerful portrayal of Semiramide in concert in London in 1998. Miricioiu is not a bel canto specialist; Santuzza is as much her territory as Semiramide. In neither role is the technique perfectly honed, but the effect is rarely less than compelling. Every one of the heroines presented here is vividly depicted, with a distinguished supporting cast (Enkeledja Shkosa, Bruce Ford and Alastair Miles's Assur all being outstanding) helping to etch each scene into the imagination.

The gala ends with an intriguing rarity which has nothing to do with Colbran or Miricioiu. Vallace, in case you are wondering, is a shortened, revised and relocated version of Guillaume Tell prepared for La Scala, Milan, in 1836-37. Austrian tyranny being an uncongenial subject to Milan's Austrian rulers, the libretto was recast to show English tyranny instead: Edward I's bloody crusade against the Scots, with William Wallace as a Scottish Tell. Rossini was not much involved in the adaptation, though he did agree to recast the finale scene so that the opera could end with a reprise of the overture's famous pas redoublé. It is that revised finale which we have here, a travesty of Schiller (and Rossini), but great fun.

Playing, choral work and conducting for this Rossini Gala are all of a high order of excellence. As is the engineering (the lightning strike in Mosè in Egitto is not for the faint-hearted). As always with Opera Rara, the accompanying 116-page booklet is superlatively informative. At the price of a single full-price CD, the disc is a terrific bargain, not least for the splendid hawk's-eye view the programme provides of 'serious' Rossini.

Il barbiere di Siviglia

Roberto Servile bar Figaro; Sonia Ganassi mez Rosina; Ramon Vargas ten Count Almaviva; Angelo Romero bar Bartolo; Franco de Grandis bass Don Basilio; Ingrid Kertesi sop Berta; Kázmér Sarkany bass Fiorello; Hungarian Radio Chorus; Failoni Chamber Orchestra, Budapest / Will Humburg
Naxos ③ 8 660027/9 (158 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1992

Not everyone will approve, but there are ways in which this super-budget set of Il barbiere di Siviglia puts to shame just about every other version of the opera there has yet been. Those it may not please are specialist vocal collectors for whom Il barbiere is primarily a repository of vocal test pieces. If, however, you regard Il barbiere (Rossini, ex-Beaumarchais) as a gloriously subversive music drama – vibrant, scurrilous, vital – then this recording is guaranteed to give a great deal of pleasure.

'Performance' is the key word here. Humburg is described in the Naxos booklet as 'Conductor and Recitative Director'; and for once the recitatives really are part of the larger drama. The result is a meticulously produced, often very funny, brilliantly integrated performance that you will almost certainly find yourself listening to as a stage play. With a virtually all-Italian cast, the results are a revelation. The erotic allure of the duet 'Dunque io son' is striking. Similarly, Don Basilio's Calumny aria, superbly sung by Franco de Grandis, a black-browed bass from Turin who was singing for Karajan, Muti and Abbado while still in his twenties. This takes on added character and colour from the massive sense of panic created by de Grandis and the admirable Dr Bartolo of Angelo Romero when Basilio comes in with news of Almaviva's arrival in town.

The Overture is done with evident relish, the playing of the Failoni Chamber Orchestra is nothing if not articulate. Aided by a clear, forward recording, a sine qua non with musical comedy, the cast communicates the Rossini/Sterbini text – solo arias, ensembles, recitatives – with tremendous relish. They are never hustled by Humburg, nor are they spared: the stretta of the Act 1 finale is a model of hypertension and clarity. It would have been nice to have an English version of the libretto, but you can't have everything at rock-bottom prices and Naxos provides an excellent track-by-track synopsis. This Il barbiere jumps to the top of the pile.

Il barbiere di Siviglia
Thomas Allen bar Figaro; Agnes Baltsa mez Rosina; Francisco Araiza ten Count Almaviva; Domenico Trimarchi bar Dr Bartolo; Robert Lloyd bass Don Basilio; Matthew Best bass Fiorello; Sally Burgess mez Berta; John Noble bar Official; Ambrosian Opera Chorus; Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner
Decca Compact Opera Collection ② 470 434-2DOC2 (147 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Text and translation accessible only via the internet.
Recorded 1982 ●●

This was the most stylish and engaging account of Il barbiere to have appeared on record since the famous de los Angeles/ Bruscantini set recorded by EMI with Glyndebourne forces in 1962. Here, making a rare but welcome appearance in an opera recording, is the stylish Academy of St Martin in the Fields. It is as pointed and sure-footed an account of the score as you could hope to hear, a reading which entirely belies the fact that this was Neville Marriner's operatic début on record. Quite how the producer, in duets, ensembles and recitatives, created so live a sense of theatre in so essentially unconvivial a place as Watford Town Hall, north west of London, must for ever remain a mystery; there is here a real and rare sense of the delighted interplay of character: a tribute, in the first place, to the degree to which Thomas Allen, Francisco Araiza, Domenico Trimarchi, Agnes Baltsa, Robert Lloyd and their fellows are inside their roles musically and dramatically. There is no vulgar horseplay in the recording; but equally there is nothing slavish or literal about the way in which Rossini's, and Beaumarchais's comic felicities have been realised. The text is Zedda, more or less. Robert Lloyd takes the Calumny aria in C (D is the 'authentic' key), rightly so, for his is a magnificent bass voice. It's a grand characterisation, very much in the Chaliapin style. Thomas Allen's Figaro and Francisco Araiza's Count bring out the opera's virility, its peculiarly masculine strength. Allen has a vivid sense of character and a brilliant technique. He also has a ripe sense of comedy.

Araiza is similarly compelling. Technically he is first-rate. His divisions are unusually bright and clean, the top (including some flashy cadences) true, shaped in a way which is both musically vivid and dramatically right. Equally, Araiza can be confiding, and funny. His whining music-master is a delight, right down to an unscripted attempt at a reprise of 'Pace e gioia' at the end of the scene, cut off by a petulant 'Basta!' from the excellent Bartolo, Domenico Trimarchi. Baltsa's Rosina, too, is infected by the set's general liveliness: witness the delighted gurgle of joy which escapes from her at the news of the Count's intentions. Recitatives, edited down here and there, are very alert, theatrically pointed; and Nicholas Kraemer's accompaniments on a sweet-sounding fortepiano are an added pleasure. Philips preferred a dryish, intimate acoustic; the small-theatre atmosphere this confers is very likeable, the more so as it allows Marriner the opportunity to conduct with a tautness and vigour which a boomier, more open acoustic would disallow. With excellent choral work in the all important ensembles, and with a delightful Berta from Sally Burgess, this is undoubtedly one of the very best Barbers the gramophone has given us.

Il barbiere di Siviglia
Sesto Bruscantini bar Figaro; Victoria de los Angeles sop Rosina; Luigi Alva ten Count Almaviva; Ian Wallace bass Dr Bartolo; Carlo Cava bass Don Basilio; Duncan Robertson ten Fiorello; Laura Sarti mez Berta; Glyndebourne Festival Chorus; Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Vittorio Gui
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono ② 567762-2 (141 minutes: ADD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded 1962 ●●●

Perhaps it is a shade misleading to refer to this classic EMI recording as a 'Glyndebourne' set. It has all the ingredients of a Glyndebourne production: notably the cast, the orchestra and chorus, and that doyen of Rossini conductors, Vittorio Gui. But as far as can be ascertained, there was no actual stage production of Il barbiere in 1962. Nor was the recording, for all its dryness and sharp-edged immediacy, actually made in Glyndebourne. It is a well-honed, conservatively staged stereophonic studio recording made by EMI in its Abbey Road Studio No 1 at the conclusion of the 1962 Glyndebourne season. Gui's performance is so astutely paced that whilst the music bubbles and boils every word is crystal-clear. This is a wonderfully declaimed reading of the score, but also a beautifully timed one. Gui's steady tempos also allow the music to show its underlying toughness. He also secures characterful playing from the RPO, from the wind players in particular. Where Victoria de los Angeles is so memorable is in the beauty of her singing and the originality of the reading. There has never been a Rosina who manages to be both as guileful and as charming as de los Angeles. Team her up with the incomparable Sesto Bruscantini and, in something like the nodal Act 1 duet, 'Dunque io son', you have musical and dramatic perfection. Gui's Dr Bartolo, Ian Wallace, is a fine character actor, given plenty of space by Gui, allowing his portrait of Dr Bartolo to emerge as a classic compromise between the letter and the spirit of the part.

La Cenerentola

Teresa Berganza mez Angelina; Luigi Alva ten Don Ramiro; Renato Capecchi bar Dandini; Paolo Montarsolo bar Don Magnifico; Margherita Guglielmi sop Clorinda; Laura Zannini contr Tisbe; Ugo Trama bass Alidoro; Scottish Opera Chorus; London Symphony Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG Double ② 459 448-2GTA2 (144 minutes: ADD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded 1971 ●

Rossini's Cinderella is a fairy-tale without a fairy, but no less bewitching for that. In fact the replacement of the winged godmother with the philanthropic Alidoro, a close friend and adviser of our prince, Don Ramiro, plus the lack of any glass slippers and the presence of a particularly unsympathetic father character, makes the whole story more plausible. La Cenerentola, Angelina, is more spunky than the average pantomime Cinders. She herself gives Don Ramiro one of her pair of bracelets, charging him to find the owner of the matching ornament and thus taking control of her own destiny. Along the way, Don Ramiro and his valet Dandini change places, leading to plenty of satisfyingly operatic confusion and difficult situations.

This recording, when originally transferred to CD, was spread across three discs, but it has now been comfortably fitted into two, now at mid-price as well. It gives a sparkling rendition of the score with a lovely light touch and well-judged tempos from Abbado and the LSO and virtuoso vocal requirements are fully met by the cast. The chief delight is Teresa Berganza's Angelina, creamy in tone and as warm as she is precise. The supporting cast is full of character, with Luigi Alva a princely Don Ramiro, Margherita Guglielmi and Laura Zannini an affected and fussy pair of sisters, and Renato Capecchi, gleeful and mischievous as he takes on being prince for a day. The recording sounds more than usually well for its age.

Additional recommendation

La Cenerentola

Bartoli Angelina Matteuzzi Don Ramiro Corbelli Dandini Bologna Teatro Comunale Chorus and Orchestra / Chailly

Decca ② 436 902-2DH2 (148 minutes: DDD: 11/93) Ⓕ

For Bartoli fans, a cherishable set that doesn't quite match the sparkle of the Abbado. Matteuzzi sings well and there are some nicely drawn characters. Chailly directs with spirit.

Elisabetta, regina d'Inghilterra

Jennifer Larmore mez Elisabetta; Bruce Ford ten Leicester; Majella Cullagh sop Matilde; Manuela Custer mez Enrico; Colin Lee ten Guglielmo; Antonio Siragusa ten Norfolk; Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; London Philharmonic Orchestra / Giuliano Carella

Opera Rara/Peter Moores Foundation
③ ORC22 (147 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 2001

Rossini wrote Elizabeth, Queen of England for the star-studded San Carlo Opera in Naples in 1815. The plot is a verse reduction of a half-remembered drama by an Italian advocate out of an entertaining but historically implausible English romance.

Larmore makes a formidable Elizabeth; beautifully sung, her performance has presence, character, and a real sense of ingrained authority. The lovely cantabile duet for Elizabeth and Matilde at the start of Act 2 is sung to perfection by Caballé and Masterson on Philips' rival set but there is a greater depth of emotion, a grainier, gutsier feel to Larmore's performance with Majella Cullagh's equally characterful, if not at every point inch-perfect, Matilde.

There is little to choose between Carreras's Leicester (for Philips) and Bruce Ford's – Carreras perhaps wins on points with a certain added youthful allure – but Opera Rara's Antonio Siragusa is a more compelling Norfolk than Ugo Benelli, who sings splendidly but without much menace. Siragusa is very fine. With such strong casting, it goes without saying that the great confrontations in the opera – Elizabeth and Norfolk, Leicester and Norfolk, and so on – all come vividly to life.

The Opera Rara performance has a lovely rich, dark feel to it. This is partly to do with Carella's conducting and the London Philharmonic's playing; partly to do with the fact that orchestration is clearly different in places. For first-time buyers, the Opera Rara set is the one to go for.

Guglielmo Tell

Sherrill Milnes bar Guglielmo Tell; Luciano Pavarotti ten Arnoldo; Mirella Freni sop Matilde; Della Jones mez Jemmy; Elizabeth Connell mez Edwige; Ferrucio Mazzoli bass Gessler; Nicolai Ghiaurov bass Gualtiero; John Tomlinson bass Melchthal; Cesar Antonio Suarez ten Un pescatore; Piero De Palma ten Rodolfo; Richard Van Allan bass Leutoldo; Ambrosian Opera Chorus; National Philharmonic Orchestra / Riccardo Chailly

Decca ④ 417 154-2DH4 (235 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1980 ●

If ever there was a case for armchair opera – and on CD at that – it is Rossini's Guglielmo Tell. The very limitations which have made it, so far, a non-repertory work, give space for the imagination to redress the balance: the short, Rousseau-esque scenes of life by Lake Lucerne, the distant entrances and exits of shepherds and huntsmen, the leisurely but perfectly balanced side-vignettes of fisherman, hunter, child.

Thanks to the clarity and liveliness of the recording itself and, above all, the shrewd casting, this set creates a vivid charivari of fathers, sons, lovers and patriots, all played out against some of Rossini's most delicately painted pastoral cameos. Chailly keeps up the undercurrent of tension between private love and public loyalty, as well as working hard the rustic jollity of the score. Tell himself could hardly have a better advocate than Sherrill Milnes. Arnoldo and Matilde, too, are cleverly cast. Pavarotti contains the coarse, direct impulsiveness of Arnoldo's shepherd stock with the tenderness of love, in his characteristic charcoal cantabile and the numbness of his remorse. Freni, singing opposite him as the forbidden Princess Matilde, phrases with aristocratic poise, folding into every fragment of embryonic bel canto the fragile ardour of a young girl's love. The vocal chemistry between them in their Act 2 declaration of love is a lively incarnation of their roles. A similarly interesting patterning of vocal timbres is produced by the casting of Elizabeth Connell as Edwige, Tell's wife, and of Della Jones as Jemmy, their son. Their last-act Trio with Matilde is matched by the contrasting colours of the basses of Ghiaurov, Tomlinson and Van Allan: their roles may be small, but their characters are vividly stamped on what is an excellent ensemble performance.

L'inganno felice

Annick Massis sop Isabella; Raúl Giménez ten Bertrando; Rodney Gilfry bar Batone; Pietro Spagnoli bass Tarabotto; Lorenzo Regazzo bar Ormondo; Le Concert des Tuileries / Marc Minkowski
Erato 0630-17579-2 (78 minutes: DDD). Notes, text Ⓕ
and translation included. Recorded live in 1996 ◉

This is a fine and tremendously enjoyable recording of an exquisite early Rossini one-acter. The plot resembles that of a late Shakespearian comedy. Set in a seaside mining community, it is concerned with the discovery and rehabilitation of Isabella, Duke Bertrando's wronged and, so he thinks, long-dead wife. It is a work that is comic and serious, witty and sentimental; and there, perhaps, lies the rub. Rossini, especially early Rossini, is meant to be all teeth and smiles, yet L'inganno felice is not quite like that. The very mise-en-scène is odd: 'seaside' and 'mining' being, in such a context, strangely contradictory concepts. This is a splendid performance, using a chamber ensemble of about 30 players. It is recorded with pleasing immediacy, which begins bullishly but settles to intimacy when the drama requires. The score is full of vocal pitfalls, not least for the tenor and for the baritone Batone. But Giménez and Gilfry cope more than adequately, with enough in reserve to produce moments of genuine ease and beauty. Annick Massis is a charming Isabella, good in her first aria, ravishing in her second. The final scene the work's finest sequence, is set at night amid the mining galleys and is beautifully performed.

L'italiana in Algeri

Jennifer Larmore mez Isabella; Raúl Giménez ten Lindoro; Alessandro Corbelli bar Taddeo; John del Carlo bass Mustafà; Darina Takova sop Elvira; Laura Polverelli mez Zulma; Carlos Chausson bass-bar Haly; Geneva Grand Theatre Chorus; Lausanne Chamber Orchestra / Jésus López-Cobos
Teldec ② 0630-17130-2 (147 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1997 ◉

This recording is hard to fault on any count. López-Cobos revels in all aspects of this dotty comedy, timing everything to perfection, enthusing his accomplished orchestra and cast to enjoy their collective self. First there's a magic moment as Isabella and Lindoro espy each other for the first time, and comment on the joy of reunion; then the main section gets under way to a perfectly sprung rhythm from the conductor, with all the passage's detail made manifest; finally the stretta is released with the kind of vitality that sets the feet tapping. Larmore obviously thoroughly enjoys the role and conveys that enjoyment in singing that matches warm, smiling tone to bravura execution of her fioriture. She is a mettlesome Isabella, who knows how to tease, then defy her would-be lover, Mustafà, and charm her real amour, Lindoro, her 'Per lui che adoro' sung with an immaculate line and sensuous tone, its repetition deftly embellished. Finally 'Pensa alla patria' evinces a touch of true élan. Lindoro is taken by that paragon among Rossini tenors, Raúl Giménez, who presents his credentials in 'Languir per una bella', honeyed tone succeeded by fleet runs. He is no less successful in his more heroic Cavatina in Act 2. Corbelli, another master-Rossinian, is witty as the put-upon Taddeo, his textual facility a marvel. The American bass-baritone, John del Carlo, is a characterful Mustafà, managing to suggest, as Rossini surely intended, a paradox of lovesick tyrant and ludicrous posturing without ever overstepping the mark into farce, and rolling Italian and his rotund roulades off his tongue with idiomatic assurance. The recording is up to Teldec's impeccably high standard.

L'italiana in Algeri
Marilyn Horne mez Isabella; Ernesto Palacio ten Lindoro; Domenico Trimarchi bar Taddeo; Samuel Ramey bass Mustafà; Kathleen Battle sop Elvira; Clara Foti mez Zulma; Nicola Zaccaria bass Haly; Prague Philharmonic Chorus; I Solisti Veneti / Claudio Scimone
Erato Libretto ② 2292-45404-2 (140 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1980

Written within the space of a month during the spring of 1813, and with help from another anonymous hand, Rossini's L'italiana in Algeri was an early success, and one which went on to receive many performances during the 19th century, with an increasingly corrupt text. A complete reconstruction was undertaken by Azio Corghi and published in 1981; this recording uses this edition which corresponds most closely to what was actually performed in Venice in 1813. L'italiana is one of Rossini's wittiest operas, featuring as did a number of his most successful works a bewitching central character, in this case Isabella, who makes fun of her various suitors, with the opera ending with a happy escape with her beloved, Lindoro, a typical tenorino role. This fine recording has plenty of vocal polish. Scimone's biggest asset is Marilyn Horne as Isabella: possibly the finest Rossini singer of her generation and a veteran in this role, she sings Rossini's demanding music with great virtuosity and polish. Her liquid tone and artful phrasing ensure that she is a continuous pleasure to listen to. She is strongly supported by the rest of the cast: Kathleen Battle is a beguiling Elvira, Domenico

Trimarchi a most humorous Taddeo, and Samuel Ramey a sonorous Bey of Algiers. Ernesto Palacio's Lindoro, however, has patches of white tone and is correct rather than inspiring. Scimone's conducting is guaranteed to give considerable pleasure.

Semiramide

Dame Joan Sutherland sop Semiramide; Marilyn Horne mez Arsace; Joseph Rouleau bass Assur; John Serge ten Idreno; Patricia Clark sop Azema; Spiro Malas bass Oroe; Michael Langdon bass Ghost of Nino; Leslie Fryson ten Mitrane; Ambrosian Opera Chorus; London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Bonynge

Decca ③ 425 481-2DM3 (168 minutes: ADD). Notes, Ⓜ
text and translation included. Recorded 1966 ◉◉

Wagner thought it represented all that was bad about Italian opera and Kobbe's Complete Opera Book proclaimed that it had had its day – but then added that 'were a soprano and contralto to appear in conjunction in the firmament the opera might be successfully revived'. That was exactly what happened in the 1960s, when both Sutherland and Horne were in superlative voice and, with Richard Bonynge, were prominent in the reintroduction of so many 19th-century operas which the world thought it had outgrown. This recording brought a good deal of enlightenment in its time. For one thing, here was vocal music of such 'impossible' difficulty being sung with brilliance by the two principal women and with considerable skill by the men. Then it brought to many listeners the discovery that, so far from being a mere show-piece, the opera contained ensembles of quite compelling dramatic intensity. People who had heard of the duet 'Giorno d'orroré' were surprised to find it remarkably unshowy and even expressive of the ambiguous feelings of mother and son in their extraordinary predicament. It will probably be a long time before this recording is superseded.

Il Signor Bruschino

Samuel Ramey bass Gaudenzio; Claudio Desderi bar Bruschino padre; Kathleen Battle sop Sofia; Frank Lopardo ten Florville; Michele Pertusi bass Filiberto; Jennifer Larmore mez Marianna; Octavio Arévalo ten Bruschino figlio, Commissario; English Chamber Orchestra / Ion Marin

DG 435 865-2GH (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1991

Witty and sentimental but also at times cruel, Il Signor Bruschino is the last, and arguably the best, of the one-acters Rossini wrote for the tiny Teatro San Moisè in Venice between 1810 and January 1813. These early farse can get by on tolerably good singing. What they can't do without is first-rate conducting – and on record clear, sharply defined orchestral sound. Choosing between the conducting of DG's Ion Marin and Claves's Marcello Viotti isn't all that difficult. Marin is far more vital; and what a cast there is on DG – a cast so expert and experienced they can't fail to bring the score wonderfully to life. Central to the whole enterprise is the Bruschino of Desderi, a superbly rounded portrait of a man who, despite the sweltering heat and the machinations of everyone around him, finally gives as good as he gets. Ramey's portrait of Gaudenzio is masterly, acted with relish and richly sung. Battle gives a ravishing account of Sofia's aria 'Ah!, donate il caro sposo' with its cor anglais colourings. This Bruschino is probably the one to have. One may occasionally have reservations about the conducting and the focus of the recording, but it's hard to imagine a better-cast account.

Tancredi

Ewa Podles contr Tancredi; Sumi Jo sop Amenaide; Stanford Olsen ten Argirio; Pietro Spagnoli bar Orbazzano; Anna Maria di Micco sop Isaura; Lucretia Lendi mez Roggiero; Capella Brugensis; Collegium Instrumentale Brugense / Alberto Zedda

Naxos ② 8 660037/8 (147 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Notes and Italian text included. Recorded 1994 ◉

Tancredi is a seminal work in the Rossini canon, a work which mingles a new-found reach in the musical architecture with vocal and instrumental writing of rare wonderment and beauty. The singing is splendid throughout, with a cast that is unusually starry. Podles has sung the role of Tancredi (to acclaim) at La Scala, Milan; the Amenaide, Sumi Jo, is a touch cool at first, too much the pert coloratura but this is not an impression that persists. Hers is a performance of wonderful vocal control and flowering sensibility.

Podles, a smoky-voiced Pole, likes to go her own way at times. In the event, though, she and Sumi Jo work well together, and they sound marvellous. Podles also manages, chameleon-like, to adjust to the purer, more obviously stylish Rossini manner of a singer who is very unlike herself, the American tenor Stanford Olsen. His portrait of the conscience-stricken father Argirio matches singing of grace and impetus with great fineness of dramatic sensibility. As a result, something like the scene of the signing of his daughter's death-warrant emerges here as the remarkable thing it is.

Alberto Zedda is lucky to have at his disposal another of those wonderfully stylish chamber orchestras and chamber choirs that Naxos seem able to conjure at will. The aqueously lovely preface to Tancredi's first entrance is a fairly representative example of the players' ear for Rossini's delicately-limned tone-painting. And the recording itself is beautifully scaled.

As usual with Naxos, you get a multilingual synopsis plus an original-language libretto without translation. All in all, then, this is a fine set.

Il turco in Italia

Awards 1998

Michele Pertusi bass Selim; Cecilia Bartoli mez Fiorilla; Alessandro Corbelli bar Don Geronio; Ramón Vargas ten Don Narciso; Laura Polverelli mez Zaida; Francesco Piccoli ten Albazar; Roberto de Candia bar Prosdocimo; Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Riccardo Chailly
Decca ② 458 924-2DHO2 (142 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1997 ●●●

Add a star mezzo of Cecilia Bartoli's stature to a conductor of Riccardo Chailly's sympathies and Il turco in Italia was asking to be recorded. Chailly, of course, has recorded the work before – for CBS back in 1981 – but in the years since, he has matured as a Rossini conductor and the Scala orchestra has this music under its collective fingers; indeed there is an energy and vitality to this playing that is wholly infectious. For Chailly's earlier recording, Montserrat Caballé was a very underpowered Fiorilla; Bartoli is full of fire and mettle (her 'Sqallido veste bruna' is sensational). Michele Pertusi is a fine Selim and his performance seems to breathe stage experience – it is a characterization that is as vocally fine as it is theatrically adept. Alessandro Corbelli, reinforcing his credentials as a Rossini singer of flair and panache, is a strongly characterised Geronio. This is a recording that smacks of the theatre, and unlike so many so-called comic operas, has lost nothing in its transfer to disc. Under Chailly's baton it fizzes and crackles like few other sets – recitatives are dispatched with the assurance of native Italian speakers and with a genuine feeling for the meaning of the text. Decca's recording is beautifully judged and the set makes a fine modern alternative to the now classic (but cut) 1954 recording under Gavazzeni with Maria Callas.

Nino Rota

Italian 1911-1979

GROVE Rota studied at the Milan Conservatory, privately with Pizzetti (1925-6), with Casella in Rome, and at the Curtis Institute (1931-2). In 1939 he joined the staff at the Bari Conservatory (director from 1950). He wrote fluently in a cool, direct style: his output includes operas (notably The Italian Straw Hat, 1955), three symphonies, concertos and instrumental pieces, besides numerous film scores (many for Fellini, Visconti and Zeffirelli).

Piano Concertos

Piano Concertos – E minor; C
Massimo Palumbo pf
I Virtuosi Italiani / Marco Boni
Chandos CHAN9681 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

Both of these works are unashamedly Romantic and nostalgic in style. The E minor Piano Concerto was composed in 1960 – at the same time as Rota's music for Fellini's film La dolce vita. As if in answer to the latter's extreme cynicism, the concerto seems to be a questioning exploration of the remaining possibilities in a modern, Romantic form. The opening Allegro-tranquillo movement begins with a dreamlike theme on the piano which is then taken up by the orchestra and developed as a sort of conversation – the orchestra insisting on a heroic, almost martial sound, while the piano and woodwind reiterate the original soft mood. The first movement is over 16 minutes: away from the rule of the film-editor's stop-watch Rota felt free to indulge himself. The same four-note figure that runs through the opening is taken up in the second movement, a quiet, slow section with a haunting intensity. The finale continues the awake-in-a-dream contrasts. Rota composed four piano concertos, but the date of that in C major seems to be in doubt. It is earlier than 1960, and is a sparer, jauntier work, more redolent in mood of the 1920s. It, too, presents a dialogue between the quest-like piano part and the orchestra asserting a darker mood. Both concertos are played by Massimo Palumbo with brilliant technique; the recorded sound is excellent.

Symphonies

No 1 in G; No 2 in F, 'Tarantina – Anni di pellegrinaggio'
Norrköping Symphony Orchestra / Ole Kristian Ruud Ⓕ
BIS CD970 (63 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998

It is fascinating to encounter these early works by Nino Rota, written when he was in his twenties, after a period of study in the USA. Rota's early career was as a church musician, something to which he returned late in life, after decades composing for the screen and the theatre. The influences in the First Symphony (1935-39) include Sibelius and Stravinsky but perhaps more significantly Copland and Hindemith. It is clearly a youthful work, a bit long-winded, but showing Rota's already firm grasp of complicated and sophisticated orchestration. The last, fourth, movement especially seems to have a maturity that points towards future greatness.

The Second Symphony, which he began while still at work on the First, in 1937, is even more Coplandesque. What would this have sounded like to an audience in the 1930s (it wasn't performed until 1970)? In one way it would have seemed conservative in the extreme, showing no tendency towards atonality or any influence of jazz. The score carries a subtitle, 'Tarantina – Anni di pellegrinaggio', referring to the period Rota spent in the extreme south of Italy, teaching in Taranto. It could be dismissed as 'light music' and the style wouldn't have offended the most sensitive ears, yet each movement is full of beautiful instrumental detail and constructed in a pleasing way. Rota had yet to find his unmistakable voice, one infused with irony and humour, which would make him the perfect match for Federico Fellini. Devotees of his film music may find these symphonies bland, but anyone who enjoys the contemporary style of Alwyn or Coates in England will find these works worthwhile. The orchestra plays both symphonies with a good sense of period manner, never overdoing the lush sound. Recommended for the adventurous.

Film Music

The Godfather. Il gattopardo. Prova d'orchestra.
La dolce vita. Otto e mezzo. Rocco e i suoi fratelli
La Scala Philharmonic Orchestra / Riccardo Muti
Sony Classical SK63359 Ⓕ
(71 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1979 ●

The influences on Nino Rota's music for The Godfather aren't hard to identify – Stravinsky, Ravel, Puccini. It's an ironic commentary on the sordid story to back it with surging neo-Romantic symphonic music. The score made a huge contribution to the film's success – so much so that after his death the studio returned to his music for Godfather III. Its mixture of Neapolitan folk-song spattered with jazzy honky-tonk makes for a pleasant opening to this second CD of Rota's music by Muti and the Scala Philharmonic.

Rota's career was inextricably bound up with those of the two most influential Italian film-makers of the 1950s and 1960s – Fellini and Visconti. Fellini's two big successes of the early 1960s, La dolce vita and Otto e mezzo are represented by brief extracts – the open-air circus-parade finale of the latter score still has a mysterious, exuberant feel. The last collaboration with Fellini was the comedy about a rehearsal – Prova d'orchestra. Time is not being kind to a lot of Fellini's work which now seems self-indulgent, but conversely Visconti's films have a massive grandeur that is overwhelming. Muti's first volume of Rota had the ballroom sequence; here there is a brief suite of themes from the film. Rocco e i suoi fratelli caused a scandal in Italy in 1960 with its depiction of organised crime and corruption and it led to Visconti's rift with La Scala because of government interference. He would surely have smiled to think, nearly 40 years later, of the orchestra playing Rota's score for the film.

Albert Roussel

French 1869-1937

GROVE After embarking on a naval career, in 1894 Roussel began studies with Gigout, moving on to train with d'Indy and others at the Schola Cantorum (1898-1908) where in 1902 he began teaching. In 1909 he made a tour of India and Indo-China, and he drew on that experience in writing his Hindu opera-ballet Padmâvatî; (1923), though other works, like the vocal-orchestral Evocations (1911) and ballet Le festin de l'araignée (1913), had already shown his ability to leaven d'Indyism with exotic material and Ravellian brilliance.

In the Symphony No 2 (1921), he moved on to an almost polytonal density, but in the 1920s his music (like Ravel's) became more spare and astringent, though still with a rhythmic vigour and motivic intensity that can be seen as a highly personal extension of Schola thinking. His later, neo-classical works, marked by wide-ranging regular themes and motoric rhythms, include the Symphonies Nos 3 and 4, the orchestral Suite in F, the Piano Concerto, the String Quartet and two ballets, Bacchus et Ariane and Aenéas.

Bacchus et Ariane

Bacchus et Ariane, Op 43.
Le festin de l'araignée, Op 17
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9494 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●●

As compared to his contemporary Dukas, Roussel has been somewhat sidelined as a 'connoisseur's composer'. That presumably means that he did not write fat, lush tunes that could be exploited in television commercials, but produced works of vigorous ideas and more subtle quality. Record companies used to fight shy of his music – the Third and Fourth Symphonies have indeed maintained a foothold, but with the ballet Bacchus et Ariane, which is closely linked with the Third, we have mostly been given only its second half. Here are alert, rhythmically vital performances of Roussel's two most famous ballets, which even at the most exuberantly excited moments (like the 'Bacchanale' in Bacchus) preserve a truly Gallic lucidity, and which Tortelier marks by a captivating lightness of touch; and when it comes to quiet passages one could not ask for greater tenderness than in the beautiful end of Act 1 of Bacchus, when Bacchus puts Ariadne to sleep.

Le festin de l'araignée, written 18 years earlier, is in a quite different style. Where Bacchus's trenchant idiom at times makes one think of Stravinsky's Apollon Musagète, Le festin (which had the misfortune to be overshadowed by the Rite of Spring, produced only eight weeks later) is atmospheric and more impressionistic (in the same vein as Roussel's First Symphony). It is a score full of delicate invention, whose one weakness is that for its full appreciation a knowledge of its detailed programme is needed – and that is provided here in the booklet.

The BBC Philharmonic play it beautifully. If this is 'connoisseur's music', then be happy to be called a connoisseur: you will find it delectable.

Symphony No 3

Roussel Symphony No 3 in G minor, Op 42
Franck Symphony in D minor
French National Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG Masters 445 512-2GMA (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1981

This 1981 Roussel Third is recognizably via Bernstein, and is more kaleidoscopic and meaningful than you are likely to have heard it, unless you possess his first New York account. The Rite of Spring-cum-Age of Steel stamping rhythms of the first movement are now a little slower, the effect possibly a little relaxed until you arrive at the central climax (astonishing 'whooping' horns and crashing metal) and the coda (now superbly emphatic with ringing trumpets and lots more crashing metal). The slow movement's songful yearning is, as it was before, slow, sublime and intensely searching in the manner of its counterpart in Mahler's Sixth, though the contrasting più mosso is not now fast enough and has its limp moments. That said, the general control is superior, particularly at and around the movement's now awesome final climax. Bernstein's New Yorkers were uninhibitedly rowdy and brash in the finale; the finale's moments of brashness are now offset by rather more sophistication.

The recording, which has a less than ideally focused bass drum, is both spacious and present, with an appropriate touch of astringency on top. Bernstein's Franck is atmospheric, big on rhetoric, extreme in its range of tempo and dynamics and typically intense. On the grand return in the finale of the slow movement's theme, Bernstein broadens massively. Vulgar? Perhaps, depending on your viewpoint. His control is again superb, with the orchestra's winds mellifluous in tone.

Miklós Rózsa

Hungarian/American 1907-1995

Raised in Budapest and on his father's rural estate, Rósza was exposed to Hungarian folk music from an early age. He studied piano with his mother (who was at the Budapest Academy with Bartók) and violin and viola with his uncle, a musician with the Royal Hungrian Opera. By the age of seven he was composing. In 1926 he was a student at the Leipzig Conservatory; by 1929 his chamber works were being performed and promoted throughout Europe. In 1931 moved to Paris where he finished his Theme, Variations and Finale, a work that soon gained international recognition. He was introduced to the film music genre through Honegger and from 1935-39 composed for London Films under Hungarian-born producer Alexander Korda. In 1940 he travelled with Korda to Hollywood to complete the score of The Thief of Baghdad and was soon in great demand as a freelance film composer and conductor. As a staff member at MGM (1948-62), he became one of the most highly regarded composers in the industry, writing music for over 100 films. The essence of his musical style springs from his early experiences with Hungarian peasant music. His works are also infused with the sentimental lyricism of the gypsy tradition.

Violin / Cello Concerto

Violin Concerto, Op 24[a]. Cello Concerto, Op 32[b]. Tema con variazioni, Op 29a[c]
[ac]Robert McDuffie vn [bc]Lynn Harrell vc Atlanta Symphony Orchestra / Yoel Levi
Telarc CD80518 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Rózsa completed his dashingly eloquent Cello Concerto in 1968 for János Starker. Not only is Telarc's engineering incomparably more vivid and realistic than that of its predecessors, the actual performance is the most irreproachably stylish and urgently impassioned of the bunch. Lynn Harrell brings all his commanding presence, customary swagger and cast-iron technique to Rózsa's strikingly idiomatic solo writing. Add a polished and enthusiastic response from the Atlanta Symphony under Yoel Levi's eagle-eyed direction, and the results are exhilarating. Written in 1953-54 for Jascha Heifetz, the irresistibly colourful and sublimely lyrical Violin Concerto remains perhaps the most popular of all Rózsa's 'serious' compositions. While Heifetz's inimitable 1956 recording (see under Korngold) enshrines one of the most treasurable specimens of his jaw-dropping virtuosity, this newcomer possesses many sterling strengths of its own. McDuffie makes a dauntingly accurate, sweet-toned soloist, producing the most radiant sonorities in the ravishing, Kodály-esque slow movement, while Levi and his Atlanta band once again prove model partners.

Last but not least, McDuffie joins forces with Harrell for the engaging Tema con variazioni which originally began life as the centrepiece of the Op 29 Sinfonia concertante penned for Heifetz and cellist Piatigorsky. Again, the performance is utterly sympathetic and stands up perfectly well to that legendary Heifetz/Piatigorsky collaboration.

Edmund Rubbra

British 1901-1986

GROVE Rubbra, a pupil of Scott and of Holst and Morris at the Royal College of Music (1921-25), worked as a pianist, teacher and critic before his appointment as lecturer at Oxford (1947-68). His music took some while to develop independence from Ireland, Bax and Holst, but his First Symphony (1937) begins to show a characteristic style of rhapsodic growth tautened by thematic working and almost incessant polyphonic activity. His later works include 10 more symphonies, of which No 9 is an oratorio-like work

(Sinfonia sacra, 1972), besides concertos for viola, piano and violin, four string quartets (1933-77), masses and motets (he became a Roman Catholic in 1948).

Symphonies Nos 3 and 7

Symphony No 3, Op 49. Symphony No 7 in C, Op 88
BBC National Orchestra of Wales / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9634 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ ◉◉
Recorded 1997. All 11 symphonies also available as boxed set, Chandos CHAN9944 (5 CDs for price of 4)

For some years the Third Symphony was a repertory piece, at least on BBC programmes, but it fell completely out of favour in the late 1950s. Commentators have noticed a certain Sibelian cut to its opening idea (with woodwind in thirds) but everything else strikes you as being completely personal. There is a whiff of Elgarian fantasy in the fourth variation of the finale. It has been called the most genial and relaxed of Rubbra's symphonies but there is a pastoral feel to many of the ideas, bucolic even, in the same way that there is about the Brahms Second Symphony. Brahms springs to mind in the masterly variations and fugue of the finale, for not long before, Rubbra had orchestrated the Brahms Handel Variations.

Hickox and his players give a very persuasive and totally convincing account of the symphony. Anyone coming to the Seventh for the first time, particularly in this performance, will surely not fail to sense the elevated – indeed exalted – quality of its musical thought. Its opening paragraphs are among the most beautiful Rubbra ever penned and it is evident throughout that this is music that speaks of deep and serious things. This performance speaks with great directness and power. The horn playing in the opening is eloquent and the orchestral playing through-out is of a uniformly high standard. To sum up, these are magnificent and impressive accounts and the recording is truthful and splendidly balanced.

Symphonies Nos 4, 10 and 11

Symphony No 4, Op 53. Symphony No 10, 'Sinfonia da camera', Op 145. Symphony No 11, Op 153
BBC National Orchestra of Wales / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9401 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993-94 ◉

Rubbra's music lacks the kind of surface allure that captivates the ear at first acquaintance, but he does have a sense of organic continuity that is both highly developed and immediately evident to the listener. Wilfrid Mellers put it in a nutshell when he said of the symphonies, there is 'nothing abstruse about their tonality and harmony', but they are difficult because 'the continuity of their melodic and polyphonic growth is logical and unremitting. The orchestration shows scarcely any concern for the possibilities of colour, nothing on which the senses can linger and the nerves relax. Second subjects are hardly ever contrasting ideas but rather evolutions from or transfigurations of the old.' The opening of the Fourth Symphony is one of the most beautiful things in the English music of our time. These pages are free from any artifice, and their serenity remains with the listener for a long time. The Fourth (1940-42) was a wartime work, though no one would ever guess so. The 10th and 11th Symphonies are from 1974 and 1979 respectively. Both are concentrated one-movement affairs that unfold with seeming inevitability and naturalness. To sum up, this is music made to last. Richard Hickox has the measure of its breadth and serenity, and secures total commitment from his excellent players. The Chandos recording is in the best traditions of the house.

Additional recommendations

Symphonies Nos 3 and 4
Couplings. A Tribute for Ralph Vaughan Williams on his 70th Birthday. Resurgam Overture
Philharmonia Orchestra / Del Mar
Lyrita SRCD202 (73 minutes: DDD: 11/90) Ⓕ
Dedicated performances of these superb symphonies under Norman Del Mar. The coupling, Resurgam, a late work of great beauty, is particularly welcome.

Symphonies Nos 2 and 7
Coupling: Festival Overture
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Boult; New Philharmonia Orchestra / Handley
Lyrita SRCD235 (78 minutes: ADD: 12/92) Ⓕ
Fine performances, excellently transferred.

Symphonies Nos 5 and 8

Symphony No 5 in B flat, Op 63. Symphony No 8, 'Hommage à Teilhard de Chardin', Op 132. Ode to the Queen, Op 83[a]
[a]Susan Bickley mez BBC National Orchestra of Wales / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9714 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1998

In the early 1950s Rubbra's Fifth Symphony was a repertory piece and broadcast frequently. Ten years later it had all but disappeared from programmes, and although a second recording was made by the late Hans-Hubert Schönzeler, this is its first digital recording, and the finest account of the Fifth ever. Part of the success of Hickox's series is his instinctive feeling for the tempo at which this music best comes to life and his scrupulous adherence to dynamic markings. Find the right tempo and everything falls into place; observe every dynamic nuance and the textures achieve the right degree of transparency. Of course the quality of the recording also plays an important part: there is great detail, presence and warmth.

The Eighth Symphony (1966-68), subtitled Hommage à Teilhard de Chardin, was composed in a very different climate, for by the late 1960s Rubbra's music was out of fashion. The new symphony had to wait three years for its first performance in Liverpool. Teilhard de Chardin was a French Jesuit priest, a philosopher and palaeontologist, whose thought had a great influence on Rubbra. The music's mystical feel and luminous texture are at times reminiscent of Holst. The Eighth speaks of deep and serious things and in this performance proves a powerful musical experience.

The Ode to the Queen, is something of a discovery. Commissioned by the BBC to celebrate the Coronation of the Queen, it is Rubbra's only song-cycle with full orchestra. The songs are inspired and beautifully sung here. A triumphant conclusion, then, to Richard Hickox's Rubbra cycle.

Additional recommendation

Symphony No 5

Couplings: Farnaby Improvisations. Britten Violin Concerto. Heming Threnody for a Soldier killed in Action

Olof vn Hallé Orchestra / Barbirolli

EMI British Composers 566053-2 Ⓕ

(71 minutes: ADD: 5/97)

A fascinating and rewarding release. Barbirolli's pioneering 1950 recording of Rubbra's Fifth is a delight from start to finish, and his Heming Threnody is hauntingly beautiful.

Symphony No 9

Symphony No 9, 'Sinfonia sacra', Op 140.
The Morning Watch, Op 55
Lynne Dawson sop Della Jones mez Stephen Roberts bar BBC National Chorus and Orchestra of Wales / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9441 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1993 ●

The Ninth (1973) is Rubbra's most visionary utterance and its stature has so far gone unrecognised (this is its only recording). Its subtitle, Sinfonia sacra, gives a good idea of its character. It tells the story of the Resurrection very much as do the Bach Passions. There are three soloists: the contralto narrates from the New Testament while the soprano takes the part of Mary Magdalen and the baritone that of Jesus. Other parts – those of disciples and angels – are taken by the chorus which also functions outside the action, in four settings of meditative Latin texts from the Roman liturgy or in Lutheran chorales to which Rubbra has put verses by Bernard de Nevers. The symphonic dimension is reinforced by the opening motive, which pretty well dominates the work. Its argument unfolds with a seeming inevitability and naturalness that is the hallmark of a great symphony.

Its depth and beauty call to mind only the most exalted of comparisons and it should be heard as often as Gerontius or the War Requiem. This is music of an inspired breadth and serenity and everyone connected with this magnificent performance conveys a sense of profound conviction. The Morning Watch is one of Rubbra's most eloquent choral pieces. It dates from 1946, and so comes roughly half-way between the Fourth and Fifth Symphonies. A setting of the 17th-century metaphysical poet, Henry Vaughan, it too is music of substance and its long and moving orchestral introduction is of the highest order of inspiration.

Sinfonia concertante

Sinfonia concertante, Op 38[a]. A Tribute, Op 56[d]. The Morning Watch, Op 55[b].
Ode to the Queen, Op 83[c]
[c]Susan Bickley mez [a]Howard Shelley pf
BBC National [b]Chorus and Orchestra of Wales / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9966 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996-99

A mouth-watering reissue comprising four outstandingly eloquent performances. The stand-out item here has to be Howard Shelley's imperious traversal of the big-boned Sinfonia concertante for piano and orchestra. Certainly, the opening 'Fantasia' exhibits an exhilarating thematic resource and craggy, almost Bartókian resilience. It's the finale, however, which contains the work's most rewarding, deeply-felt inspiration: this is a prelude and fugue of grave nobility, economy and poise, whose elegiac countenance reflects Rubbra's sense of loss at the death of his teacher and good friend, Gustav Holst. Next comes an affectionate account of A Tribute (Rubbra's 70th-birthday tribute to Vaughan Williams), followed by The Morning Watch, a noble choral setting of Henry Vaughan's mystic poem which possesses a power and radiance that cannot fail to impress. Last, but not least, there's Ode to the Queen (1953); employing texts by three Tudor poets (Crashaw, D'Avenant and Campion), it's a charming, 13-minute creation, the two extrovert outer songs framing a Poco adagio e tranquillo setting of chaste beauty. Mezzo Susan Bickley is ideally cast, and Hickox tenders bright-eyed support. Superb sound throughout, enormously ripe and wide-ranging.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 2, Op 73[a]; No 4, Op 150[b]. Lyric Movement, Op 24[c]. Meditations on a Byzantine Hymn, 'O Quando in Cruce', Op 117[ad]
[c]Michael Dussek pf [abc]Dante Quartet
(Krysia Osostowicz vn/[d]va Declan Daly vn Judith Busbridge [d]va Alastair Blayden vc)
Dutton Laboratories Epoch CDLX7114 Ⓜ
(59 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2001 ●

Completed in 1951, the Second Quartet is a marvellously inventive piece, beautifully scored for the medium, unfailingly purposeful and full of beguilingly subtle rhythmic and harmonic resource. Bearing a dedication to Robert Simpson, the two-movement Fourth Quartet of 1975-77 was one of Rubbra's last major works. Probing and intensely poignant, it's another hugely eloquent, seamlessly evolving affair which repays repeated hearings.

The Dante Quartet prove outstandingly sympathetic protagonists of Rubbra's noble inspiration, their playing urgently expressive and tonally ingratiating. Pianist Michael Dussek joins proceedings for a stylish and delectably unforced account of the Lyric Movement of 1929, an expertly wrought essay for piano quintet which itself grew out of an earlier, discarded string quartet. Tony Faulkner's Maltings sound is excellent on the whole, if just a fraction too closely balanced. No matter, a wonderful disc.

String Quartets – No 1 in F minor, Op 35; No 3, Op 112. Cello Sonata, Op 60^{a}. Improvisation for Unaccompanied Cello, Op 124.
^{a}Michael Dussek pf Dante Quartet (Krysia Osostowicz, Matthew Truscott vns Judith Busbridge va ^{a}Pierre Doumenge vc)
Dutton Epoch CDLX7123 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 2002 ●●

Rubbra originally conceived the first of his four string quartets in 1933. Thirteen years later, he overhauled his thoughts and added a new finale. Dedicated to Vaughan Williams and beautifully laid out for the medium, it is an invigorating and purposeful work, boasting a particularly memorable slow movement. The Third Quartet of 1963 is even finer; its seamlessly evolving structure demonstrates Rubbra's sebtle ear for harmony and counterpoint. The three movements play without a break, and once again the Adagio centrepiece plumbs great depths.

It's good that the Dante Quartet have lost no time in completing their Rubbra cycle for Dutton. The previous coupling of Quartets Nos 2 and 4 (reviewed above) was shortlisted for a Gramophone Award, and if anything this newcomer attains an even greater level of accomplishment and perception. These are eloquent readings which strike a perfect equilibrium between communication and rigour.

Bouquets, too, for the Dante's young French cellist, Pierre Doumenge, who teams up with pianist Michael Dussek for a cogent and impassioned account of the 1946 Cello Sonata (more convincing than either comparative rival). Doumenge also shines in the unaccompanied Improvisation from 1964.

The production values are exemplary. All told, this is a most rewarding release.

Piano Trios

Piano Trios – No 1 'in one movement', Op 68^{a}; No 2, Op 138^{f}. Meditazioni sopra 'Coeurs désolés', Op 67^{b}. Phantasy, Op 16^{c}. Sonata for Oboe and Piano in C, Op 100^{d}. The Buddah – Suite (arr Cruft)^{e}. Duo, Op 156^{g}
Endymion Ensemble (^{e}Helen Keen fl ^{bdeg}Melinda Maxwell ob ^{acef}Krysia Osostowicz, ^{c}Catherine Manson vns ^{e}Catherine Manson va ^{aef}Jane Salmon vc ^{abcdfg}Michael Dussek pf)
Dutton Laboratories Epoch CDLX7106 Ⓜ
(77 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2000 ●

How wise to kick off with the Piano Trio No 1 of 1950 – a magnificent beast, brimful of doughty integrity and always evincing a breathtaking contrapuntal scope. It is cast in a single movement, comprising an initial Andante moderato of glorious, long-breathed eloquence, a perky Episodio scherzando and a concluding theme and three variations ('Meditazioni').

Like all of Rubbra's finest music, the score unfolds with an intuitive purpose and questing spirituality as awesome as it is rewarding, an observation that extends to its scarcely less imposing two-movement successor of 20 years later. The mood here is darker, more rarefied, the opening Tempo moderato e deliberato distilling a lofty austerity that not even the jaunty, syncopated rhythms of the Allegro scherzando second movement can quite dispel.

The remaining five items span virtually the whole of Rubbra's career. Even in the early Phantasy for two violins and piano (1927) Rubbra's burgeoning mastery of the flowing line and capacity for organic thought are already very much in evidence, the music's rapt, at times distinctly pastoral lyricism engagingly reminiscent of the young Herbert Howells's chamber offerings. It's a lovely work, as is the Suite for flute, oboe and string trio that Adrian Cruft prepared from Rubbra's incidental music to Clifford Bax's 1947 radio play, The Buddha. Of the two works for oboe, the appealing Sonata of 1958 impresses by dint of its quiet cogency, while the 1949 Meditazioni sopra 'Coeurs désolés' inhabits much the same gently ruminative landscape found in the last section of the Piano Trio No 1. That just leaves the deeply felt Duo for cor anglais and piano (Rubbra's very last chamber work, completed six years before his death in 1986). Performances throughout are poised and dedicated; truthful sound and balance, too.

Further listening

Leighton Fantasy on an American Hymn Tune. Alleluia Pascha Nostrum. Variations. Piano Sonata
Hilton cl R Wallfisch vc P Wallfisch pf
Chandos CHAN9132 (70 minutes: DDD: 5/93) Ⓕ

Committed performances of some of Leighton's imaginative chamber music.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas^{a} – No 1, Op 11; No 2, Op 31; No 3, Op 133. Four Pieces, Op 29^{a}. Variations on a Phrygian Theme, Op 105
Krysia Osostowicz vn ^{a}Michael Dussek pf
Dutton Laboratories Epoch Series CDLX7101 Ⓜ
(59 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ●

Rubbra's First Violin Sonata is a notable achievement all round: its first two movements exhibit a bittersweet lyricism that will strike a chord with anyone who has ever responded to, say, John Ireland's glorious Second Violin Sonata or the chamber music of Howells. By contrast, the 'Fugal Rondo' finale intriguingly pursues an altogether more sturdy, determinedly neo-Classical mode of expression. Written six years later in 1931, the Second Sonata already reveals a wider emotional scope, as well as a striking use of progressive tonality that at least one contemporary critic found 'disturbing and unnecessary'. Championed by the great Albert Sammons, it will come as a substantial discovery to many: comprising an eventful, ever-evolving first movement, a strong, but never sentimental 'Lament' centrepiece, and a quasi-Bartókian finale, its wild exuberance seems to look forward across the decades to the last movement of this same figure's Violin Concerto of 1959.

Framing that are the Four Pieces for beginners and the unaccompanied Variations on a Phrygian Theme – a work of compact resourcefulness. But even finer is the Third Sonata. It's a simply wondrous piece, its sense of purpose, rapt intuition and profound serenity irresistibly calling to mind Rubbra's Eighth Symphony, and it fully deserves the exalted advocacy it receives here. Indeed, Osostowicz and Dussek form an outstandingly sympathetic partnership.

Solo Piano Works

Prelude and Fugue on a Theme of Cyril Scott, Op 69. Sonatina, Op 19. Introduction, Aria and Fugue, Op 104. Preludes, Op 131. Nemo Fugue. Studies, Op 139. Invention on the Name of Haydn, Op 160. Fantasy Fugue, Op 161. Teaching Pieces, Op 74[a]
Traditional (arr Rubbra) Fukagawa
Michael Dussek, [a]Rachel Dussek pfs
Dutton Laboratories Epoch CDLX7112 Ⓕ
(62 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2001

Rubbra was an excellent pianist, and his output for the instrument spans pretty much his entire career. It's the earliest work here – the Sonatina from 1928-29 – that proves by far the most technically demanding. Whereas the raptly lyrical first two movements have something of the outdoor tang of Vaughan Williams and Howells, the finale seems to stand apart, its timeless, intuitive spirit and bracing contrapuntal mastery the hallmarks of Rubbra's mature voice.

Other stand-out items include the noble Introduction, Aria and Fugue, the pithy Four Studies of 1970-71 and, of course, the Eight Preludes (Rubbra's most substantial piano offering, completed in 1966). The latter comprise a hugely rewarding sequence, the organic wholeness of Rubbra's luminous inspiration often calling to mind his masterly Eighth Symphony.

Suffice it to say, Michael Dussek acquits himself extremely well throughout, and he has been sympathetically recorded.

Vocal Works

Missa Cantuariensis, Op 59[ab]. Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A flat, Op 65[ab]. Missa in honorem Sancti Dominici, Op 66[a]. Prelude and Fugue on a Theme of Cyril Scott, Op 69 (arr Rose)[b]. Tenebrae, Op 72[a]. Meditation, Op 79[b]
[a]St John's College Choir, Cambridge / Christopher Robinson [b]org 🏵
Naxos 8 555255 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000 ●●

With this valuable new Rubbra anthology Christopher Robinson and his St John's College Choir reinforces the favourable impression left by previous instalments in their English Choral Music series for Naxos. They prove especially eloquent, humane advocates of the eight-part Missa Cantuariensis. We've long needed a top-notch digital recording of this, the first of Rubbra's five Mass settings. Fortunately Robinson and company rise to the challenge admirably, not least in the exuberant concluding Gloria with its lung-burstingly high tessitura. We also get a thoroughly idiomatic rendering of the taut and imposing Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A flat that Rubbra wrote two years later.

In the glorious Missa in honorem Sancti Dominici from 1949 (inspired by Rubbra's own conversion to Roman Catholicism the previous year, on the feast day of St Dominic) our Cambridge group doesn't quite match the sumptuous blend, miraculous unanimity or spine-tingling fervour displayed by James O'Donnell's Westminster Cathedral Choir (to quote the composer: '...this is not austere music...red blood runs through its veins!'). On the other hand, these newcomers sound wholly captivated by the nine motets that make up the remarkable Op 72 Tenebrae. Boasting an infinitely subtle harmonic and contrapuntal resource, these timeless, wonderfully compassionate settings of the responsories used during Matins on Maundy Thursday show Rubbra very much at the height of his powers, encompassing an extraordinarily wide dramatic and expressive range. Robinson also gives us two instrumental bonuses in the rapt Meditation for organ, Op 79, and Bernard Rose's transcription of the more substantial Prelude and Fugue on a Theme of Cyril Scott (originally written for piano in 1950 to celebrate Scott's 70th birthday). Throw in Naxos's praiseworthy production, and you have a bargain of the first order.

Rubbra A Hymn to the Virgin, Op 13[ab]. Rosa mundi, Op 2[ab]. Fukagawa[b]. Pezzo ostinato, Op 102[b]. Songs, Op 4 – The Mystery[a]; Jesukin[ab]. Orpheus with his Lute, Op 8[ab]. Transformations, Op 141[b]. The Jade Mountain, Op 116[ab]. Improvisation, Op 124[c]. Discourse, Op 127[bc] L Berkeley Nocturne[b]
Howells Prelude[b]
[a]Tracey Chadwell sop [b]Danielle Perrett hp
[c]Tim Gill vc
ASV CDDCA1036 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1995

All but 10 minutes of this CD is devoted to Rubbra and several works here are first recordings, including the impressive Transformations for harp, Op 141, and the early miniatures that open the disc, the Hymn to the Virgin and Rosa mundi. Both reflect the world of Holst and Scott. Many of the pieces also reflect the strong attraction Rubbra felt for the Orient, from the early Fukagawa arrangement (1929), to The Jade Mountain (1962), as well as the inspiring harp pieces: the Pezzo ostinato and the Transformations, the most extended (and perhaps the most exalted) piece on the disc. Both derive inspiration from the Indian raga. Perrett plays with finesse and sensitivity and her free, imaginative handling of the Pezzo ostinato is admirable. She brings authority to the Improvisation, Op 124 (1964). Chadwell proves an intelligent interpreter of the songs, although she appears more backwardly balanced and there is just a shade too much echo round her voice. Generally speaking, though, the recording is first-rate. The overall character of this music is meditative and readers should select a few pieces at a time.

A must for Rubbra aficionados.

Poul Ruders

Danish 1949

Ruders studied piano and organ at the Odense Conservatory and graduated from the Royal Danish Conservatory in 1975. He worked initially as a church organist and freelance keyboard player. Although he had some lessons from Nørholm and orchestration from Kar Rasmussen, he describes himself as an essentially self-taught composer.

Ruders is widely recognised as the leading Danish composer of his generation. The large proportion of his works are for orchestra or large chamber ensemble; some of his scores use electronic keyboards and samplers. Ruders has developed a flexible musical language, organised only by his own 'homespun' systems; freely atonal but able to incorporate tonal references. His command of idiomatic instrumental and vocal writing, his strong sense of drama and his readiness to explore extremes of experience enable him to communicate directly and powerfully with audiences.

Violin Concerto No 1

Violin Concerto No 1[a]. Etude and Ricercare[b]. The Bells[c]. The Christmas Gospel[d]
[c]Lucy Shelton sop [ab]Rolf Schulte vn [c]Speculum Musicae / David Starobin gtr [a]Riverside Symphony Orchestra / George Rothman; [d]Malmö Symphony Orchestra / Ola Rudner
Bridge BCD9057 (62 minutes: DDD) Texts included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1994-95 ●

Ruders's First Violin Concerto (from 1981) begins as routine minimalist auto-hypnosis. But it develops some wonderfully inventive ways of disrupting and reassembling itself. Admittedly the last movement, with its chaconne based on Vivaldi and Schubert, tiptoes on the border of sensationalism. Otherwise the work could join Schnittke's Fourth as one of the few contemporary violin concertos with a strong claim to standard-repertoire status. Schulte gives an intense account of the solo part; the Riverside orchestra is tight in discipline, the recording close. All these factors help to make the overall musical impression extremely vivid. Less persuasive is Ruders's vocal writing in The Bells (the same Edgar Allen Poe texts as set by Rachmaninov), and there is something not quite convincing about the instrumental setting too – perhaps too uniform an intensity, too much frantic heterophony. The Christmas Gospel, tossed off in two weeks for a mixed animation and live-action film, is darkly impressive – necessarily simple and direct, but still rewarding, even when divorced from the visual images.

Corpus cum figuris

Four Dances in One Movement. Dramaphonia. Corpus cum figuris
Erik Kaltoft pf Aarhus Sinfonietta / Søren Kinch Hansen
BIS CD720 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995-96

The name Corpus cum figuris ('body with figurations') comes from Thomas Mann's novel about a fictional German composer, Dr Faustus. There's no programmatic significance, says Poul Ruders; it was the title itself that set his imagination working. At times the piece does sound like a grotesque, terrifying break-dance, full of jagged, joint-dismembering syncopations. But something of Mann's apocalyptic conception seems to have got into Ruders's music too – the smell of sulphur, the sense of prevailing desolation. It comes over well in this moody but very precise performance. So too does Dramaphonia, a one-movement piano concerto with an 'orchestra' of 11 instruments. This is more sombre still than Corpus cum figuris, the pace prevailingly slow and brooding. But Ruders knows how to hold the attention, even when very little seems to be happening. Four Dances in One Movement makes an excellent contrast. The darkness of the other two works isn't entirely absent from Four Dances, but the sweetly parodistic waltz tune of the second dance is delicious. Perhaps the performance could be a little more satirically stylish.

The Handmaid's Tale

Marianne Rørholm mez Offred; Hanne Fischer mez Double; Poul Elming ten Luke; Ulla Kudsk Jensen mez Offred's Mother; Anne Margrethe Dahl sop Aunt Lydia; Dijna Mai-Mai sop Moira; Lise-Lotte Nielsen sop Janine; Annita Wadsholt contr Moira's Aunt; Susanne Resmark contr Serena Joy;

Kari Hamnøy contr Rita; Aage Haugland bass Commander; Gert Henning-Jensen ten Nick; Elsebeth Lund sop Ofglen; Pia Hansen mez New Ofglen; Bengl-Ola Morgny ten Doctor; Elisabeth Halling mez Warren's Wife; John Laursen ten Commander X; Uffe Henriksen bass First Eye and Guard; Morten Kramp bass Second Eye and Guard
Royal Danish Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Michael Schønwandt
Da Capo ② 8 224165/6 (144 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live in 2000 ●●

Poul Ruders says of his vividly imaginative opera that he composed it 'as though I were directing a film'. Precisely: it is divided into 44 scenes, some very short, several incorporating flashbacks in which present and past sometimes appear simultaneously. The opera's 'present' is the not too distant future, a hideous fundamentalist autocracy in which women have no rights, not even to read and write, and those of them convicted of 'gender-treachery' (adultery, second marriage, contraception, abortion) are compelled to become 'Handmaids', ritually impregnated by the husbands of childess women. The central character, Offred (Of Fred – the name of the man whose property she now is), is portrayed by two singers: her present, brainwashed and imperfectly remembering self, and Offred as she was in 'Time Before', happily married (though as her husband's second wife a 'gender traitor' to the new order) with a five-year-old daughter. The opera, based on Margaret Atwood's novel, depicts the brutal totalitarianism of 'Time Now', Offred's relationship with the Commander (Fred) and his alarming wife, her longing for her dimly remembered husband and child and her enlistment in a sort of resistance group. But it is in the very nature of the plot that we never learn her ultimate fate.

It is also in the plot's nature that it needs a great variety of types of music, as we move from past to present, from the grim rituals of Time Now to Offred's memories of Time Before. Ambiguous music, too, since in this shadowy, threatening world things are often not what they seem. Ruder's great achievement is to provide that variety and ambiguity from within the resources of his own style; in particular, he balances on the tightrope from tonality to atonality with great skill. The rituals of the Handmaids are accompanied by simple, chorale-like chants with 'minimalist' accompaniment. The most striking passage to emerge from the score is a duet for the two Offreds in which both voices seem to be yearning for a tonal resolution – probably in D – but can no more achieve it than two people 20 years apart in time can meet.

Ruders has been best known hitherto for his prodigiously resourceful orchestral writing, and he surpasses himself here: electronic keyboards, samplers and additional percussion are added to the large orchestra, but many of the strangest, most nightmarish or most radiant sounds are produced by normal instruments used with brilliant originality. Some of the more monstrous inhabitants of this nightmare world are portrayed in vocal lines that go to extremes, but far more often the writing for voices is idiomatically singable. The cast, among whom there is not one single weak link, sing their hearts out, and Schønwandt conveys the kaleidoscopic colours of Ruder's score with a remarkable degree of clarity; the recording is first-class.

John Rutter

British 1945

One of the most popular and widely performed composers of his generation, Rutter studied at Clare College, Cambridge then taught at Southampton University, returning to Clare College as director of music in 1975. He left in 1979 to devote himself to composition and founded the Cambridge Singers with whom he has made many recordings of both his own and others' music. His works are predominately vocal; his musical style draws upon the British choral tradition – Holst, Vaughan Williams, Howells, Britten and Tippett – but also late 19th- early 20th-century European music, especially Fauré and Duruflé.

Requiem

Requiem[a]. Hymn to the Creator of Light. God be in my head. A Gaelic Blessing. Psalmfest – No 5, Cantate Domino. Open thou mine eyes[b]. A Prayer of St Patrick. A Choral Fanfare. Birthday Madrigals – No 2, Draw on, sweet night; No 4, My true love hath my heart. The Lord bless you and keep you
[a]Rosa Mannion, [b]Libby Crabtree sops Polyphony; Bournemouth Sinfonietta / Stephen Layton
Hyperion CDA66947 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●

Here is music finely crafted, written with love for the art and an especial care for choral sound. It is melodious without being commonplace, harmonically rich without being sticky, modern in the graceful way of a child who grows up responsive to newness but not wanting to kick his elders in the teeth. He gives us the heart's desire. But he's on too familiar terms with our heart's desires, he doesn't extend them, or surprise us into realising that they were deeper and subtler than we thought. This is by way of cautiously savouring a remembered taste, which could readily be indulged without perceived need for an interval: one item leads to another and before we know it the pleasurable hour is over.

The Requiem is the longest work; the other pieces vary from two to just over six minutes. Most are unaccompanied and show the choir of 25 voices as another of those expert groups of assured and gifted professionals that are among the principal adornments of modern musical life. Their capacity as a virtuoso choir is tested in the Cantate Domino and Choral Fanfare, but Rutter writes for real singers (not just singer-musicians) and their tone is unfailingly beautiful. The two soloists are excellent.

Additional recommendation

Requiem[a]

Couplings: Advent anthem, 'Arise, shine'. Go forth into the world in peace. Toccata in seven. Variations on an Easter theme for organ duet[c]. A Clare Benediction. Musica Dei donum[b]. Come down, O Love divine.

[a]Thomas sop [b]Jones fl [a]Hooker ob
Nicholas Rimmer, [c]Collon org [a]Dorey vc
Clare College Choir, Cambridge; Members of the City of London Sinfonia / Brown Ⓢ
Naxos 8 557130 (69 minutes: DDD) ●●
Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002

A fine selection of Rutter's work, recorded with the choir of Rutter's own Cambridge college. Clare are fresh and natural, thoroughly musical in feeling and professional in care; they also have the advantage in the recorded sound, which brings them further forward. The version of the Requiem is the scoring for solo instruments and organ, rather than the full orchestral score heard on Hyperion (reviewed above).

Gloria

Gloria[abc]. Come down, O Love divine.
Lord, make me an instrument of thy peace[b].
To everything there is a season. I my Best-beloved's am. Praise the Lord, O my Soul[ac]. I will lift up mine eyes[b]. As the bridegroom to his chosen[b]. A Clare Benediction. The Lord is my light and my salvation. Go forth into the world in peace. Thy perfect love[b]. Te Deum[ac]

Polyphony, [a]The Wallace Collection; [b]City of London Sinfonia / Stephen Layton with [c]Andrew Lumsden org
Hyperion CDA67259 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 2000

This superb disc contains a balanced cross-section of Rutter's sacred choral music, spanning over a quarter century and featuring several first recordings. Rutter's stylistic hallmarks are all here: an unfailing knack to get to the root of the text, exquisitely balanced vocal writing, melting harmonies, intensely sweet turns of phrase, short ecstatic climaxes, but also a willingness to be astringent, and rhythmically powerful. There are nods to pageantry, for example in the conclusion of the Gloria with its Waltonian swagger, some decliously echt Sullivan at the end of the Te Deum and, in I my Best-beloved's am, an occasional vision of the neo-Byzantine soundworld of his fellow Highgate School pupil, John Tavener.

The artistry of the 25 full-bodied voices of Polyphony is beyond reproach, only suffering a deficit in sheer volume when pitted against the full fury of The Wallace Collection. Sumptuously recorded, all the forces involved play to perfection. Greatly enjoyable.

Five Traditional Songs

Rutter Five Traditional Songs
Vaughan Williams Five English Folksongs
Traditional (arr Rutter) I know where I'm going. Down by the sally gardens. The bold grenadier. The keel row. The cuckoo. She's like the swallow. Willow song. The willow tree. The miller of Dee. O can ye sew cushions? Afton water. The sprig of thyme. She moved through the fair (arr Runswick). The lark in the clear air (arr Carter)
Cambridge Singers; City of London Sinfonia / John Rutter
Collegium COLCD120 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1992 ●

Pleasure in singing is almost the raison d'être of this disc. Rutter not only provides us with a healthy dollop of nostalgia, but gives these songs a whole new lease of life in some characteristically scrumptuous arrangements. For some, though, there is always the danger that the superficial charms of Rutter's arrangements can smother the fundamental beauty of the original melody. But then one would argue that he is not attempting to follow in the footsteps of the great folksong arrangers (he pays tribute to this tradition by including Vaughan Williams's Five English Folksongs). His arrangements belong more to the light music tradition; what Messrs Binge, Coates and Tomlinson achieved with orchestral colours Rutter finds primarily through vocal ones – and it's significant that the very finest arrangements here (including a ravishing 'Golden Slumbers') are unaccompanied. The singers are outstanding.

Kaija Saariaho

Finnish b1952

GROVE After studying with Paavo Hainінen at the Sibelius Academy, Helsinki, she worked for Brian Ferneyhough and Klaus Huber at the Musikhochschule in Freiburg (1981-2) and attended a computer music course at IRCAM in Paris in 1982. She is interested in enlarging the potential of traditional instruments and uses electronic instruments and computers to that end. For Lichtbogen (1985-6), for nine instruments and live electronics, a computer was used in the pre-compositional stage. She also makes use of extra-musical stimuli, such as texts or natural phenomena: Nymphéa (Jardin secret III) (1987), for string quartet and live electronics, employs models from nature for abstract musical composition.

Flute Concerto

Flute Concerto, 'Aile du Songe'[d]. Laconisme de l'aile. Oiseaux[c] – French Version[a]; English Version[b]
Camilla Hoitenga fl/[b]spkr [a]Amin Maalouf spkr
[c]Kaija Saariaho elec [d]Finnish Radio Symphony Orchestra / Jukka-Pekka Saraste
Montaigne MO782154 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded c2002 ●

Saariaho's Flute Concerto is beautiful and characteristically imaginative, an extended study of the flight and the movement of birds but also a very striking re-thinking of the idea of 'concerto'. At the beginning the flute almost designs the orchestra, generating not only melodic ideas but timbres; in a later section (a brilliant virtuoso dance-scherzo) the soloist 'teaches' the orchestra the melodic and other ideas that this vividly coloured movement uses. Other instruments take flight and become kindred birds, the space between a hovering bird and its shadow on the motionless earth beneath is finely suggested, but this is no mere imitative piece. It is at the same time a meditation on the symbolism of birds suggested by the poems of Saint-John Perse, to whose imaginative world the solo flute piece Laconisme de l'aile, written at the very beginning of Saariaho's mature career, is also indebted. Indeed in that piece the sounds of the flute, including multiphonics and other techniques, are generated by Perse's words, intoned by the flautist at the outset.

The Montaigne disc is turned into an hommage to Perse by the inclusion of six of his poems. Each poem is equipped with a 'sonic environment' composed by Saariaho using fragments of birdsong and flute phrases manipulated by computer. This material fills rather more than half the disc, but it's the Concerto – one of Saariaho's major achievements – that makes this disc. It is splendidly played and both cleanly and spaciously recorded.

Château de l'âme

Graal Théâtre[a]. Château de l'âme[b]. Amers[c]
[b]Dawn Upshaw sop [a]Gidon Kremer vn [c]Anssi Karttunen vc [c]Avanti Chamber Orchestra; [a]BBC Symphony Orchestra; [b]Finnish Radio Chamber Choir and Symphony Orchestra / [abc]Esa-Pekka Salonen
Sony Classical SK60817 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001 ◉

An important recording, splendidly performed. Despite Sony's lack of song texts for the song-cycle Château de l'âme this is a piece that demands to be heard; that these are spells, to awaken love, to protect and to heal, is sufficiently evident, even without the words. They are exquisitely sung, finely played and quite haunting. The cycle makes a fine introduction to Saariaho's music.

Graal Théâtre is a two-movement, 28-minute violin concerto demanding rhetorical gestures and extraordinary feats of virtuosity from the soloist, responding to them with richly inventive orchestral landscapes. Quite apart from Saariaho's formidable ear it is obvious that she played the violin once, and is still in love with its flamboyant nature. Amers (Sea-marks) is a rather shorter two-movement cello concerto, a bit harder to grasp at first hearing because it is more concerned with colour and texture than with sustained line, but Graal Théâtre will lead you into its world, and it is no less formidably played. All three pieces are vividly recorded.

Camille Saint-Saëns

French 1835-1921

Saint-Saëns was a child prodigy and his GROVE dazzling gifts early won him the admiration of Gounod, Rossini, Berlioz and especially Liszt, who hailed him as the world's greatest organist. He was organist at the Madeleine, 1857-75, and a teacher at the Ecole Niedermeyer, 1861-65, where Fauré was among his devoted pupils. He also pursued a range of other activities, organising concerts of Liszt's symphonic poems (then a novelty), reviving interest in older music, writing on musical, scientific and historical topics, travelling often and widely and composing prolifically; on behalf of new French music he co-founded the Société Nationale de Musique (1871). A virtuoso pianist, he excelled in Mozart and was praised for the purity and grace of his playing. Similarly French characteristics of his conservative musical style – neat proportions, clarity, polished expression, elegant line – reside in his best compositions, the classically orientated sonatas (especially the first each for violin and cello), symphonies (No 3, the Organ) and concertos (No 4 for piano, No 3 for violin. He also wrote 'exotic', descriptive or dramatic works, including four symphonic poems, in a style influenced by Liszt, using thematic transformation, and 13 operas, of which only Samson et Dalila (1877), with its sound structures, clear declamation and strongly appealing scenes, has held the stage. Le carnaval des animaux (1886) is a witty frolic; he forbade performances in his lifetime, Le cygne apart. From the mid-1890s he adopted a more austere style, emphasising the classical aspect of his aesthetic which, perhaps more than the music itself, influenced Fauré and Ravel.

Cello Concertos

No 1 in A minor, Op 33; No 2 in D minor, Op 119

Cello Concerto No 2 in D minor, Op 119[c]. La muse et le poète, Op 132[ac]. Romance in E flat, Op 67[c] (orch cpsr). Cello Sonata No 2 in F, Op 123[b]
Steven Isserlis vc [a]Joshua Bell vn [b]Pascal Devoyon pf [c]North German Radio Symphony Orchestra / Christoph Eschenbach
RCA Red Seal 09026 63518-2 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

Steven Isserlis here follows up his earlier outstanding release of Saint-Saëns' cello music with another that's even more revelatory. This disc concentrates on the more neglected cello works that Saint-Saëns wrote towards the end of his long career. It is true that neither Concerto nor Sonata quite matches its predecessor in memorable melody, but Isserlis, in powerful, imaginative performances, brings out other qualities to show how unjust their neglect is.

That is particularly true of the Sonata, which, vividly supported by Pascal Devoyon, rivals Brahms's magnificent Second Cello Sonata in heroic power and scale.

At 33 minutes, this is easily the longest of Saint-Saëns' cello works, its ambitious tone of voice instantly established (as it is in the Brahms) and then masterfully sustained throughout the first movement. The second-movement scherzo, almost as long and far more than just an interlude, is a sharply original set of variations, leading to a songful slow movement which in turn leads up to a passionate climax. Then in the surgingly energetic finale, both Isserlis and Devoyon articulate the rapid passagework with thrilling clarity.

The cello writing in the Second Concerto is rather less grateful with its thorny passages of double-stopping, but the two-movement structure characteristic of Saint-Saëns works well, with each divided clearly in two, Allegro into Andante, Scherzo into cadenza and reprise of Allegro. Making light of technical problems, Isserlis is persuasive both in the bravura Allegros and in the hushed meditation of the slow section. Yet neither he, nor Eschenbach, can quite overcome the truncated feeling at the end, when the reprise of the opening material is so short.

The Romance is an adaptation of the slow fourth movement of the Cello Suite, Op 16, a charming piece which Saint-Saëns reworked several times. Yet best of all is the lyrical dialogue of La muse et le poète. Inspired by Alfred de Musset's poem, La nuit de mai, it opens with Saint-Saëns at his most luscious, reflecting de Musset's role as a hothouse romantic among French poets. It then moves seamlessly through contrasted episodes, with the violin (superbly played by Joshua Bell) representing the muse and the cello as the poet himself. A generous collection, warmly recorded.

Cello Concerto No 1. Le carnaval des animaux – The swan[a]. Romance in F, Op 36[b]. Romance in D, Op 51[b]. Cello Sonata No 1 in C minor, Op 32[b]. Chant saphique in D, Op 91[b]. Gavotte in G minor, Op posth[b]. Allegro appassionato in B minor, Op 43[b]. Prière, Op 158

Steven Isserlis vc [a]Dudley Moore, [b]Pascal Devoyon pfs [c]Francis Grier org London Symphony Orchestra / Michael Tilson Thomas

RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 61678-2 Ⓕ

(67 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1992

'Concerto!' was a Channel Four TV series that showed participating soloists in rehearsal, in conversation with Dudley Moore and Michael Tilson Thomas and, ultimately, in performance, which resulted in several recordings, of which this is one. This disc is recommendable not so much for Steven Isserlis's Cello Concerto – smooth and intelligent as that is – as for the fill-ups. The swan has Moore and Tilson Thomas as joint accompanists, elegantly executed, but the items with Pascal Devoyon are especially valuable, the First Cello Sonata full of elegantly tailored drama, the two Romances, Chant saphique and Gavotte palpable charmers, tastefully played; and the headstrong, thematically memorable Allegro appassionato, one of the finest shorter pieces in the cellist's repertory. The disc is enhanced by the opportunity of hearing the rather affecting but relatively unfamiliar Prière, composed for André Hekking just two years before Saint-Saëns's death.

Additional recommendation

Cello Concertos Nos 1 and 2

Couplings: Suite, Op 16 (arr vc/orch). Allegro appassionato in B minor, Op 43. Le carnaval des animaux – The swan

Kliegel vc Bournemouth Sinfonietta / Monnard

Naxos 8 553039 (62 minutes: DDD: 11/97) Ⓢ

> Maria Kliegel performs the Second Cello Concerto with impressive panache and precision. The First, too, is well played, though not a first choice for the work.

Violin Concertos

No 1 in A, Op 20; No 2 in C, Op 58;
No 3 in B minor, Op 61

Philippe Graffin vn BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Martyn Brabbins

Hyperion CDA67074 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1998 ●

The first two violin concertos of Saint-Saëns were composed in reverse order. The Second is the longer and lesser-known of the two, but the First Concerto more resembles the thematic charm and concise design of the First Cello Concerto. Cast in a single short movement that falls into three distinct sections, it launches the soloist on his way right from the start (six emphatic chords) and features a delightful central section with some felicitous woodwind writing. Hyperion holds a trump card in Philippe Graffin, whose elegant, emotionally charged playing is strongly reminiscent of the young Menuhin (he has a similar sort of sound) and whose understanding of the idiom is second to none – certainly among modern players.

Saint-Saëns's First Violin Concerto was composed in 1859, whereas his Second preceded it by a year. Unexpectedly, the first movement's thematic material has an almost Weberian slant. The orchestration is heavier than in the First, and the musical arguments are both more formal and more forcefully stated. It is a more overtly virtuoso work than the First Concerto, and perhaps rather less memorable, but again Graffin weaves a winsome solo line and Martyn Brabbins directs a strong account of the orchestral score, with prominently projected woodwinds. The relatively well-known Third Concerto (1880) is roughly the same length as the Second (around half-an-hour), but is more consistently interesting. The basic material is of higher quality, the key relations more telling and orchestration infinitely more delicate. No other recording liberates so much of the score's instrumental detail, probably because most of Graffin's predecessors have been balanced way in front of the orchestra.

Piano Concertos

No 1 in D, Op 17; No 2 in G minor, Op 22;
No 3 in E flat Op 29; No 4 in C minor, Op 44;
No 5 in F, Op 103, 'Egyptian'

Awards 2002
Piano Concertos Nos 1-5
Wedding Cake, Op 76. Rapsodie d'Auvergne, Op 73. Africa, Op 89
Allegro appassionato, Op 70
Stephen Hough pf City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sakari Oramo Ⓕ
Hyperion ② CDA67331/2
(155 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2000 ●●●

If Saint-Saëns's idiom once answered – and maybe still does – to qualities fundamental to the French musical character, it must straight away be said that Hough sounds the complete insider. He commands the range of the big statements, whatever their character, as well as sparkle and panache, a sense of drama and seemingly inexhaustible stamina; and he can charm. Yet perhaps most delightful is the lightness and clarity of his decorative playing: even when subservient to the orchestra one notices that every note of his roulades and filigree comes up glistening. And it is a bonus not to have the virtuoso passages sounding hectic or overblown – for Saint-Saëns, virtuosity always had an expressive potential. There is an air of manufacture about the writing sometimes, certainly, but as Hough knows, there must be nothing mechanical in the delivery of it. All of it tells. Sweeping across the keyboard, dipping and soaring through the teaming notes, he flies like a bird.

He manages to convey what makes these pieces tick: fine workmanship, fantasy, colour, and the various ways Saint-Saëns was so good at combining piano and orchestra. The orchestra has plenty to do. Gounod remarked that his younger colleague 'played with and made light of the orchestra as of the pianoforte', and these scores are textbooks of lean but firm orchestration from which at least one major French composer learned (Ravel, another eclectic, who must have seen the 'old bear' as a kindred spirit). The days are past when the CBSO under Louis Frémaux was considered Britain's 'French' orchestra, but with Sakari Oramo it does splendidly here, playing alertly with its inspiring soloist as he does with it (another plus). The recording balances are fine, with lovely piano sound and plenty of orchestral detail in natural-sounding perspectives. All in all, a spiffing set in which pleasurable discoveries and rediscoveries await.

Saint-Saëns Piano Concerto No 2 Ⓗ
Rachmaninov Piano Concerto No 3 in D minor, Op 30
Shostakovich Prelude and Fugue in D, Op 87 No 5
Emil Gilels pf Paris Conservatoire Orchestra / André Cluytens
Testament mono SBT1029 (65 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1954-56 ●●

Gilels was a true king of pianists and these Paris- and New York-based recordings only confirm his legendary status. Here, again, is that superlative musicianship, that magisterial technique and, above all, that unforgettable sonority. What breadth and distinction he brings to the first movement of the Saint-Saëns, from his fulmination in the central octave uproar to his uncanny stillness in the final pages. High jinks are reserved for the second and third movements, the former tossed off with a teasing lightness, the latter's whirling measures with infinite brio. An approximate swipe at the Scherzo's flashing double-note flourish, a false entry and a wrong turning five minutes into the finale offer amusing evidence of Gilels's high-wire act. No performance of this concerto is more 'live', and it's small wonder that Claudio Arrau included it among his desert island favourites.

Gilels's Rachmaninov is altogether more temperate yet, once more, this is among the few truly great performances of this work. His tempo is cool and rapid, and maintained with scintillating ease through even the most formidable intricacy. The cadenza – the finer and more transparent of the two – billows and recedes in superbly musical style and the climax is of awe-inspiring grandeur and the central scherzando in the finale is as luminous as it is vivacious. The finale's meno mosso variation is excluded and, it has to be said, Cluytens's partnership is distant and run of the mill. But the recordings hardly show their age in such admirably smooth transfers. Gilels's 'encore', Shostakovich's Prelude and Fugue No 5 is like a brilliant shaft of light after the Rachmaninov. The performance is perfection, entirely justifying Artur Rubinstein's comment after hearing him play in Russia: 'If that boy comes to the West, I shall have to shut up shop'.

Saint-Saëns Piano Concerto No 4 in C minor, Op 44[c]. Etude en forme de valse, Op 52 No 6[d] Ⓗ
Franck Symphonic Variations[a] ✿
Ravel Piano Concertoin D[b]
Alfred Cortot pf [a]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Landon Ronald; [b]orchestra, [c]Paris Conservatoire Orchestra / [bc]Charles Munch Ⓢ
Naxos Historical 8 110613 (60 minutes: ADD) ●●

Here are performances of a timeless vitality and validity. The exception is the Ravel Concerto, which is wildly approximate and confused. Elsewhere, though, there is a super-abundance of wit and charm – of Cortot at his most beguiling. Cortot's capacity to be free and ecstatic yet bracingly unsentimental was one of his most exhilarating qualities, and his rubato at the start of the Saint-Saëns makes modern rivals such as Rogé (Decca) and Collard (EMI) pale in comparison. At 8'12" (dolce tranquillo legato) you will hear a classic instance of the cantabile for which Cortot was celebrated, and in the final pages of the same movement an inimitably limpid and delicate poetry. Again, in the central Allegro vivace, Cortot's famous or infamous scrambles and skirmishes are never at the expense of the music's innate elegance and style, and who else has spun off the Concerto's closing cascades with such glitter and aplomb? Cortot's playing may not have been note-perfect but there is no doubt that he was every inch the virtuoso. As an encore, there is Saint-Saëns' Etude en forme de valse, and while the 1931 recording is by no means the equal of the legendary 1919 disc, a performance that prompted Horowitz's envy, it is gloriously alive with Cortot's verve and magic. Mark Obert-Thorn's transfers are exceptional and all lovers of past but ever-present greatness will want this second and final Naxos volume of Cortot's sadly few concerto recordings.

Orchestral Works

Danse macabre in G minor, Op 40. Phaéton in C, Op 39. Le rouet d'Omphale in A, Op 31. La Jeunesse d'Hercule in E flat, Op 50. Marche héroïque in E flat, Op 34. Introduction and Rondo capriccioso in A minor, Op 28[a]. Havanaise in E, Op 83[a]
[a]Kyung-Wha Chung vn [a]Royal Philharmonic Orchestra; Philharmonia Orch / Charles Dutoit
Decca 425 021-2DM Ⓜ
(66 minutes: ADD) ●

It's enough to make you weep – at the age of three, Saint-Saëns wrote his first tune, analysed Mozart's Don Giovanni from the full score when he was five, and at 10 claimed he could play all of Beethoven's 32 piano sonatas from memory. There is some consolation that, according to a contemporary, physically 'he strangely resembled a parrot', and perhaps even his early brilliance was a curse rather than a blessing, as he regressed from being a bold innovator to a dusty reactionary. In his thirties (in the 1870s) he was at the forefront of the Lisztian avant-garde. To Liszt's invention, the 'symphonic poem' (Saint-Saëns was the first Frenchman to attempt the genre), he brought a typically French concision, elegance and grace.

Charles Dutoit has few peers in this kind of music; here is playing of dramatic flair and classical refinement that exactly matches Saint-Saëns intention and invention. Decca's sound has depth, brilliance and richness.

Complete Symphonies

No 1 in E flat, Op 2; No 2 in A minor, Op 55;
No 3 in C minor, Op 78, 'Organ'

Symphonies – A; F, 'Urbs Roma'; Nos 1-3
Bernard Gavoty org French Radio National Orchestra / Jean Martinon
EMI ② 569683-2 (156 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1972-75 ●

Saint-Saëns's four early symphonies have rather tended to be eclipsed by the popularity of his much later Organ Symphony. It's easy to see why the latter, with its rich invention, its colour and its immediate melodic appeal has managed to cast a spell over audiences, but there is much to be enjoyed in the earlier symphonies too.

The A major dates from 1850 when Saint-Saëns was just 15 years old and is a particularly attractive and charming work despite its debt to Mendelssohn and Mozart. The Symphony in F major of 1856 was the winning entry in a competition but was immediately suppressed by the composer after its second performance. The pressures of writing for a competition no doubt contribute to its more mannered style but it nevertheless contains some impressive moments, not least the enjoyable set of variations that form the final movement. The Symphony No 1 proper was in fact written three years before the Urbs Roma and shares the same youthful freshness of the A major, only here the influences are closer to Schumann and Berlioz. The Second Symphony reveals the fully mature voice of Saint-Saëns and in recent years has achieved a certain amount of popularity which is almost certainly due in part to this particularly fine recording. Inevitably we arrive at the Organ Symphony, and if you don't already have a recording then you could do a lot worse than this marvellously flamboyant performance. Indeed, the performances on this generous set are persuasive and exemplary. A real bargain.

Symphony No 3, 'Organ'

Symphony No 3[a]. Samson et Dalila – Bacchanale[b]. Le déluge – Prélude[b]. Danse macabre[b]
[a]Gaston Litaize org [a]Chicago Symphony Orchestra, [b]Orchestre de Paris / Daniel Barenboim
DG Galleria 415 847-2GGA (56 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1976

Daniel Barenboim's recording of the Third Symphony has dominated the catalogue since it first appeared on LP. In fact it is one of the most exciting, physically involving recordings ever made of this work. Barenboim secures not only fine ensemble from his Chicago players but conveys supremely well the mounting excitement of a live performance, without ever falling into hysteria. The organ part has been superimposed on to the Chicago tape. It has Gaston Litaize at the organ of Chartres Cathedral, and though there may be objections in principle, the result is more sharply defined than on most rival recordings. The reissue is generous in offering an exhilarating 'Bacchanale' from Samson et Dalila, a sparkling Danse macabre in which Luben Yordanoff plays his violin solo beautifully, if not especially diabolically, and the rather engaging and not too sentimental Prélude from Le déluge. The remastering has brought a brighter overall sound picture, with the bass response drier, and a very slight loss of bloom on the upper strings.

At the famous organ entry in the finale the ear notices that the top is harder, but the spectacle remains and retains its thrill.

Symphony No 3[a]. Le carnaval des animaux[b]
Peter Hurford org Pascal Rogé, Christina Ortiz pfs [a]Montreal Symphony Orchestra; [b]London Sinfonietta / Charles Dutoit
Decca Ovation 430 720-2DM (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1980-82

In 1886 Saint-Saëns poured his considerable experience as an unequalled virtuoso of the organ, piano and practitioner of Lisztian unifying techniques into his Organ Symphony; it instantly put the French Symphony on the map, and provided a model for Franck and others. With its capacity for grand spectacle (aside from the organ and a large orchestra, its scoring includes two pianos) it has suffered inflationary tendencies from both conductors and recording engineers. Dutoit's (and Decca's) achievement is the restoration of its energy and vitality. The affectionate portraits in the 'zoological fantasy', The carnival of the animals, benefit from more intimate though no less spectacular sound, and a direct approach that avoids obvious clowning.

Saint-Saëns Symphony No 3 Debussy La mer 🄷
Ibert Escales
Berj Zamkochian org Boston Symphony Orchestra / Charles Munch
RCA Living Stereo 09026 61500-2 (73 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1956-59 OO

This famous recording was made in Symphony Hall, Boston. To combat the hall resonance the RCA engineers moved many of the seats from the body of the hall so that the orchestra could spread out, while the organ (situated behind the stage) was miked separately. The result was a wonderfully rich, sumptuous sound which also achieved internal clarity – one notices that in the Scherzo and the filigree passages for piano in the introduction to the finale. However, it is the spectacular moments that one remembrs: the rich bonding of organ and strings in the Poco adagio and the full-blooded organ entry from Berj Zamkochian in the finale. Munch's superb reading moves forward with a powerful lyrical impulse in a single sweep from the first note to the last. To make this issue even more enticing Munch's 1956 versions of Debussy's La mer and Ibert's Escales ('Port of call') have been included. There is some marvellous playing in both, especially from the lustrous Boston violins. Here, however, the original recordings were more closely balanced and the effect is less rich, the dynamic range less wide. The adrenalin runs high in both performances.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 3, 'Organ'
Couplings: Saint-Saëns Le rouet d'Omphale, Op 31. Danse macabre, Op 40 Poulenc Organ Concerto in G minor
Alain org ORTF National Orchestra / Martinon
Apex 8573-89244-2 (71 minutes: ADD: 7/71 and 10/71) Ⓢ

Exciting and authoritative Organ Symphony that easily triumphs over the slightly harsh 1966 sound. Alain's is a distinguished presence both here and in the Poulenc. A vintage compilation well worth anyone's fiver.

The Carnival of the Animals

Saint-Saëns Le carnaval des animaux
Ravel Ma mère l'oye
Joseph Villa, Patricia Prattis Jennings pfs
Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra / André Previn Ⓕ
Philips 400 016-2PH (49 minutes: DDD)

With the transfer to CD of the Ravel work, the mellowness of the original LP, atmospheric but finely transparent, is further enhanced. The same qualities are a great asset in Le carnaval des animaux, notably so in the beautifully transparent account of 'Aquarium' and in the finely judged, not-too-close balance of the solo cello in 'The swan', played with exquisite tenderness by Anne Martindale Williams. The piano tone is extremely faithful too, bright but never aggressive, with the piano chords rightly kept as a pulsing background against the string melody of 'Tortoises', and though the double-basses sound rather distant in 'The elephant', the sepulchral quality in their timbre is very realistic. The full ensemble used in the opening and closing movements is not so transparent, but that is mostly a question of instrumentation. There has rarely, if ever, been a more exuberant account of the final procession of the animals. This is one of the finest versions of this work. The one reservation is a purely technical one – no banding except between the two works.

Additional recommendation
Carnival of the Animals[a]
Coupling: Ravel[a] Ma mère l'oye. Boléro Bizet[a] Jeux d'enfants. Dukas Sorcerer's Apprentice[b]
Katin, Fowke pfs Scottish National Orchestra / Gibson[a]; Hallé Orchestra / Loughran[b]
Classics for Pleasure 574 9472 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ

A characterful and spontaneous reading with some fine couplings at an attractive price.

Chamber Works

Saint-Saëns Fantaisie, Op 124[a]. Fantaisie after Weber's 'Oberon'. L'air de la pendule. Caprice brillant Chopin/Saint-Saëns Nocturnes – No 16 in E flat, Op 55 No 2; No 18 in E, Op 62 No 2
Chopin/Ysaÿe Ballade No 1 in G minor, Op 23. Waltz No 14 in E minor, Op posth
Ysaÿe Caprice d'après l'Etude en forme de valse de Saint-Saëns
Philippe Graffin vn [a]Catherine Beynon hp Pascal Devoyon pf
Hyperion CDA67285 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 OO

The 20th century decided, by and large, that Saint-Saëns lacked passion and Schwung, perhaps taking a physical cue from the 'sharp little man' Stravinsky spotted in the audience at the première of Le sacre. And once performers are led to believe that a composer is a purveyor of sophisticated trifles, then they will tend to play him that way. Now along comes Philippe Graffin to give us not only Saint-Saëns composer of passion, but Saint-Saëns actor of genius. The essence of acting is, some would say, to become the character, and Saint-Saëns miraculously 'becomes' Chopin in his arrangements of two Nocturnes for violin and piano. They are beautiful and effective pieces in their own right and dispel all doubts as to the viability of the transcription process.

The end crowns the work, in the form of the Fantaisie of 1907 for violin and harp. Graffin's tone throughout is sweet and seductive, his phrasing a thing of pure joy; but in this Fantaisie, with delicate but prompt support from Catherine Beynon, he moves up a gear further still, to reach the heart of this deeply moving piece. The three Ysaÿe transcriptions are equally successful. A wonderful disc. Buy it.

Piano Trios

No 1 in F, Op 18; No 2 in E minor, Op 92
Joachim Trio (Rebecca Hirsch vn Caroline Dearnley vc John Lenehan pf)
Naxos 8 550935 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993

1863 and 1892 are the dates of these trios, of which No 1 was written by a composer not yet 30 but already a confident master of his craft. Bland his voice may be, but it is intelligent and agreeable: a French Brahms without genius, one dares suggest, although Mendelssohn also comes to mind. At the same time, there are passages unlike either of these composers, such as the bare and angular main theme of the A minor slow movement in No 1, though Grieg might have written it. Such music needs sympathetic, unfussy interpretation and the skilful and sensitive Joachim Trio gives it just that; as for the First Trio as a whole, the work is charming (try the fleet Scherzo) and the booklet-essay rightly notes the 'delicate brilliance' of the piano writing by a composer who was also an expert player. The E minor Trio, a more dramatic five-movement piece, is played here with fine judgement, being warmly expressive without sentimentality or mannerism. The recording is excellent.

Mélodies

Chanson (Nouvelle chanson sur un vieil air). Guitare. Rêverie. L'attente. Le chant de ceux qui s'en vont sur la mer. Le pas d'armes du Roi Jean. La coccinelle. A quoi bon entendre. Si vous n'avez rien à me dire. Dans ton coeur. Danse macabre. Mélodies persanes, Op 26 – La brise; Sabre en main; Au cimetière; Tournoiement. Marquise, vous souvenez-vous?. La Cigale et la Fourmi. Chanson à boire du vieux temps. Nocturne. Violons dans le soir. Guitares et mandolines. Une flûte invisible. Suzette et Suzon. Aimons-nous. Temps nouveau. Le vent dans la plaine. Grasselette et Maigrelette
François Le Roux bar Krysia Osostowicz vn Philippa Davies fl Graham Johnson pf
Hyperion CDA66856 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 ●

This is the most resounding blow yet to be struck for the mélodies of Saint-Saëns. François Le Roux with his incisive diction and ability to characterise each song, is a real champion for the man, once so successful, who became, as Graham Johnson puts it in the booklet, 'a footnote' rather than a chapter in the history of French music. Many of the poems that Saint-Saëns set were used by other composers, for instance Dans ton coeur, which became Duparc's Chanson triste, by 'Jean Lahor' (Henri Cazalis). The first song of the Mélodies persanes, 'La brise', is full of eastern promise, the second, 'Sabre en main' a rollicking bit of toy-soldier galloping away, but just as one is beginning to think that Johnson is shooting himself in the foot by being so ironic about the music they're performing comes the hauntingly beautiful fifth song, 'Au cimetière', with its quietly rippling accompaniment and the languorous poem about the lovers sitting on a marble tomb and picking the flowers. Le Roux sings this with controlled, quiet intensity. Johnson makes the point that it is of little importance from which part of the composer's life the songs come, he embodies that totally French 19th-century style, sometimes anticipating Hahn and Massenet, sometimes harking back to Boieldieu. If a setting of La Fontaine's fable about the cicada and the ant is pure salon charm, then the final 'Grasselette et Maigrelette' Ronsard chanson, composed when Saint-Saëns was 85 in 1920, is a vivacious café-concert-style evocation of old Paris.

Samson et Dalila

Plácido Domingo ten Samson; Waltraud Meier mez Dalila; Alain Fondary bar Priest; Jean-Philippe Courtis bass Abimelech; Samuel Ramey bass Old Hebrew; Christian Papis ten Messenger; Daniel Galvez-Vallejo ten First Philistine; François Harismendy bass Second Philistine; Chorus and Orchestra of the Bastille Opera, Paris / Myung-Whun Chung
EMI ② 754470-2 (124 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1991 Ⓕ ●●

This is the most subtly and expertly conducted performance of this work to appear on CD, excellent as others have been in this respect, and also the best played and sung. Chung's achievement is to have welded the elements of pagan ruthlessness, erotic stimulation and Wagnerian harmony that comprise Saint-

Saëns's masterpiece into a convincing whole. His success is based on the essentials of a firm sense of rhythm and timing allied to a realization of the sensuousness and delicacy of the scoring. Whether in the lamenting of the Hebrews, the forceful music written for the High Priest, the heroics of Samson, the sensual outpourings of Dalila, or the empty rejoicing of the Bacchanale, he and his orchestra strike to the heart of the matter – and that orchestra plays with Gallic finesse, augmented by a dedicated discipline.

The choral singing, though too distantly recorded, is no less alert and refined, with a full range of dynamic contrast. Meier's Dalila is a fascinating portrayal of this equivocal anti-heroine, seductive, wheedling, exerting her female wiles with the twin objects of sexual dominance and political command. All her sense of purpose comes out in her early greeting to the High Priest, 'Salut à mon père'; then she's meditative and expectant as Dalila ponders on her power at 'Se pourrait-il'. The set numbers are all sung with the vocal ease and long phrase of a singer at the zenith of her powers. She makes more of the text than Domingo who sings in his familiar, all-purpose style, admirable in itself, somewhat missing the particular accents brought to this music by the great French tenors of the past. They exist no more and one must salute the sterling and often eloquent tones of Domingo.

Fondary is superb as the High Priest, firm and rich in tone, commanding and vengeful in delivery: the most compelling interpreter of the part on disc, tout court. Ramey is luxury casting as the Old Hebrew, but as this is a part once sung by Pinza, Ramey probably felt he wasn't slumming it. After an unsteady start, he sings the small but important role with breadth and dignity. As Abimelech, Courtis makes much of little. Apart from the two reservations already made, the recording is admirable, with a wide and spacious sound, and the soloists forward, but well integrated. This must now be the outright recommendation for this work.

Additional recommendation
Samson et Dalila
Vickers Samson Gorr Dalila
René Duclos Choir; Paris Opera Orchestra / Prêtre
EMI Great Recordings of the Century ② 567598-2
(121 minutes: ADD: 7/88) Ⓜ

A classic recording with Rita Gorr's magnificent Dalila towering over the performance. Vickers, too, is superb. The sound is not perfect but don't let that deter you.

Aulis Sallinen

Finnish 1935

GROVE Sallinen was a pupil of Merikanto and Kokkonen at the Helsinki Academy (1955-60), where he returned to teach in 1970. In the late 1960s he began melding triads with avant-garde techniques; then in the 1970s he turned to opera, drawing on sources as diverse as Shostakovich, Janácek and Orff in The Horseman (1975), The Red Line (1978), The King Goes forth to France (1984) and Kullervo (1992). His concert works include four symphonies, five string quartets and concertos for violin and for cello.

Orchestral Works

Variations for Orchestra, Op 8.
Violin Concerto, Op 18. Some aspects of Peltoniemi Hintrik's funeral march, Op 19. The nocturnal dances of Don Juanquixote, Op 58
Eeva Koskinen vn Torleif Thedéen vc
Tapiola Sinfonietta / Osmo Vänskä Ⓕ
BIS CD560 (63 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1992

Sallinen's operas and symphonies have stolen the limelight in recent years at the expense of other works fully worthy of attention, as this well-played and well-recorded disc proves. Whereas the Variations (1963) are somewhat anonymous if deftly written, the Violin Concerto (1968) is an altogether maturer work, unusually sombre for so bright a solo instrument, and perhaps the first piece to point to his later stature. His next published work was the Third String Quartet (1969), subtitled Some aspects of Peltoniemi Hintrik's funeral march, which, thanks to the Kronos Quartet's advocacy has become one of Sallinen's most heard works This arrangement for string orchestra dates from 1981. The nocturnal dances of Don Juanquixote is an extended fantasia for cello and strings, the title being the only parody of Strauss (although a solo violin enters late as Sancho Panza-leporello!). Sallinen is fond of playing games and all is never as it seems: one can almost hear the collective thud of critics' jaws falling open at this Arnold-like spoof.

Songs of Life and Death, Op 69

Songs of Life and Death, Op 69.
The Iron Age – Suite, Op 55b^{a}
Margit Papunen sop Jorma Hynninen bar Opera Festival Chorus; ^{a}East Helsinki Music Institute Choir; Helsinki Philharmonic Orch / Okko Kamu
Ondine ODE844-2 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995 ●

Listening to these two works by Aulis Sallinen is a bit like looking at two different photographs of the composer: the face is undeniably the same but not the perspective. Songs of Life and Death (1993-94) arose, rather by mischance, from a failed effort to compose a Requiem on verses by Lassi Nummi. Although title and outward form suggest Mahlerian associations, the conservative musical language brings Verdi to mind, and in a very real sense this cycle is a 20th-century equivalent of the latter's Requiem: both are symphonic in construction and operatic in idiom, composed from spiritual rather than religious standpoints, and make use of secular elements. There are differences, of course, not least in scale and conception. And while Sallinen's songs are also very much songs of life, death is not here perceived as a grim or tragic end, and this imparts to the whole a peculiarly late 20th-century aspect. Here at last is the choral-and-orchestral masterpiece Sibelius should have written, Finnish to the core yet international in appeal. It is one of the very finest compositions Sallinen has yet produced. Where in the Songs of Life and Death voices are the principal element, in the Iron Age Suite (1978-82) the focus is on the orchestra, the chorus being an important but more colouristic extra. The suite originated in music written for a series of prize-winning Finnish TV documentaries and in it the more familiar Sallinen of the symphonies and early operas is on display. Both works receive terrific performances.

Erik Satie

French 1866-1925

GROVE Satie entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1879, but his record was undistinguished. After leaving he wrote the triptychs of Sarabandes (1887), Gymnopédies (1888) and Gnossiennes (1890), of which the latter two sets are modal and almost eventless. In the 1890s he began to frequent Montmartre, to play at the café Chat Noir and to involve himself with fringe Christian sects. He also made the acquaintance of Debussy.

From 1905-8 he was a student again, at the Schola Cantorum. At last in 1911 his music began to be noticed, and this seems to have stimulated a large output of small pieces, mostly for solo piano and mostly perpetuating his earlier simplicity in pieces with ironic titles. Sports et divertissements (1914), published with illustrations by Charles Martin, contains 20 miniatures eccentrically and beautifully annotated by Satie. In 1915 he came to the attention of Cocteau, who seized on him as the ideal of the anti-Romantic composer and who facilitated the more ambitious works of his last years: the ballets Parade (1917), Mercure (1924) and Relâche (1924), and the cantata Socrate (1918). These have the same flatness as the smaller pieces and songs, achieved by means of directionless modal harmony, simple rhythm and structures made up through repetition or inconsequential dissimilarity. In different ways the style had an effect on French composers from Debussy and Ravel to Poulenc and Sauguet, as later on Cage.

Parade

Parade. Trois Gymnopédies – Nos 1 and 3 (orch Debussy); No 2 (orch Corp). Mercure. Three Gnossiennes (orch Corp). Rêlache
New London Orchestra / Ronald Corp
Hyperion CDA66365 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989

In 1918, the year after Diaghilev's Russian Ballet staged Satie's Parade in Paris, Poulenc wrote that 'to me, Satie's Parade is to Paris what Petrushka is to St Petersburg'. Satie was thenceforth adopted as the spiritual father of 'Les Six', whose ideal was the marriage of serious music with jazz, vaudeville, and the circus. Those who only know Satie from his early Gymnopédies and Gnossiennes – take heed: Parade shuffles along its apparently aimless, deadpan and wicked way with interjections from typewriters, lottery wheels, pistols and sirens.

What does it all mean? Ronald Corp could be accused of retaining a slightly stiff upper lip, but there may well be a seriousness of purpose behind Satie's balletic miniatures. Certainly, there is little sign here of the uproarious debunking of some of 'Les Six'. His orchestrations of the Gnossiennes and the remaining Gymnopédie are idiomatic, and his performances all have the requisite cool beauty. Hyperion's sound is spacious and natural.

Piano Works

Six Gnossiennes. Ogives. Petite ouverture à danser. Sarabandes. Trois Gymnopédies
Reinbert de Leeuw pf
Philips 446 672-2PH (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●

Tender, solemn, droll, silly and occasionally plain boring, Satie's piano music has certainly proved its appeal for performers and record collectors, judging from the number of recitals devoted to it. But this one is out of the ordinary, for unlike the majority of artists, who offer a mixed bag of pieces, Reinbert de Leeuw has chosen music that is entirely solemn and even hieratic in utterance. He begins with the archaically beautiful Gnossiennes, taking the first of them unusually slowly but with compelling concentration. The composer's devotees will be thrilled, though you have to surrender completely to get the message of this repetitive, proto-minimalist music. The four Ogives derive their name from church architecture and their unbarred, diatonically simple music has clear affinities with plainchant although unlike chant it is richly harmonised. Monotonous it may be, but that is part of its charm, if that term can apply to such a contemplative style. The very brief Petite ouverture à danser is a mere meandering sketch in lazy waltz-time, but all Satie is sacred to the converted and the writer of the booklet-essay accords it four lines, finding in it (as translated here) 'a suggestion of indifference, vacillating between a melancholy melody and indecisive harmony'. (Not exactly Beethoven, one might say.) The two pensively sad triptychs of Sarabandes and Gymnopédies – here very slow yet tonally most refined – complete this finely played and recorded disc, which offers nothing whatsoever of the bouncier café-concert Satie.

Sports et divertissements. Enfantillages pittoresques. Valse-ballet. Fantaisie-valse. Le piège de Méduse.

Petite musique de clown triste. Première pensée Rose + Croix. Le fils des étoiles – La vocation; L'initiation. Carnet d'esquisses et de croquis. Petit prélude de 'La Mort de Monsieur Mouche'. Gambades. Caresse. Trois Peccadilles importunes. La diva de l'Empire. Les pantins dansent. Danse de travers. Petite ouverture à danser. Rêverie du pauvre
Pascal Rogé pf
Decca 455 370-2DH (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

This unusual collection displays a broader diversity of style and expression than we expect from Satie. It contains the rarely heard Sports et divertissements, comprising 20 snap-shots, none lasting more than a minute or so, each evoking a sport or recreational activity. This is surely one of Satie's finest works, and it ought to be better known. Also recorded are early pieces, including the Valse-ballet and Fantaisie-valse, published in 1885. Much of this music displays a childlike innocence and simplicity, but here we also find wit, pastiche and evocation. Pascal Rogé has already consolidated his reputation as a performer of French repertoire. His responses are generally cool and reserved; this undoubtedy suits the ethereal timelessness of much of Satie's output, but occasionally one wishes, if only for contrast in the context of the disc as a whole, that Rogé would let himself go a bit more (the 'Esquisses et Sketch mont-martrois' from the Carnet d'esquisses et de croquis, for example). That said, his playing is wholly idiomatic and vividly captures the spirit of Satie's idiosyncratic imagination. This collection of miniatures allows for selective listening, although each work, especially the Sports et divertissements, should be heard in its entirety. All are recorded with a wonderfully natural, if very close, piano sound.

Alessandro Scarlatti Italian 1660-1725

GROVE When he was 12 Alessandro Scarlatti was sent to Rome, where he may have studied with Carissimi. He married in 1678 and later that year was appointed maestro di cappella of S Giacomo degli Incurabili (now 'in Augusta'). By then he had already composed at least one opera and a second, Gli equivoci nel sembiante, was a resounding success in 1679. It confirmed Scarlatti in his chosen career as an opera composer and attracted the attention of Queen Christina of Sweden, who made him her maestro di cappella.

In 1684 Scarlatti was appointed maestro di cappella at the vice-regal court of Naples, at the same time as his brother Francesco was made first violinist. It was alleged that they owed their appointments to the intrigues of one of their sisters (apparently Melchiorra) with two court officials, who were dismissed. For the next two decades over half the new operas given at Naples were by Scarlatti. Two of them, Il Pirro e Demetrio (1694) and La caduta dei Decemviri (1697), were especially successful, but by 1700 the War of the Spanish Succession was beginning to undermine the privileged status of the Neapolitan nobility, rendering Scarlatti's position insecure. In 1702 he left with his family for Florence, where he hoped to find employment for himself and his son Domenico with Prince Ferdinando de' Medici.

When these hopes failed, Scarlatti accepted the inferior position in Rome of assistant music director at S Maria Maggiore. With a papal ban imposed on public opera, he found an outlet for his talents in oratorio and in writing cantatas for his Roman patrons. In 1706 he was elected to the Arcadian Academy, along with Pasquini and Corelli. The following year he attempted to conquer Venice, the citadel of Italian opera, with Mitridate Eupatore and Il trionfo della libertà, but they both failed and Scarlatti was subsequently forced to return to Rome, where he was promoted to the senior post at S Maria Maggiore.

Scarlatti found little satisfaction in the life of a church musician, and towards the end of 1708 he accepted an invitation from the new Austrian viceroy to resume his position at Naples, where he remained for the rest of his life, though he maintained close contacts with his Roman patrons. It was probably in 1715 that he received a patent of nobility from Pope Clement XI. His final opera, La Griselda, was written for Rome in 1721, and he seems to have spent the final years of his life in Naples in semi-retirement.

Scarlatti's reputation as the founder of the Neapolitan school of 18th-century opera has been somewhat exaggerated. He was not influential or even very active as a teacher, nor was he the sole originator of the musical structures (da capo aria, Italian overture, accompanied recitative) with which his name is associated, although he did bring to these structures a level of skill and originality which surpassed those of his contemporaries. Some of his best music is in the chamber cantatas, too few of which are known today.

Cantatas

Il rosignolo (first version). Perchè tacete, regolati concenti?. Infirmata, vulnerata. Ombre tacite e sole. Il genio di Mitilde mente non vè. O pace del mio cor P
David Daniels counterten Arcadian Academy / Nicholas McGegan
Conifer Classics 75605 51319-2 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998

The American countertenor, David Daniels has a fine, firmly produced voice, even throughout its range; both his intonation and his enunciation are impeccable; he is exact in his handling of florid passages; and his ornamentations are very stylish. If there is one reservation, it is that for too much of the time (except in Infirmata, vulnerata) he sings at one constant level of dynamics. It is possible the recording contributes to this: it is certainly responsible for the harpsichord sounding much weaker in some cantatas than in others.

By far the most substantial work here is the earliest, Perchè tacete, probably dating from the mid-1690s. It is the only one with a Venetian opera-type overture, and the numerous movements include four arias, three of which are of two strophes. At the other extreme is Il rosignolo, scored only for continuo and consisting of just two da capo arias joined by a recitative: the nightingale's song, it emerges, is a lament for love. Love is also the subject of O pace del mio cor (the lover vainly seeking peace of mind) and the 1716 Ombre tacite, the despairing lament of a deceived lover. In the recitatives of both of these, Scarlatti underlines emotive words with extraordinary harmonic progressions. The one remaining work is something of an enigma: though in Latin and printed as a 'sacred concerto', the words could be interpreted as referring either to divine love or to human (which is presumably why McGegan includes it here). The style is plainer than in the others except for the vigorous ending: there are chromatic harmonies in the first aria, and a later aria is unusual in being constructed on a seven-bar ground bass. The disc demonstrates Scarlatti's range of styles and the diversity of his scoring, even within a single work.

Cain, overo il primo omicidio

Graciela Oddone, Dorothea Röschmann sops Bernarda Fink contr Richard Croft ten Antonio Abete bass Academy for Ancient Music, Berlin / René Jacobs counterten 🄿

Awards 1999

Harmonia Mundi ② HMC90 1649/50 (138 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded 1997 Ⓕ ⊙⊙⊙

This is a stunning performance of a remarkable work. It was classified at the time not as an oratorio but as a trattenimento sacro ('sacred entertainment'), which suggests that its first performance, in 1707 in Venice, took place in a private palace rather than a church. But Scarlatti brought to the work, besides his seemingly inexhaustible invention, all the dramatic instinct that had made him famous as a composer of operas (of which he had already written about 40). Anyone charged with extracting a 'highlights' selection from this would find themselves in a quandary, since almost every number could be considered a highlight, from the brilliant opening aria for Adam, to two remorseful arias, with affecting chromaticisms, for Eve, and Lucifer (with excited violins) tempting Cain.

Jacobs has assembled an absolutely outstanding cast whose technical accomplishment, dramatic commitment and stylish ornamentation could scarcely be bettered. Furthermore, the instrumental playing is first-class.

Humanità e Lucifero

A Scarlatti Humanità e Lucifero Corelli Trio Sonatas – B flat, Op 3 No 3; C, Op 4 No 1 🄿
Rossana Bertini sop Massimo Crispi ten Europa Galante / Fabio Biondi vn
Opus 111 OPS30-129 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1990s ⊙

Alessandro Scarlatti's oratorio, Humanità e Lucifero, here receives its first recording. It dates from 1704 when it was first performed at the Collegio Nazareno in Rome on the Feast of the Blessed Virgin Mary. This is a vibrant score of instant melodic and harmonic appeal, very well sung by Rossana Bertini (Humanity) and marginally less so by Massimo Crispi (Lucifer). Bertini has a particularly bright vocal timbre which suits her role admirably. Her intonation is deadly accurate and her performance radiates light throughout. Crispi is more variable in the success with which he negotiates some of Scarlatti's exacting passagework. The voice is less refined in tone quality than Bertini's and, while this is appropriate to his Stygian role, there is a tendency towards bluster which adversely affects tonal focus. The music itself holds the attention throughout and, as so often with Scarlatti, there are moments of outstanding beauty, enhanced by delicate scoring perhaps for solo violin, cello or sopranino recorder. In contrast with these delicate touches are passages of resonant scoring for solo trumpet. The insertion of two trio sonatas by Scarlatti's contemporary, Corelli, from Opp 3 and 4 are also very affecting in context. They are sensitively played by Biondi and his instrumentalists who bring a rare sense of poetry to the slow movements.

In summary, this is a rewarding issue and one which readers so far unacquainted with Scarlatti's vocal music are likely to find a very enjoyable introduction. Recorded sound is excellent and full texts with translations are included.

Sedecia, re di Gerusalemme

Sedecia, re di Gerusalemme
Virginie Pochon sop Philippe Jaroussky counterten Mark Padmore ten Peter Harvey bass Il Seminario Musicale / Gérard Lesne counterten
Virgin Veritas ② VC5 45452-2 (94 minutes: DDD). Notes, texts and translations included Ⓕ
Recorded 2001 ⊙

Most of Alessandro Scarlatti's oratorios were written for Rome, where the genre had originated at the beginning of the 17th century, and where papal opposition to opera encouraged it to flourish. In practice the difference between opera and oratorio is more apparent than real, since they share many of the same formal elements. One of the finest of Scarlatti's oratorios, Il primo omicidio of 1707, was only relatively recently revealed as a masterpiece of great originality in René Jacobs's recording (Harmonia Mundi, reviewed above), and to this can now be added Sedecia, re di Gerusalemme, which was probably premièred in Rome during the composer's second period there in 1703-08.

Full praise should go first to Gérard Lesne whose presence on this recording is the critical element in its undoubted success. This is not just a question of his stylish singing, but of a vision of the dramatic articulation of the work as a whole. There are convincing portrayals from some of the other singers too, notably Virginie Pochon, who turns in an elegant performance distinguished by beautifully controlled passagework. Jaroussky's Ismael is a little erratic at times, particularly in the more bravura moments, but at its most telling is most effective. Scarlatti's varied orchestral palette is senstively explored by the instrumentalists. All in all a rich and rewarding experience.

Domenico Scarlatti Italian 1685-1757

GROVE In 1701 Domenico Scarlatti was appointed organist and composer of the vice-regal court at Naples, where his father Alessandro was maestro di cappella. In 1705 his father sent him to find employment in Venice where he may have first met Handel, with whom he formed a strong attachment. By 1707, however, he was in Rome, assisting his father at S Maria Maggiore, and he remained in Rome for over 12 years, occupying posts as maestro to the dowager Queen of Poland from 1711, to the Marquis de Fontes from 1714, and at St Peter's (assistant maestro of the Cappella Giulia from November 1713, maestro from December 1714).

In 1719 Scarlatti resigned his positions in Rome and apparently spent some years in Palermo before taking up his next post, as mestre of the Portuguese court in Lisbon. The Lisbon earthquake of 1755 destroyed documents about his career there, but his duties included giving keyboard lessons to John V's daughter, Maria Barbara, and his younger brother, Don Antonio. When Maria Barbara married the Spanish crown prince in 1729 Scarlatti followed her to Seville and then, in 1733, to Madrid, where he spent the rest of his life. Although he continued to write vocal music, sacred and secular, the main works of his Iberian years are the remarkable series of keyboard sonatas, copied out in his last years and taken to Italy by his colleague, the castrato Farinelli.

Scarlatti married twice: in 1728 a Roman, Maria Catarina Gentili, and in 1739 a Spaniard, Anastasia Maxarti Ximenes. None of his nine children became a musician. In 1738 King John V of Portugal knighted him: he responded by dedicating to the king a volume of Essercizi per gravicembalo, the only music published during his lifetime under his supervision.

The seven operas Scarlatti wrote in Rome for Queen Maria Casimira were by no means failures, and his church music and secular cantatas contain much admirable music. But his fame rightly rests on the hundreds of keyboard sonatas, nearly all in the same binary form, in which he gave free rein to his imagination, stimulated by the new sounds, sights and customs of Iberia and by the astonishing gifts of his royal pupil and patron. In these he explored new worlds of virtuoso technique, putting to new musical ends such devices as hand-crossing, rapidly repeated notes, wide leaps in both hands and countless other means of achieving a devastating brilliance of effect.

Keyboard Sonatas

Awards 1996

Kk1; Kk3; Kk8; Kk9; Kk11; Kk17; Kk24; Kk25; B minor, Kk27; Kk29; Kk87; Kk96; Kk113; Kk141; Kk146; Kk173; Kk213; Kk214; Kk247; Kk259; Kk268; Kk283; Kk284; Kk380; Kk386; Kk387; Kk404; Kk443; Kk519; Kk520; Kk523
Mikhail Pletnev pf
Virgin Classics ② 561961-2 Ⓑ
(140 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994 ●●●

Every so often a major pianist reclaims Scarlatti for the piano with an outstanding recording and this is such an occasion. As Ralph Kirkpatrick put it, Scarlatti's harpsichord, while supremely itself, is continually menacing a transformation into something else. True, the relation of the music to harpsichord sound could hardly be closer – you can't argue on that point! – and of course it wouldn't have been composed the way it is for a different instrument. Scarlatti is marvellous at suggesting imaginary orchestrations and stimulating our own imagination. He makes us aware of the different vantage points as the music passes before us, of the different tones of voice and rhetorical inflexions – as various in these sonatas as the events in them are unpredictable. There are dances, fiestas and processions here, serenades, laments, and evocations of everything from the rudest folk music to courtly entertainments and churchly polyphony; and as the kaleidoscope turns you marvel at the composer who could embrace such diversity, shape it and put it all on to the keyboard.

This is strongly individual playing, be warned. Pletnev's free-ranging poetic licence may not be to your taste. Not that his spectacular virtuosity is likely to be controversial: this really is hors de catégorie and enormously enjoyable. And the evocations of the harpsichord are often very witty, but Pletnev doesn't shrink from using the full resources of the piano, sustaining pedal included, and if you baulk at the prospect of that as the means to an end he may not be for you.

The sustaining pedal is indeed dangerous in music which is almost wholly to do with lines, not washes of colour; its effect is to make us see Scarlatti as if through Mendelssohn's eyes. Yet moments of such falsification are rare. As often as not when Pletnev appears to be on the verge of stepping outside Scarlatti's world, or reinventing a little bit of it, it's because of some shaft of insight vouchsafed to his extraordinary musical mind that is well worth having. Characterization is everything, and though he can be a mite coy in the reflective sonatas he generally goes straight to the heart of the matter. The vigorous, full tone in the quick numbers is a joy, and most admirable is the way he makes sound immediately command character. That is something only the best artists are able to do. Superb recorded sound.

Kk3, 54, 141, 145, 175, 162, 177, 185, 199, 208, 248, 249, 299, 310, 484, 492, 531, 535
Pierre Hantaï hpd
Mirare MIR9918 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●

The first track (Kk535) is typical of the quick-moving sonatas that abound in this programme – an astonishing display of dexterity in which the harpsichord he uses (a 1999 copy of an anonymous Thuringian instrument of 1720) and the acoustic help in preserving total clarity. Even at maximum velocity (did Scarlatti and his pupil reach such speeds?) he manages to shape his phrases with micro-second dwellings.

It is not only the speedy sonatas that are impressive; Kk208 exemplifies his skilful shifts to either side of the pulse in giving the lines a natural 'vocal' quality. It also illuminates Kk185, 310, 199 and 162, in the last of which it is more evident in the playful quicker 'interludes'. The irresistible disc is splendidly annotated by Hantaï and beautifully packaged.

Keyboard Sonatas – B flat; D, Kk443; D minor, Kk444; F sharp minor, Kk448; G minor, Kk450; F minor, Kk462; F minor, Kk466; F minor; F, Kk469; E flat, Kk474; B flat, Kk503; B flat, Kk504; E flat, Kk508; D minor, Kk516; D minor, Kk517; C minor, Kk526; C, Kk527; E, Kk531; F, Kk540; F, Kk541; B flat, Kk545; C, Kk548
Frédérick Haas hpd
Calliope CAL9330 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

This is a stunning recording. There are some tough nuts here but Haas cracks them with ease and a sense of surging virtuosity. He plays on the warmly resonant but clear-sounding French harpsichord last used by Scott Ross. If you want to introduce Scarlatti to someone you could not do it better than by playing this disc. This appears to be a one-off recording but it offers strong temptation as a 'supplement' to anyone already embarked on an integral sonata collection.

Keyboard Sonatas, Volume 2 – A minor, Kk3; G, Kk14; E, Kk20; B minor, Kk27; D minor, Kk32; D, Kk33; A, Kk39; E minor, Kk98; A minor, Kk109; D minor, Kk141; G, Kk146; A, Kk208; A, Kk209; D minor, Kk213; A, Kk322; D, Kk436; F minor, Kk481; D, Kk492. D minor, Kk517
Michael Lewin pf
Naxos 8 553067 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995 ●

Michael Lewin is an American pianist as dexterous and assured as he is audacious. Here there is no sense of 'studio' caution but only of liberating and dazzling music-making, live and on the wing. Kk492 in D could hardly provide a more brilliant curtain-raiser, and in Kk3 in A minor (the one where Scarlatti's impish humour offers the musical equivalent of someone slipping on a banana skin) Lewin's playing positively brims over with high spirits. The D major Sonata, Kk33, is all thrumbing guitars and bursts of sunlight and in Kk141, with its cascades of repeated notes, Lewin even gives Martha Argerich a run for her money. There is a no less appealing balm and musical quality in the more restrained numbers such as Kk32 in D minor and Kk208 in A, though the recital comes to a suitably ebullient conclusion with Kk517 in D minor which is here like a river in full spate. The New York-based recordings are suitably lively (more successful than in Vol 1) and not even the most persistent lover of Scarlatti on the harpsichord could accuse Michael Lewin of an absence of the necessary glitter, panache and stylistic awareness.

Samuel Scheidt

German 1587-1654

GROVE Scheidt was organist of the Moritzkirche, Halle, for several years, and studied with Sweelinck in Amsterdam before becoming Halle court organist in 1609. From 1619-20 he was also court Kapellmeister, but the musical establishment almost disbanded (because of the Thirty Years War) in 1625. In 1627-30 he was director of music in Halle, also composing for the Marktkirche. His duties as court Kapellmeister resumed in 1638. Scheidt was active as an organ expert and a teacher and knew both Schütz and Schein.

Scheidt distinguished himself in both keyboard and sacred vocal music, in which he combined traditional counterpoint with the new Italian concerto style. Contrapuntal chorale settings are important among his c150 keyboard pieces. Some appear in his three-volume Tabulatura nova (1624), the first German publication of keyboard music to be in open score rather than in German organ tablature or in two-staff format; the collection also contains variations and liturgical pieces. Scheidt left some 160 sacred vocal works. His first book, Cantiones sacrae (1620), consists of polychoral motets, some of them based on chorales, and his second (1620) of large concertos with obbligato instrumental parts. Small concertos for few voices make up the four volumes of Geistliche Concerte (1631 -40). Scheidt also composed dances, canzonas, sinfonias etc and canons.

Ludi Musici

Ludi Musici – Alamande a 4; Canzon ad imitationem Bergamas angl a 5; Canzon super Cantionem Gallicam a 5; Canzon super O Nachbar Roland a 5; Five Courants a 4; Courant dolorosa a 4; Two Galliards a 4; Galliard a 5; Galliard battaglia a 5; Three Paduanas a 4 🅿
Hespèrion XX / Jordi Savall viol
Astrée Naïve ES9980 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1995

Scheidt's Ludi Musici reflects the fusion of English and German traditions in the emergent world of instrumental music in early 17th-century Germany and is a mouth-wateringly diverse and inventive mixture of dance, canzona and variation. These are works which brim over with character and nonchalantly brilliant craftsmanship. Scheidt has that rare knack, for the 1620s and 1630s, of sustaining an instrumental piece for more than two minutes without bombarding us with a new idea every 10 bars; the longer pieces such as the Paduanas and the brilliant Canzon a 5 ad imitationem Bergamas angl, with its thrilling close, convey admirable long-term direction amid a concentrated love of ephemeral effect. This is a cocktail which Hespèrion XX relishes. The Pavans are, as you would expect from Jordi Savall, eventful. There are moments when an indulgence from Savall's treble viol stifles the potential for a more reflective allusion, but the overriding effect is of a performer striving to find a meaningful discourse, not content just to 'let the music play itself'; the colour and shape he brings to line and texture is often beguiling (disarmingly poignant in the stillness of the final Paduana), at times too much of a good thing but always engaging.

Johann Hermann Schein

German 1586-1630

Schein trained as a soprano in the Dresden court chapel, studied at Schulpforta and Leipzig and later worked as music director and tutor to the children of Gottfried von Wolffersdorff, 1613-15. After a year as Kapellmeister at the Weimar court, he became Kantor of St Thomas's, Leipzig in 1616. He knew both Schütz, a close friend, and Scheidt. Primarily a composer for the voice, Schein was significant as one of the first composers to graft the modern Italian style on to the traditional elements of Lutheran church music. Much of his large sacred vocal output (nearly 400 works) is in five published volumes. The first part of Opella nova (1618) contains sacred concertos with continuo, clearly influenced by Viadana's but based (in most cases) on chorale melodies; the second part (1626), which uses fewer chorales, includes obbligato instrumental parts. His other sacred publications are a motet collection (1615), a book of sacred madrigals (1623) and the Cantional (1627), a hymnbook. Schein left some 90 secular vocal pieces, all to his own texts. Especially Italianate are the three-part settings in Musica boscareccia (1621-28) and his German continuo madrigals (1624 – the first such works to be published). He also composed songs and occasional works. His main instrumental work is the Banchetto musicale (1617), containing 20 variation suites.

Israelis Brünnlein

Ensemble Vocal Européen / Philippe Herreweghe
Harmonia Mundi HMX298 1574 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1995

Anyone who hears this sympathetic account of Israelis Brünnlein ('The Fountains of Israel' – 26 sacred madrigals in five and six parts with a basso seguente) from Ensemble Vocal Européen will be convinced that this is one of the great pillars of German Baroque music. It is fascinating not only as a demonstration of how the best German music incorporates foreign styles within indigenous techniques but also for Schein's discovery of his own unique expressive horizons, in ways which cannot directly be attributed to either Mantua or Leipzig. As in the Lagrime di San Pietro of Lassus (a composer whose poised contrapuntal craft is transmuted with profound respect by Schein), secular idioms successfully serve the sacred vision. Herreweghe, whose cool and collected reading of the Lassus masterpiece (see review under Lassus; refer to the Index) is vocally peerless, finds fresh priorities here. The exposed solo context draws out a greater sense of quasi-spontaneous attention, particularly in upbeat examples like 'Freue dich des Weibes' and the brilliance of 'Ist nicht Ephraim?'. Emotional intensity can, however, sound overmeasured in works like 'Die mit Tränen säen' and 'Was betrübst', where dramatic urgency is required above the restrained shapeliness that is Herreweghe's hallmark. There are some fine singers (underpinned by the splendid Peter Kooy), even if the tenor tuning is not always beyond reproach; as an almost comprehensive – five pieces are left out – volume of 80-odd minutes, this further assures Schein's reputation as a master of exquisite characterisation.

Johann Heinrich Schmelzer

Austrian c1620/23-1680

Schmelzer was trained in Vienna and served in the court chapel from the mid-1630s, becoming a member of the orchestra in 1649 and vice-Kapellmeister in 1671. In 1679 he was made Kapellmeister. The leading Austrian composer of instrumental music before Biber, he wrote 150 ballet suites for court dramatic productions and over 100 sonatas. The former each have between two and nine dances, sometimes thematically related; some include elements of folk music. Notable among the sonatas are the six Sonatae unarum fidium (1664), the earliest published set for solo violin and continuo. Schmelzer's prolific output also includes sepolcri and other dramatic pieces, nearly 200 sacred works and some secular vocal music.

Sonatae unarum fidium

Schmelzer Sonatae unarum fidium – Nos 1-6. P
Sonata for Violin and Continuo in A minor, 'Il cucù'
Biber (arr A Schmelzer) Sonata for Violin and Continuo, 'Victori der Christen'
Romanesca (Andrew Manze vn Nigel North theorbo John Toll hpd/org)
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7143 (67 minutes: DDD)

Also includes a free sampler disc of Biber violin sonatas. Recorded 1995 Ⓕ ●

Coming to these recordings from Biber's extravagant and incomparably theatrical sonatas, one is immediately struck by common stylistic threads but also by Schmelzer's studied lyricism, a searing and disarming feel for melodic progression (heard in the close of the Cucù Sonata) and the sense of a man who, when he is not following his tail with ostinato basses, has mastered the canzona-sonata mentality and takes full advantage of its freedom. All Biberian features certainly, but as Andrew Manze both explains in his note and demonstrates in his playing, there is less overall ostentation here; whilst the extraordinary Sonata No 4 latterly contains gloriously extended and potent outbursts, it is the patient arching direction of Schmelzer's melodic frame which draws one in. Manze and his accomplished continuo players (the theorbo is exquisite and distinctive) are wonderful exponents in this mesmerising Baroque byway.

Schmelzer Sonatae unarum fidium[b] Anonymous 🅿
Scordatura Violin Sonata[a] Bertali Chiaconna
John Holloway vn [ab]Aloysia Assenbaum org
[a]Lars Ulrik Mortensen hpd/org
ECM New Series 465 066-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

Johann Heinrich Schmelzer was the first home-grown Kapellmeister to be appointed at the Hapsburg Court in Vienna in 1679, following generations of Italians hired for their oltremontani flair and easy command of prevailing fashion. Schmelzer's six sonatas from 1664 are certainly Italianate, and not without freewheeling virtuosity, but they also contain a type of extended lyricism, and, as in the opening of the Fourth Sonata, a sense of no-nonsense progression of comforting expectation. In fact, this work, and that by his dynamic forebear, Antonio Bertali (whose own Chiaconna is quite a party-piece) are typical 17th-century showcases for the violin where intricate and fantastical divisions unfold above a recurring bass pattern. The playing in this technically demanding repertoire is dazzling, and the intonation faultless. Yet equally impressive is the measured classicism and subtle poetical restraint of the protagonist, John Holloway. Not every bar of Schmelzer's set is compelling and Holloway opts for a consistent clarity of sound rather than milking every note as if it is of earth-shattering importance; he uses rubato discerningly, as in the introspective musings in the Fifth Sonata where the narrative is beautifully and elegantly articulated. The idea of a double continuo of organ and harpsichord is highly effective throughout.

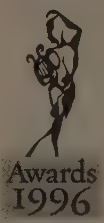
The first recording of Sonatae unarum was made by Romanesca (see above), and they too opt for a counterpoint of continuos with organ and theorbo. The sense of a rich consort-like texture can only bring a much-needed breadth to music which might otherwise test the concentration over the course of an hour. To choose between these two fine recordings is not easy, save to say that Romanesca is more consistently adventurous and theatrical. Holloway and his excellent keyboardists are less extrovert, softer-grained and more inclined to hover with sweet and restrained decorum. Both recordings are exceptional in their way, revealing how much interpretative leeway Schmelzer gives his players.

Franz Schmidt

Czechoslovakian/Austrian 1874-1939

Schmidt, a pupil of Bruckner and Fuchs at the Vienna Conservatory, was cellist in the Vienna Hofoper orchestra (1896-1911, for much of the time under Mahler), then taught at the Staatsakademie (1914-27) and the Musikhochschule (1927-31). In his music he continued the grand tradition, with peripheral influence from Schoenberg, Debussy and Hindemith: his works include four symphonies (1899, 1913, 1928, 1933), by which he made his name, the orchestral Variationen über ein Husarenlied (1931), chamber music (two string quartets, a piano quintet and two quintets for clarinet, piano and strings), organ pieces, the oratorio Das Buch mit sieben Siegeln (1937) and two operas (Notre Dame, 1904; Fredigundis, 1921).

Symphony No 4



Symphony No 4 in C. Variations on a Hussar's Song
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Franz Welser-Möst
EMI 555518-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●●●

Writing in The Symphony (ed Robert Simpson, Penguin Books: 1967) the late Harold Truscott made a strong case for Franz Schmidt. He robustly dismissed the notion that his music does not travel. 'It "travels" very well, when allowed to do so, and I will go so far as to say that anyone who claims a love and understanding of Beethoven, Brahms or Sibelius, should have no difficulty with Schmidt. There could,' he went on, 'scarcely be a more positive work than No 4, whose confidence is complete and without bombast' and it is obvious that Schmidt's mastery of the art of symphonic thinking and of the orchestra is everywhere in evidence. The symphony is in one unbroken span whose material derives from the haunting opening 21-bar theme on solo trumpet – in itself an idea of remarkable originality. Unlike Reger, whose influence can at times be clearly heard, Schmidt was a late developer and far from prolific. Indeed apart from the four symphonies, there is only one other orchestral work, the Variations on a Hussar's Song recorded here. For those who have never encountered his music, it is perhaps best if loosely described as rich in palette, in much the same way as Elgar, chromatic in its harmonic language yet never cloying, and above all it has an innate nobility, an elegiac dignity of utterance and a sense of vision. Not without reason did Truscott call Schmidt the 'only real successor to Bruckner – in so far as there is one at all'. Welser-Möst shows great feeling for this music and carries his fine players with him. Theirs is playing of eloquence and dedication.

Additional recommendation
Complete Symphonies
Chanteaux vc Detroit Symphony Orchestra; Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Järvi
Chandos CHAN9568 ④ (175 minutes: DDD: 3/90[R]; 3/92[R]; 4/96[R]) Ⓕ

Schmidt's four symphonies make for rewarding listening, especially in Järvi's colourful readings.

Alfred Schnittke USSR 1934-1998

GROVE Schnittke was a pupil of Rakov and Golubev at the Moscow Conservatory (1953-61), where he taught until 1972. His works often use quotations, parodies and stylistic imitations in a highly charged manner, though some are more unified in expression. Textures are rich and complexly varied and string instruments feature prominently in his output, which, apart from four symphonies and various stage works, includes five concerti grossi, four violin concertos, two violin sonatas and chamber music. He was a prolific writer on Russian music.

Concerto grosso No 1

Concerto grosso No 1[a]. Quasi una sonata[b].
Moz-Art à la Haydn[c]
Tatiana Grindenko vn Yuri Smirnov hpd/prep pf/pf
Chamber Orchestra of Europe / [a]Heinrich Schiff, [bc]Gidon Kremer [a]vn
DG Masters 445 520-2GMA (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1988 ●

For a single representative of Alfred Schnittke's work you could choose nothing better than the first Concerto grosso of 1977. Here are the psychedelic mélanges of Baroque and modern, the drastic juxtapositions of pseudo-Vivaldi with pseudo-Berg, producing an effect at once aurally exciting and spiritually disturbing. The piece has had many recordings, but never with the panache of Kremer and friends and never with the vivid immediacy of this live DG recording (in fact the solo violins are rather too closely miked for comfort, but that's only a tiny drawback). Quasi una sonata was originally composed in 1968 for violin and piano and it was something of a breakthrough piece for Schnittke as he emerged from what he called 'the puberty rites of serialism', letting his imagination run riot for the first time. No one could call it a disciplined piece, but if that worries you, you should leave Schnittke alone anyway. The transcription for solo violin and string orchestra is an ingenious one and Kremer again supplies all the requisite agonised intensity. Moz-Art à la Haydn is a very slight piece of work, and it really depends on visual theatricality to make its effect. Still, it complements the other two pieces, and this disc is an excellent introduction to this composer.

Concerto grosso No 6

Schnittke Concerto grosso No 6[a]. Violin Sonata
Takemitsu Nostalgia Weill Concerto for Violin and Wind Orchestra, Op 12
Daniel Hope vn [a]Simon Mulligan pf/hpd English Symphony Orchestra / William Boughton
Nimbus NI5582 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

Full marks to Nimbus for variety. The danger is that three such different composers, combined in a way you would never expect in a concert, will cancel each other out. Fortunately, the performances are strong enough – even when heard in close succession – to justify the enterprise, and the recording quality is just as successful. With the earlier of the Schnittke works, the Sonata, a textual point of some interest emerges. Usually, the harpsichord functions as the violinist's alter ego throughout, but Hope, with Schnittke's agreement, has the keyboardist move from harpsichord to piano from the final stages of the second movement onwards. The change is certainly justified in the finale, and adds an extra dimension to a commendably unexaggerated account of this turbulent score. The early Weill Violin Concerto can easily sprawl, and sound too earnest for its own good. Here there is an appropriate fluency, and excessive gravity is avoided. Daniel Hope is able to project the required authority, especially in the cadenza, and although some might prefer a more forward placement for the soloist, the excellent qualities of Hope's playing are no less appealing. As for Takemitsu's song of farewell for the film-maker Andrei Tarkovsky, the music is a model of how to balance emotional restraint and expressive warmth, and the performance does it justice.

Piano Quintet

Schnittke Piano Quintet[a] Shostakovich String Quartet No 15 in E flat minor, Op 144
[a]Alexei Lubimov pf Keller Quartet
(András Keller, János Pilz vns Zoltán Gál va Judit Szabó vc)
ECM New Series 461 815-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

Just as Schnittke's First Symphony picks up the threads from Shostakovich's last, so his Piano Quintet feels like the natural successor to Shostakovich's last string quartet; that makes ECM's coupling of the two chamber works an effective and thought-provoking one, the more so since both performances are of the highest quality.

This music is a good deal harder to bring off than it looks. The textures are emaciated, and the pain of emotional starvation needs to register with unremitting intensity. In Schnittke's solo piano opening, Alexei Lubimov shows the requisite temperament and control of sonority, and both he and the Kellers keep us inside the Quintet's world through the first movement's obsessive, quarter-tone-inflected bell-tolling, through the ghost-train-ride of the film-derived Tempo di valse, through the catatonic laments of the two succeeding slow movements, all the way to the anxious transfigurations of the finale.

Curiously, Lubimov goes against the score in the final phrase, where Schnittke asks for pitched notes to fade into the noise of fingertips tapping on the keys, echoing the pedal-knocking at the end of the first movement. But his carefully graded diminuendo is effective enough in its own way, and overall this is the only recorded performance to rival Ludmilla Berlinsky and the Borodins (reviewed above).

Single-disc versions of Shostakovich's valedictory quartet are surprisingly thin on the ground. Here, too, the Kellers can stand comparison with the very finest. Shostakovich's parched and starved textures can be made to sound even more discomforting, but the Kellers' tonal control brings out its own range of nuance. Recording quality is nicely judged, the players being set in a nicely unobtrusive perspective.

Schnittke Piano Quintet. String Quartet No 3
Mahler/Schnittke Piano Quartet
Borodin Quartet (Mikhail Kopelman, Andrei Abramenkov vns Dmitri Shebalin va Valentin Berlinsky vc); Ludmilla Berlinsky pf
Virgin Classics 759040-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990 ◉

Schnittke's chamber music does not have the high public profile of some of his symphonies and concertos, but in many ways it is more fastidiously composed and it certainly makes for equally rewarding listening at home. The Piano Quintet is the outstanding feature of this disc. Predominantly slow and mournful (it is dedicated to the memory of the composer's mother) and with a haunting waltz on the notes of the BACH monogram, it is here played with compelling intensity, especially by the pianist Ludmilla Berlinsky, daughter of the Borodin Quartet's cellist. The Piano Quartet is a conflation of the 16-year-old Mahler's first movement with his incomplete second movement in Schnittke's own paraphrase – another haunting experience, beautifully played and recorded. Less satisfying as a performance, because slightly glossed over, is the Third Quartet; but this is perhaps the finest and undoubtedly the most often performed of Schnittke's chamber works. As a whole the disc can be warmly recommended.

String Trio

String Trio. Violin Sonatas – No 1;
No 2, 'Quasi una sonata'
Mateja Marinkovic´ vn Paul Silverthorne va
Timothy Hugh vc Linn Hendry pf Ⓕ
ASV CDDCA868 (65 minutes: DDD)

This performance is extremely satisfying. It is atmospherically recorded, and convincingly reinforces the Trio's claims to be considered one of Schnittke's major works. The music is surely to be preferred in this original version, rather than as the 'Trio Sonata' of Yuri Bashmet's orchestral arrangement. Dating from 1985, and written in response to a commission from the Alban Berg Society of Vienna, the Trio is notable for the extent to which its reminiscences and re-creations are far less contrived and self-indulgent than is often the case with this composer. They are not merely backward-looking, nostalgic gestures, but suggest a blueprint for a new, romantically tinged post-modernism. Whether or not you go along with this analysis, it is difficult to deny that the Trio puts the pair of early violin sonatas into the shade. They are not negligible pieces, even so, and these performances have much to commend them. Mateja Marinkovićand Linn Hendry make a first-rate duo: even the most piano-bashing bits of the Second Sonata are not deprived of all musical sense, and the urgent interplay between the instruments is authentically intense.

Suite in the Old Style

Suite in the Old Style. Moz-Art à la Haydn.
Praeludium in memoriam Dmitri Shostakovich. A Paganini. Stille Musik. Stille Nacht. Madrigal in Memoriam Oleg Kagan. Gratulations rondo
Mateja Marinkovič, Thomas Bowes vns Timothy Hugh vc Linn Hendry pf
ASV CDDCA877 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

At first glance, this disc presents a rather scrappy impression. It contains no large-scale pieces, and the largest work – the early Suite in the Old Style – is for the most part an uneventful exercise in dutiful imitation. It is what the Suite only hints at that the other works realise more fully. In the Gratulations rondo Schnittke again wears the mask of conformity to an old, easygoing classicism. When the mask begins to slip, we wonder what to think. Is this a serious lesson about the potential banality of classicism's familiar formulas? Are the distortions of those formulas expressive of affection or hostility?

These issues come most fully into focus in Stille Nacht, as Gruber's sweet little tune, with its obediently basic harmony, is subjected to quiet but ruthlessly dissonant deconstruction. 'Silent Night' acquires the connotations of Rachel Carson's Silent Spring, suggesting an environmental disaster rather than a cosy spirituality. Schnittke's ability to create memorable musical laments is well displayed here, in the Shostakovich and Kagan memorial pieces, in Stille Musik and even in A Paganini, which traces an absorbing contest between an apparent distaste for virtuosity and a celebration of it. The impact of these compositions is the greater for their relative concentration and Mateja Marinković is a player of admirable technical refinement. The recording is first-class, and the disc servse as an ideal introduction to Schnittke for listeners who may have doubts about his larger-scale works.

Further listening
Gubaidulina String Quartets Nos 1-3
Coupling: String Trio
Danish Quartet
CPO CPO999 064-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Intellectually and emotionally challenging, Gubaidulina's string quartets make for compelling listening. Anyone with an ear for 'tough' music should give them a try.

Concerto for Mixed Chorus

Concerto for Mixed Chorus.
Minnesang. Voices of Nature[a]
[a]Rachel Gledhill vibe
Holst Singers / Stephen Layton
Hyperion CDA67297 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

The rather anodyne name Concerto for Mixed Chorus (1984-85) actually conceals a work with tremendous depths of faith and feeling, and a masterpiece of choral writing building firmly on the Russian sacred tradition.

The text comes from deeply penitential religious poetry by Grigor Narekatsi, a 10th-century Armenian monk, to which Schnittke responded with an immediacy that makes this a colourful and considerably more approachable work than the later Penitential Psalms. The Holst Singers bring to the music's often stunningly rich textures not only their previous experience with Russian music, but also something of the English choral tradition, which makes those not infrequent moments that suggest the choral writing of, say, Howells or Bax, strike one the more forcefully. In this they make a different case for the work from the Danish and Russian choirs recorded on Chandos; the music can stand many different approaches, and this is not only as convincing as any other version, but allows details of the scoring to come through in a unique way. The technical skill of the Holst Singers is truly impressive. It is the Concerto that provides the real interest in this programme, and with a performance of this extraordinary quality it should earn many new admirers.

12 Penitential Psalms

Swedish Radio Choir / Tõnu Kaljuste
ECM New Series 453 513-2 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1996 ●

Schnittke's 12 Penitential Psalms (1988) are not biblical: Nos 1-11 use 16th-century Russian texts and No 12 is a wordless meditation which encapsulates the spirit and style of what precedes it. Though at times dark and despairing in tone, this is in no sense liturgical music. It is too expansive, and reaches towards the ecstatic too consistently, to qualify as ascetic or austere. Indeed, the warmly euphonious chorale-like textures with which several of the movements end are sumptuous enough for one to imagine a soulful saxophone weaving its way through them. As this suggests, the recording is extremely, and not inappropriately, resonant, and the performance is polished to a fault, the individual lines superbly controlled and the textures balanced with a fine feeling for their weight and diversity. Although some may find this issue a little too refined, it realises the work's expressive world with imposing and irresistible authenticity.

In these works, Schnittke seems to be doing penance for the extravagant indulgences of works such as Stille Nacht and the Viola Concerto, abandoning modernism in general and expressionism in particular. The music nevertheless retains strong links with the images of lament and spiritual aspiration, and there is nothing in the least artificial or contrived about its emotional aura. It is difficult to imagine a more convincing or better recorded account of it than this one.

Othmar Schoeck

Swiss 1886-1957

GROVE Schoeck studied at the Zürich Conservatory and with Reger in Leipzig (1907-8), then worked in Zürich and St Gall as a conductor. He was one of the leading Swiss composers of his time. His numerous songs, usually setting German Romantic poetry, establish him among the foremost lieder composers, but he also wrote important operas: the dense and richly scored Penthesilea (1927) and Vom Fischer und syner Fru (1930), which like other works is more folklike. The rest of his output includes choral and orchestral scores and a few chamber pieces.

Lieder

Unter Sternen, Op 55[a] – Frühgesicht; Ein Tagewerk I und II. Das Stille Leuchten, Op 60[a] – Reisephantasie; Das Ende des Festes; Jetzt rede du! Lieder, Op 20[a] – Auf ein kind; Nachruf. Lieder, Op 24b – Jugendgedenken[a]; Keine Rast[b]; Das Ziel[b]; Ravenna[b]. Lieder, Op 17[a] – Peregrina II. Lieder, Op. 19a[a] – Dämmerung senkte sich von oben. Hafis-Lieder, Op 33[a] – Ach, wie schön ist Nacht und Dämmerschein. Lieder, Op 19b[a] – Nachklang; Höre den Rath den die Leyer tönt; Diese Gondel vergleich ich. Lieder, Op 8[b] – Aus zwei Tälern; Auskunkt. Lieder, Op 31[b] – Kindheit; Im Kreuzgang von Santo Stefano. Zehn Lieder, Op 44[b]

Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar [a]Margrit Weber, [b]Karl Engel pfs
DG 463 513-2GFD (78 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1958 and [b]1977 ●

No one has done more for the superb but persistently underrated songs of Schoeck than Fischer-Dieskau, and the 33 here are sung with outstanding subtlety and are very shrewdly chosen. 'Subtlety' includes a remarkable palette of vocal colour and at times extremes of dynamic. 'Shrewdness' involves not only selection but juxtaposition. Nachruf, a poignant song of old age and lament over lost companions, is followed by Jugendgedenken, a nostalgic summoning up of happy memories; both gain by the conjunction, and Fischer-Dieskau's beautiful phrasing of 'nur noch einmal' ('just once more I will look back') movingly links them as a diptych. Those who have yet to discover Schoeck need only sample the haunting Im Kreuzgang von Santo Stefano or the darkly quiet Ravenna, both evocations of the poignancy of transitoriness, to be immediately captured. This is the only available recording of the recondite but masterly Op 44 cycle.

Penthesilea

Helga Dernesch sop Penthesilea; Jane Marsh sop Prothoe; Mechtild Gessendorf sop Meroe; Marjana Lipovšek mez High Priestess; Gabriele Sima sop Priestess; Theo Adam bass-bar Achilles; Horst Hiestermann ten Diomede; Peter Weber bass Herold Austrian Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Gerd Albrecht
Orfeo C364941B (80 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded live in 1982

Schoeck's one-act opera, Penthesilea is an astonishing and masterly score. It seems barely credible that a work so gripping in its dramatic intensity, and so powerful in atmosphere, should be so little known. It has the listener on the edge of the seat throughout its 80 short minutes and, like any great opera, it continues to cast a spell long after the music has ended. In the Grove Dictionary of Opera, Ronald Crichton wrote that 'at its most intense, the language of Penthesilea surpasses in ferocity Strauss's Elektra, a work with which it invites comparison'. In so far as it is a one-act work, set in the Ancient World, highly concentrated in feeling and with strongly delineated characters, it is difficult not to think of Strauss's masterpiece. Yet its sound world is quite distinctive. Though he is a lesser figure, Schoeck similarly renders the familiar language of Straussian opera entirely his own. The vocabulary is not dissimilar yet the world is different. We are immediately plunged into a vivid and completely individual world, packed with dramatic incident: off-stage war cries and exciting, dissonant trumpet calls. There is an almost symphonic handling of pace, but the sonorities are unusual: for example, there is a strong wind section, some 10 clarinets at various pitches, while there are only a handful of violins; much use is made of two pianos in a way that at times almost anticipates Britten. This performance emanates from the 1982 Salzburg Festival; Helga Dernesch in the title-role commands the appropriate range of emotions as Penthesilea and the remainder of the cast, including the Achilles of Theo Adam, rise to the occasion. The important choral role and the orchestral playing under Gerd Albrecht are eminently committed and the recording is good. There is a useful essay and libretto, though in German, not English.

Arnold Schoenberg

Austro/Hungarian 1874-1951

Schoenberg began violin lessons when he GROVE was eight and almost immediately started composing, though he had no formal training until he was in his late teens, when Zemlinsky became his teacher and friend (in 1910 he married Zemlinsky's sister). His first acknowledged works date from the turn of the century and include the string sextet Verklärte Nacht as well as some songs, all showing influences from Brahms, Wagner and Wolf. In 1901-3 he was in Berlin as a cabaret musician and teacher, and wrote the symphonic poem Pelleas und Melisande, pressing the Straussian model towards denser thematic argument and contrapuntal richness.

He then returned to Vienna and began taking private pupils, Berg and Webern being among the first. He also moved rapidly forwards in his musical style. The large orchestra of Pelleas and the Gurrelieder was replaced by an ensemble of 15 in Chamber Symphony No 1, but with greater harmonic strangeness, formal complexity and contrapuntal density. When atonality arrived in 1908, it was the inevitable outcome of a doomed attempt to accommodate ever more disruptive material. However, he found it possible a quarter-century later to return to something like his tonal style, as in the Suite in G for strings.

That, however, was not possible immediately. The sense of key was left behind as Schoenberg set poems by George in the last two movements of String Quartet No 2 and in the cycle Das Buch der hängenden Gärten, and for the next few years he lived in the new, rarefied musical air. With tonality had gone thematicism and rhythmic constraint; works tended to be short statements of a single extreme musical state, justifying the term 'expressionist' (Five Orchestral Pieces; Three Pieces and Six Little Pieces for piano). The larger pieces of this period have some appropriate dramatic content: the rage and despair of a woman seaching for her lover (Erwartung), the bizarre stories, melancholia and jokes of a distintegrating personality (Pierrot lunaire, for reciter in Sprechgesang with mixed quintet), or the progress of the soul towards union with God (Die Jakobsleiter).

Gradually Schoenberg came to find the means for writing longer instrumental structures, in the 12-note serial method, and in the 1920s he returned to standard forms and genres, notably in the Suite for piano, String Quartet No 3, Orchestral Variations and several choral pieces. He also founded the Society for Private Musical Performances (1919-21), involving his pupils in the presentation of new music under favourable conditions. In 1923 his wife died (he remarried the next year), and in 1925 he moved to Berlin to take a master class at the Prussian Academy of Arts. While there he wrote much of his unfinished opera Moses und Aron which is concerned with the impossibility of communicating truth without some distortion in the telling.

In 1933 he was obliged as a Jew to leave Berlin: he went to Paris, and formally returned to the faith which he had deserted for Lutheranism in 1898. Later the same year he arrived in the USA, and he settled in Los Angeles in 1934. It was there that he returned to tonal composition, while developing serialism to make possible the more complex structures of the Violin Concerto and the String Quartet No 4. In 1936 he began teaching at UCLA and his output dwindled. After a heart attack in 1945, however, he gave up teaching and made some return to expressionism (A Survivor from Warsaw, String Trio), as well as writing religious choruses.

Piano Concerto

Schoenberg Piano Concerto, Op 42ª. Drei Klavierstücke, Op 11. Sechs Klavierstücke, Op 19. Berg Sonata for Piano, Op 1. Webern Variations, Op 27
Mitsuko Uchida pf ªCleveland Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
Philips 468 033-2PH (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●●

Uchida's distinctive musical personality and outstanding technique make her Schoenberg, Berg and Webern well worth hearing however many other version of these works you have in your collection. Uchida brings a marvellous spontaneity and sense of drama to the more overtly romantic compositions here – Berg's Sonata and Schoenberg's Op 11 Pieces. This is certainly not one of those accounts of the Berg where you question the composer's wisdom in marking the first section for repeat. As for the Schoenberg, never has one been more aware of this music's closeness in time and spirit to the cataclysmic world of the monodrama Erwartung. Uchida's earlier recording of Op 11 was warmly praised, and this one is no less accomplished. Elsewhere, her relish for strongly juxtaposed contrast risks occasional over-emphasis, as in the third of the Op 19 pieces, and the virtues of more sharply articulated playing in this repertory are demonstrated on Peter Hill's admirable super-bargain-price Naxos disc. His account of Webern's Variations is exemplary in its clarity and feeling for line; yet Uchida manages to suggest deeper links with more romantic perspectives without in any way traducing the music's inherent radicalism.

Links with romanticism are even more explicit in the texture and thematic character of Schoenberg's Concerto, and this performance places the work firmly in the tradition of Liszt and Brahms. Not even Pierre Boulez can bring ideal lucidity to the occasionally lumpy orchestral writing, but the performance as a whole, with excellent sound, has an attractive sweep and directness of utterance. Alfred Brendel's second recording (Philips) remains a fine achievment, but the orchestral playing is less refined than on the new disc, the recording drier, with a flatter perspective. Nor are Michael Gielen's readings of Schoenberg's two chamber symphonies as competitive as Uchidas's of the solo piano works.

Verklärte Nacht, Op 4

Verklärte Nacht. Pelleas und Melisande, Op 5
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG The Originals 457 721-2GOR Ⓜ
(74 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1973-74 ●●●

This is a very distinguished coupling, superbly played by the BPO – a truly 'legendary' reissue, quite unsurpassed on record. Karajan never approached contemporary music with the innate radicalism and inside knowledge of a composer-conductor like Boulez; yet he cannot be accused of distorting reality by casting a pall of late-romantic opulence and languor over these works. He is understandably most at home in the expansive and often openly tragic atmosphere of Schoenberg's early tone-poems Verklärte Nacht and Pelleas und Melisande. The richly blended playing of the BPO provides the ideal medium for Karajan's seamless projection of structure and expression. He remains especially sensitive to the music's lyricism, to the connections that to his ears override the contrasts. Although Verklärte Nacht has certainly been heard in performances less redolent of 19th-century tradition, as well as less calculated in its recorded acoustic, this remains a powerfully dramatic reading. One man's view, then: but, given the man, a notably fascinating one.

Schoenberg Verklärte Nacht, Op 4 (orig version) Ⓗ
Schubert String Quintet in C, D956
Alvin Dinkin va Kurt Reher vc Hollywood Quartet (Felix Slatkin, Paul Shure vns Paul Robyn va Eleanor Aller vc)
Testament mono SBT1031 (73 minutes: Ⓕ
ADD). Recorded 1950-51 ●●●

This was the first ever recording of Verklärte Nacht in its original sextet form and it remains unsurpassed. When it was first reviewed in Gramophone, the late Lionel Salter wrote of it as being 'beautifully played with the most careful attention to details of dynamics and phrasing, with unfailing finesse, with consistently sympathetic tone, and, most important, with a firm sense of the basic structure'. The Schubert too fully deserves its classic status. The tranquillity of the slow movement has never been conveyed with greater nobility or more perfect control. The Hollywood Quartet made music for the sheer love of it and as a relaxation from their duties in the film-studio orchestras, for which they were conspicuously overqualified. They have incomparable ensemble and blend; and their impeccable technical address and consummate tonal refinement silence criticism. To add to the pleasure, the transfers could not be better.

Schoenberg Verklärte Nacht Schubert (arr Mahler) String Quartet No 14 in D minor, D810, 'Death and the Maiden'
Norwegian Chamber Orchestra / Iona Brown
Chandos CHAN9616 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Given the wrong sort of performance, Verklärte Nacht can drag on interminably – but not here. Iona Brown's reading with the Norwegian Chamber Orchestra lends every instrumental exchange the immediacy of live theatre: her lovers are voluble, unstinting and spontaneously communicative. There is colour in every bar: Schoenberg's ceaseless shifts in tone and tempo seem freshly credible, and the sum effect is extraordinarily compelling. The up-front recording further compounds a sense of urgency; only the closing pages seem a trifle uncomfortable with such close scrutiny.

Rivals, however, are plentiful. Among older alternatives, Karajan and the BPO are the most tonally alluring; but Brown runs it close, and her young Norwegian players are with her virtually every bar of the way. No digital rival is quite as good. The Schubert-Mahler also offers further confirmation of a genuine artistic alliance. Mahler's bolstered textures work least well in the second movement, something that even Brown's advocacy doesn't quite compensate for; but the rest is shot through with genuine passion and vitality. A memorable disc.

Variations for Orchestra

Variations for Orchestra, Op 31. Pelleas und Melisande
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
Erato 2292-45827-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ●●

The two faces of Schoenberg could scarcely be more starkly juxtaposed than they are on this superbly performed and magnificently recorded disc – Boulez and the CSO at their formidable best. Pelleas und Melisande can be taken not only as Schoenberg's 'answer' to Debussy's opera (also based on Maeterlinck's play) but as his challenge to Richard Strauss's supremacy as a composer of symphonic poems. It is indeed an intensely symphonic score in Schoenberg's early, late-romantic vein, with an elaborate single-movement structure and a subtle network of thematic cross-references. Yet none of this is an end in itself, and the music is as gripping and immediate a representation of a tragic love story as anything in the German romantic tradition. To move from this to the abstraction of the 12-note Variations, Op 31 may threaten extreme anticlimax. Yet from the delicate introduction of the work's shapely theme to the turbulent good humour of the extended finale Schoenberg proves that his new compositional method did not drain his musical language of expressive vitality. The elaborate counterpoint may not make for easy listening, but the combination of exuberance and emotion is irresistible – at least in a performance like this.

Further Listening
Zemlinsky Die Seejungfrau
Couplings: Psalm XIII. Psalm XXIII.
Ernest Senff Chamber Chorus; Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra / Chailly
Decca Entartete Musik 444 969-2DH Ⓕ
(65 minutes: DDD: 6/87[R])

Zemlinsky's The mermaid, a three-movement symphonic fantasy based on the Hans Andersen story, is a sumptuous and imaginative sea symphony. Don't miss it.

Chamber Symphony

Awards 1995

Chamber Symphony No 1, Op 9[a]. Erwartung[b]. Variations for Orchestra, Op 31[c]
Phyllis Bryn-Julson sop [a]Birmingham Contemporary Music Group; [bc]City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 555212-2 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1993 ●●●

This well-filled disc offers an unusually comprehensive survey of the essential Schoenberg – the irascible late-Romantic of the Chamber Symphony (1906), the radical expressionist of Erwartung (1909) and, in the Variations (1928), the synthesizer of expressionist moods with techniques that set up neo-classical associations. Rattle's account of the Chamber Symphony may well surpass that of the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra in the demonstration quality of the sound, which has remarkable depth and realism. Rattle ensures a superbly well characterised and integrated performance, which only veers towards over-emphasis at the very end. There is also ample refinement where that is called for, and this quality is no less abundant in Erwartung. Here the almost impressionistic sheen of the orchestral sound fits well with Phyllis Bryn-Julson's generally restrained approach to the vocal line. When it comes to the Variations for Orchestra, Rattle and the CBSO are supreme.

This recording may well be the first to convey the full, astonishing range of the work's textures, from the most delicate chamber music to dense tuttis, without a hint of artificiality. But it is the interpretation which counts for most. Rattle brings all these textures to rhythmic and expressive life, avoiding the lumpiness and stridency which occasionally afflict other conductors. He has taken enormous care to follow Schoenberg's detailed markings, yet the result has a sovereign spontaneity. Despite strong competition from Boulez this performance is a triumph.

Five Orchestral Pieces, Op 16

Five Orchestral Pieces, Op 16. A Survivor from Warsaw, Op 46[cd]. Begleitmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene, Op 34. Herzgewächse, Op 20[a]. Serenade, Op 24[be]
[a]Eileen Hulse sop [b]Stephen Varcoe bar [c]Simon Callow narr [d]London Voices; [e]Twentieth Century Classics Ensemble; London Symphony Orchestra / Robert Craft
Koch International Classics 37263-2 Ⓕ
(69 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

This is an absorbing issue, not least for the sheer variety of works that it contains. The two largest compositions, Op 16 and Op 24, define the disc's range. The Five Orchestral Pieces, in which expressionism can be heard emerging from the chrysalis of late romanticism, are played with supreme finesse by the LSO, and Robert Craft probes the richly diverse textures with exemplary concentration and precision. The downside is some loss of immediacy. There are also slight reservations about the balance in A Survivor from Warsaw, where Simon Callow is, one imagines, placed behind the orchestra, depriving this harrowing work of its visceral impact. A closer focus would have been preferable. Herzgewächse and Begleitmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene are both well performed, the latter with a recessed perspective, similar to that in Op 16, which ensures an extremely well-blended texture without loss of detail. Nevertheless, the finest performance here is that of the Serenade, Op 24, where the sound (recorded in New York, not in London) is cleaner, and the characterization is superb from beginning to end. Stephen Varcoe is a rather breathy singer in the dauntingly angular and wide-ranging 'Sonnet', but the performance as a whole makes a convincing case for the work's high level of musical thought and purely technical mastery.

String Quartets

String Quartets[a] – No 1 in D minor, Op 7; No 2 in F sharp minor, Op 10; No 3, Op 30; No 4, Op 37; D. Verklärte Nacht, Op 4[afg]. Chamber Symphony No 1 in E, Op 9 (arr Webern)[ah]. Sechs Klavierstücke, Op 19[a]. Wind Quintet, Op 26 (both arr Guittart)[af]. Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra (after Handel's Concerto grosso, Op 6 No 7)[ai]. Ode to Napoleon, Op 41[aeh]. String Trio, Op 45[b]. Phantasy, Op 47[bh]
[a]Schoenberg Quartet
([bc]Janneke van der Meer, Wim de Jong vns [b]Henk Guittart va [b]Viola de Hoog vc) with [d]Susan Narucki sop [e]Michael Grandage spkr [f]Jan Erik van Regteren va [g]Taco Kooistra vc
[h]Sepp Grotenhuis pf [i]Arnhem Philharmonic Orchestra / Roberto Benzi
Chandos ⑤ CHAN9939 (319 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000

The Schoenberg Quartet adopt an unashamedly Romantic approach in the early D major Quartet, stressing its inheritance from Brahms and Dvořák. This feels right in context, and leads on seamlessly to a raptly expressive reading of Verklärte Nacht. More restrained than the Brandis and less overwrought than the Juilliard recordings, it represents a viable modern alternative to the fabled Hollywood Quartet, and restores a sense of intimacy too often lost now that the string orchestra transcription has become the better known version.

Even more than in their earlier account of the First Quartet, the Schoenbergs have found the balance between highlighting salient detail and the long-range cohesiveness that this intricately structured work needs. Theirs is an engrossing but never exhausting interpretation, the coda suffused with a repose such as Schoenberg was never again to attain so completely. If the First Chamber Symphony makes effortless listening in comparison, this is because Webern's skilful 'working reduction' removes the hectic confrontation of wind and strings, though this lucid and animated performance is admittedly easier on the ears than the Arditti's more highly pressurised reading. The Second Quartet is the one, surprising disappointment here. The scherzo's malevolence is rather flaccidly conveyed, and the music's pained transcendence eludes this performance by a small but significant margin.

The Third Quartet, however, is superb. Years of coaching from the late Jenö Lehner, second violinist of the Kolisch Quartet, have enabled the Schoenbergs to endow this often intractable-seeming music with a grace and rhythmic buoyancy unmatched since the Kolisches themselves (try the Adagio to hear this rarely achieved combination).

If the Fourth Quartet isn't quite as convincing, it packs a powerful emotional punch, and scales heights of eloquence in the fervent Largo. As with Bartók's Sixth Quartet, outward form here is radically redefined by an inner expressive force. The path to these mature and disquieting masterpieces is laid with first recordings of Henk Guittart's revelatory quartet transcription of the Op 19 Piano Pieces – Webernian in size but not in expression – and his ambitious rethink of the Wind Quintet for string quintet; an altogether more ingratiating listen than the original, and one which might just give this unloved piece a new lease of life.

The String Trio is powerfully realised, suffusing this desperate masterpiece with a vision which is never less than moving. Janneke van der Meer ably realises the craggy eloquence of the Phantasy, Schoenberg's final chamber work.

Cleanly recorded in a number of sympathetic acoustics, this is a testament to 25 years of dedicated interpretative prowess by the Schoenberg Quartet. This is music they care about with a passion, and their performances convey that belief in ample measure. However well you think you know this fascinating and often inspiring music, do acquire this set.

String Quartets – No 1, Op 7; No 2 in F sharp minor, Op 10[a]; No 3, Op 30; No 4, Op 37
[a]Dawn Upshaw sop Arditti Quartet
(Irvine Arditti, David Alberman vns Garth Knox va Rohan de Saram vc)
Auvidis Montaigne ② MO782135 Ⓜ
(139 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993 ●

These recordings were made in London, in collaboration with the BBC, and the sound is consistently spacious, with a natural clarity and an even balance; the details of Schoenberg's complex counterpoint, as evident in No 1 as in No 4, can be heard with a minimum of stress and strain. Though one occasionally gets the impression that the Arditti is relatively cool in its response to this often fervent music, the overall mood they create is far from anti-romantic, and they call on a very wide range of dynamics and tone colours. Even if every nuance in Schoenberg's markings is not followed, this is warmly expressive playing. Dawn Upshaw's contribution to the Second Quartet also helps to heighten the drama although she misses some of that mysterious, ecstatic quality which makes this music so haunting. It is in the Third and Fourth Quartets that the superior sound quality of the Auvidis Montaigne issue pays greatest dividends. Textural clarity is vital here, and although even the Arditti struggles to sustain the necessary lightness in the long second movement of No 4, their wider dynamic range brings you close to the toughly argued, emotionally expansive essence of this music. Yet the performance of No 3 is the finest achievement of the set: clarity of form and emotional conviction combine to create an absorbing account of a modern masterwork. It sets the seal on a most distinguished enterprise.

Songs

2 Balladen, Op 12 – Jane Grey[a]; Der verlorene Haufen[b]. Das Buch der hängenden Gärten, Op 15[a]. Lieder, Op 1 – Dank[b]. Lieder, Op 2[a]. Lieder, Op 3 – Die Aufgeregten[b]; Warnung[b]; Geübtes Herz[b]. Lieder, Op 6 – Lockung[a]; Traumleben[b]
[a]Sarah Connolly mez [b]Roderick Williams bar Iain Burnside pf
Black Box BBM1072 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002 ●●

These performances were originally recorded for BBC Radio 3's regular and imaginative series, Voices. They sound like very well-prepared performances, for a start: singers and pianist have obviously spent much time thinking about the texts and working out what their voices can do with these songs. Both singers as a result expand to the demands of the music.

Roderick Williams's fine-grained baritone copes well with some of the bigger utterances here; only in the huge and awkward intervals of 'Traumleben' is there any hint of strain, and both baritone and pianist find real power and drama in 'Der verlorene Haufen' and in that, as Burnside acknowledges in his booklet note, quite repulsive (but repulsively fascinating) song 'Warnung'. The splendid, Brahmsian (but then distinctly Wagnerian) 'Dank' opens the recital most inspiritingly.

The amount of work that Burnside and Sarah Connolly put into preparing Das Buch der hängenden Gärten is obvious throughout, in subtle phrasing and colouring, intimacy of expression and scrupulous attention to Stefan George's often obscure and feverish words. A very fine reading, and Burnside is throughout outstandingly imaginative.

All the songs here were recorded in as little as three days, but all three musicians sound as though they had lived with them for months at least. A distinguished and absorbing recital, the recording admirably combining intimacy with space.

Choral Works

Friede auf Erden, Op 13. Kol nidre, Op 39. Drei Volkslieder, Op 49. Zwei Kanons – Wenn der schwer Gedrückte klagt; O dass der Sinnen doch so viele sind!. Drei Volkslieder (1929) – Es gingen zwei Gespielen gut; Herzlieblich Lieb, durch Scheiden; Schein uns, du liebe Sonne. Vier Stücke, Op 27. Drei Satiren, Op 28. Sechs Stücke, Op 35. Dreimal tausen Jahre, Op 50. De profundis (Psalm 130), Op 50*b*. Modern Psalm (Der erste Psalm), Op 50*c*. A Survivor from Warsaw, Op 46
John Shirley-Quirk, Günter Reich narrs BBC Singers; BBC Chorus and Symphony Orchestra; London Sinfonietta / Pierre Boulez
Sony Classical ② SM2K44571
(105 minutes: DDD/ADD). Texts and translations Ⓑ
included. Recorded 1976-86 ●

Pierre Boulez's recordings of Schoenberg have been appearing at irregular intervals over many years. This two-disc compilation of choral works includes performances recorded on three separate occasions in 1982, 1984 and 1986, as well as transferring the 1976 recording of A Survivor from Warsaw, originally coupled on LP with three purely orchestral works. There's no lack of interpretative consistency in what we hear, however. By 1976 Boulez was a seasoned Wagner conductor, and while it may be simplistic to ascribe the weightiness and spaciousness of these Schoenberg performances to his experiences at Bayreuth, the generally recessed sound-perspective strongly suggests a desire to turn the BBC's Maida Vale studios into a much larger and more resonant hall. This distancing is especially evident in John Shirley-Quirk's declamation of the text of Kol nidre, one of Schoenberg's later and more substantial sacred compositions. Once you adjust to the balance, the performance itself has an appropriately fervent atmosphere, as do the accounts of the other works involving narrator, chorus and orchestra, the unfinished Modern Psalm and A Survivor from Warsaw. Both are characteristically intense and exultant, the Psalm with some particularly telling orchestral interjections, A Survivor from Warsaw with its climactic choral hymn (sung in Hebrew, though the booklet fails to provide transliterations of the Hebrew text both for this and for Psalm 130). Günter Reich's memorably dramatic (but not melodramatic) narration in A Survivor from Warsaw benefits from his relatively forward placing.

Most of the music on the discs is for chamber choir, usually unaccompanied. Boulez's expressiveness tends to be fairly generalised, creating and sustaining an overall mood rather than responding to every nuance of the text. The BBC Singers are technically excellent, but the recording magnifies the collective vibrato, the tonal fruitiness which can blur textural definition, especially in the close-knit part-writing of the six pieces for male choir, Op 35. Where the late-Romantic sheen Boulez casts over Schoenberg's harmony works best is in such beautifully turned exercises in nostalgia as the German folk-song arrangements, especially the ravishingly beautiful 'Schein uns, du liebe Sonne'. Fortunately the singers find the necessary incisiveness for the Op 27 and Op 28 collections, even if a drier acoustic might have helped to clarify the convoluted lines of the problematic Op 27 No 4, 'Der Wunsch der Liebhabers'. A firm recommendation.

Gurrelieder

Awards 2002

Karita Mattila sop Anne Sofie von Otter mez Thomas Moser ten Philip Langridge ten Thomas Quasthoff bass-bar Berlin Radio Chorus; MDR Radio Chorus, Leipzig; Ernst Senff Choir; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI ② 557303-2 (110 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded 2001 ●●●

Apparently Rattle told the Berlin Philharmonic to play Gurrelieder 'as though it were Daphnis et Chloé', which sounds crazy until you listen to the result: indeed, the sonorities do rather often sound subtly and delicately French. It seems obvious from this performance that Rattle also means it when he says that Gurrelieder is 'the world's largest string quartet'. Not literally; more an extraordinary richness of multi-coloured chamber textures. You will certainly also notice how rarely the full resources of Schoenberg's gargantuan orchestra are called for (all the more satisfyingly vast when they are). And this of course has an effect on the soloists: none of them is required to force. Karita Mattila, too, gains from this more intimate approach, floating over exquisite orchestral textures in her first song and touching the second very lightly, though in the fourth she can manage both a splendid opening out and an ethereal close. Anne Sofie von Otter has a brighter voice than many exponents of the Wood Dove, better at quieter expressiveness than the wild, gutturally expressed grief of Brigitte Fassbaender, still unrivalled in this role in Riccardo Chailly's recording; but von Otter is in no way inadequate to her task. Langridge is vividly characterful as Klaus-Narr, Thomas Quasthoff a fine Peasant and a vehement Speaker. The choral singing is first-class, the orchestral playing superfine and the recording – a mixture of live and studio performances – both detailed and spacious. That Rattle loves this score is obvious throughout. There are several fine accounts of Gurrelieder in the current catalogue, of which Chailly's has for a long while been a favourite; his soloists are at least as fine as Rattle's, but Rattle's control of rubato, his readiness to adopt more relaxed tempos and to allow silences to register are all tangible advantages. Rattle now replaces Chailly at the head of the list.

Gurrelieder
Melanie Diener sop Jennifer Lane mez Stephen O'Mara, Martyn Hill tens
David Wilson-Johnson bass
Ernst Haefliger spkr Simon Joly Chorale; Philharmonia Orchestra / Robert Craft
Koch International Classics ② KICCD7542 Ⓜ
(118 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included ●

A quite remarkable disc. On the evidence of this superb performance we have quite clearly been underestimating Robert Craft. Precision and finely moulded detail are evident throughout, at least as clearly as in Chailly's and Rattle's accounts, but in Craft's case one is no less often aware of sumptuous richness, passionate eloquence and sheer, satisfying orchestral weight. He is also more prepared than rivals to adopt broad tempos and expressive but never slack rubato. Despite a few tiny reservations it a more thrilling account than either of the rivals mentioned above and carries something of the excitement of a live performance.

Stephen O'Mara has the sort of voice that one associates with Wagner's Siegmund but with a fine sense of line and sufficient variety of dynamic to open out stirringly at climaxes. There have been more expressive Toves than Melanie Diener, but not many who are so firm-voiced and steady. Jennifer Lane is an excellent Wood Dove, dramatic and expressive, David Wilson-Johnson a grippingly vehement peasant, while anyone who thinks of Martyn Hill as a typically understating English tenor will be astonished by his Klaus-Narr, which is vividly acted and firm of voice. In his 83rd year Ernst Haefliger is an extraordinarily lively, urgent Speaker. The Simon Joly Chorale are inspiritingly full-voiced, singing out like heroes.

Yet most of the memorable moments of this performance are Craft's and the Philharmonia's: the wonderfully glittering chamber textures of the penultimate scene, the passion and savagery of the orchestral interlude that heralds the death of Tove, the tumultuous power of the 'wild hunt'. Gurrelieder has been exceptionally fortunate on disc in recent years, but this recording (whose sound is often magnificently full and spacious) need fear none of its rivals.

Gurrelieder
Susan Dunn sop Brigitte Fassbaender mez
Siegfried Jerusalem, Peter Haage tens
Hermann Becht bass Hans Hotter narr St Hedwig's Cathedral Choir, Berlin; Dusseldorf Musikverin Chorus; Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra / Riccardo Chailly
Double Decca ② 473 728-2 Ⓜ
(101 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included
Recorded 1985 ●

This vast cantata, a direct descendant of Wagnerian music-drama, was for the turn-of-the-century musical scene in general, more the ultimate gorgeous sunset. Schoenberg's forces are, to put it mildly, extravagant.

As well as the six soloists and two choruses, the orchestra sports such luxuries as four piccolos, ten horns and a percussion battery that includes iron chains; and so complex are some of the textures that, to achieve a satisfactory balance, a near miracle is required of conductor and recording engineers. Decca has never been mean with miracles where large-scale forces are concerned and this set is no exception. Chailly gives us a superbly theatrical presentation of the score.

The casting of the soloists is near ideal. Susan Dunn's Tove has youth, freshness and purity on her side. So exquisitely does she float her lines that you readily sympathise with King Waldemar's rage at her demise. Siegfried Jerusalem has the occasional rough moment but few previous Waldemars on disc have possessed his heroic ringing tones and range of expression. And Decca makes sure that its trump card, the inimitable Hans Hotter as the speaker in 'The wild hunt of the summer wind', is so tangibly projected that we miss not one single vowel or consonant of his increasing animation and excitement at that final approaching sunrise.

Pierrot lunaire

Pierrot lunaire, Op 21. Herzgewächse, Op 20. Ode to Napoleon, Op 41
Christine Schäfer sop David Pittman-Jennings narr
Ensemble InterContemporain / Pierre Boulez
DG 457 630-2GH (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●

Pierre Boulez's third recording of Pierrot lunaire is an intense yet intimate reading, recorded in a way that is positively anti-resonant, and which veers, like the music itself, between harshness and reticence. Boulez's second recording (for Sony Classical), with Yvonne Minton, has long been notorious as the 'sung' Pierrot, flouting the composer's specific instructions about recitation. This time Christine Schäfer is more speech-orientated, the few fully sung notes perfectly pitched, and although slidings-away from sustained sounds are on the whole avoided, the effect is superbly dramatic in the work's more expressionistic movements.

The work's existence in a strange world half-way between cabaret and concert hall is admirably caught. Boulez's first recording of the Ode to Napoleon was with David Wilson-Johnson and the Ensemble InterContemporain (also Sony Classical), and this one is a more than adequate replacement. David Pittman-Jennings has a heavy voice, but he skilfully inflects the sketchily notated dynamics of the vocal part, and the instrumental backing is forceful and well nuanced. The sound may be clinically dry, but when the performance has such expressive immediacy, this is scarcely a serious drawback.

The disc is completed by the brief, exotic Maeterlinck setting from 1911, whose hugely demanding vocal line deters all but the hardiest. Christine Schäfer copes, while the accompaniment for celesta, harmonium and harp weaves its usual spell. A thoroughly memorable disc.

Moses und Aron

David Pittman-Jennings narr Moses; Chris Merritt ten Aron; László Polgár bass Priest; Gabriele Fontana sop Young Girl, First Naked Woman; Yvonne Naef mez Invalid Woman; John Graham Hall ten Young Man, Naked Youth; Per Lindskog ten Youth; Henk de Vries bar Young Man; Siegfried Lorenz bar Another Young Man;
Chorus of the Netherlands Opera; Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
DG ② 449 174-2GH2 (106 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes,text and translation included
Recorded 1995 ●

Moses und Aron is respected rather than loved, with the reputation of being a tough assignment for all concerned. One of the essays in the booklet accompanying this recording calls it a didactic opera. Pierre Boulez, however, is a conductor in whom didacticism is close to a passion, and he is obviously passionate about this opera. We take it for granted that in any work to which he feels close, every detail will be both accurate and audible. But for Schoenberg Moses und Aron was a warning as well as a homily, and as much a confession of faith as either. Boulez, often himself a Moses preaching against anti-modern backsliding, is at one with Schoenberg here.

Some such reason, surely, has led to this being not only a performance of immaculate clarity, but of intense and eloquent beauty and powerful drama too. The recording was made during a run of stage performances, but in the Concertgebouw in Amsterdam, not in the theatre. In the beautiful acoustic of their own hall, the orchestra plays with ample richness and precision, and the sometimes complex textures benefit enormously from a perceptible space around them.

The choral singing matches the orchestral playing in quality: beautiful in tone, eloquently urgent, vividly precise in the difficult spoken passages. The soloists are all admirable, with no weak links. Merritt in particular seems to have all that the hugely taxing role of Aron demands: a fine control of long line, intelligently expressive use of words, where necessary the dangerous demagogue's glamour. Pittman-Jennings is a properly prophetic Moses, grand of voice. This is one of Boulez's finest achievements and a compelling argument for Moses und Aron as an anything but coldly didactic opera.

Franz Schreker Austrian 1878-1934

Schreker studied with Fuchs at the Vienna Conservatory (1892-1900) and won success with his ballet Der Geburtstag der Infantin (1908) and still more with his opera Der ferne Klang (1912), which established his mastery of a harmonically rich, luxuriantly eventful orchestral style, used to suggest the surreal power of music over the characters. In 1908 he established the Philharmonic Choir, which performed many new works, and in 1912 was invited to teach at the Music Academy in Vienna, from where he moved in 1920 to the directorship of the Berlin Musikhochschule: for the next 10 years his fame was at its peak. Meanwhile the operas Die Gezeichneten (1918) and Der Schatzgräber (1920) had shown a more Wagnerian manner, though he returned to his earlier style, influenced by the more expressionist Strauss, in Irrelohe (1924). Der singende Teufel (1928) and Der Schmied von Gent (1932) are more neo-classical, but continue his abiding concern with the metaphysics of artistic creation (he wrote all his own librettos). Christophorus (1927), unperformed in his lifetime and dedicated to Schoenberg, is the most extraordinary expression of his existential anguish and vision of voluptuousness. His few non-operatic works include a Chamber Symphony (1916) and songs.

Overtures and Preludes

Prelude to a Drama. Valse lente. Ekkehard, Op 12. Symphonic Interlude. Nachtstück. Fantastic Overture, Op 15
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Vassily Sinaisky
Chandos CHAN9797 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Sumptuously performed and unflinchingly recorded, this collection will be seized on by Schreker enthusiasts, and they will enjoy every massively scored climax, every gorgeously coloured, embroidered and encrusted texture. Those who are only Schreker enthusiasts north-north-west may need to be warned that the climaxes are pretty frequent and that the textures are in constant flux. Listening to this programme uninterrupted is recommended only to addicts; others may wonder whether Schreker isn't repeating himself. All are operatic preludes or entr'actes (from Die Gezeichneten, Der Schatzgräber and Der ferne Klang respectively), and all serve similar functions: to represent in a darkened auditorium erotic acts or emotions that could scarcely be represented on a stage.

The Valse lente is balletic light music, softly and delicately scored. Ekkehard is a tone-poem about a monk who falls in love with a Duchess and goes to war to defend her: each of these aspects has its own theme, and they are turbulently developed before a peaceful conclusion on Ekkehard's 'monastic' melody over a palpable organ pedal. No programme is stated for the Fantastic Overture, but it approaches the three big dramatic pieces in richness. Not many composers demand quite so much of a vast orchestra as Schreker, and Sinaisky and his orchestra amply fulfil those demands.

Die Gezeichneten

Heinz Kruse ten Alviano Salvago; Elizabeth Connell sop Carlotta; Monte Pederson bar Count Vitelozzo Tamare; Alfred Muff bass Duke Adorno/Capitaneo di Giustizia; Lászlo Polgar bass Lodovico Nardi, Podesta; Christiane Berggold mez Martuccia; Martin Petzold ten Pietro; Robert Wörle ten Guidobald Usodimare; Endrik Wottrich ten Menaldo Negroni; Oliver Widmer bar Michelotto Cibo; Matthias Goerne bass-bar Gonsalvo Fieschi; Kristin Sigmundsson bass Julian Pinelli; Petteri Salomaa bass Paolo Calvi; Marita Posselt sop Ginevra Scotti; Reinhard Ginzel ten First Senator; Jörg Gottschick bass Second Senator; Friedrich Molsberger bass Third Senator; Herbert Lippert ten A youth; Berlin Radio Chorus; Deutsches Symphony Orchestra, Berlin / Lothar Zagrosek
Decca Entartete Musik ③ 444 442-2DHO3 Ⓕ
(171 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1993-94 ●●

The mingling in Die Gezeichneten of post-Salome opulence with post-Salome gaminess of subject matter is indeed strong stuff. Carlotta, a beautiful but gravely ill painter knows that her health would never withstand physical love. She is loved, he believes hopelessly, by the monstrously ugly nobleman Alviano; she is desired by the licentious Count Tamare. Drawn by the beauty of Alviano's soul she at first declares her love for him, but then deserts him for Tamare. On learning that she gave herself to Tamare voluntarily, knowing the fatal consequences, Alviano first kills his rival, then goes mad. Schreker's sheer resourcefulness is breathtaking. Each character seems to have not merely an identifying theme but a whole sound world. Scenes of extreme complexity are handled with total assurance. The score is melodious, fabulously multi-coloured and has great cumulative power. One reservation was hinted at by Alban Berg's reaction to the libretto: he found it superb but 'a bit kitschy'. It is, and this quality is intensified in the music by a curious impassivity. Carlotta's 'conversion' from spiritual to physical love is not accompanied by much change in her alluringly mysterious music; her characterization is fantastically detailed but has no depth. She, Alviano and Tamare are ideas, not people. It is an opera in which richness of detail, complexity of texture and sheer glamour replace humanity. The end is 'effective' but not tragic. Nevertheless, as a document of its time (1918) and as a score of unprecedented richness it abundantly deserves recording.

Zagrosek's reading is superb, his cast almost without flaw. Connell has all Carlotta's glamour, together with a purity of tone and a subtle response to words and phrasing that come close to giving her a soul. Kruse is less imaginative, one or two of Alviano's high notes give him trouble, but he sings strongly and lyrically; Pederson makes a grippingly formidable, physical opponent.

The precision and detail of the subsidiary characters are praiseworthy throughout. The recording is remarkably fine.

Franz Schubert

Austrian 1797-1828

GROVE Schubert, son of a schoolmaster, showed an extraordinary childhood aptitude for music, studying the piano, violin, organ, singing and harmony and, while a chorister in the imperial court chapel, composition with Salieri (1808-13). By 1814 he had produced piano pieces, settings of Schiller and Metastasio, string quartets, his first symphony and a three-act opera. Although family pressure dictated that he teach in his father's school, he continued to compose prolifically; his huge output of 1814-15 includes Gretchen am Spinnrade and Erlkönig (both famous for their text-painting) among numerous songs, besides two more symphonies, three masses and four stage works. From this time he enjoyed the companionship of several friends: frequently gathering for domestic evenings of Schubert's music (later called 'Schubertiads'), this group more than represented the new phenomenon of an educated, musically aware middle class, it gave him an appreciative audience and influential contacts as well as the confidence, in 1818, to break with schoolteaching. More songs poured out, including Der Wanderer and Die Forelle, and instrumental pieces – inventive piano sonatas, some tuneful, Rossinian overtures, the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies – began to show increased harmonic subtlety.

In 1820-21 aristocratic patronage, further introductions and new friendships augured well. Schubert's admirers issued 20 of his songs by private subscription, and he and Schober collaborated on Alfonso und Estrella. Though full of outstanding music, it was rejected. Strained friendships, pressing financial need and serious illness – Schubert almost certainly contracted syphilis in late 1822 – made this a dark period, which however encompassed some remarkable creative work: the epic Wandererfantasie for piano, the passionate, two-movement Eighth Symphony (Unfinished), the exquisite Schöne Müllerin song cycle, Die Verschworenen and the opera Fierabras. In 1824 he turned to instrumental forms, producing the A minor and D minor (Death and the Maiden) string quartets and the lyrically expansive Octet for wind and strings; around this time he at least sketched the Great C major Symphony. With his reputation in Vienna now steadily growing Schubert entered a more assured phase. He wrote mature piano sonatas, notably the one in A minor, some magnificent songs and his last, highly characteristic String Quartet, in G. 1827-28 saw not only the production of Winterreise and two piano trios but a marked increase in press coverage of his music; and he was elected to the Vienna Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. But though he gave a full-scale public concert in March 1828 and worked diligently to satisfy publishers – composing some of his greatest music in his last year, despite failing health – appreciation remained limited. At his death, aged 31, he was mourned not only for his achievement but for 'still fairer hopes'.

Schubert's fame was long limited to that of a songwriter, since the bulk of his large output was not even published, and some not even performed, until the late 19th century. Yet, beginning with the Fifth Symphony and the 'Trout' Quintet, he produced major instrumental masterpieces. These are marked by an intense lyricism, a spontaneous chromatic modulation that is surprising to the ear yet clearly purposeful and often beguilingly expressive, and, not least, an imagination that creates its own formal structures. His way with sonata form, whether in an unorthodox choice of key for secondary material (Symphony in B minor, 'Trout' Quintet) or of subsidiary ideas for the development, makes clear his maturity and individuality. The greatest of his chamber works is acknowledged to be the String Quintet in C, with its rich sonorities, intensity and lyricism, and in the slow movement depth of feeling engendered by the sustained outer sections embracing a central impassioned section in F minor. Among the piano sonatas, the last three represent another summit of achievement. His greatest orchestral masterpiece is the Great C major Symphony, with its remarkable formal synthesis, rhythmic vitality, felicitous orchestration and lyric beauty. Among the choral works, the partsongs and masses rely on homophonic texture and bold harmonic shifts for their effect; the masses in A flat and E flat are particularly successful.

Schubert effectively established the German Lied as a new art form in the 19th century. He was helped by the late 18th-century outburst of lyric poetry and the new possibilities for picturesque accompaniment offered by the piano, but his own genius is by far the most important factor. Reasons for their abiding popularity rest not only in the direct appeal of Schubert's melody and the general attractiveness of his idiom but also in his unfailing ability to capture musically both the spirit of a poem and much of its external detail. He uses harmony to represent emotional change (for example, magically shifting to a 3rd related key) and accompaniment figuration to illustrate poetic images (moving water, a church bell).

Schubert's discovery of Wilhelm Müller's narrative lyrics gave rise to his further development of the Lied by means of the song cycle. Again, his two masterpieces were almost without precedent and are unsurpassed. Both identify nature with human suffering, Die schöne Müllerin evoking a pastoral sound-language, and Winterreise a more intensely Romantic, universal, profoundly tragic quality.

Symphonies

No 1 in D, D82; No 2 in B flat, D125; No 3 in D, D200; No 4 in C minor, D417, 'Tragic'; No 5 in B flat, D485; No 6 in C, D589; No 8 in B minor, D759, 'Unfinished'; No 9 in C, D944, 'Great'

Awards 1989

Symphonies Nos 1-6, 8 and 9. Grand Duo in C, D812 (orch J Joachim). Rosamunde, D644 – Overture, 'Die Zauberharfe'
Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Claudio Abbado
DG ⑤ 423 651-2GH5 Ⓕ
(320 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1986-87 ●●●

Even from a conductor who had actively encouraged the Chamber Orchestra of Europe from the start, it is a remarkable tribute that Claudio Abbado chose this superb band of young musicians, founded by former members of the European Community Youth Orchestra, for this major Schubert project. A more obvious choice would have been the Vienna Phil-harmonic, or for that matter either of the other great orchestras with which he had been closely associated. But Abbado's confidence in his young players was repaid with compound interest. For all their fine qualities, his previous recordings of the central Viennese classics have never been remarkable for their warmth. With the COE in Schubert it is different. These are performances, recorded in three different venues, mainly in the Konzerthaus in Vienna, but also at Watford Town Hall, which have an authentic Schubertian glow. Anyone worried that a band with the words 'Chamber Orchestra' in the title might sound too puny for the later symphonies, need have no worries at all. The playing here is as satisfyingly powerful as it is polished, Abbado bringing an extra imaginative dimension without losing anything in freshness. Added to that, he uses specially edited texts for the six symphonies not included in the Neue Schubert-Ausgabe, with important and at times striking results.

So the middle section of the first subject in the Great C major Symphony has a semiquaver figure in the oboe melody quite different from what we have become used to, and four bars which Brahms cut from the Scherzo when he was editing the old Schubert-Ausgabe have been restored. Conversely the additional bars that Brahms added to the Fourth and Sixth Symphonies have been omitted. Abbado admits: 'There was some soul-searching on my part about the desirability of reversing some of Brahms's quite sensitive editorial decisions: the four bars he cut in the Scherzo of the Great C major, for example, are not Schubert's strongest'. On any count Schubertians will find refreshment here not just in the performances but in the texts too, and though any idea that the Grand Duo for piano duet was the missing 'Symphony No 7' has long been exploded, it is good to have that as a supplement to the authentic cycle in the arrangement made – at Brahms's suggestion – by Joseph Joachim. In principle the lovely slow movement of the Tragic Symphony may be too Romantic as Abbado presents it, but with yearningly tender oboe playing, it is the most winning account of all on record. The only place where Abbado's subtle pointing dangerously draws attention to itself is in the Unfinished Symphony. There in the first movement, the second subject has Abbado starting each phrase with a slight agogic hesitation, very beautiful and very refined, but not really so effective as the simpler, folk-like treatment favoured by others. Yet his slowing for the ominous opening of the development section in that movement adds superbly to the tremendous power of the climax as it builds up, a totally justified freedom of expression, the mark of a master interpreter.

In the Great C major, too, the hand of a master, the touches of individuality, the moments of freedom, give Abbado's reading an extra weight lacking in other interpretations. Abbado's extra items are generous too, not just the Rosamunde Overture but the Joachim arrangement of the Grand Duo, not likely to be confused with an original Schubert symphony but bringing illumination to a work which in the very forces involved – piano duet – gets unjustly neglected. With its fresh look at the texts, its refined and imaginative performances, sunnily expressive, powerful and intense, this Abbado set has to be the first recommendation, guaranteed to bring joy and illumination.

Symphonies Nos 1-9
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Karl Böhm
DG Collectors Edition ④ 471 307-2GB4 Ⓑ
(250 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1963-71

These are marvellous performances: vibrant, clear, characterful and effortlessly well played. The recordings, too, still seem new-minted, even the Ninth, the first of the symphonies to be recorded. The Berliners' art is the art that disguises art. Böhm never feels the need to do anything clever but just quietly sees to it that this superb orchestra plays at its best. Böhm's way with the two late symphonies is, in fact, highly sophisticated. The Unfinished begins in what seems to be a leisurely fashion but his performance of the first movement catches Schubert's mix of lyricism and high drama with extraordinary acuity. Conversely, the second movement seems swift but brings the work full circle with an equally extraordinary sense of calm and catharsis in the final pages. The celebrated 1963 Ninth out-Furtwänglers Furtwängler in the myriad means it uses within a single grand design to capture the symphony's sense of danger and derring-do in addition to its lyricism, nobility, and earthy Austrian charm.

In the early symphonies, Böhm's approach is simpler-seeming and more direct. Rhythms are so finely propelled, the pulse so effortlessly sustained, the music always lands on its feet. The zest comes from the stylish Berlin string-playing; melodically, it is the woodwinds (every one a Lieder singer) who catch the beauty of Schubert's melodies and the skirl of the attendant descants. You won't find yourself tiring of Böhm's approach; he doesn't give in to irritating idiosyncrasies (à la Harnoncourt), but ensures that the Schubertian stream is always clear to the eye and sweet to the taste.

Symphonies Nos 1-6, 8 and 9
Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec ④ 4509-91184-2 (284 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1992 ●

Harnoncourt, like Abbado on DG, has researched Schubert's own manuscripts, and corrected many unauthentic amendments that found their way into the printed editions of the symphonies, such as the eight bars later added to the Fourth Symphony's first movement exposition; but the differences between Harnoncourt's interpretative Schubert and Abbado's are startling. The Ninth's finale, unlike Abbado's, a whirling, spinning vivace – is borne aloft on astonishingly precise articulation of its rhythms and accents, and a springy delivery of the triplets. Characteristics, of course, one has come to expect from a Harnoncourt performance. Still, what a joy to hear this Allegro, and those of most of the earlier symphonies, seized with such bright and light-toned enthusiasm. Here is urgent, virile and vehement playing, never over-forceful, over-emphatic or burdened with excessive weight. What came as a surprise was the consistent drawing out of these scores' potential for sadness and restlessness. Harnoncourt does not set apart the first six symphonies as merely diverting, unlike Abbado (out-and-out charm is seldom part of Harnoncourt's Schubertian vocabulary): their bittersweet ambiguities and apparent affectations of anxiety here acquire a greater significance, and the cycle, as a whole, a greater continuity.

Up to a point, the darker, more serious Schubert that emerges here, derives from the type of sound Harnoncourt fashions from his orchestra; not least, the lean string tone and incisive brass. And maybe, up to a point, from the corrections: Harnoncourt refers to the manuscripts as often being 'harsher and more abrupt in tone [than the printed editions], juxtaposing extreme dynamic contrasts', though you can't help feeling that contrasts in general have been given a helping hand. Trios are mostly much slower than the urgent minuets/scherzos that frame them (with pauses in between the two). And Schubert's less vigorous moments are very noticeable as such, and are inflected with varying degrees of melancholy – it is uncanny how the string playing, in particular, often suggests a feeling of isolation (along with the sparing vibrato is an equally sparing use of that enlivening facility: staccato). The Unfinished Symphony's first movement is a stark, harrowing experience (yet it remains a well-tempered musical one: gestures are never exaggerated); the opening is as cold as the grave itself; the second subject knows its song is short-lived. In both movements, the elucidation and balance of texture can only be described as masterly: just listen to the trombones casting shadows in both codas. This, then, is as seriously pondered, coherent and penetrating a view of the complete cycle as we have had. Whether or not you feel Harnoncourt focuses too much on Schubert's darker side, you have to marvel at his ability to realise his vision. The recorded sound offers that inimitable Concertgebouw blend of the utmost clarity and wide open spaces.

Symphony No 3

Symphonies Nos 3, 5 and 6 H
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Thomas Beecham
EMI Great Recordings of the Century
566984-2 (78 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1955-59 ●●●

Beecham was well into his seventies when he made these recordings with the Royal Philharmonic, the orchestra he had founded in 1946. His lightness of touch, his delight in the beauty of the sound he was summoning, the directness of his approach to melody, and his general high spirits will all dominate our memory of these performances. But listening again, we may be reminded that Beecham could equally well dig deep into the darker moments of these works. Schubert's elation was rarely untroubled and the joy is often compounded by its contrast with pathos – Beecham had that balance off to a tee. It should be noted that he does not take all the marked repeats and he doctored some passages he considered over-repetitive. However, these recordings may also serve as a reminder of the wonderful heights of musicianship that his players achieved, as in the trio of the Third

Symphony's Minuet, where a simple waltz-like duet between oboe and bassoon attains greatness by the shapeliness, ease and poignancy of its execution. Despite some signs of age, these recordings still preserve the brilliance of their readings and the tonal quality of this orchestra. Altogether, a disc to lift the heaviest of spirits.

Symphonies Nos 3 and 4. Overture in D, D590, 'In the Italian style'
Stockholm Sinfonietta / Neeme Järvi
BIS CD453 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

The Overture is a delight, even if the Stockholm woodwinds lack that last ounce of agility for their perky Rossinian imitations. About the Abbado DG set of the symphonies (Nos 3 and 4 are available separately but without the Overture), we have extolled the wonderfully spontaneous sounding playing. But alongside Järvi, Abbado can sound positively calculating. As remarked about Järvi's set reviewed below (Symphonies Nos 5 and 6), it is the 'freshness' of Järvi's approach that is so infectious, and that quality is here in abundance as well. The Stockholm Sinfonietta, though, lacks the corporate virtuosity of the Chamber Orchestra of Europe; in the finale of the Third Symphony both conductors set similarly brisk speeds, but the Swedes simply don't have the muscle to leap for joy like their COE counterparts, and in the finale of the Fourth you miss the clean articulation of those accompanying quavers on the strings that run through most of this movement and give it so much of its excitement and tension. Neither is the engineering free of fault. The recording location is the same as for Nos 5 and 6 (the Stockholm Concert Hall), but you sense that the microphones have been moved back. The overall balance is uncannily natural, but a little more mellow than before. Timpani and brass are vivid (wonderful horns!), but in the tuttis and faster passages there ought to be a clearer profile of the strings. The Third Symphony is less afflicted than the Fourth, perhaps because it is more lucidly scored. So, Järvi for warmth, grace and the occasional impression of a rushed job, Abbado for drama rhythmic stability and sound of striking clarity.

Symphony No 5

Symphonies Nos 5 and 6.
Overture in D in the Italian style, D591
Stockholm Sinfonietta / Neeme Järvi
BIS CD387 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

This Järvi disc abounds in freshness. As so often with Järvi, one notices an unusual degree of light and shade, while the phrasing always sounds spontaneous. He makes the music breathe, and the textures always sound deliciously airy without an accompanying loss of tonal weight in louder passages; a bright, well-focused BIS recording helps. In the Trio of the Sixth Symphony Scherzo, his balance of forte-piano accents, and legato continuation, is convincing but he does tend to come down on each accent so decisively that one hardly has time to recover before the next one – the intervening woodwind phrases leave little impression. Nevertheless, this is a recommendable coupling, with the Overture, D591, a generous filler.

Symphonies Nos 5 and 8
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG 427 645-2GH (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1987

Bernstein is surprisingly brisk in the first movement of the Unfinished, making it more clearly a sonata-form Allegro, with the semiquavers of the main theme given an almost Mendelssohnian quality in their lightness. Perhaps even more surprisingly he refuses to linger over the haunting melody of the second subject, keeping it very fresh, hardly at all moulding it in the way that Abbado does, for example, with the Chamber Orchestra of Europe. In the slow movement Bernstein opts for a rather heavily moulded treatment at an unusually slow tempo. However, with the fortissimo interjections all the weightier at Bernstein's speed, it is a strong and convincing reading. The sound in both No 5 and the Unfinished is comparably full and atmospheric to that for the Great C major (reviewed below).

In the Fifth some may similarly have reservations over Bernstein's relatively slow tempo for the second movement Andante con moto. Yet the refinement of the playing and the detailed imagination puts it in a league of its own. In all three fast movements of No 5, not least the finale, he adopts a dashing speed; light as well as brisk. Whatever detailed reservations there may be, Bernstein is consistently at his most magnetic, justifying his latter-day technique of having live recordings edited together and tidied up after.

Symphony No 8

Symphonies Nos 8 and 9
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Günter Wand
RCA Victor Red Seal ② 09026 68314-2 Ⓜ
(85 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in 1995 OO

The advantages of these Berlin readings over Wand's 1991 Hamburg Musikhalle/North German RSO recordings (also live) are, often, as you might expect: greater facility (in, say, the infamous string triplets in the Ninth's last movement), generally richer string sonority (a proper 'heft' for those stamping C major chords also in the Ninth's finale), sweeter, more vibrant and more focused woodwind (wonderful solos in the Eighth's second movement second subject), a mostly wider (though far from excessive) range of dynamics in the Eighth, more expansive phrasing, and accents more consistently placed (and recorded sound with marginally greater presence). The groundplans remain the same, in other words, the basic tempo and its modification (and what ingenious and effective plans they are, and how marvellous it has been to re-encounter Wand's sublimely wrought rubato); as does the conductor's views on repeats (taken in the Eighth's first movement, but not in the Ninth's outer movements).

It is pointless to speculate whether the small details that have changed (for example, the now truly pianissimo second subject of the Eighth's first movement) are due to Wand's further four years' thought on the works, or changes brought about by the Berlin orchestra's own musical collective, or just 'another time, another place'. Maybe a bit of all three. If you already own the Hamburg recordings, there is no need to rush out to buy this (and, of course, you will also be the proud owner of the finest Schumann Fourth of the last two decades – the Hamburg Schubert Eighth's coupling). If you don't, this set is an obvious choice. Wand's Schubert is informed by a very special devotion, wisdom and insight, and a very individual spirit of adventure.

Schubert Symphony No 8
Mendelssohn Symphony No 4
Philharmonia Orchestra / Giuseppe Sinopoli
DG Masters 445 514-2GMA (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1983 ●

Giuseppe Sinopoli made an auspicious choice of repertory for this, his first recording as Principal Conductor with the Philharmonia. It was this coupling which Guido Cantelli chose for one of his last recordings, made with the Philharmonia in the palmy days of the mid-fifties. Enough to say that Sinopoli could hardly have provided a sharper contrast in everything except the quality of the playing of the Philharmonia: this recording shines out as a superb example of Philharmonia refinement, responsiveness and virtuosity, a tribute not just to Sinopoli's own intensive work but to the standards he had built up largely with the help of his compatriot predecessor, Riccardo Muti.

In a sense with readings of both works so sharply individual as Sinopoli's no comparisons are strictly relevant. Where Cantelli for example made a glowing impact by his simple, natural way with every single movement, Sinopoli directs readings which in almost every bar call attention to unexpected points. Undoubtedly they will be controversial, both in the interpretative style and often in the very choice of speeds. What makes both performances intensely revealing, exhilarating and refreshing is the extraordinary intensity which compels attention from the very first note. Some may find the moulding of the great second subject theme on the cellos in the Unfinished too calculated. Others may feel that he moulds too much in the very slow account of the third movement of the Italian. Elsewhere the glow of commitment alongside such playing is intense.

Sinopoli's view of the Unfinished, from the menacing pianissimo of the opening motif onwards, makes the point strongly that this is a progress from darkness to light. The tragedy of the B minor first movement could hardly be contrasted more strongly against the ethereal glow of fulfilment in the second. The contrasting moods of the Italian Symphony are sharply etched too. In the first movement Sinopoli sets a dangerously fast speed, but unlike most rivals he sacrifices neither clarity, precision nor detail with delectable pointing in the rapid triplets and with subtle phrasing and shading of dynamic to match even Karajan (DG) at his slower speed. Both the middle two movements find Sinopoli adopting slow speeds and moulded phrasing, with the Pilgrims' March made weighty and melancholy in its beauty, the third movement bringing fairyland horn calls in the Trio. The final Saltarello is bitingly brilliant with Sinopoli at the end emphasizing in a final thrust Mendelssohn's refusal to allow the minor key to resolve into the major, leaving a bitter tang.

Symphony No 9, 'Great'

Symphony No 9[a]. Wagner Siegfried Idyll[b]
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Georg Solti
Decca Legends 460 311-2DM (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded [b]1965 and [a]1981 ●●●

Solti's Ninth is likely to bowl you over when you first hear it – you somehow don't expect him to be such a mellow and smiling Schubertian, and of course the VPO playing has great vitality too. As a performance it is quite glorious and can hold its own with any of its rivals, and in terms of recorded sound it is amazing (one of Decca's very best, and in the demonstration class, still). In its LP format, it was notable for its wide-ranging dynamics, its warmth and real 'presence'. The sound is, indeed, full-bodied and well-defined. Yet the CD remaster is undoubtedly superior: the instruments seem positively tangible. Initially, you may wonder whether the higher transfer level of the CD is responsible for the greater sense of immediacy but adjusting the controls still leaves the CD sounding firmer, more 'present' and richer. Altogether a most impressive disc and though one might quibble about the balance (rather forward in the concert hall), there is no doubt that this is a winner.

Symphony No 9. Gesang der Geister über den Wassern, D714
Monteverdi Choir; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
DG 457 648-2GH (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded live in 1997

An outstanding example of the programmer's art. From the close of the choral song's watery passage of the soul, the common key of C allows the symphony's opening horn call then to ease us magically on to firmer ground for its own world of more confident journeying. Schubert might almost have intended it! An outstanding performance of the song, too; heard in the supremely evocative version for male voice and lower strings. These days, it is more difficult for new versions of the symphony to be ‘outstanding’. Outstanding versions have fallen into two categories. Old masters, like Giulini and Wand, revisiting a score barnacled by traditional speedings and slowings, and bringing their own lifetimes’ gained insights and affection to it (barnacles and all); and those who have thrown late 19th- and 20th-century traditions and instruments out of the window and started afresh, such as Norrington and Mackerras.

Gardiner, despite the generally lively tempos and light touch, is happy to embrace most of the barnacles. Obviously, you won’t find Gardiner making cuts and halving the tempo for the finale’s famous unison stamping Cs; but neither is there any incidence of Norrington’s ‘historical’ phrasing vocabulary. Whether all this is how Gardiner feels the symphony should sound, or is born out of respect for a Viennese tradition, is hard to say. Whatever the case, in general, they play magnificently for him; the Vienna strings – with all the violins on the left – their familiar sweet-toned selves (showing little inhibition in their use of vibrato); and the special colours of their woodwinds’ voices are always heard where they should be (memorably rustic, rueful oboes in the second movement, and a joyous ‘singing out’ of the entire section in the Scherzo’s Trio). As for the recorded sound, DG manages a satisfying compromise between spaciousness and presence. Of an audience there is not a hint.

Schubert Symphony No 9 in C, ‘Great’, D944[c] 🄷
Cherubini Anacréon – Overture[a]
Cornelius The Barber of Baghdad – Overture[b]
[a]Royal Philharmonic Orchestra; [bc]BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sir Adrian Boult
BBC Legends/IMG Artists [b]mono BBCL4072-2 Ⓕ
(72 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in [a]1963; [b]1954 and [c]1969

Schubert’s Great C major Symphony was a work close to Boult’s heart. He recorded it for the first time in 1934, for the last in 1972, and in between came countless performances. This one was at rather a noisy Prom in 1969, when he returned to the BBC Symphony Orchestra from which, he had been severed by the mercilessness of BBC bureaucracy.

Among much else, he was a supreme master of the orchestra, attentive to his players without ever losing sight of a work’s architecture. In this performance there is his absolute security of tempo, which does not mean stiffness. The finale is steady without inflexibility; the scherzo drives along brightly; and the Andante moves inexorably towards its terrifying climax, with a movingly sad cello aftermath. This is vintage Boult. So, in their own ways, are the two overtures.

Symphony No 10

Symphony No 10 in D, D936*a* (realised Newbould).
Symphonic fragments – D, D615; D, D708*a*
(orch Newbould)
Scottish Chamber Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Hyperion CDA67000 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Someone will have to find another name for Schubert’s Unfinished Symphony (the B minor) before too long. In fact there are six unfinished Schubert symphonies: there are two whole movement expositions for D615, torsos of three movements and a nearly complete Scherzo for D708*a*, and enough sketch material for Brian Newbould to attempt a complete conjectural reconstruction of D936*a*, the symphony Schubert began writing in the last weeks of his life. Inevitably some will ask, why bother? Well, apart from the increase in the sense of wonder at Schubert’s sheer productivity, there is some wonderful music here, especially the slow movement of D936*a*, desolate and warmly consoling by turns. As a whole, D936*a* suggests that, even at this late stage, Schubert was still thinking in terms of new developments. The concluding third movement, contrapuntally fusing elements of scherzo and finale, is like nothing else in Schubert – or in any other composer of the classical period. Of course, Newbould has had to do some guessing here, but the results are on the whole strikingly authoritative. The performances carry plenty of conviction and the recordings are atmospheric yet detailed. Altogether a fascinating disc.

Additional recommendation
Complete Symphonies 💰
Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Marriner
Philips ⑥ 470 886-2PB6 (6 hours 7 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ

Marriner’s Schubert is light on its feet, full of sprung rhythms and gracefully turned phrases. His set can be confidently recommended if you respond to a more agile, ‘modern’ (though not authentic) approach.

Octet in F, D803

Gaudier Ensemble (Richard Hosford cl Robin O’Neill bn Jonathan Williams hn Marieke Blankestijn, Lesley Hatfield vns Iris Juda va Christoph Marks vc Stephen Williams db)
Hyperion CDA67339 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●

An intriguing point arises in the second movement. It is meant to be Adagio but the Gaudier pace it fairly swiftly, offering a reminder that one edition marks it Andante un poco mosso. The Vienna Octet of 1957 followed this instruction, but its 1990 counterpart preferred something slower. The Gaudier, though, are anything but perfunctory. Their line is curvaceous and malleable with a dynamic range that contains many shades of softness. Engineer Tony Faulkner has helped by using the ambience of the Henry Wood Hall to create both a blend and a distinctiveness of timbre. There is a glow to the sound that other versions don’t have.

The Gaudier’s control over the grading of tonal intensity draws attention to the fact that many passages in this work are written piano or pianissimo; and where leavened by hairpin accents, stabbing sforzandi and even fortissimi they supply necessary impact without being crude. If there is one movement that encapsulates all that is striking about this performance, then it is the fourth – an Andante with seven variations. Here is an example of how these musicians balance themselves (best illustrated by clarinettist Richard Hosford entering wraith-like to shadow Marieke Blankestijn's violin from bar 9 of the first part of the theme – track 4, 0'17"), and how they have thought about the different facets of the music. Were he alive today, this recording might even persuade Schubert scholar Maurice JE Brown to change his mind about the seventh variation, which he described as 'a distasteful episode'.

Octet. Minuet and Finale in F, D72
Vienna Octet; Vienna Wind Soloists
Decca Eclipse 448 715-2DEC (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1990 ●●

Over the years Decca has made a speciality of recording the Schubert Octet in Vienna, and this budget-priced reissue by the Vienna Octet, captured within the glowing acoustics of the Mozartsaal of the Vienna Konzerthaus, and ideally balanced by Christopher Raeburn, is most winning. The enticing warmth of the opening Adagio catches the listener's attention at once, and the central movements – the Scherzo bustling with vitality and the deliciously played Andante con variazioni – are unforgettable. Then comes the lovingly Schubertian Menuetto, and after an arresting tremolando introduction, the joyfully bucolic finale rounds things off in sparkling fashion. At its price, this Vienna version is now in a class of its own. As a bonus we are offered the Minuet and Finale, D72, two engaging miniatures from the composer's youth, nicely elegant in the hands of the Vienna Wind Soloists. The demonstration-standard recording makes this a bargain not to be passed by.

'Trout' Quintet

Piano Quintet in A, 'Trout', D667^{a}. Quartet in G, D96^{b}
^{b}Wolfgang Schulz fl ^{a}Gerhard Hetzel vn Wolfram Christ va Georg Faust vc ^{a}Alois Posch db ^{b}Göran Söllscher gtr ^{a}James Levine pf
DG 431 783-2GH (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990 ●

Schubert composed the Trout Quintet in his early twenties for a group of amateur musicians in the town of Steyr in Upper Austria, then noted for its fine fishing and keen fishermen. The Quintet, like all great occasional music, stands as strongly as ever today, with its freshly bubbling invention and sunny melodiousness. In the present version by James Levine and members of the Vienna Phil, the unity of ensemble and common sense of purpose are most compelling. Both acoustically and musically, their performance has an affecting intimacy. Particularly noticeable are the warmth of Faust's cello playing within the texture and the heavenly phrasing of the orchestra's leader, Gerhard Hetzel, who was tragically killed in a walking accident in 1993. The piano is attractively balanced as a member of the ensemble, rather than as a soloist, which makes the variation fourth movement unusually appealing. Like most of their rivals, this group does not repeat the exposition in the finale. A rarity has been included which ensures that any Schubertian will want this issue in their collection. The so-called Guitar Quartet, D96, is an arrangement of a trio by Wenzel Matiegka which Schubert made in 1814. It is a charming work, presumably intended for domestic use, whose grace and elegance are highly infectious in this delightful performance.

Piano Quintet in A, 'Trout', D667^{a}. String Trios – B flat, D581; B flat, D111*a*
Members of the Leipzig Quartet (Andreas Seidel vn Ivo Bauer va Matthias Moosdorf vc); ^{a}Christian Zacharias pf ^{a}Christian Ockert db
Dabringhaus und Grimm MDG307 0625-2 Ⓕ
(66 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998 ●●

This Trout must surely be one of the very best versions of this much-recorded work – the sound is wonderfully natural, and so is the performance. You get the impression that here was an occasion when everything 'clicked', giving the playing a friendly, relaxed feeling that's just right for this carefree piece. Zacharias has the knack of making even the simplest phrase sound expressive, and the strings, without any exaggeration, produce the most beautiful tonal shadings. All five players, too, have an impressive sense of line; the phrasing and points of emphasis are balanced so that Schubert's expansive designs are projected compellingly. If the Trout shows a Schubertian spaciousness, his one completed String Trio is unusually compact. Another distinguished feature is the florid, Spohr-like elegance of much of the violin writing – Andreas Seidel is splendidly stylish and confident. This is another very fine performance, emphasizing the predominating gentle lyricism, but with plenty of vigour and panache when required. The String Trio fragment, less than two minutes, continues the same, 'let's hear everything' approach; it's a sketch for what subsequently became the comparatively familiar B flat Quartet, D112.

Schubert Piano Quintet in A, 'Trout', D667^{a}
Mozart Piano Quartet in G minor, K478
Thomas Zehetmair vn Tabea Zimmermann va Richard Duven vc ^{a}Peter Riegelbauer db Alfred Brendel pf
Philips 446 001-2PH (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●●

Brendel is of course the lynchpin here and, as ever, balances heart and mind with innate good taste. Time and again you find yourself overhearing detail that might otherwise have passed for nothing: every modulation tells; every phrase of dialogue has been polished, pondered and carefully considered. And yet it is a dialogue, with the loose-limbed Thomas Zehetmair leading his supremely accomplished colleagues through Schubert's delightful five-tier structure. The Scherzo and Allegro giusto frolic within the bounds of propriety (some will favour an extra shot of animal vigour), whereas the first, second and fourth movements are rich in subtle – as opposed to fussy – observations. The recording, too, is exceedingly warm, with only the occasional want of inner detail to bar unqualified enthusiasm. Philips, as ever, achieves a well-rounded, almost tangible piano tone.

Mozart's G minor Quartet makes for an unexpected, though instructive, coupling, following the Trout. Here again there is much to learn and enjoy, especially in terms of phrasal dovetailing and elegant articulation (Brendel's opening flourish is a model of Mozartian phrase-shaping). Still, you may sometimes crave rather more in the way of Sturm und Drang – a fiercer, more muscular attack, most especially in the first movement. Yet there will be times when the conceptual unity and executive refinement of this performance – its articulate musicality – will more than fit the bill. Both works include their respective first movement repeats.

Piano Quintet in A, 'Trout', D667ª. Adagio and Rondo concertante in F, D487 🏅
Kodály Quartet (Attila Falvay, Tamás Szabo vns Gábor Fias va János Devich vc) ªIstvánTóth db
Jenö Jandó pf Ⓢ
Naxos 8 550658 (53 minutes: DDD) ●

This disc is further proof of Naxos's impressive ability to produce outstanding recordings at an astonishingly low price. Jenö Jandó's recording of the Trout Quintet, in a version which is based on the first edition of 1829, is buoyant and vigorous. The string support from members of the Kodály Quartet and István Tóth, despite some rough edges, is generally sonorous and appropriate. Balance is good, with the piano agreeably highlighted. The result is a performance which is a most desirable acquisition. Although Schubert wrote no concertos, he did write a concertante work for piano and strings which is also included here. Notwithstanding limitations of thematic invention, the Adagio and Rondo makes an attractive coupling. Jandó's sheer enthusiasm for this music provides a compelling alternative to other full-price accounts.

Piano Quintet in A, 'Trout', D667ª. String Quartet No 14 in D minor, 'Death and the Maiden', D810ᵇ 🅷
ªSir Clifford Curzon pf ªmembers of the Vienna Octet (Willi Boskovsky vn Gunther Breitenbach va Nikolaus Hübner vc Johann Krump db); ᵇVienna Philharmonic Quartet (Willi Boskovsky, Otto Strasser vns Rudolf Streng va Robert Scheiwein vc)
Decca 417 459-2DM (71 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded ª1957, ᵇ1963 ●

Willi Boskovsky's gentle and cultured mind is very much responsible for the success of these performances of Schubert's two best-known chamber works. In the delectable Trout Quintet there is real unanimity of vision between the players, as well as an immaculate attention to the details of the scoring. Clifford Curzon's part in the performance is memorable especially for his quiet playing – the atmosphere is magical in such moments. Everywhere there is a great awareness of the delicacy and refinement of Schubert's inventiveness. The Death and the Maiden Quartet is no less successful. Schubert's strikingly powerful harmonies, together with a sustained feeling of intensity, all go to heighten the urgency of the first movement. Despite this, string textures are generally kept light and feathery. In the Andante all is subtly understated and although a mood of tragedy is always lurking in the background, never is it thrown at the listener. Boskovsky's understanding of the music is very acute and the performance cannot fail to satisfy even the most demanding. These are two vintage recordings and in the quartet the quality of sound is quite remarkable.

String Quintet in C, D956

Schubert String Quintet in C, D956ª
Beethoven Grosse Fuge in B flat, Op 133ᵇ
Hagen Quartet (Lukas Hagen, Rainer Schmidt vns; Veronika Hagen va; Clemens Hagen vc);
ªHeinrich Schiff vc
DG 439 774-2GH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991ª and 1993ᵇ ●●

By following Boccherini in using two cellos instead of two violas for his String Quintet, Schubert increased the potential for greater textural contrast. Moreover, the dichotomy between the tragic perspective and Viennese gaiety in the Quintet, so evident in much of Schubert's greatest music, generates an especially potent dramatic force.

The Hagen Quartet's performance of the first movement, which presents remarkably clear textural detail, is broad and expansive. The Hagen, unlike the Alban Berg Quartet, include the exposition repeat in a movement that lasts almost 20 minutes. Perhaps as a consequence, they play the Adagio second movement at an unusually fast tempo. However, through breathtaking dynamic control in the first section, passionate intensity in the second, and engaging spontaneity of the ornamentation in the final section, the Hagen achieve an expression that is powerfully compelling.

The second half of the Quintet is often treated as a period of emotional relief from the profound concentration of the first two movements. Startlingly, the Hagen maintain the tension with violent textural and dynamic contrast in the Scherzo, and distinctively varied registral sonority in the Trio. The finale, in which the Hagen effectively balance the music's charming Hungarian flavour with its more sinister touches, provides an arresting conclusion

The Hagen's account of Beethoven's Grosse Fuge is polished and sensitive and, though it may lack the raw excitement of the Alban Berg's live version, it vividly conveys the difference between Beethoven's and Schubert's compositional means. The Hagen's is an outstanding disc, in which exceptional performances, that challenge the finest alternatives, are complemented by superb recording.

String Quintet[a]. Symphony No 5[b] 🄷
[a]Isaac Stern, [a]Alexander Schneider vns [a]Milton Katims va [a]Paul Tortelier vc [b]Prades Festival Orchestra / Pablo Casals [a]vc
Sony Classical Casals Edition mono SMK58992 Ⓜ
(76 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1952-53 ●●●

This should have an in-built fail-safe against hasty consumption, in that their interpretative ingredients are so rich, varied and unpredictable that to experience it all at once is to invite mental and emotional exhaustion. Casals is, of course, the lynchpin. A charismatic presence, he embraces everything with the passion of a devoted horticulturist tending his most precious flowers, and that his love extended beyond the realms of music to mankind itself surely enriched his art even further. The most celebrated Prades recording ever is still the Stern/Casals/Tortelier reading of the C major Quintet, a masterful traversal graced with elastic tempos, songful phrasing, appropriate rhetorical emphases (especially in the first and second movements) and fabulous string playing. The coupling here is a 'first release' of Schubert's Fifth Symphony, recorded in 1953 – a warm, keenly inflected performance, jaunty in the outer movements and with an adoring, broadly paced Adagio. One presumes that it has been held from previous view only because of a few minor executant mishaps. It is certainly well worth hearing. The transfer of the Quintet reveals itself as marginally warmer but occasionally less well-focused than previous incarnations. Still, the original was no sonic blockbuster to start with but this shouldn't deter you from hearing this disc.

String Quintet in C, D956[a]
Douglas Cummings vc The Lindsays
(Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Roger Bigley va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA537 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1985

Schubert's sublime C major Quintet is eminently well served on disc. With this version one is immediately struck by its naturalness. You are left with the impression that you are eavesdropping on music-making in the intimacy of a private home. Although there is plenty of vigour and power, there is nothing of the glamourised and beautified sonority that some great quartets give us. (The two cellos, incidentally, are both by the same maker, Francesco Rugeri of Cremona.) They observe the first-movement exposition repeat, and the effortlessness of their approach does not preclude intellectual strength. The first movement surely refutes the notion that Schubert possessed an incomplete grasp of sonata form, an idea prompted by the alleged discursiveness of some of the sonatas. This is surely an amazing achievement even by the exalted standards of his day, and The Lindsays do it justice, as indeed they do the ethereal Adagio. Here they effectively convey the sense of it appearing motionless, suspended as it were, between reality and dream, yet at the same time never allowing it to become static. The quartet sound is not so full-bodied or richly burnished as that produced by many rivals, lacking quite the splendour or richness given to the best sound-recordings, but they have what can only be called a compelling wisdom. Their reading must be placed at the top of the list and for many readers will be an obvious first choice.

Additional recommendations
String Quintet in C, D956
Alban Berg Quartet with Heinrich Schiff vc
EMI Great Recordings of the Century
566890-2 (48 minutes: ADD: 10/83[R]) Ⓜ

A classic recording that still takes some beating. The music floats effortlessly in the outside sections, and the effect is mesmeric, and in the finale the players find just the right combination of understatement and swagger.

Coupling: Schoenberg Verklärte Nacht, Op 4 🄷
(orig version) Hollywood Quartet (Felix Slatkin, Paul Shure vns; Paul Robyn va; Eleanor Aller vc)
Alvin Dinkin va Kurt Reher vc
Testament mono SBT1031
(73 minutes: ADD: 4/94) Ⓕ

In the 1950s the authors of The Record Guide spoke of the Schubert as 'one of the best [LPs] in the discography of chamber music'; and so it remains. The Schoenberg, too, is superb. See the review of this disc under Verklärte Nacht.

String Quartets

No 10 in E flat, D87; No 12 in C minor, 'Quartettsatz', D703; No 13 in A minor, D804, 'Rosamunde'; No 14 in D minor, 'Death and the Maiden', D810; No 15 in G, D887

String Quartets Nos 10 and 13 🄿
Quatuor Mosaïques (Erich Höbarth, Andrea Bischof vns Anita Mitterer va Christophe Coin vc)
Auvidis Astrée E8580 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

This recording of the A minor Quartet was the first ever on period instruments. With unusually broad tempos, the Mosaïques consistently stresses the music's pathos, loneliness and fatalism. The Hungarian-flavoured finale is normally seen as a stoically cheerful reaction to the pain that has gone before. But here it steals in as if in a dream from the spectral close of the Minuet, the opening melody delicately floated, its off-beat accents barely flicked; where the Alban Berg brings a faintly military strut to the C sharp minor melody (2'11"), the Mosaïques, suppressing any hint of swagger in the dotted rhythms, distils a doleful balletic grace.

In the Andante of the Rosamunde the Mosaïques, while slower than its rivals, never loses sight of the gehende Bewegung, the walking motion that underlies so many of Schubert's andantes. It matches its rivals in its tender, sentient phrasing, subtly flexing the pulse in response to harmonic movement. The Minuet, with its glassy, vibratoless pianissimos, is more eerily remote, less human in its desolation, than from the Alban Berg.

For the coupling the Mosaïques offers the early E flat Quartet, written when Schubert was just 16. Not even this affectionate, considered advocacy can do much for the dull, harmonically stagnant opening movement. But the players relish the raw energy of the Scherzo, with its braying donkey evocations, and bring a delicious demure wit to the Rossinian second theme of the finale (0'58"). And, as in the absorbing, moving reading of the A minor Quartet, the delicacy of nuance and clarity of texture, easier to obtain from the sparer-toned period instruments, is often revelatory. The recording is clean, vivid and immediate. In sum, an outstanding disc in every way.

String Quartets – Nos 10, 12, 'Quartettsatz', and 13
Belcea Quartet (Corina Belcea, Laura Samuel vns Krzysztof Chorzelski va Alasdair Tait vc)
EMI 557419-2 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●●

'Schubert's Quartet has been performed, rather slowly in his opinion, but very purely and tenderly,' wrote Moritz von Schwind on the day D804 was premièred by the Schuppanzigh Quartet. The composer may well have reacted similarly on hearing the Belcea's first movement. It's a spacious tempo, certainly, causing some of the more energetic music – the last four bars for instance – to sound slightly ponderous. But purity and tenderness are certainly in evidence. Internal balance and intonation are exemplary, and in the songful melodic writing that dominates the whole work, Corina Belcea and her colleagues seem to have the knack of shaping each long phrase to perfection, knowing just when to intensify the vibrato or give a note extra emphasis, and when to allow the music to flow effortlessly onwards.

These fine qualities persist throughout. There may be more dramatic accounts of D703, but no other group presents its cantabile music in a more affecting way. The lesser work, D87, gets a charming, persuasive interpretation, but the profound and subtle way these young players engage with the later, greater music is the most impressive thing this group has done so far.

String Quartets Nos 10^{b} and 14^{a}
Alban Berg Quartet (Günther Pichler, Gerhard Schulz vns Thomas Kakuska va Valentin Erben vc)
EMI 556470-2 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in ^{a}1994, ^{b}1997

String Quartets Nos 12 and 15
Alban Berg Quartet (Günther Pichler, Gerhard Schulz vns Thomas Kakuska va Valentin Erben vc)
EMI 556471-2 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1997 ●●

The Alban Berg Quartet's policy of making recordings at concert performances certainly produces impressive results: interpretations that avoid any feeling of routine or of being overcareful. What impresses above all is the flexibility and sensitivity of these performances. In the first movement of D887 the Alban Berg, by subtly drawing our attention to the precise emotional colour of all Schubert's magical harmonic shifts, finds a touching, intimate quality within the grand design. And it's certainly an advantage for any group performing this quartet to be able to produce such a magnificent tremolando – whether it's the forest murmurs of the first movement or the Gothic shuddering of the Andante's middle section.

The G major Quartet is the outstanding performance on these discs, but Death and the Maiden isn't far behind, particularly the con fuoco Scherzo and finale. There are a few places, where Schubert is straightforwardly tuneful (in D703 and in the outer movements of D87, especially) where one wishes Günther Pichler would play in a simpler, more direct manner. The Busch Quartet's 1930s recordings of D810 and D887 are smoother, less emphatic than that of modern groups, and this enables it to convey the emotional nuances, particularly of the D minor Quartet, in a more inward and profound way. And the two quartets are available (with some repeats missing) on a single CD. But it's a measure of the Alban Berg Quartet's exceptional quality to realise that it is in the same league, with the same sense of players totally absorbed in the music. The recorded sound is immeasurably more vivid and lifelike.

String Quartets Nos 12^{a}, 13^{b}, 14^{a} and 15^{b}
Quartetto Italiano (Paolo Borciani, Elisa Pegreffi vns Piero Farulli va Franco Rossi vc)
Philips Duo ② 446 163-2PM2 (142 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded ^{a}1965, ^{b}1976-77

The Italians' playing has freshness, affection, firm control and above all authority to a degree that no relative newcomer can match. It is notable not only for the highest standards of ensemble, intonation and blend, but also for its imaginative insights; these attributes readily apply to the music-making on this Duo reissue, particularly in the slow movements. Indeed, the players' progress through the wonderful set of variations in the Andante con moto, which reveals the Death and the Maiden Quartet's association with the famous Schubert song of that name, has unforgettable intensity (it is a grand conception packed with memorable detail – the evocation of terror in the early stages of the first movement coda has never been bettered).

The comparable Andante of No 13, with its lovely Rosamunde theme – which is approached here in a relaxed, leisurely manner – is held together with a similar (almost imperceptible) sureness of touch. When this work was originally issued, the first-movement exposition repeat was cut in order to get the quartet complete on to a single LP side. Here it has been restored.

Finest of all is the great No 15, a work of epic scale. The first movement alone runs to nearly 23 minutes, and the players' masterly grip over the many incidents that make up the Allegro molto moderato is effortless. For an encore we are given No 12, a piece on a smaller scale, but here presented with a comparable hushed intensity of feeling. This, like No 14, was recorded in 1965 and the textures are leaner than on the others, with a fractional edge on fortissimos. Nevertheless, the ear soon adjusts when the playing is as remarkable as this. The other recordings have more body, and a fine presence. The CD transfers throughout are excellent.

String Quartets Nos 14 and 15 🄷
Busch Quartet (Adolph Busch, Gösta Andreasson vns Karl Doktor va Hermann Busch vc)
EMI Références mono 769795-2 Ⓜ
(73 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1936-38 ●●

Death and the Maiden is the best served of Schubert's quartets on CD. The Busch Quartet's account is now well over 60 years old but it still brings us closer to the heart of this work than any other. The slow movement, in particular, has an unmatched and marvellous eloquence. The same must also be said of the G major Quartet, a performance of surpassing beauty which reveals more of the depth and humanity of the score than any subsequent recording. Such are these performances that the music is quick to engross your thoughts to the exclusion of any consideration of the age of the recordings. The recording is, on the whole, good: exceptionally so in the quieter passages.

Piano Trios

Piano Trios^{a} – B flat, D28 (Sonata in one movement); No 1 in B flat, D898; No 2 in E flat, D929. Notturno in E flat, D897^{b}. String Trios^{b} – B flat, D471; B flat, D581
^{a}Beaux Arts Trio (Menahem Pressler pf Daniel Guilet vn Bernard Greenhouse vc); ^{b}Grumiaux Trio (Arthur Grumiaux vn Georges Janzer va Eva Czako vc)
Philips Duo ② 438 700-2PM2 (127 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1966-69 ●

These performances are polished, yet the many solo contributions from each of the players emerge with a strong personality. The Beaux Arts cellist brings lovely phrasing and a true simplicity of line, so right for Schubert – memorably in the lovely slow movement melody of the Trio No 2 in E flat.

In addition to the great piano trios (B flat, D898 and E flat, D929) the set includes the extremely personable, very early Sonata in B flat, D28, where the lyrical line already has the unmistakable character of its young composer. Also included is the Notturno, D897, a raptly emotive short piece played here with a remarkable depth of feeling that recalls the gentle intensity of the glorious slow movement of the String Quintet.

The recording is naturally balanced, although a little dry in the treble. Of the two rarer string trios, also early works, the four-movement Trio, D581 is totally infectious, with that quality of innocence that makes Schubert's music stand apart. Given such persuasive advocacy, and vivid recording, both pieces cannot fail to give the listener great pleasure.

Piano Trios Nos 1 and 2. Sonata in A minor, D821, 'Arpeggione'. Notturno in E flat, D897
Yuuko Shiokawa vn Miklos Perényi vc
András Schiff pf
Teldec ② 0630-13151-2 (127 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●●

This set begins with an outstanding performance of the Arpeggione Sonata. The recording is clear and spacious, and the outer movements have an effortless sense of momentum that is not too inflexible to allow for some expressive rubato and pointing of the phrases. There's no hint in Perényi's playing that this is a difficult work for the cello, and he produces a most beautiful, warm, serene tone for the Adagio. Schiff's special feeling for Schubert is apparent even in the most subsidiary details of the piano part and particularly in the more dominating roles of the trios and the Notturno.

These three well-matched players find exactly the right tone and feeling. In the first Allegro of the B flat Trio the superior recording helps them to convey the music's grandeur and the following Andante is played with a flowing, evocative style. Shiokawa's clear-toned, elegant violin playing is certainly a great asset here. In the Notturno, too, a flowing tempo doesn't spoil the tranquillity of the opening melody, but allows the contrasting episode to emerge triumphantly.

In the monumental E flat Trio Schiff, Shiokawa and Perényi seem sometimes to be a little polite and decorous, but their interpretation is certainly not lacking in vitality or variety. The finale in this performance lasts nearly 20 minutes: the players have gone back to the original version of the movement – Schubert made cuts when preparing the trio for publication. If you are an admirer of Schubert's 'heavenly length' then you will hear it as the true culmination of one of his greatest instrumental works.

Piano Trio No 2 in E flat, D929
Florestan Trio (Susan Tomes pf Anthony Marwood vn Richard Lester vc)
Hyperion CDA67347 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●

This profound, yet still often light-hearted, E flat Trio was written in the same month (November) that Schubert completed Winterreise. We are instantly reminded of this in the Florestan's eloquent and aptly paced account of the C minor Andante con moto, with what Richard Wigmore describes as its 'stoical trudging gait'. Its essential melancholy is gently caught, first by the cellist, Richard Lester, and then equally touchingly by the pianist, Susan Tomes. The dramatically rhythmic opening of the first movement could almost be by Beethoven, but once again these players show themselves to be completely within the Schubertian sensibility and catch perfectly the atmosphere of the more important lyrical motif, first heard on the cello (in bars 15 and 16), which is to dominate the movement alongside the engaging repeated-note figure (so delicately articulated by the piano).

They set a winningly jaunty mood for the finale, which is maintained whenever the main theme reappears, even though, as always with late Schubert, much happens to vary the music's mood and atmosphere. Another superb performance then from the Florestans, penetrating, yet full of spirited spontaneity, and in spite of the moments of sadness, much Schubertian bonhomie. The recording is completely lifelike and very well balanced.

Works for Piano Duet

Divertissements – à la hongroise, D818; sur des motifs originaux français, D823 P
Andreas Staier, Alexei Lubimov fp duet
Teldec 0630-17113-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

Schubert's Divertissement à la hongroise, his most flamboyant essay in the Hungarian vernacular style, has always overshadowed the Divertissement on French themes. Yet the less favoured work is in some ways the more compelling. Its profoundly un-divertimento-like first movement has a haunting, quintessentially Schubertian second theme and one of the composer's most turbulent and tonally audacious developments. The Andantino, a set of variations on a glum little theme that sounds more plausibly French than anything else in the work, is transfigured by its ravishing final variation in the major; and the finale is a sprawling, colourful rondo. Using a fine copy by Christopher Clarke of an 1826 Graf instrument, Staier and Lubimov give performances which, in poetry, élan and sheer relish have never been surpassed. One immediate advantage of a fortepiano in this music is the way it clarifies the textures, especially in the bass regions. Then there is the unique array of colours available through the use of no fewer than five pedals – the harp-like sonorities of the una corda pedal, for instance, or the 'bassoon' pedal, with its buzzing lower strings. The instrument's coup de grâce is its so-called Turkish pedal, attached to bass drum, bells and cymbals, which the players unleash with swashbuckling effect. If you're a sceptic about period performance, then these hugely enjoyable performances should convert you.

Sonata for Piano Duet in C, D812, 'Grand Duo'. Eight Variations in A flat, D813. Trois marches militaires, D733
Daniel Barenboim, Radu Lupu pf duet
Teldec 0630-17146-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

One might expect this combination of artist playing Schubert to produce winning results and so it does. Rarely will you hear duet playin of such refined elegance and multicoloured animation. Here, the playing is vivid an glamorous; the dynamic and colouristic range o Barenboim's and Lupu's performances suggest a public environment. After the spirited brio o the familiar Marches militaires, the remainder o the disc contains music of greater seriousnes and architectural breadth. The Variations i A flat are beautifully played, with subtle and discerning pianism. The largest work on this disc i the C major Sonata: here it runs to 43 minutes longer than any of Schubert's solo sonatas. It ca reasonably be classed alongside Schubert's tw other late masterpieces in C, the Great Symphony and the String Quintet. The Grand Duo i symphonic in scope and expression, although th writing is innately pianistic. The fine detail o Barenboim's and Lupu's account, their diversit of colour and attack and their voicing of melodi and inner lines, suggests an image of suitabl orchestral depth and variety. Furthermore, th surface gloss of these performances is underpinned by the most crystalline lucidity an poetry. The recording is excellent.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas – D384; D385; D408
Gidon Kremer vn Oleg Maisenberg pf
DG 437 092-2GH (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991

The front cover of the booklet here refers t these works as sonatinas, while the notes an back cover have sonatas. In fact they have bee called both and, as the notes explain, th diminutive designation was bestowed on the by their publisher. The writer makes a case fo the grander title, and indeed they are hardl slight, with the A minor and G minor lastin over 20 minutes and only the popular D majo having something of the miniature about it. Furthermore, the minor mode of D385 and D40 (which here precede the D major) adds to one' feeling that these are not lightweight pieces.

Clearly this is also the view of Gidon Kreme and Oleg Maisenberg, who invest the firs movement of the A minor work with a liltin melancholy, taking it slowly even for Allegr moderato and often lingering over expressiv details longer than might be thought desirable however, this is better than applying pressure t the music and they mostly maintain momentum Yet in their playing as a whole you feel tha they aim to give these works a depth and dram that they do not altogether bear. Indeed, it is touch mannered, and whether you find it excessively so must be a matter of taste. The same is true of this violinist's characteristic tone: it has a certain thinness along with vibrant sweetness, although it is undoubtedly touching. This said, the two artists are very well attuned, and Maisenberg is an admirable pianist. The recording is well balanced and very natural.

Additional recommendations
Violin Sonatas
D, D384; A minor, D385; G minor, D408
Dubeau vn Kuerti pf
Analekta fleurs de lys FL2 3042 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
No longer available in the UK, but try the internet

Dubeau and Kuerti are at one in maintaining the intimate tone of these works; they manage to make each detail tell while keeping everything natural and unforced. An impressive account.

Violin Sonatas. Variations. Octet.
Couplings[a]: Polonaise, D580. Concerto Movement, D345
Kremer vn Maisenberg, Afanassiev pfs; [a]Chamber Orchestra of Europe
DG ④ 469 837-2GB4 (4 hours 40 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ

Everything is performed with great style and elegance, and Kremer's piano partners are fully equal to his flights of imagination. These musicians clearly believe in this music. The Octet – with a truly deluxe line-up of artists – receives a spirited performance. Highly recommended.

Wandererfantasie, D760

Fantasie in C, D934[a]. Fantasy in C, 'Wandererfantasie', D760
[a]Yuuko Shiokawa vn András Schiff pf
ECM New Series 464 320-2 (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Nearly all Schubert's great instrumental works maintain the Classical four-movement layout: but he did turn occasionally to the fashionable, looser, fantasia-style forms – in the case of the Wandererfantasie, one of his most disturbing works, he seems to be using his structural know-how in order to subvert the expectations of Classical form. András Schiff vividly brings out the switches between Classical poise, intensely Romantic mood-painting and near-expressionistic disruption; the key lies in the way he doesn't exaggerate any contrast, but makes each detail tell, so that the full range of the piece can be heard. One shouldn't underestimate the technical achievement – the lead-in to the adagio section is a perfect demonstration of a gradual diminuendo, of energy falling away, and when the Adagio arrives the chordal playing is superb – the melodic line perfectly balanced by the dark, melancholic colours in the bass.

Balance and lack of exaggeration inform the D934 Fantasie, too. From the start, when Shiokawa steals in above the piano tremolando, there's an air of magic. Her fine, silvery tone only rarely expands to a richer or more dramatic utterance, but her care not to overplay actually adds to the rich impression the performance gives. Whereas Kremer and Afanassiev present the central variation set as a brilliant showpiece, Schiff and Shiokawa paint a noticeably more varied picture – drama and virtuosity alternating with delicacy and touches of lyrical tenderness. In short, these are interpretations of rare penetration and individuality: a must for the Schubert section in your collection.

Schubert Fantasy in C, 'Wandererfantasie' D760
Schumann Fantasie in C, Op 17
Maurizio Pollini pf
DG The Originals 447 451-2GOR Ⓜ
(52 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1973 ●●●

The cover shows Caspar David Friedrich's familiar The Wanderer above the Sea of Fog. Pollini, on the other hand, is a wanderer in a transparent ether or crystalline light and both of these legendary performances, recorded in 1973 and beautifully remastered, are of a transcendental vision and integrity. In the Schubert his magisterial, resolutely un-virtuoso approach allows everything its time and place. Listen to his flawlessly graded triple piano approach to the central Adagio, to his rock-steady octaves at 5'23" (where Schubert's merciless demand is so often the cause of confusion) or to the way the decorations in the Adagio are spun off with such rare finesse, and you may well wonder when you have heard playing of such an unadorned, unalloyed glory. Pollini's Schumann is no less memorable. Doubting Thomases on the alert for alternating touches of imperiousness and sobriety will be disappointed, for, again, Pollini's poise is unfaltering. The opening Moderato is sempre energico, indeed, its central Etwas langsamer is so sensitively and precisely gauged that all possible criticism is silenced. The coda of the central march (that locus classicus of the wrong note) is immaculate and in what someone once called the finale's 'shifting sunset vapour' Pollini takes us gently but firmly to the shores of Elysium. Here is a record that should grace every musician's shelf.

Hüttenbrenner Variations

Andante in C, D29. Minuet in A minor, D277*a*. Minuet in A, D334. 13 Variations in A minor on a theme by Anselm Hüttenbrenner, D576. Andante in A, D604. Fantasy in C, 'Grazer Fantasie', D605a. Three Impromptus, D946
James Lisney pf
Olympia OCD479 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

An illuminating programme of lesser-known works, which demonstrates the composer's exploitation of tonal colour and keyboard sonority. After a sensitive performance of the enchanting C major Andante, D29, Lisney plays a group of pieces that exploit the expressive potential of A major/minor tonality. Two minuets establish the emotional contrast between these tonal colours: the A minor one is bold and defiant, with a tranquil F major trio, while the carefree, amiable A major work is balanced by a poignantly lyrical trio in E major. The Variations on a theme by Anselm Hüttenbrenner demonstrates a more complex and dramatic A major/minor dichotomy, which Lisney here presents beautifully with subtle control of the theme's different transformations and telling modal shifts. In addition, Lisney offers a thoroughly absorbing, searching account of the brooding, introspective A major Andante and a poetically romantic, finely conceived performance of the Grazer Fantasie.

To conclude, carefully observed interpretations of the three Impromptus, D946, whilst perhaps lacking the spontaneity of Brendel's reissued versions (on a two-disc set), nevertheless confirm Lisney as a thoughtful and perceptive Schubertian. This fascinating concert, which benefits from satisfyingly faithful recorded sound, should attract a wide audience.

Impromptus

Impromptus – D899; D935. Drei Klavierstücke, D946
Allegretto in C minor, D915
Maria João Pires pf
DG ② 457 550-2GH2 (108 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●●

This is something very special indeed. Pires's characteristic impassioned absorption in all she plays – that concentration which makes the listener appear to be eavesdropping on secrets shared between friends – could hardly find a truer soul mate than in the sensibility of Schubert. Each Impromptu has a rare sense of integrity and entirety, born of acute observation and long-pondered responses.

Pires's instinct for tempo and pacing brings a sense of constant restraint, a true molto moderato to the Allegro of the C minor work from D899, created by a fusion of right-hand tenuto here with momentary left-hand rubato there. Then there is the clarity of contour within the most subtly graded undertones of the G flat major of D899 which re-creates it as a seemingly endless song. Or an Andante just slow, just nonchalant enough for the Rosamunde theme of the D935 B flat major to give each variation space and breath enough to sing out its own sharply defined character.

The Allegretto, D915 acts as a Pause between the two discs, a resting place, as it were, for reflection and inner assessment on this long journey. Its end – which could as well be its beginning – is in the Drei Klavierstücke, D946 of 1828. The first draws back from the fiery impetuousness within the Allegro assai's tautly controlled rhythms, to an inner world with its own time scale; the second, more transpired than played, has an almost unbearable poignancy of simplicity. The paradox of these unselfregarding performances is how unmistakably they speak and sing out Pires and her unique musicianship. To draw comparisons here would be not so much odious as to miss the point.

Complete Piano Sonatas

No 1 in E, D157; No 2 in C, D279; No 3 in E, D459; No 4 in A minor, D537; No 5 in A flat, D557; No 6 in E minor, D566; No 7 in E flat, D568; No 8 in F sharp minor, D571; No 9 in B, D575; No 11 in C, D613; No 12 in F minor, D625; No 13 in A, D664; No 14 in A minor, D784; No 15 in C, 'Relique', D840; No 16 in A minor, D845; No 17 in D, D850; No 18 in G, D894; No 19 in C minor, D958; No 20 in A, D959; No 21 in B flat, D960

Piano Sonatas Nos 1-21
András Schiff pf
Decca ⑦ 448 390-2DM7 (498 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1992-93

András Schiff's Schubert sonatas, of course, come into direct competition with the masterly set from Wilhelm Kempff, which is very special indeed (these were recorded in the mid- to late 1960s and are available on a seven-disc DG set). Kempff's unsurpassed performance of the last great B flat Sonata (No 21), for instance, is ravishingly beautiful, full of the insights of his long experience. But throughout his series Schiff's freshness of approach is spring-like in its appeal, and his response to these 19 works (he includes the fragments of the Eighth Sonata, which Kempff omits) – which he describes as 'among the most sublime contributions written for the piano' – is no less individual and certainly not short of poetic feeling or a sense of the music's overall design. Anyone who wants modern recordings of these great sonatas should be well content with Schiff's survey, even though the catalogue also includes many individual performances of great distinction. The excellent recordings were made in the Brahms-Saal of the Vienna Musikverein.

Piano Sonatas – individual discs

Piano Sonatas Nos 1 and 18. Die schöne Müllerin – Der Müller und der Bach (arr Liszt, S565)
Arcadi Volodos pf Ⓕ
Sony Classical SK89647 (64 minutes: DDD) ●

Here is irrefutable proof of Arcadi Volodos's genius and versatility. Naturally, lovers of long-cherished recordings by Schubertians of the stature of Schnabel, Kempff, Pollini and Brendel will hesitate, equating Volodos's sheen and perfection with an external glory rather than an interior poetic truth. But such witnesses for the prosecution will find themselves silenced by an empathy with Schubert's spirit so total that it would be extraordinary in a pianist of any age, let alone one still in his twenties.

The jubilant burst of scales and arpeggios that launch the E major Sonata are given with a deftness and unforced eloquence that are pure Volodos, while the Andante's sighing chromaticism and surprise modulations have a tonal translucence that will make lesser mortals weep with envy. But it is in the G major Sonata, that epitome of Schubertian lyricism, that Volodos erases all possible doubts. His opening has an unforgettable stillness and mystery, his velvet-tipped sonority and seamless legato a reminder that Schubert's vocal and instrumental inspiration were for the most part one and the same. For Volodos and for his listeners this is a true dance of the gods. The recordings are as flawless as the playing.

Piano Sonata No 7 in E flat, D568
Moments musicaux, D780
Mitsuko Uchida pf
Philips 470 164-2PH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●

This is a magical recreation of the E flat Sonata. Let's not make an exaggerated claim for the piece: it comes near the beginning of Schubert's 12 completed piano sonatas, and the later ones are of course played more often because they're greater. But this one is an enchantment, and weighing in at 31 minutes, as it does here, it sits proudly as the first of his grand four-movement sonatas, purposeful and confident in the space it makes for itself.

How characteristic of Uchida to make you want to celebrate the music, first of all. She inhabits it completely, and her preferred Steinway for Schubert, and this recording of it – at the Musikverein in Vienna, in the main auditorium – are at one with her endeavour, perfectly judged in what they bring to it, part of the focus.

In the Moments musicaux, however, it is possible to question the weight with which almost every phrase and paragraph are invested – perhaps some of the rhythmic freedom too – while being carried through by the power of Uchida's vision and her technical control. Carried through, yes, but borne along? This is magnificent playing but to enjoy her to the full you do have to accept Uchida's slow tempi and to a projection of the expression which is painstaking to the point (some might feel) of laboriousness, especially with all the repeats. C'est bon, mais c'est long.

No singer could push Schubert as far as Uchida does – but so what? A stunning record nonetheless, and perhaps one to feel quite possessive about.

Piano Sonatas Nos 9, 12 and 13.
Moment musical in C, D780 No 1
Sviatoslav Richter pf
BBC Legends BBCL4010-2 (78 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1979 ●●

Richter's Schubert is simply in a class of its own. No pianist did more to overturn the traditional view of the composer as a blithe, unreflecting child of nature. And in this Festival Hall recital three sonatas from 1817-19 unfold with a grandeur of conception, a spirituality and a stoical timelessness that were unique to Richter. The first two movements of the A major Sonata are, on the face of it, implausibly slow: but with his mesmeric, self-communing intensity Richter convinces you for the duration of the performance that no other way is admissable. Phrases, paragraphs are shaped with calm inevitability, underpinned by the sublime, luminous simplicity of Richter's cantabile; and no pianist is more sensitive to Schubert's magical harmonic strokes or understands more surely their place in the larger scheme. As Richter conceives them, the first two movements of the A major foreshadow the rapt, philosophical contemplation of the late G major and B flat Sonatas; and even the finale, projected with Richter's characteristic mastery and subtlety of rhythm, has something rarefied in its playfulness. Richter is equally lofty and far-sighted in the two lesser-known sonatas.

The BBC recording, while perhaps a shade bass-light, is warm, and does ample justice to Richter's vast dynamic and tonal palette. A bronchial March audience can intrude at the start of tracks, especially in finales. But no matter. All but those terminally resistant to Richter's uniquely introspective, long-spanned view of the composer should acquire as a matter of urgency these visionary performances by one of the greatest Schubertians of the century.

Piano Sonatas No 9, 15 and 18
Sviatoslav Richter pf
Philips ② 438 483-2PH2 (117 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1979 ●●

Facts first. The G major Sonata, D894 takes up an entire CD, in comparison with the average 16 or 17 minutes. Richter's first movement is no less than 26'51" long. Then the C major, D840 appears not unvollendet at all, but with its little unfinished Menuetto and Rondo taking their own eye- and ear-opening place. Behind these facts lie the concepts which set these performances apart. The heavenly length of the first movement of D894 is created out of Richter's relationship with time itself. The more one listens to his late Schubert, the more one realises that movement and momentum are not conceived as linear. Rather they are cyclical, very much in the spirit of the final song of Winterreise in which the Leiermann's turning melody could be eternal. No wonder that it is to Richter that singers like Peter Schreier turn when working out the when and the how of their Schubert.

The opening Molto moderato is read as extremely slow: the ear begins by being on tenterhooks for what might come next – then shocked by the sudden, harsh brightening of tone as the first temporary modulation is prepared. As the movement progresses, the opening motif becomes like a mantra in an extended meditation in which the listener must go through the same discipline of private pacing as the performer. At a practical level, Richter's tempo allows the mood of Molto moderato e cantabile to be unbroken by busy-ness even as the theme metamorphoses into quaver figuration. The Andante, when at last it arrives, moves with a contrastingly lithe, blithe ease, more songlike, more forceful at its centre. The simplicity and clarity of movement created by Richter's fingers in the bright dance of weight and measure which is the final Allegretto (and which makes for an archaic, hymn-like Andante in D575) is Schubert's sweetness and light.

His dark side, in both these sonatas, is explored uncompromisingly by Richter in modulations of key and dynamics abrupt enough to hurt. Richter's complete incomplete Sonata, D840 is another extraordinary journey. Another endless Moderato (22 minutes) is this time relentless in the bare, unbeautiful resonance of its repeated figures which, all the more miraculously, become song accompaniment. It is followed by a strange, minimalist Menuetto and an almost surreal sense of bleakness as the pirouetting Rondo melts into thin air.

Piano Sonatas Nos 9[a], 18[b], 20[c], 21[d]
Alfred Brendel pf
Philips ② 456 573-2PM2 (138 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in the [a]Concertgebouw, Amsterdam in 1998, [b]Alte Oper, Frankfurt in 1998, [c]The Maltings, Snape in 1999, [d]Royal Festival Hall, London in 1997

For some years now Brendel's discography has been enriched by occasional releases of recorded live performances – correctives, alternatives or supplements, as he puts it, to his studio recordings. These Schubert sonatas are most welcome. The enchanting, constantly surprising and utterly characteristic B major Sonata (No 9), not often played but an important piece, appears in Brendel's discography for the first time.

Disc one opens with the great G major Sonata (No 18), and the first chord will have you hooked: a pleasurable journey is guaranteed. Brendel's playing of the A major Sonata (No 20) couldn't be more vivid. Again, you don't have to find a way in: he is there for you from the beginning. Is he now more persuasive than ever in the finales of these big pieces? Certainly a characteristic he shares with only the finest performers is that he has kept his music-making young, through a continuous renewal of his vision. And in Schubert that vision is an all-seeing one which does justice not only to the supreme lyricist but to the assaults of fever and delusion that are as menacing and terrifying in some of the sonatas as in the songs. And as always when Brendel is at his best, he conveys a sense of complete emotional and intellectual coherence, as well as great freedom. The playing is pretty stunning, too.

The B major Sonata (No 9), though slighter than the others, is a delight; Brendel finds a lighter manner for it, almost carefree, as Schubert was in 1817. The sound in the B flat Sonata disappoints a little; the piano is just too distant – or is it just that the Royal Festival Hall is not in the same league as an acoustic as Snape Maltings, the Concertgebouw or the Alte Oper in Frankfurt? There, I find the sound warm and justly distanced (and the pianos better). Applause after each piece; quite a lot of singalong from him in the A major, but not enough to be a worry; and no coughing or audience noise to speak of anywhere except in the B flat Sonata.

Piano Sonatas Nos 14 and 17
Mitsuko Uchida pf
Philips 464 480-2PH (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

Mitsuko Uchida's Schubert is never less than wonderfully finished in pianistic terms, and as an interpretation it is only occasionally a little disappointing. In these two latest sonatas she is close to her best. The D major, a product of the composer's extended summer tour in Austria in 1825, is, as Misha Donat's essay notes, 'among Schubert's sonatas ... the most brilliant and extrovert'. With her exceptional finger technique Uchida takes its technical demands in her stride (there are several renowned Schubertians of whom this much cannot be said), yet she never allows physical excitement to become the be-all-and-end-all. She finds playfulness in the contrasting themes of the first movement, and handles the song-like writing of the second and fourth with the expertise of a great Lieder accompanist, each phrase being subtly inflected yet never to the detriment of the long line. However, the horn-call-based second theme in the slow movement sounds a little over-excited and more than a little over-pedalled. But when it and the main theme of the movement are superimposed on the final page, Uchida's tone is fabulously well graded. Most memorable of all are the half tones she deploys in the third movement Trio and the exceptional delicacy and refinement of her passagework in the finale.

In the A minor Sonata she brings out the world-weariness of the first movement, the fragile hopefulness of the Andante, and the finale's seething energy. The contrasting martial theme in the first movement again finds her a fraction over-excitable. Nor does the finale coda sweep all before it in the exultant way of a Richter.

Richter is on peak form in the D major sonata from Moscow in 1956 (Melodyia), and the A minor from Tokyo in 1979 (Olympia). Everything he does seems to have deeper roots and to be carried forward by an even stronger artistic imperative than Uchida's, so that he does not need to resort to her occasionally rather calculated-seeming hesitations in order to convince.

But for an alternative in rich modern sound, Uchida remains a good bet. Once again the recordings, from the Vienna Musikverein, verge on the over-resonant; but in this instance they detract hardly at all from the music or the playing.

Piano Sonatas Nos 11, 14 and 21
Stephen Hough pf
Hyperion CDA67027 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

Stephen Hough's moving performance of Sonata No 21 is marked throughout by refined, discerning pianism and an uncommonly subtle ear for texture. In all four movements, he seeks out the music's inwardness and fragility, its ethereal, self-communing remoteness. The opening Molto moderato, unfolding in vast, calm spans, has a hypnotic inevitability; there are countless felicities of timing and colour, but always a vital sense of forward motion. Hough adopts a dangerously slow tempo in the Andante but sustains it through the breadth and concentration of his line, the subtlety of his tonal palette and his pointing of rhythmic detail. His rarefied grace and delicacy, his gentle probing of the music's vulnerability, are of a piece with his conception of the sonata as a whole.

As usual, Hyperion does not stint over playing time, offering another complete sonata in addition to the two-movement fragment, No 11. No 14, perhaps Schubert's most depressive instrumental work, is magnificently done. Hough distils an immense weight of suffering from the pervasive two-note motif that dominates the first movement like some massive, Wagnerian pendulum; but, typically, the lyrical music is limpidly coloured and poignantly inflected, with an unusually precise observation of Schubert's accents. The Andante is flowing and long-arched, with some ravishing soft playing, and he a brings a superb rhythmic impulse to the eerily scudding counterpoint of the main subject and a piercing tenderness to the contrasting F major theme (0'51"). The fragmentary C major Sonata, one of numerous Schubert torsos from the years 1817-22, is no great shakes: two pleasant but uneventful movements, both incomplete. It's unsurprising that Schubert lost interest in mid-flight. But Schubertians will be happy to have the fragment as a bonus to Hough's individual and searching readings of the two great sonatas, which take their place alongside the most recommendable in the catalogue. The pleasure is enhanced by the exemplary clarity, warmth and truthfulness of the recording.

Piano Sonatas Nos 14 and 17
Alfred Brendel pf
Philips 422 063-2PH (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1987 ●

There is an extraordinary amount of highly experimental writing in Schubert's piano sonatas. The essence of their structure is the contrasting of big heroic ideas with tender and inner thoughts; the first impresses the listener, the second woos him. The two works on this CD are in some ways on a varying scale. The D major lasts for 40 minutes, the A minor for around 23. However, it is the latter that contains the most symphonically inspired writing – it sounds as if it could easily be transposed for orchestra. Alfred Brendel presents the composer not so much as the master of Lieder-writing, but more as a man thinking in large forms. Although there are wonderful quiet moments when intimate asides are conveyed with an imaginative sensitivity one remembers more the urgency and the power behind the notes. The A minor, with its frequently recurring themes, is almost obsessive in character whilst the big D major Sonata is rather lighter in its mood, especially in the outer movements. The recorded sound is very faithful to the pianist's tone, whilst generally avoiding that insistent quality that can mar his loudest playing.

Piano Sonatas Nos 15 and 18
Mitsuko Uchida pf
Philips 454 453-2PH (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Schubert's G major Sonata, D894, is the ultimate Frühlingstraum. Pervading the entire work is that oscillation between light-filled dream and stark waking reality. These may be juxtaposed in dramatic motivic contrast, but they are, quintessentially, twin sides of a single consciousness; and it is Mitsuko Uchida's supreme achievement to understand and re-create precisely this quality. She creates a true opening molto moderato of profound stillness and long distances. Chords really resonate and breathe out, yet her quick intakes of breath as the second subject steps into dance are tempered with the more flexible, whimsical intimacy of a Schiff. Uchida's gentleness of touch is ballasted by a firmly delineated bass and a weight of rhythmic articulation. She finds an easy, instinctive pace for the Andante, creating compacted shocks in the ringing chords of its minor-key episodes. These chords announce a Menuetto in which the Trio slinks in as the merest spectre of a Ländler, and leads to a finale in which Uchida creates a dance of the spirit within a deep inner stillness. The Relique Sonata, D840, one of Schubert's great and tantalizingly unfinished works, sounds entire, fully achieved in Uchida's hands. She shares with Schiff a leisured playing-out of the first movement. And her Andante is no less intimate in its bel canto of minute nuance and inflexion, starker and bleaker still than Schiff's masterpiece.

Piano Sonata No 16. Impromptus, D946
Alfred Brendel pf
Philips 422 075-2PH Ⓕ
(61 minutes: DDD) ●

Though love of the music alone, as pianists know, is not enough to master these pieces, it is essential, and in this big A minor Sonata Brendel presents us with a drama that is no less tense for being predominantly expressed in terms of shapely melody. There is a flexibility in this playing that reminds us of the pianist's own comment that in such music 'we feel not masters but victims of the situation': he allows us plenty of time to savour detail without ever losing sight of the overall shape of the music, and the long first movement and finale carry us compellingly forwards, as does the Scherzo with its urgent energy, while the Andante second movement, too, has the right kind of spaciousness. In the Impromptus which date from the composer's last months, Brendel is no less responsive or imaginative. Richly sonorous digital recording in a

German location complements the distinction of the playing on this fine disc.

Piano Sonata No 16. Impromptus, D946 🅿
Andreas Staier fp
Teldec Das Alte Werk 0630-11084-2 Ⓕ
(62 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995 ●

Once again, it is Andreas Staier's imagination and insight as a musician, rather than Staier-as-fortepianist, which comes to the fore in this rich recital. In the Sonata, for instance, Staier sets up a wide gulf between the two poles of Schubert's musical material – the sustained and lyrical, and the percussive and propulsive – in metaphysical terms, if you like, between the inner and outer, the contemplative and active life of this movement. Then he starts to paint with the pedal: there is a choice of four on this 1825 Viennese Johann Fritz fortepiano, and his changing use of them as the hands wander through the development creates a wide landscape for the journey, reminiscent of some of the piano writing in Winterreise. Here, and in the even more far-reaching expressive palette of the E flat major Impromptu, Staier really does realise the truth of his own statement that this – unlike the multi-purpose modern concert grand – is truly a 'specifically Romantic instrument'. In the slow movement's variations, the shifting balance between the hands are uniquely tailored to the resonating scale of the instrument, to uniquely revelatory effect. None of this could happen without Staier's own exceptionally sensitive imagination. At the start of the E flat minor Impromptu he creates a wide area of open space for the Andante, with the little, high, cadenza-like scalic figure appearing, as a sudden and wonderful bright light, as time is momentarily suspended.

Piano Sonata No 19. Impromptus, D899.
Deutsche Tänze, D783
Imogen Cooper pf
Ottavo OTRC78923 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989 ●

This is in fact the last of Imogen Cooper's six-disc cycle of the piano music of Schubert's last six years, a cycle launched in 1988 hard on the heels of similar cycles given on the concert platform in both London and Amsterdam. Like its predecessors, it confirms her as a Schubert player of exceptional style and finesse. Intuitively perceptive phrasing and a willingness to let the music sing within a wholly Schubertian sound world are prime virtues. And though (like her erstwhile mentor, Alfred Brendel) she is no slave to the metronome when contrasting first and second subjects in sonata expositions, she still makes the music her own without the self-consciously mannered kind of interpretation heard from one or two more recent rivals in this strongly competitive field. Her urgent yet poised performance of the late C minor Sonata certainly confirms her admission that the comparatively clinical atmosphere of an audience-less recording venue worries her not at all. In London's Henry Wood Hall her Yamaha is as clearly and truthfully reproduced as most else in the series.

Piano Sonatas Nos 19 and 21
Sviatoslav Richter pf
Olympia OCD335 (78 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1972 ●

As any follower of Richter's Schubert knows, you have to allow his sense of time to take over. Resist it and you will draw a blank. Submit and you will pass through an unsuspected doorway into an inner world of timeless inevitability. The C minor first movement is all fierce concentration and bleakness, the second all intense inner singing, the third deceptive simplicity with silences weighted as if hovering over the music's own demise, and the finale has a hellish drive to it – an utterly compelling experience. Monumental as ever, the first movement of the B flat Sonata is immensely slow, the tempo chosen not with the opening theme in mind but with a view to the G flat trill and the following silence, reminders of the chasm beneath. Don't expect any consolation from the slow movement or Grecian lightness from the Scherzo; all is directed towards the controlled desperation of the finale. Any duffer (to paraphrase Goethe) can make this sonata touching; but with Richter it becomes (to risk malicious misunderstanding) appalling. It bores into the soul.

Piano Sonatas Nos 19-21 🅿
Andreas Staier fp
Teldec Das Alte Werk ② 0630-13143-2 Ⓕ
(119 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●

The harpsichord has all but replaced the concert grand in Baroque keyboard music. But resistance to the fortepiano is still strong; that clattery tone, the lack of sustaining power in high registers – it just doesn't sing like a modern piano. However, there are many instances where the sound of the 1825 Johann Fritz piano, and especially Andreas Staier's handling of it, are simply revelatory. Staier uses the fortepiano's moderator pedals and the una corda pedal, which shifts the hammers so that they strike only one string each, to great effect. Staier's use of these tools never seem excessive or misplaced, and it's hard to believe that Schubert wouldn't have made similar use of them. It isn't only in the special effects department that the fortepiano scores. In the middle of the slow movement of D959 there's a remarkable, violent cadenza-like passage which is rarely effective on modern concert pianos. On the fortepiano you can strain and pound for all you're worth, and yet the scale of the sound feels absolutely right. The later recitative-like contrast of the ffz chords and short, pleading piano phrases at the climax of the second movement of D959 works wonderfully here. Similarly, Staier can play the fzp and ffzp accents in the trio section of D960's Scherzo with due emphasis without destroying the music's lightweight character. But it is Staier's handling of the instrument, not the instrument itself, that makes these recordings so exceptional. In tempo, phrasing and so on, his approach is thoroughly modern; in fact his performances would probably translate very effectively to a modern piano without any – or much – sense of incongruity.

Piano Sonata No 20. Moments musicaux, D780
Stephen Kovacevich pf
EMI 555219-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

Here is Schubert playing as compulsive and single-minded as any on record. Formidably serious and concentrated this is not for lovers of 'lilac time' or of softly focused, lyrical options. Indeed, it is often as if the Grim Reaper himself had cut a swathe through Schubert, forbidding at a glance even a touch of solace, let alone Gemütlichkeit. Yet the force and authenticity of such an outwardly controversial view is made unarguable and few pianists have penetrated more deeply to the dark, restlessly beating heart beneath Schubert's outwardly genial surface. The ferocity of Kovacevich's fortissimo chording in the development section of the sonata's first movement is typical of his refusal of all polite circumspection, and rarely can the Andantino, with its central elemental uproar, have sounded more spare or disconsolate. Even the Scherzo becomes both a memory of Beethoven's fierce whimsy and a presage of Chopin's irony, and more than touch of unease erases much chance of a conventionally meandering or leisurely view of the finale.

For Kovacevich, then, this is surely Schubert's sonata equivalent of Winterreise; a savage journey into oblivion. Many will look for light relief in the Moments musicaux, but again Kovacevich refuses all obvious sentiment or enticement. His tone remains lean and acidulous, and he possesses a rare ability to drain his sonority of all colour substance, accentuating the hectic flush of No 5 and achieving an extreme sense of desolation in No 6.

This record, then, is for those who concede that Schubert could be 'full of sorrow/And leaden eyed despair', a composer who had more than his share of life's vicissitudes. Competition from other great Schubertians (Schnabel, Brendel, Pollini, Lupu and Imogen Cooper, to name but five!) is intense, yet Kovacevich's Schubert inhabits a world of its own; an extraordinary achievement. The recordings are spectacularly bold.

Piano Sonata No 21. Drei Klavierstücke, D946
Mitsuko Uchida pf
Philips 456 572-2PH (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

Uchida's concentration and inwardness are of a rare order in her absorbed, deeply poetic reading of the B flat Sonata. No pianist makes you so aware how much of the first two movements is marked pp or even ppp; and none conjures such subtlety of colour in the softest dynamics: listen, for instance, to her playing of the three unearthly C sharp minor chords that usher in the first-movement development, or her timing and colouring of the breathtaking sideslip from C sharp minor to C major in the Andante. Other pianists may find a stronger undercurrent of foreboding or desperation in these two movements – though Uchida builds the development of the initial Molto moderato superbly to its dramatic climax. But none probes more hauntingly the music's mysterious contemplative ecstasy or creates such a sense of inspired improvisation. And her limpid cantabile sonorities are always ravishing on the ear. She is equally attuned to the less rarefied world of the Scherzo and finale, the former a glistening, mercurial dance, con delicatezza indeed, the latter graceful and quixotic, with a hint of emotional ambiguity even in its ostensibly cheerful main theme and a tigerish ferocity in its sudden Beethovenian eruptions.

The coupling is generous: the three Klavierstücke, D946, composed, like the sonata, in Schubert's final year, 1828, and assembled by Brahms for publication. She brings a wonderfully impassioned sweep, with razor-sharp rhythms, to the opening of the E flat minor, No 1, and mesmerically floats its slow B major episode. She also restores the beguiling barcarolle-like episode in A flat that Schubert excised from his autograph manuscript. The recording finely captures Uchida's subtle, pellucid sound world. A revealing disc from a Schubertian of rare insight and spirituality.

Complete Masses

No 1 in F, D105; No 2 in G, D167; No 3 in B flat, D324; No 4 in C, D452; No 5 in A flat, D678; No 6 in E flat, D950. Stabat mater, D383

Masses – No 1; No 2; No 3; No 4[a]; No 5[a]; No 6[a]. Stabat mater. Also contains six other short works
Lucia Popp, Helen Donath, Maria Venuti sops
Brigitte Fassbaender mez Adolf Dallapozza, Peter Schreier, Francisco Araiza, Josef Protschka tens
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Bavarian Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Wolfgang Sawallisch
EMI Sawallisch Edition ④ 764778-2
(297 minutes: ADD/DDD). Texts and translations Ⓜ included. Recorded 1980s ●●
Items marked [a] are also available on EMI Double Forte ② Ⓜ 573365-2 together with Tantum ergo, D962, and Offertorium, D963

The rather meagre representation this music has always received in the catalogue would seem to suggest that much of what is included in these discs is of little more than academic interest. Certainly not even Schubert's greatest advocates would describe everything he wrote for the Church as a masterpiece; his use of counterpoint, most notably in the Sixth Mass, is often dismissed as rudimentary. But there can never be any doubting the sincerity of Schubert's intentions and given sensitive, well-conceived performances, his unquenchable gift for melodic invention and ability to write instantly attractive music overrides any technical shortcomings. Such are Sawallisch's performances. His clear sense of direction, his natural feel for the line and his unpretentious approach never fail to reveal the inherent beauty in almost everything Schubert wrote.

The Bavarian Radio Chorus, with its rich, vibrant tone, won't be to everyone's liking, but it shows a consistent level of technical accomplishment, following Sawallisch's naturally shaped lines and beautifully moulded dynamics. Similarly, with such accomplished Schubertians as Lucia Popp and Fischer-Dieskau one can expect some memorable performances. The highlight of these discs is the deliciously delicate trio between Popp, Adolf Dallapozza and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, supported by some extraordinarily elegant orchestral playing, in the Benedictus of the Second Mass: if you had to take just one recording of Schubert to a desert island, this would be a strong contender. Sawallisch's is an impressive achievement for maintaining so consistent an approach and producing performances of exemplary musicianship. The recordings are first-rate, with the older analogue transfers coming up unusually well.

Mass No 5

Mass No 5. Deutsche Messe, D872 Ⓟ
Stefan Preyer treb Thomas Weinhappel counterten Jörg Hering ten Harry van der Kamp bass Arno Hartmann org Vienna Boys' Choir; Chorus Viennensis; Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / Bruno Weil
Sony Classical Vivarte SK53984 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993 ●

In the Deutsche Messe Bruno Weil makes no attempt to impose interpretative individuality on music designed purely for liturgical use: he is content merely to oversee neat ensemble and balance. The orchestra, consisting mainly of wind instruments, doubles the chorus parts and while its role might seem largely superfluous it does provide a comfortable cushion on which the choir can relax while making its way effortlessly through such unchallenging music. It's a different story with the sparkling A flat major Mass, but again Bruno Weil's understated direction results in an immensely satisfying performance. There is a youthful vigour and infectious enthusiasm here. Of course, much of that comes from the superb singing of the Vienna Boys' Choir. Their exuberant 'Hosanna's in the Sanctus and Benedictus are more unashamedly joyful than such music has a right to be. The two boy soloists sing with a musical maturity way beyond their years. That is not to belittle the splendid contribution from the adult voices nor the exquisite playing of the Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment. Weil achieves the perfect tonal blend: nothing disturbs the open-hearted honesty of this genuinely sincere performance.

Mass No 5[a]. Hymnus an den heiligen Geist, D948[b]. Psalm 92, D953[c]. Stabat mater in G minor, D175[d]
[c]Mhairi Lawson, [a]Deborah York sops [c]Lynette Alcantara, [a]Sally Bruce Payne mezzos [ab]Neill Archer, [bc]Robert Burt tens [bc]Colin Campbell bar [a]Michael George, [bc]Robert McDonald basses Monteverdi Choir; [abd]Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Philips 456 578-2PH (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●

Gardiner's interpretation of Schubert's great, often visionary A flat Mass stands somewhere between the generously moulded, Romantically inclined Sawallisch and the fresh, guileless reading from Bruno Weil using an all-male choir and boy soloists. Where Gardiner immediately scores is in the sheer poise and refinement of his performance: neither of the other choirs sing with such effortless blend, such perfect dynamic control or such precise intonation – a crucial advantage in, say, the tortuous chromaticism of the 'Crucifixus'. The orchestral playing too is superb, with a ravishing contribution from the woodwind who throughout the Mass are favoured with some of Schubert's most poetic writing.

Gardiner is straighter, more abstemious with rubato, than Sawallisch, though he usually allows the music more breathing space than the brisk, exuberant Weil. His minute care for Schubert's phrasing and dynamic marks and the fabulous control of his singers and players often make for deeply satisfying results – as in the gentle, luminous Kyrie, where Gardiner shows a typically acute feel for harmonic flux and the curve of the Schubertian line. The opening of the Gloria has a torrential energy, and Gardiner is not one to miss a trick in, say, the cataclysmic drama of the 'Crucifixus' or the long, smouldering crescendos and awesome modulations of the Sanctus. Occasionally, though, the very polish and precision of the music-making can seem a shade studied: the opening of the Credo, for instance, sounds almost like an elocution lesson; and Gardiner favours a smart pace and emphatic, martial accents in the Dona nobis pacem, where Sawallisch, at a slower tempo, finds altogether more breadth and nobility. Gardiner's soloists, led by the plangent, boyish tones of Deborah York, use their relatively limited opportunities well: the 'Gratias' trio, sung with chamber-musical delicacy, is one of the highlights. He opts for the original and less gargantuan version of the 'Cum sancto spiritu' fugue, and as an appendix he gives us the original draft of the 'Et incarnatus est', with several significant differences, including lighter scoring from the final version.

The additional items, none of them over-familiar, are well contrasted. Two are late works: the rapt Hymn to the Holy Ghost and the solemn, declamatory Psalm 92, set to the Hebrew text for the famous Jewish cantor Salomon Sulzer and sung here in German translation. Even less well known is Schubert's 1815 setting of the first four verses of the Stabat mater, a poignant and, at times, intensely dramatic little piece. Performances of all three are first-rate, with Colin Campbell firm and resonant in the cantor's role in Psalm 92. The recorded sound is perfectly acceptable, though the balance favours the orchestra, especially the violins, over the chorus and even at times the soloists. Sawallisch, a Schubertian of vast experience and innate sympathy, is still top choice for a single version of the A flat Mass. But quite apart from the very considerable merits of Gardiner's version, his enterprisingly chosen extra items could make this a first choice for many.

Part-songs

Psalm 23, D706. Im Gegenwärtigen Vergangenes, D710. Gesang der Geister über den Wassern, D714. Gondelfahrer, D809. Coronach, D836. Nachthelle, D892. Grab und Mond, D893. Nachtgesang im Walde, D913. Ständchen, D920. Die Nacht, D983c. Gott im Ungewitter, D985
Birgit Remmert contr Werner Güra ten Philip Mayers pf Scharoun Ensemble; RIAS Chamber Choir, Berlin / Marcus Creed
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1669 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●

Most of the part-songs here evoke some aspect of night, whether benevolent, romantic, transfigured or sinister. Between them they give a fair conspectus of Schubert's achievement in the part-song genre, ranging from the mellifluous, Biedermeier Die Nacht, forerunner of many a Victorian glee, and the gently sensuous Gondelfahrer to the eerie, harmonically visionary Grab und Mond and the brooding Gesang der Geister über den Wassern. Other highlights here include the alfresco Nachtgesang, with its quartet of echoing horns, Ständchen, a delicious nocturnal serenade, the austere, bardic Scott setting Coronach and the serenely luminous Nachthelle. The RIAS Chamber Choir confirms its credentials as one of Europe's finest, most virtuosic ensembles. It sings with rounded, homogeneous tone, wellnigh perfect intonation and an excitingly wide dynamic range. Characterisation tends to be very vivid, whether in the ecstatic central climax in Nachthelle, sharp contrasts in Gesang der Geister über den Wassern or the great sense of awe – and palpable feeling for Schubert's strange modulations – in Grab und Mond.

Birgit Remmert, the alto soloist in Ständchen (sung, incidentally, in the version with women's voices), sings well enough but with insufficient lightness and sense of fun. But Werner Güra negotiates what one of Schubert's friends called 'the damnably high' tenor solo in Nachthelle gracefully and with no sense of strain. Philip Mayers is a serviceable rather than specially imaginative pianist, though the delicate, silvery treble of the early 19th-century instrument is enchantingly heard in Psalm 23 and the shimmering high repeated notes of Nachthelle; and the other instrumentalists make their mark – splendid rotund horns in Nachtgesang im Walde, sombrely intense strings in Gesang der Geister. The recorded sound is clear and warm, with a well-judged vocal-instrumental balance.

Stabat mater

Stabat mater. Magnificat in C, D486.
Offertorium in B flat, D963
Sheila Armstrong sop Hanna Schaer mez
Alejandro Ramirez ten Philippe Huttenlocher bar
Lausanne Vocal Ensemble; Lausanne Chamber Orchestra / Michel Corboz
Erato 4509-96961-2 (59 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1979 ●

Schubert's strikingly fresh setting of the Stabat mater (in a German translation) was written in the composer's 19th year, yet it displays clear anticipations of his later music, especially in the terzetto (No 11) for soprano, tenor, baritone and chorus and the striking chorus 'Wer wird Zähren sanften Mitleids' (No 5) with its superb horn writing. There is a beautiful tenor aria with oboe obbligato, in which Alejandro Ramirez is very stylish, while the bass aria 'Sohn des Vaters' is dark and strong. Here Philippe Huttenlocher may not be quite sombre enough, yet his contribution is still most enjoyable. The singing of the Lausanne Vocal Ensemble, with the Lausanne CO under Corboz, combines clarity of focus with a firm sonority, and Schubert's lively fugues have plenty of vigour. The two shorter pieces, the Magnificat (again with a fine contribution from Ramirez) and the Offertorium, are also given strong performances. The recording, though not crystal clear, has transferred vividly.

Complete Secular Choral Works

Elisabeth Flechl, Ruth Ziesak sops Martina Steffl, Angelika Kirchschlager mezzos Birgit Remmert contr Franz Leitner, Thomas Künne, Christoph Prégardien, Herbert Lippert tens Oliver Widmer bar Karl Heinz Lehner, Hiroyuki Ijichi, Edgard Loibl, Robert Holl basses Barbara Moser, András Schiff, Andreas Staier, Werner Schröckmayr pfs Arnold Schoenberg Choir; Vienna Konzertverein / Erwin Ortner
Teldec ⑦ 4509-94546-2 (480 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995-96 ●

The scheme of presentation here is both sensible and imaginative. Each of the discs has a subject-heading and each has its share of the treasures. The first, 'Transience', opens with the setting of Goethe's Gesang der Geister über den Wassern for men's voices and string quartet (without violins), probably the supreme masterpiece of the whole collection. The fascinating contrapuntal treatment of Schiller's Dreifach ist der Schritt der Zeit in its male-voice setting, and the gentle melancholy of Scott's Coronach are also memorable. The love-songs on the second disc begin and end with the Ständchen, 'Zögernd leise', its second version, with male-voice chorus, being the more attractive in these performances. Under the heading of 'Eternity' (third disc) comes much that has perhaps a questionable place in a secular anthology: good to have, never the less, the anthem known to British choristers as Where Thou reignest as Schiksalslenker, blicke nieder. The fourth disc has 'Heroism' as its theme, with Mirjams Siegesgesang as its lengthiest work. 'Nature' produces several masterpieces, including Kleist's Gott in der Natur and the magical Nachthelle. The sixth, devoted to 'Celebration', has some longer occasional pieces, none so delightful as the brief cantata written for his father's birthday in 1813, with guitar accompaniment. The last disc, 'Circle of Friends', begins, beguilingly, with Der Tanz and ends with Zur guten Nacht. Ortner's soloists do well, but it is in the choral singing that the great merit of these performances lies. The Arnold Schoenberg Choir is a fine body of musicians and here they show a virtually unflawed beauty and opulence of tone. The pianists, headed by András Schiff, are excellent.

Lieder

Elly Ameling

Lieder[a] – Im Abendrot, D799. Die Sterne, D939. Nacht und Träume, D827. Der liebliche Stern, D861. Der Vollmond strahlt, D797 No 3*b*. Der Einsame, D800. Schlaflied, D527. An Silvia, D891. Das Mädchen, D652. Minnelied, D429. Die Liebe hat gelogen, D751. Du liebst mich nicht, D756. An die Laute, D905. Der Blumenbrief, D622. Die Männer sind méchant, D866 No 3. Seligkeit, D433. Nachtviolen, D752. Du bist die Ruh, D776. Das Lied im Grünen, D917. Der Schmetterling, D633. An die Nachtigall, D497. An die Nachtigall, D196. Der Wachtelschlag, D742. Im Freien, D880. Die Vögel, D691. Fischerweise, D881. Die Gebüsche, D646. Im Haine, D738. Kennst du das Land, D321. Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt, D877 No 4. Heiss mich nicht reden, D877 No 2. So lasst mich scheinen, D877 No 3. Die Liebende schreibt, D673. Nähe des Geliebten, D162. Heidenröslein, D257. Liebhaber in allen Gestalten, D558. Die junge Nonne, D828. Der König in Thule, D367. Gretchen am Spinnrade, D118. Gretchens Bitte, D564. Szene aus Goethes Faust, D126 (with Meinard Kraak ten, chorus and org). Suleika I, D720. Suleika II, D717. Raste Krieger!, D837. Jäger, ruhe von der Jagd, D838. Ave Maria, D839. An die Musik, D547. Schwestergrüss, D762. Sei mir gegrüsst, D741. Die Blumensprache, D519. An den Mond, D296. Abendbilder, D650. Frühlingssehnsucht, D957 No 3. Erster Verlust, D226. Nachthymne, D687. Die Sterne, D684. Der Knabe, D692. Wiegenlied, D498. Berthas Lied in der Nacht, D653 Lieder[b] – Ganymed, D544. Die Götter Griechenlands, D677. Der Musensohn, D764. Fülle der Liebe, D854. Sprache der Liebe, D410. Schwanengesang, D744. An den Tod, D518. Die Forelle, D550. Am Bach im Frühling, D361. Auf dem Wasser zu singen, D774. Der Schiffer, D694. An die Entfernte, D765. Sehnsucht, D516. An die untergehende Sonne, D457. Abendröte, D690
Elly Ameling sop [a]Dalton Baldwin,
[b]Rudolf Jansen pfs

Philips The Early Years ④ 438 528-2PM4
(260 minutes: ADD/DDD). Texts included. Ⓜ
Recorded 1972-84 ●●

The first Im Abendrot (the Lappe setting) introduces the smiling Ameling of 1973, her voice basking in the images of golden shafts of light, and rapt in an easeful legato. In the shorter vowels and pulsing pianistic light of Die Sterne, she still finds serenity, just as in Der Einsame the poet's solitude is sensed at the heart of a tingling, sentient world. The expressive subtlety of these performances comes from an unique fusion of response between Ameling and Baldwin during this period. In the second disc, their creative empathy is turned to Schubert's settings of Goethe. Ameling focuses on the vulnerability and childlike eagerness of Mignon, missing, perhaps, the nervous feverishness which lies just below the surface of these songs, and which Wolf was to exploit to the full. After one of the most perfectly-scaled performances of Heidenröslein on disc, Ameling and Baldwin turn to Goethe's Gretchen and Suleika, and to Scott's Ellen. Gretchen's searing vision at the spinning-wheel is answered by the rarely heard Szene aus Goethes Faust in which Ameling finds herself in the company of an anonymous and very spooky Böser Geist, as well as a ghostly choir who seem piped in from another planet. Seven years later, Ameling turns to a still stranger spirit world. The third disc, recorded in 1982, includes the lunar beauty of Schubert's Bruchmann setting, Schwestergrüss, articulated by a voice bleached of any colour. It is almost impossible to detect any sense of ageing in the voice here: Characterised by songs which search out the most elusive of soul moods, this third recital reveals Ameling's soprano at its most finely nuanced, in songs such as Abendbilder and the Novalis Nachthymne. In the final disc, at the age of 50, Ameling took on the challenge of some of Schubert's most visionary songs: facing Schiller's Greek gods, Goethe's Ganymed, Schlegel's Der Schiffer and moving through Mayrhofer's longing to Schlegel's final sunset. These songs stretch the voice and the mind to its very limits, yet Ameling's artistry seems to grow with the music itself. The set includes full texts but no translations. In the end, though, Ameling's singing renders them all but redundant.

Janet Baker

Lieder[a] – Gretchen am Spinnrade, D118. Was bedeutet die Bewegung?, D720. Ach, um deine feuchten Schwingen, D717. Schwestergruss, D762. Schlummerlied, D527. An die untergehende Sonne, D457. Heiss' mich nicht reden, D877 No 2. So lasst mich scheinen, D877 No 3. Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt, D877 No 4. Kennst du das Land, D321. Berthas Lied in der Nacht, D653. Epistel an Herrn Josef Spaun, D749. Raste, Krieger, D837. Jäger, ruhe von der Jagd, D838. Ave Maria, D837. Hin und wieder, D239. Lieber schwärmt, D239 No 6. An die Nachtigall, D497. Schlafe, schlafe, D498. Delphine, D857. Wiegenlied, D867. Die Männer sind méchant, D886 No 3. Iphigenia, D573. Das Mädchen, D652.

Die junge Nonne, D828. Am Grabe Anselmos, D504. Abendstern, D806. Die Götter Greichenlands, D677. Gondelfahrer, D808. Auflösung, D807. Lieder[b] – Die Forelle, D550. Rastlose Liebe, D138. Auf dem Wasser zu singen, D774. Der Tod und das Mädchen, D531. An die Musik, D547. Frühlingsglaube, D686. Der Musensohn, D764. An Sylvia, D891. Litanei, D343. Heidenröslein, D257. Nacht und Träume, D827. Du bist die Ruh', D776

Dame Janet Baker mez [a]Gerald Moore,
[b]Geoffrey Parsons pf
EMI Double Forte ② 569389-2 Ⓜ
(155 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1970-80 ●●

When the major part of this issue, the first 25 songs, appeared in 1971 under the title 'A Schubert Evening', the reviewer gave it a glowing review in Gramophone. EMI provided a lavish booklet with annotations on each song, texts and translations, and illustrations of the artists and of Schubert. Virtually nothing of that remains. The briefest summary of the notes, no pictures, no words. It's a great shame as this set has some of the most glorious Schubert singing you can imagine. 'A Schubert Evening' was in part instigated as a complementary issue to Fischer-Dieskau's contemporaneous recording of all Schubert's songs suited to a male interpreter. Dame Janet chose those he had abjured, ones specifically written for a female protagonist. She fulfils almost every aspect of her riveting selection in terms of vibrant tone, immaculate line, control of dynamics, insights into the poems' meaning and lively storytelling.

EMI, in its documentation, seems to have overlooked the fact that five of the songs, Nos 7-11 on the second CD, come from an earlier recital. They are five of the songs that Baker often sang at recitals from the start of her career and to which she was particularly attached; Am Grabe Anselmos and Gondelfahrer, two superb pieces, are perhaps the most telling of a wonderful group. The remainder of the recordings from a 1980 recital with Parsons, showing no deterioration in the mezzo's singing, offer several of the composer's most popular pieces, all sung con amore. This is an issue to treasure.

Janet Baker

Abendstern, D806[a]. Amalia, D195[a]. Atys, D585[a]. Auf dem See, D543[b]. Auflösung, D807[a]. Augenlied, D297[a]. Blumenlied, D431[b]. Die Entzückung an Laura, D390[a]. Gondelfahrer, D808[b]. Die Götter Griechenlands, D677 – Strophe[b]. Die junge Nonne, D828[b]. Der Jüngling am Bache, D30[a]. Der Jüngling und der Tod, D545[c]. Memnon, D541[a]. Der Musensohn, D764[a]. Das Rosenband, D280[b]. Schwestergruss, D762[c]. Sehnsucht, D636[a]. Der Sieg, D805[a]

Dame Janet Baker mez [a]Geoffrey Parsons,
[b]Graham Johnson, [c]Martin Isepp pfs
BBC Legends BBCL4070-2 (73 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Live broadcasts from [c]1970, [b]1977 and [a]1980 ●

The interpretation of Schubert's Lieder comes no better than this, a recital taken from three different broadcast sources, catching Dame Janet at the absolute peak of her powers. Most of the songs are by poets – Goethe, Schiller and Mayrhofer – who moved the composer to his most noble inspiration. As several Schubert specialists have commented, for each he reserved a particular style, in response to their very different manner, and Baker catches the precise meaning of each.

Of the Schiller settings, the operatic expression of Amalia and the dreamy rapture of the praise of Laura (here the singer achieves one miraculous pp effect) are perfectly caught. Best of all is that wonderful song, Die Götter Griechenlands, where longing is so movingly expressed. All of the seven Mayrhofer settings find Baker truly at one with the poet's high-minded self-communing on the meaning of life, and with his underlying fatalism. Most notable are the calm assurance and serenity she brings to Der Sieg, the resigned isolation found in Abendstern, and the holy fire of Auflösung, the last two masterpieces that the singer did so much to make popular.

As Gerald Moore once pointed out, Baker liked the stimulus of the different ideas she received from different pianists. Here Isepp, Parsons and the young Graham Johnson provide just that, completing pleasure in a recital that goes to the heart of the chosen material: as ever one realises that Baker was, above all, a singer of conviction. The absence of any texts or translations is the only blot on a superb issue.

Barbara Bonney

Ave Maria, D839. Ganymed, D544. Kennst du das Land, D321. Heiss mich nicht reden, D877 No 2. So lasst mich scheinen, D877 No 3. Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt, D877 No 4. Liebhaber in allen Gestalten, D558. Heidenröslein, D257. Nahe des Geliebten, D162. Die Forelle, D550. Auf dem Wasser zu singen, D774. Im Abendrot, D799. Ständchen, D889. Du bist die Ruh, D776. Gretchen am Spinnrade, D118. Gretchens Bitte, D564. Der Hirt auf dem Felsen, D965

Barbara Bonney sop Sharon Kam cl
Geoffrey Parsons pf
Teldec 4509-90873-2 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 ●●

Bonney's programme is most carefully planned. She begins with a substantial selection of Goethe settings, going to the heart of the matter in all the Mignon songs, singing Ganymed with exemplary legato and breath control. Then she makes a well-varied selection from many of the better-known pieces. She crosses paths with Blochwitz only in Die Forelle and Auf dem Wasser zu singen. Both take the same time over each, but it is worth noting that Jansen, for Blochwitz, finds more variety and lift in the barcarolle-like accompaniment of the latter song than does Parsons. Vocally speaking, both versions are enjoyable in their natural accomplishments.

Bonney's line and breath are again remarkable in Du bist die Ruh, which also demonstrates, as do all the other offerings, the purity of her tone – more North American clear-aired than Viennese creamy – yet that is never allowed to exclude depth of feeling. Indeed when she returns to the Goethe settings with Gretchen am Spinnrade she shows particular eloquence in the way that, at a deliberate pace, she builds the song unerringly to its climaxes and also catches the inwardness of Gretchen's state of mind. The recording is faultless.

Ian Bostridge

Lied eines Schiffers an die Dioskuren, D360. Nachtstück, D672. Auf der Donau, D553. Abendstern, D806. Auflösung, D807. Geheimes, D719. Versunken, D715. Schäfers Klagelied, D121. An die Entfernte, D765. Am Flusse, D766. Willkommen und Abschied, D767. Die Götter Griechenlands, D677. An die Leier, D737. Am See, D746. Alinde, D904. Wehmut, D772. Über Wildemann, D884. Auf der Riesenkoppe, D611. Sei mir gegrüsst, D741. Dass sie hier gewesen, D775. Der Geistertanz, D116

Ian Bostridge ten Julius Drake pf Ⓕ

EMI 557141-2 (68 minutes: DDD) ●●

A truly memorable experience. The first half of the programme is divided between settings of Mayrhofer and Goethe, two poets who drew the very best out of Schubert. Bostridge responds to this inspiration with singing that is worthy of the pieces both in terms of silvery, poised tone and inflection of the text. Such musing songs as Nachtstück, Abendstern, Geheimes, Versunken and An die Entfernte are delivered in that peculiarly plangent tone of the tenor's which causes his audiences to tremble in admiration.

Using vibrato, verbal emphases, pianissimos and floated touches to quite magical yet seemingly spontaneous effect, these songs, and many others receive near-ideal performances. Only in the rough-hewn Willkommen und Abschied would perhaps a heavier voice, a baritone rather than a tenor, be preferable. Bostridge enthusiasts will lap up this wonderful issue; so ought all lovers of Schubert Lieder. Bostridge need fear no comparison with other great interpreters of these songs. The admirable recording catches voice and piano in ideal balance.

Ian Bostridge

Auf der Bruck, D853. Fülle der Liebe, D854. Im Walde, 'Waldesnacht', D708. Der liebliche Stern, D861. Der Schmetterling, D633. Tiefes Leid, 'Im Jänner 1817', D876. Vom Mitleiden Mariä, D632. Der Wanderer, D649. Wiedersehn, D855. Piano Sonata No 17 in D, D850

Ian Bostridge ten Leif Ove Andsnes pf

EMI 557509-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002 ●●

EMI hit an inspired note when it invited Andsnes and Bostridge to complement the fomer's series of Schubert's greatest sonatas with an aptly chosen selection of songs. For here, surely, are musical soul-mates, two artists who fuse to become one and whose love of Schubert's variety and ambivalence is evident in every bar. In Der liebliche Stern their range of nuance never excludes naturalness and what concentrated musical energy they discover in Auf der Bruck. Each twist and turn of the narrative in Fülle der Liebe is deftly caught and both artists find a cool, attenuated, almost Gallic beauty in Der Wanderer with its final line 'froh ungeben, doch alleine' ('there is joy all around, yet I am alone'). Again, in the concluding Der Schmetterling you could hardly hope for a lighter touch or a greater sense of enchantment and it is only in the sonata that a few doubts arise.

Here it is Andsnes's naturalness that impresses most. Everything is kept refreshingly on the move and if there is an occasional impression of more sense than sensibility the playing is never less than musicianly. The hushed coda is notable, but Andsnes's coolness and control hardly make you forget long-cherished recordings by Schnabel, Kempff, Curzon, Brendel and, perhaps most of all, Gilels.

Buy it for the inspired partnership with Bostridge. The recorded sound is excellent, and the translations of the songs are by Richard Wigmore.

Ian Bostridge

An den Mond, D193. Wandrers Nachtlied I, D224. Der Fischer, D225. Erster Verlust, D226. Heidenröslein, D257. Erlkönig, D328. Litanei auf das Fest Allerseelen, D343. Seligkeit, D433. Ganymed, D544. An die Musik, D547. Die Forelle, D550. Frühlingsglaube, D686. Im Haine, D738. Der Musensohn, D764. Wandrers Nachtlied II, D768. Der Zwerg, D771. Auf dem Wasser zu singen, D774. Du bist die Ruh, D776. Nacht und Träume, D827. Fischerweise, D881. Im Frühling, D882. An Silvia, D891

Ian Bostridge ten Julius Drake pf

EMI 556347-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 ●●

Bostridge's devoted admirers will once more wonder at his famed engagement with the text in hand and his innate ability both to sing each piece in an entirely natural manner and at the same time to search out its inner meaning, everything achieved without a vocal or technical mishap within hearing. His gift for finding the right manner for each song is exemplified in the contrast between the easy simplicity he brings to such apparently artless pieces as Fischerweise, Frühlingsglaube and the less familiar Im Haine (this a wondrous performance of a song that is the very epitome of Schubert the melodist) and the depth of feeling found in Erster Verlust (a properly intense reading), Nacht und Traüme, Wandrers Nachtlied I and II, Du bist die Ruh (so elevated in tone and style) and Litanei.

Bostridge also characterises spine-chillingly the intense, immediate drama of Erlkönig and Der Zwerg, though here some may prefer the weight of a baritone. In the latter piece Drake is particularly successful at bringing out the originality of the piano part, and in a much simpler song, An Sylvia, he gives to the accompaniment a specific lift and lilt that usually goes unheard. In these songs, as in everything else, the ear responds eagerly to the tenor's fresh, silvery tone and his ever-eager response to words. The recording and notes are faultless.

Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau
Lieder, Volumes 1-3 DG (21 discs) 437 214-2GX21 (1463 minutes: ADD). Volumes also available separately, as detailed below. Ⓑ
Recorded 1966-72 ○○○

234 Lieder, written between 1811 and 1817
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Gerald Moore pf
DG ⑨ 437 215-2GX9 (404 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1966-68 Ⓑ

171 Lieder, written between 1817 and 1828
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Gerald Moore pf
DG ⑨ 437 225-2GX9 (395 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1969 Ⓑ

Die schöne Müllerin, D795. Winterreise, D911. Schwanengesang, D957
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Gerald Moore pf
DG ③ 437 235-2GX3 (184 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1971-72 Ⓑ

Twenty-one discs at under £100 bringing together two of this century's greatest Lieder interpreters – it sounds like a recipe for success, as indeed it is, fulfilling the highest expectations. The recordings were made when Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau was at his peak and Gerald Moore could draw on a lifetime's experience and love of this repertoire. Though the set makes no claims to completeness, most of the songs for male voice are included here. The use of a single singer and pianist gives the set a unity that allows the listener to gasp anew at the composer's wide-ranging inspiration and imagination.

Fischer-Dieskau brings a unique understanding, an elegant line and a diction that renders the text clear without resort to the written texts. If occasionally he imparts an unnecessary weightiness to the lighter songs, this quibble is as nothing when his historic achievement is taken as a whole. And though he made many recordings of the song cycles these are perhaps the finest, with Moore the ideal partner. Try for example, the bleakness of 'Ihr Bild' from Schwanengesang or the hallucinatory happiness of 'Der Lindenbaum' from Winterreise. The songs themselves are basically in chronological order (but with the three song cycles collected together in the final box). It is unfortunate there is no index – trying to find individual songs can be frustrating. Also, the translations are distinctly quirky in places; better to use Richard Wigmore's excellent book Schubert: The Complete Song Texts (Gollancz: 1988) if you have a copy to hand.

Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau
An die Entfernte, D765[a]. Auf dem Wasser zu singen, D774[a]. Du bist die Ruh, D776[b]. Erlkönig, D328[c]. Die Forelle, D550[b]. Heidenröslein, D257[b]. Das Heimweh, D456[a]. Der Jüngling an der Quelle, D300[b]. Der Jüngling und der Tod, D545[a]. Das Lied im Grünen, D917[a]. Litanei auf das Fest aller Seelen, D343[a]. Nachtgesang, D314[a]. Der Schiffer, D536[a]. Sei mir gegrüsst, D741[b]. Ständchen, 'Horch! Horch! die Lerch', D889[b]. Der Strom, D565[a]. Der Tod und das Mädchen, D531[a]. Der Wanderer, D649[a]. Der Winterabend, D938[a]. Das Zügenglöcklein, D871[a]. Der zürnende Barde, D785[a]
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Gerald Moore pf
EMI Encore 574754-2 (69 minutes: ADD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1960 and 1966

Almost 70 minutes of Fischer-Dieskau singing Schubert in his absolute prime at super-bargain price cannot be bad, in spite of the absence of texts. The songs chosen – some outright favourites, others fine pieces the baritone helped to rescue from obscurity – make up a most desirable programme. As regards interpretation, Fischer-Dieskau is at his most soft-grained and persuasive in the lyrical pieces, notably the rarely heard but most beautiful Nachtgesang, at his most melodramatic in the more forceful Lieder, culminating in a hair-raising account of Erlkönig.

Moore is both sensitive and positive as the great baritone's partner, and contributes meaningfully to all the performances. EMI's recording of the period was wholly successful in catching the full tone of its singers.

Renée Fleming
Heidenröslein, D257. Die Forelle, D550. An die Nachtigall, D497. Im Frühling, D882. Die junge Nonne, D828. Nacht und Träume, D827. Auf dem Wasser zu singen, D774. Ave Maria, D839. Frühlingsglaube, D686. Gretchen am Spinnrade, D118. Du bist die Ruh, D776. Der Tod und das Mädchen, D531. Viola, D786. Die Männer sind méchant, D866 No 3
Renée Fleming sop Christoph Eschenbach pf
Decca 455 294-2DH (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996

When yet another recital of Schubert Lieder appears, composed in the main of well-known songs, one looks for some special attributes to set it off from what has gone before in such profusion. Renée Fleming frequently supplies just those touches of individual response and high art which the ear is seeking. Like Dame Margaret Price she brings considerable stage experience to bear on her readings in terms of dramatic immediacy. That is particularly true of Die junge Nonne and Gretchen am Spinnrade, both of which carry the charge of emotions made manifest at the moment of recording. There is almost as much to enjoy and appreciate in the more reflective, inward pieces. Im Frühling, in both voice and piano, catches very precisely the sense of longing evoked by the spring, with Eschenbach pointing up the poignancy of alternating major-minor. In An die Nachtigall, Fleming's tone is poised, finely controlled, even more so in the more difficult Du bist die Ruh, where she shades the end of the final two couplets with a ravishing piano. Nacht und Träume, still harder to sustain, is as time-stopping as it should be. In the sadly neglected flower-ballad Viola the pair suggest a true partnership of thought and execution. At least three other songs, Auf dem Wasser zu singen, Ave Maria and Frühlingsglaube seem marginally too slow. Here, and sometimes elsewhere, a shade more rhythmic verve, a greater attention to consonants, would improve on what is already a formidable array of virtues, and Eschenbach's habit of indulging in ritenutos sometimes becomes a distraction. These small points apart, this is a Liederabend to savour and faultlessly recorded too.

Matthias Goerne and Christine Schäfer
Lieder, Volume 27 – Lob der Tränen, D711. Lebensmelodien, D395. Sprache der Liebe, D410. Wiedersehn, D855. Sonett I, D628. Sonett II, D629. Sonett III, D630. Abendröte, D690. Die Berge, D634. Die Vögel, D691. Der Fluss, D693. Der Knabe, D692. Die Rose, D745. Der Schmetterling, D633. Der Wanderer, D649. Das Mädchen, D652. Die Sterne, D684. Die Gebüsche, D646. Blanka, D631. Der Schiffer, D694. Fülle der Liebe, D854. Im Walde, D708
Matthias Goerne bar Christine Schäfer sop
Graham Johnson pf
Hyperion CDJ33027 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995-96

Goerne's brief is Schubert's settings of the brothers Schlegel, whose volatile character and life are amply and fascinatingly described in Johnson's introduction to the booklet. As ever in this series, there are songs that we should curse ourselves for neglecting for so long. Among the few settings of August von Schlegel is the interesting Lebensmelodien, where the Swan and the Eagle engage in a colloquy – the one all tranquil, the other all disturbed – and are observed by doves on whom Schubert lavishes his most beautiful music. In the formal Wiedersehn, as Johnson avers, Schubert imitates the style of a Handelian aria. The second of three Petrarch translations prefigures, arrestingly, the mood of Winterreise.

When we come to brother Friedrich and the quasi-cycle Abendröte we are in an even more exalted world where Der Fluss, another of Schubert's miraculous water songs, Der Knabe, above all Die Rose, where the fading of the rose is a metaphor for lost virginity (this, movingly done by Schäfer), and Der Wanderer show just how willingly Schubert responded to Schlegel's imagery. About Goerne's singing as such, ably assisted by Johnson's playing, there are no reservations, particularly in the visionary Die Sterne, but as the CD progresses his interpretations can seem a shade soporific; one wonders if he has lived long enough with these songs to penetrate to their heart. His easily produced, slightly vibrant and mellifluous baritone and sense of Schubertian style make him a largely rewarding interpreter. The recording is superb.

Gundula Janowitz
Schubert Atys, D585. Einsamkeit, D620. Der Fluss, D693. Im Freien, D880. Die Gebüsche, D646. Die Götter Griechenlands, D677. Sehnsucht, D516
Hüttenbrenner Frühlingsliedchen. Der Hügel. Lerchenlied. Die Seefart. Seegras. Spinnerlied. Die Sterne
Gundula Janowitz sop Irwin Gage pf
Orfeo C592021B (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1972 ●

This is an unusual and wholly absorbing recital by a soprano often, mistakenly, considered no more than a singer with a lovely voice. In 1972, at the height of her appreciable powers, Janowitz impressed her Salzburg audience with this, her first recital at the Festival. Her discerning choice comprises some notable songs by Schubert rarely heard in recital and ones by his contemporary Hüttenbrenner, which Janowitz sang from manuscript copies, seldom performed since the composer's day. These are surely their first recordings.

Has there ever been such a lovely, poised account of the great Schiller-inspired song, Die Götter Griechenlands or such an ingratiating one of Sehnsucht, the Mayrhofer setting? The first offering, Im Freien, has its winning cantilena filled with gloriously sustained, long-breathed tone. The programme ends with Einsamkeit. This grandly imaginative if slightly impersonal quasi-cantata, to a Mayrhofer text, a composition that Schubert himself thought so highly of, is a kind of a panorama of a life, ending in a wonderfully reposeful final section. Janowitz and her impressive partner perform it with total conviction, sustaining interest throughout.

Although not in Schubert's class – who is? – Hüttenbrenner reveals a talent apparently well able to encompass the meaning of poems in fluent and often imaginative writing. Orfeo provide no texts, let alone translations, but the delightful Spinnerlied must be about spinning: it is an artlessly charming song. Der Hügel is obviously about more serious matters, and in its sad course comes closes to Schubert in depth of feeling. Frühlingsliedchen has a simple, spring-like joy to it, and an appealingly varied, strophic form. Janowitz takes the measure of them all, and adds to a gently vibrant tone many tints and touches of half-voice. They could not have a better advocate.

The recording catches the full glow of the singer's voice. The only drawback, that sad absence of texts, is not serious enough to stop acquiring this issue, given that Janowitz virtually tells you in her utterance what the songs are about.

Christoph Prégardien
Lieder, Volume 23 – Der Tod Oscars, D375. Das Grab, D377[a]. Der Entfernten, D350. Pflügerlied, D392. Abschied von der Harfe, D406. Der Jüngling an der Quelle, D300. Abendlied, D382. Stimme der Liebe, D412. Romanze, D144. Geist der Liebe, D414. Klage, D415. Julius an Theone, D419. Der Leidende, D432. Der Leidende (second version), D432*b*. Die frühe Liebe, D430. Die Knabenzeit, D400. Edone, D445. Die Liebes-götter, D446. An Chloen, D363. Freude der Kinderjahre, D455. Wer sich der Einsamkeit ergibt, D478. Wer nie sein Brot mit Tränen ass, D480. An die Türen, D479. Der Hirt, D490. Am ersten Maimorgen, D344. Bei dem Grabe meines Vaters, D496. Mailied, D503. Zufriedenheit, D362. Skolie, D507
Christoph Prégardien ten [a]London Schubert Chorale; Graham Johnson pf
Hyperion CDJ33023 (78 minutes: DDD)
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1994 ●

When the Hyperion Schubert Edition is completed, this latest wondrous offering will rank among its most precious jewels. Prégardien is a prince among tenor interpreters of Lieder at present, on a par with Blochwitz in instinctive, natural and inevitably phrased readings. Johnson, besides, of course, finding exactly the right performers for these songs, surpasses even his own high standard of playing in this series. Then there is Schubert himself, the Schubert of 1816 by and large, who was, Johnson tentatively suggests in his notes, going through a phase of 'bringing himself under control'. That means, largely but far from entirely, writing gently lyrical strophic songs, most of them of ineffable beauty and simplicity, starkly contrasting with the Harfenspieler settings from Wilhelm Meister, two of which were written in 1816, the other in 1822.

In such an outright masterpiece as Der Jüngling an der Quelle, Prégardien and Johnson confirm the latter's view that this piece 'makes time stand still'. They emphasise, in Stimme der Liebe, how Schubert uses shifting harmonies to indicate romantic obsession. They show in the two similar but subtly different versions of Der Leidende ('The suffering one') what Johnson calls 'two sides of the same coin', with the tenor's plangent, tender singing, line and text held in perfect balance. The two Hölty songs that follow, Die frühe Liebe and Die Knabenzeit, evince a wonderful affinity with thoughts of childhood on the part of poet and composer, again ideally captured here. So is the 'chaste and wistful' mood of Klopstock's Edone. The recording is ideally balanced .

Christoph Prégardien

Der Alpenjäger, D524. Antigone und Oedip, D542. Atys, D585. Auf der Donau, D553. Auflösung, D807. Der entsühnte Orest, D699. Fahrt zum Hades, D526. Fragment aus dem Aeschylus, D450. Freiwilliges Versinken, D700. Gondelfahrer, D808. Lied eines Schiffers an die Dioskuren, D360. Memnon, D541. Nach einem Gewitter, D561. Nachtstück, D672. Nachtviolen, D752. Philoktet, D540. Der Schiffer, D536. Der Sieg, D805. Die Sternennächte, D670. Wie Ulfru fischt, D525. Der Zürnenden Diana, D707

Christoph Prégardien ten Andreas Staier fp

Teldec Das Alte Werk 8573-85556-2 Ⓕ

(70 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2001 ●●

Prégardien and Staier, who have now been musical partners for more than 10 years, add to their laurels as interpreters of Lieder with this remarkably satisfying disc entirely devoted to Schubert's settings of Mayrhofer. Here singer and player are equally in sympathy with the mood of every Lied. Prégardien seems fully up to imparting the power expressed in such songs as Fahrt zum Hades and Der Schiffer, railing against fortune in the most imposing manner. Some of the songs devoted to classical subjects are among the hardest in the whole Schubert oeuvre for interpreter and listener to encompass, but with these artists as guides, they seem reasonably approachable, Memnon a particular success. It hardly needs saying that in the more lyrical songs, the pair are at their very best, the tenor's plaintive, seamless and eloquent singing supported by Staier's refined insights into the keyboard contributions, here played on a wonderfully translucent instrument. The rarely encountered Abschied is well worth unearthing when done so sympathetically. Best of all are pieces such as Auf der Donau, Abendstern, Gondelfahrer and Auflösung, once seldom done but now regularly performed. These readings are as lovingly sung and convincingly phrased on both sides as any. Add an excellent recording, and this is a CD all Schubertians will want.

Christine Schäfer

Im Frühling, D882. Die Blumensprache, D519. Die gefangenen Sänger, D712. Der Schmetterling, D633. An den Mond, D259. An den Mond, D296. Die Gebüsche, D646. Der Fluss, D693. Der Knabe, D692. Nacht und Träume, D827. Im Abendrot, D799. Glaube, Hoffnung und Liebe, D955. Vom Mitleiden Mariä, D632. Beim Winde, D669. Des Mädchens Klage, D6. Blanka, D631. Das Mädchen, D652. Die Rose, D745. Die junge Nonne, D828. Nähe des Geliebten, D162

Christine Schäfer sop Irwin Gage pf

Orfeo C450971A (79 minutes: DDD). Texts and Ⓕ

translations included. Recorded 1997 ●

What makes Schäfer such a special artist is the candid, plaintive, natural quality of her tone and her simplicity of phrasing. These are combined with clear, unaffected diction, and a sense of vulnerability in the timbre, to evoke the pure spirit of each song. Some, used to more vibrant, luscious voices, may find Schäfer's tone too narrow or they may be troubled by moments when she is deliberately on the flat side of a note but they are part of her vocal personality and perhaps nearer to what was heard in Schubert's day. Her attributes as a Schubertian are confirmed by her discerning choice of songs in this generously filled programme. Whether the pieces are grave or cheerful, Schäfer finds the right expression. The simplicity at the start of An den Mond (D296) is succeeded by heightened intensity at just the appropriate moment, in the fifth stanza. In that underrated Schlegel setting, Der Fluss, she adds special urgency to the last line. In better-known songs, such as Nacht und Träume and Im Abendrot the soprano refreshes the familiar through a new draught of feeling, simple yet inward, and that is the epithet that comes most readily to mind in those two melancholic songs, Das Mädchen and Die Rose, the one about an unloved girl, the other about a flower speaking of its mortality. To end she catches the perfect Schubert/Goethe accord of Nähe des Geliebten, where 'Ich denke dein' and 'Ich bin bei dir' are affirmations of a deep love. Irwin Gage partners his singer with many touches of subtle, finely shaded phrasing. Add a surely balanced recording and Lieder lovers are in for a generous treat.

Elisabeth Schwarzkopf 🄷

An die Musik, D547. Im Frühling, D882. Wehmut, D772. Ganymed, D544. Das Lied im

Grünen, D917. Gretchen am Spinnrade, D118. Nähe des Geliebten, D162. Die junge Nonne, D828. An Silvia, D891. Auf dem Wasser zu singen, D774. Nachtviolen, D752. Der Musensohn, D764. Six moments musicaux, D780ᵃ
Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop ᵃEdwin Fischer pf
EMI Références mono 567494-2 Ⓜ
(67 minutes: ADD). Recorded ᵃ1950 and 1952 ●

Many young and not-so-young singers can't abide Schwarkopf's interpretative style, which is strikingly at odds with the straightforward readings so often heard today. Playing devil's advocate, one can understand the nature of the complaints about her interventionist approach, her occasional distortion of vowel sounds and a general approach that William Mann once described to me as 'verschmuckt' (bejewelled). You may judge such views, for instance, in a song like Auf dem Wasser, where not a phrase is left to speak for itself; compare it with the natural and simple reading of her contemporary Irmgard Seefried (Testament), which is so much more appropriate to the song.

That said, the doubters should listen to this recital with Edwin Fischer, one of the greatest ever discs of Schubert singing. As so often in her recitals dating back to Oxford days in 1950, annoyance with the occasional mannerism soon gives way to wonder at such an amazingly eager response to every facet of a song and its setting. And truly inspired by Fischer, she throws caution utterly to the wind and astonishes us in accounts of Die junge Nonne, Ganymed and Gretchen am Spinnrade that have seldom if ever been surpassed for vocal consistency and concentration – though it is a pity the singer makes a break in the final, long phrase of Ganymed.

Fischer, one of the noblest Schubert interpreters of his or any time, is obviously a partner in a thousand and on his own confirms his stature in the legendary 1950 recording of the Moments musicaux better transferred here than ever before – as are the Lieder. So this is a CD no Schubertian can do without.

Awards 1995

Bryn Terfel
Lieder – Gruppe aus dem Tartarus, D583. Litanei auf das Fest Allerseelen, D343. Die Forelle, D550. An die Leier, D737. Lachen und Weinen, D777. Schwanengesang, D957 – Ständchen; Das Fischermädchen; Die Taubenpost. Meerestille, D216. Der Wanderer, D489 (formerly D493). Erlkönig, D328. Der Tod und das Mädchen, D531. Heidenröslein, D257. Wandrers Nachtlied II, D768. An die Musik, D547. Auf der Bruck, D853. Schäfers Klagelied, D121. An Silvia, D891. Du bist die Ruh', D776. An die Laute, D905. Rastlose Liebe, D138. Ganymed, D544. Der Musensohn, D764
Bryn Terfel bass-bar Malcolm Martineau pf
DG 445 294-2GH (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1994. ●●●

Terfel's gift, now well known, is a generous, individual voice, a natural feeling for German and an inborn ability to go to the heart of what he attempts. His singing here is grand in scale – listen to any of the dramatic songs and the point is made – but like Hotter, whom he so often resembles, he is able to reduce his large voice to the needs of a sustained, quiet line, as in Meerestille. When the two come together as in Der Wanderer, the effect can be truly electrifying, even more so, perhaps, in Erlkönig where the four participants are superbly contrasted. Yet this is a voice that can also smile, as in An die Laute and 'Die Taubenpost' or express wonder, as in Ganymed, a most exhilarating interpretation, or again explode in sheer anger as in the very first song, the strenuous Gruppe aus dem Tartarus. Terfel is not afraid to employ rubato and vibrato to make his points and above all to take us right into his interpretations rather than leave us admiring them, as it were, from afar. Throughout, Martineau's at once vigorous and subtle playing is an apt support: his accompaniment in Erlkönig is arrestingly clear and precise.

Various singers
Lieder, Volume 24 – Schäfers Klagelied, D121. An Mignon, D161. Geistes-Gruss, D142 (two versions). Rastlose Liebe, D138. Der Gott und die Bajadere, D254. Tischlied, D234. Der Schatzgräber, D256. Der Rattenfänger, D255. Bundeslied, D258. Erlkönig, D328. Jägers Abendlied, D215. Jägers Abendlied, D368. Wer nie sein Brot mit Tränen ass, D480 (two versions). Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt, D359. So lasst mich scheinen, D469*a* and D469*b* (two fragments). Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt, D481. Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt, D656. An Schwager Kronos, D369. Hoffnung, D295. Mahomets Gesang, D549 (cptd R. Van Hoorickx). Ganymed, D544. Der Goldschmiedsgesell, D560. Gesang der Geister über den Wassern, D484 (cptd R Van Hoorickx). Gesang der Geister über den Wassern, D705 (cptd E Asti).
Christine Schäfer sop John Mark Ainsley ten Simon Keenlyside bar Michael George bass Graham Johnson pf London Schubert Chorale / Stephen Layton
Hyperion CDJ33024 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993-94

Renewed praise first of all for Graham Johnson. This volume is as cogent an example as any of his method, a masterly exposition, in written words and musical performance, of the crucial relationship between Goethe and Schubert upon which Johnson throws a good deal of new light. Not all here is notable Schubert, but the lesser songs serve to place in perspective the greater ones.

The CD begins with one of the latter, Schäfers Klagelied, in a finely honed, dramatic performance by Ainsley, who is heard later on the disc always to advantage. Good as Christine Schäfer is in the first version of An Mignon, she is better in the sadly neglected Der Gott und die Bajadere, as Johnson avers. This is the only song in the genre about prostitution, and a haunting one too, even though, throughout its appreciable length, it relies on just one melody, and Schäfer precisely catches its haunting atmosphere. But the climax of her contribution comes in Ganymed – with Johnson providing exactly the right rhythmic lilt at the piano, her voice conveys all the elation of poem and music.

Schäfer is the child in a three-voice rendering of Erlkönig, a manner of performing the piece that has the composer's blessing. Johnson has surely never surpassed his account here of the hair-raisingly difficult piano part. George, who perhaps has the least ingratiating songs to perform, sings with feeling and style but sometimes an excess of vibrato. An invaluable addition to the series.

Various singers

Lieder, Volume 26 – Der Einsame, D800. Des Sängers Habe, D832. Lied der Delphine, D857 No 1. Lied des Florio, D857 No 2. Mondenschein, D875. Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt, D877 No 1. Heiss mich nicht reden, D877 No 2. So lasst mich scheinen, D877 No 3. Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt, D877 No 4. Totengräberweise, D869. Das Echo, D990C. An Silvia, D891. Horch, horch! die Lerch', D889. Trinklied, D888. Wiegenlied, D867. Widerspruch, D865. Der Wanderer an den Mond, D870. Grab und Mond, D893. Nachthelle, D892. Abschied von der Erde, D829

Christine Schäfer sop John Mark Ainsley ten Richard Jackson bar London Schubert Chorale; Graham Johnson pf

Hyperion CDJ33026 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1995 ●●

It is hard to know where to begin in praise of this disc. It has several centres of excellence, the first being Schäfer's beseeching, urgent account of the Mignon settings from Goethe's Wilhelm Meister that make plain her pre-eminence today among sopranos in Lieder. Next comes Ainsley's winningly fresh account of An Silvia. You may be surprised at how wholly new-minted Ainsley's ardent tones and Johnson's elating piano manage to make of such a hackneyed song. Schäfer and Johnson do the same service for Horch, horch! die Lerch'. Then comes the extraordinary discovery of this volume. As a rule, Johnson has excluded unaccompanied vocal pieces from his project; happily, he has made an exception in the case of the astonishingly original Seidl setting Grab und Mond, which touches on eternal matters, or rather the permanence of death, a message starkly expressed in typically daring harmony. The London Schubert Chorale gives it a spellbinding interpretation and also contributes positively to a performance of another Seidl setting, the better-known Nachthelle, where the high-lying tenor lead provides no problems for Ainsley. There have to be reservations over the work of Richard Jackson; his tone is inadequate to the demands of Der Einsame, the unjustly neglected Totengräberweise and Der Wanderer an den Mond, which call for a richer palette of sound.

Throughout, Johnson's playing and, of course, his admirable notes are their customary sources of pleasure and enlightenment. The recording is well-nigh faultless.

Various singers

Lieder, Volume 32 – An die Sonne, D439. Beitrag zur fünfzigjährigen Jubelfeier des Herrn von Salieri, D407. Das war ich, D174a/D450a. Didone Abbandonata, D510a (both cptd Hoorickx). Der Entfernten, D331. Entzückung, D413. Der Geistertanz, D494. Gott der Weltschöpfer, D986. Gott im Ungewitter, D985. Grablied auf einen Soldaten, D454. Das Grosse Halleluja, D442. Des Mädchens Klage, D389. Licht und Liebe, D352. Naturgenuss, D422. Ritter Toggenburg, D397. Schlachtgesang, D443. Die verfehlte Stunde, D409. Der Wanderer, D489. Zufriedenheit, D501. Zum Punsche, D492

Lynne Dawson, Patricia Rozario, Christine Schäfer sops Ann Murray, Catherine Wyn-Rogers mezzos Paul Agnew, John Mark Ainsley, Philip Langridge, Jamie MacDougall, Daniel Norman, Christoph Prégardien, Michael Schade, Toby Spence tens Simon Keenlyside, Maarten Koningsberger, Stephan Loges, Christopher Maltman, Stephen Varcoe bars Neal Davies, Michael George basses Graham Johnson pf London Schubert Chorale / Stephen Layton

Hyperion CDJ33032 (78 minutes: DDD). Notes, Ⓕ
texts and translations included ●

Like the previous Schubertiads in the Edition, this disc mixes solo songs and partsongs, the familiar and the unfamiliar. The only really famous work here is Der Wanderer, that archetypal expression of romantic alienation whose popularity in Schubert's lifetime was eclipsed only by that of Erlkönig. Some of the partsongs – Zum Punsche, Naturgenuss and Schlachtgesang – cultivate a vein of Biedermeier heartiness that wears a bit thin today. Nor will Schubert's consciously archaic tribute to his teacher Salieri have you itching for the repeat button – though, like several other numbers, it shows the 19-year-old composer rivalling Mozart in his gift for musical mimicry. In compensation, though, are partsongs like the sensual Der Entfernten, with its delicious languid chromaticisms (relished here by the London Schubert Chorale), and the colourful setting of Gott im Ungewitter. The slight but charming setting of Das war ich is appealingly done by the light-voiced Daniel Norman, and Ann Murray brings her usual charisma and dramatic conviction to the pathetic Italian scena Didone Abbandonata.

Christine Schäfer is equally charismatic in the unjustly neglected Die verfehlte Stunde (recorded here for the first time), catching perfectly the song's mingled yearning and ecstasy and negotiating the mercilessly high tessitura with ease. Other happy discoveries include Schubert's virtually unknown third setting of Des Mädchens Klage, with its soaring lines, a melancholy tale of courtly love, sung by Christoph Prégardien with as much drama and variety as the music allows, and the surging Entzückung ('music for an infant Lohengrin,' as Graham Johnson puts it), for which Toby Spence has both the flexibility and the necessary touch of metal in the tone. Doubts were fleetingly raised by Lynne Dawson's slight tremulousness in Des Mädchens Klage, and by Christopher Maltman's prominent vibrato at forte and above in an otherwise involving performance of Der Wanderer. But, these cavils apart, no complaints about the singing or Graham Johnson's vivid accompaniments.

Various singers

Lieder, Volume 34 – La pastorella al prato, D513[fjpt]. Frohsinn, D520[q]. Der Alpenjäger, D524[r]. Die Einsiedelei, D563[i]. Das Grab, D569[u]. Atys, D585[o]. Der Kampf, D594[s]. Das Dörfchen, D598[fjpt]. Die Geselligkeit, D609[cdgt]. Sing-Übungen, D619[ac] (ed Roblou). Das Abendrot, D627[s]. Abend, D645[h] (ed Brown). Das Mädchen, D652[e]. Cantate zum Geburtstag des Sängers Michael Vogl, D666[blm]. Prometheus, D674[p]. Über allen Zauber Liebe, D682[k] (ed Hoorickx). Die gefangenen Sänger, D712[n]. Grenzen der Menschheit, D716[s]. Wandrers Nachtlied II, D768[r] [a]Lorna Anderson, [b]Lynne Dawson, [c]Patricia Rozario sops [d]Catherine Denley, [e]Marjana Lipovšek mezzos [f]John Mark Ainsley, [g]Ian Bostridge, [h]Martyn Hill, [i]Philip Langridge, [j]Jamie MacDougall, [k]Daniel Norman, [l]Michael Schade tens; [m]Gerald Finley, [n]Matthias Goerne, [o]Thomas Hampson, [p]Simon Keenlyside, [q]Stephan Loges, [r]Christopher Maltman bars [s]Neal Davies bass-bar [t]Michael George bass [u]London Schubert Chorale / Stephen Layton; Graham Johnson pf

Hyperion Schubert Edition CDJ33034 Ⓕ

(79 minutes: DDD)

Texts and translations included

Recorded 1991-99 ●

In his guise as a wizard of an impresario, Graham Johnson has gathered together four baritones and one bass-baritone (Neil Davies) to give us a feast of finely wrought, intelligent interpretations. Hampson's rendering of that outsider's lament, Atys, is at once an object-lesson in refined singing and a deeply felt outpouring of sorrow. Keenlyside, singing with as much firm, mellow tone and feeling as his American coeval, gives a properly intense, agonised account of the great, Zeus-defying Prometheus, magnificently supported by Johnson. Goerne is assigned the seldom-heard Schlegel setting, Die gefangenen Sänger, and brings his gently vibrant tone, reminiscent of his noted predecessor Herbert Janssen, and his natural gift for phrasing to bear on this strange but captivating piece. Maltman, growing in stature as a Lieder artist, begins the programme with the extrovert Der Alpenjäger and ends it with the introverted Wandrers Nachtlied on which he lavishes the hushed concentration due to a page of rapt utterance, a suitable conclusion to the performance of Goethe settings in the whole edition.

Neil Davies erupts into the series with three absorbing interpretations: the declamatory Schiller setting Der Kampf, the flowing, glowing Das Abendrot and the awe-inspiring Grenzen der Menschheit. All three evince his real affinity for the German language and the world of Schubert. He also has the low notes the pieces call for. The one female solo brings back Lipovšek at her most beguiling in the poignant and unforgettable Schlegel setting Das Mädchen, already performed just as movingly by Christine Schäfer in Vol 27. This wonderful fare is interspersed with lighter, less demanding material, all done with pleasure by varying groups of singers, plus three tenor solos. Langridge is predictably charming in Die Einsiedelei. Hill is not quite at his best and Norman's style is etiolated in their offerings. Piano playing both maintain Hyperion's usual high standard.

Various singers

Lieder, Volume 37 – Auf dem Strom, D943[cd]. Herbst, D945[a]. Bei dir allein, D866/2[c]. Irdisches Glück, D866/4[c]. Lebensmut, D937[c]. Schwanengesang, D957 – No 1, Liebesbotschaft[a]; No 2, Kriegers Ahnung[a]; No 3, Frühlingssehnsucht[a]; No 4, Ständchen[a]; No 5, Aufenthalt[a]; No 6, In der Ferne[a]; No 7, Abschied[a]; No 8, Der Atlas[b]; No 9, Ihr Bild[b]; No 10, Das Fischermädchen[b]; No 11, Die Stadt[b]; No 12, Am Meer[b]; No 13, Der Doppelgänger[b]. Die Taubenpost, D965A[b]. Glaube, Hoffnung und Liebe, D955[abc]

[a]John Mark Ainsley, [b]Anthony Rolfe Johnson, [c]Michael Schade tens [d]David Pyatt hn Graham Johnson pf

Hyperion Schubert Edition CDJ33037 Ⓕ

(80 minutes: DDD)

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●

This disc, the last in Hyperion's Schubert Edition, is in large part devoted to the performance of the non-cycle Schwanengesang, that extraordinary collection in which Schubert seems more original and more inclined even than in earlier Lieder to peer into the future. We usually encounter the work transposed for a baritone, though Schreier and Schiff have recorded it memorably for Decca. Johnson has astutely divided the songs between two voices. Ainsley is given the Rellstab settings, Rolfe Johnson the Heine, plus Seidl's Die Taubenpost, which so poignantly and airily closes the set.

Ainsley interprets his songs with the tonal beauty, fine-grained phrasing and care for words that are the hallmarks of his appreciable art, even if his voice sometimes lacks a difficult-to-define individuality of timbre. The over-exposed Ständchen is given a new spontaneity of utterance by both the singer and Graham Johnson. Anthony Rolfe Johnson brings all the appropriate intensity one would expect from him to the tremendous Heine settings. Sometimes his tone hardens when he is depicting the deserted lover present in so many of these pieces, but that is hardly inappropriate to the depth of feeling being expressed.

Most of the other songs of 1828, which open the recital, are assigned to Schade, who sings them with refined tone and an innate feeling for sharing his enjoyment in performing them, nowhere more so than in the opening Auf dem Strom. Ainsley reads his sole offering here, Bei dir allein, with just the fiery passion it calls for.

In sum, this is a worthy, often inspired conclusion to the series, once more enhanced by Johnson's copious notes. It also has a complete index to the Edition. The recording is faultless.

Anne Sofie von Otter
Heidenröslein, D257. Wonne der Wehmut, D260. Der Jüngling an der Quelle, D300. Erntelied, D434. Im Walde, D708. Geheimes, D719. Suleika I, D720. Dass sie hier gewesen, D775. Viola, D786. Im Abendrot, D799. Abendstern, D806. Ave Maria, D839. Totengräbers Heimweh, D842. Bei dir allein, D866 No 2. Der Wanderer an den Mond, D870. Im Frühling, D882. An Silvia, D891. Ständchen, D920
Anne Sofie von Otter mez Bengt Forsberg pf with Swedish Radio Chorus
DG 453 481-2GH (69 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 Ⓕ ●

This is a recital alive with the delight of long-awaited encounter and the vocal security of choices well made. In songs such as An Silvia and Geheimes the wide-eyed wonder of her own discovery incarnates that of the songs' own subjects. Tiny moments of gentle emphasis, and a little spring on each note of its rising sequences adds to the wondering incredulity of An Silvia's questionings. There are many epiphanies along the way for even the most experienced Schubertian. Heidenroslein, for example, is re-created as a sudden, elusive Augenblick, a passing moment in time in which pique and piquancy fuse without a hint of mere coyness. And listen to the way in which von Otter and the ever perceptive Bengt Forsberg bring a sense of wry self-awareness to Der Wanderer an den Mond.

The recital grows gradually darker, moving, by way of Standchen, D920 to the twilight of Im Abendrot. Here, long, firmly-grounded vowels are backlit by the afterglow of Forsberg's piano line before some deep, passionate digging into the Angst of Totengrabers Heimweh, and a wonderfully breathless, intimately urgent imprecation of an Ave Maria.

Song cycles

Die schöne Müllerin, D795. Schwanengesang, D957. Winterreise, D911

Winterreise
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Daniel Barenboim pf
DG 463 501-2GFD (73 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1979 ●●

Die schöne Müllerin[a]. Nacht und Träume, D827b. Ständchen, D889[b]. Du bist die Ruh, D776[b]. Erlkönig, D328[c]
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar
[a]Jörg Demus, [bc]Gerald Moore pfs
DG 463 502-2GFD (75 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1968 (previously unreleased), [bc]1970 ●●

Schwanengesang. Vollendung, D579. Die Erde, D579b. An die Musik, D547. An Silvia, D891. Heidenröslein, D257. Im Abendrot, D799. Der Musensohn, D764. Die Forelle, D550. Der Tod und das Mädchen, D531
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar
Gerald Moore pf Ⓜ
DG 463 503-2GFD (73 minutes: ADD) ●●●

You wouldn't think that a recording by Fischer-Dieskau, given his huge Schubert discography, could still offer an exciting revelation – but that's what the 'new' Die schöne Müllerin recording offers. Explanations for its suppression vary. The singer seems to think it has something to do with its technical quality: the booklet-note, slightly more credibly, tells us that it was planned before DG decided to include the cycle in its 'complete' Schubert with the baritone and Gerald Moore, which caused this performance to be put on the back-burner. Now we can enjoy a reading that is absolutely spontaneous, daring in its dramatic effects – bold extremes of dynamics, for instance – and full of even more subtle detail than in Fischer-Dieskau's other recordings.

This approach owes not a little to Demus's piano. As Alan Newcombe says in his notes: 'Aided by Demus's lightly pedalled, often almost brusque staccato articulation, the result is starker, more elemental, less comfortable [than the reading with Moore], conceived on a larger scale.' To that one should add that the singer is at the absolute height of his powers; tone, line, breath control and intuitive imagination are most remarkable in the strophic songs that, in lesser hands, can seem over-long. Another feature of this is the significant underlining he gives to pertinent words. For instance, in Pause note how 'gehängt', 'durchschauert' and 'Nachklang' receive this treatment. It is this unique vision of the German language in music that still marks out this baritone from his many successors. Immediate, unvarnished sound heightens the value of this extraordinary performance.

There's hardly one of Fischer-Dieskau's eight and more recordings of Winterreise that one would want to be without, but the 1979 reading seems to represent his interpretative thoughts on the cycle at their most mature, while his voice was still in a pristine state, and the partnership with Barenboim, an artist the singer has lavished with praise, is one of close rapport allied with bold imagination on both sides, a large-scale interpretation that seems to have a whole world of sorrow and anguish in its projection.

The singer's partnership with Gerald Moore in Schubert is well represented by their second, 1972 recording of Schwanengesang. It was one of the most rewarding fruits of their long collaboration and crowned their joint labours on the composer's oeuvre. The extra nine, mostly popular songs only confirm the impression left by the quasi-cycle: who could resist this pair in Die Forelle and An Silvia?

Die schöne Müllerin

Die schöne Müllerin
Jochen Kupfer bar Susanne Giesa pf
Channel Classics CCS18898 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded c2002 ●●

This reading of Schubert's cycle is confirmation, as if that were needed, of Jochen Kupfer's beautiful singing, and even more of his gifts as a Lieder interpreter. Kupfer's voice and style is highly reminiscent of Wolfgang Holzmair's, but his technique is just that shade firmer and his voice more youthful than the older baritone's with Imogen Cooper, recalling rather Holzmair's first (1983) recording on Preiser. Both artists have a tenor-like quality to their voices, coming near to some ideal for the work. Kupfer begins with the basic verities of immaculate line and imaginative phrasing, to which he adds a complete identification with the youthful lover's aspirations and eventual disappointment and tragedy.

This lad sets out with a spring in his heels and a smile in his voice, quite avoiding any sense of despondency from the outset. All is going to be well in his wooing. That is conveyed in the first few songs with fresh immediacy as though the poetic emotions and their setting were new-minted. The arrival of the unwanted and aggressive hunter provokes an almost breathless jealousy and, in that arresting song, 'Die liebe Farbe', an appropriately mesmeric, plaintive approach. From there on the downward curve of emotional feeling, so arrestingly depicted in the words and music, finds in Kupfer and his alert partner an answering mood of despair, the raw and anguished passion in those final three songs fully achieved. All the while you feel the disillusionment and pathos in the texture and verbal acuity of the interpretation.

With a finely balanced recording to add to one's pleasure, this is a performance among baritones to place very near the top of the pile, if not at its apex, and it challenges even the prevailing tenor recommendations, the versions by Ian Bostridge and Werner Güra.

Die schöne Müllerin, D975
Werner Güra ten Jan Schultsz pf
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1708 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1999 ○○○

An absolutely enthralling account of the cycle on virtually every count that seriously challenges the hegemony of the many desirable versions already available. In the first place Güra must have about the most beautiful voice ever to have recorded the work in the original keys (and that's not to overlook Wunderlich, a far less perceptive interpreter). Its owner has a technique second to none, able to vary his tone, sing a lovely pianissimo and/or a long-breathed phrase with perfect control. Then no musical or verbal subtlety seems to escape him at any stage of the young man's disillusioning journey from happiness to misery and death.

The plaintive quality of his voice and its youthful sap are precisely right for conveying the protagonist's vulnerability and, where needed, his self-pity. That great song 'Der Neugierige' encapsulates these virtues, with the final couplet of questioning the brook immaculately done, just as the pp at the close of the previous song is given a curious sense of uncertainty on the boy's part. The three strophic songs are finely varied: here, as throughout, the use of rubato is natural and inevitable and the integration of singer and pianist, who is happily playing a Bechstein, are at their most compelling.

'Mein' is properly eager, expectant, 'Pause' as plangent as it should be, especially at its end. The frenetic anger of the 14th and 15th songs is as over-heated as it should be, 'Die liebe Farbe' rightly hypnotic. In those great songs, 'Trockne Blumen' and 'Der Müller und der Bach', both artists go to the heart of the matter, and the final lullaby is soft-grained and consoling. Schultsz's contributions are sometimes controversial, always challenging. Güra surpasses even the Gramophone Award-winning Bostridge, simply because his voice is under even better control and because his German is more idiomatic. The Harmonia Mundi sound, in spite of some reverberance, catches voice and piano in ideal balance.

Awards 1996

Die schöne Müllerin, with a reading of six poems not set by Schubert
Ian Bostridge ten Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau narr Graham Johnson pf
Hyperion CDJ33025 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included.
Recorded 1994-95. ○○○

The 20 songs of Die schöne Müllerin portray a Wordsworthian world of heightened emotion in the pantheistic riverside setting of the miller. The poet, Wilhelm Müller, tells of solitary longings, jealousies, fears and hopes as the river rushes by, driving the mill-wheel and refreshing the natural world. Ian Bostridge and Graham Johnson go to the heart of the matter, the young tenor in his aching tones and naturally affecting interpretation, the pianist in his perceptive, wholly apposite playing – and, of course, in his extensive notes. The sum of their joint efforts is a deeply satisfying experience. Bostridge has the right timbre for the protagonist and a straightforward approach, with an instinctive rightness of phrasing. His peculiarly beseeching voice enshrines the vulnerability, tender feeling and obsessive love of the youthful miller, projecting in turn the young lover's thwarted passions, self-delusions and, finally, inner tragedy. Nowhere does he stretch beyond the bounds of the possible, everything expressed in eager then doleful tones. Johnson suggests that 'Ungeduld' mustn't be 'masterful and insistent' or the youth would have won the girl, so that even in this superficially buoyant song the sense of a sensitive, sad, introverted youth is maintained. The daydreaming strophic songs have the smiling, innocent, intimate sound that suits them to perfection, the angry ones the touch of stronger metal that Bostridge can now add to his silver, the tragic ones, before the neutral 'Baches Wiegenlied', an inner intensity that rends the heart as it should. An occasional moment of faulty German accenting matters not at all when the sense of every word is perceived.

As a bonus we have here a recitation of the Prologue and Epilogue and of the Müller poems not set by Schubert: Fischer-Dieskau graces it with his speaking voice. The ideal Hyperion recording catches everything in very present terms. In all musical matters, everything Johnson writes only enhances one's enjoyment, if that is the right word, of a soul-searching interpretation.

Die schöne Müllerin
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Gerald Moore pf
EMI Great Recordings of the Century 566907-2 Ⓜ (59 minutes: ADD). Text and translation included
Recorded 1961 ●●

This reissue is the best of Fischer-Dieskau's three recordings of this work, made at the height of his – and Moore's – powers. Fischer-Dieskau's interpretation is simply more idiomatic and more natural. He and Moore are here more spontaneous than in 1951 (for EMI), less affected than in 1972 (reissued on a DG CD in 1985). The conglomeration of Fischer-Dieskau's subtleties and insights are almost overwhelming but here they are mostly subsumed in the immediacy of a highly individual, always alerting performance. But the difference between conscious interpretation and interior restraint can be felt if you compare Fischer-Dieskau and Patzak in the phrase 'sie mir gab' in 'Trockne Blumen'. Moore throughout offers a discerning and musically valid characterization of the participating stream: nothing is overplayed yet all is made manifest. So the intending purchaser is embarrassed with riches in a work that almost always brings the best out of its interpreters. Whichever other interpretation you opt for, you will certainly want Fischer-Dieskau for complete command and understanding of this glorious work.

Die schöne Müllerin H
Julius Patzak ten Michael Raucheisen pf
Preiser mono 93128 (61 minutes: AAD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1943

Der Mensch hat so eine Stimme' ('The man has a tone of voice') says Rocco of Florestan, and it's always a phrase that seems particularly apt for the voice of the great Viennese tenor, Julius Patzak, who was, of course, an unsurpassed Florestan himself. The same plangent utterance that was so affecting in his portrayal of Beethoven's suffering hero informs his famous interpretation of Schubert's cycle about the lovelorn millerhand. Indeed, his account of 'Die liebe Farbe' is so subjectively intense as to be hardly bearable, and the whole reading, with its poignant diction and lambent tone, places it quite in a class of its own. None reaches to the heart of the matter with quite Patzak's unerring skill. The range of his tone colour and methods of expression are evident not only in 'Die liebe Farbe' but also in the two great songs that succeed it.

In 'Die liebe Farbe', such phrases as 'grüne Rasen' and 'hat's jagen so gern' carry an enormous weight of grief as does the piercing enunciation of 'tote liebe' in 'Trockne Blumen'. The end of this song is taken very fast, as if in a fever of unjustified hope. But in earlier, happier moments, Patzak is no less eloquent – try the third verse of 'Des Müllers Blumen' or the whole of 'Morgengruss', where he creates the illusion of actually talking to the girl, or hear the intimate articulation in 'Der Neugierige' while, by contrast, the words tumble out abruptly in the fierce hatred of 'Der Jäger' and the following song. This is an interpretation that is hors concours, and not perhaps an interpretation one would wish to hear every day – it is too despairing. It is immensely detailed and subjective, free and spontaneous seeming, never calculated and sophisticated. Raucheisen is at times revelatory at the piano, at times wayward.

The recording, though immediate, has the occasional distortion, and the piano is backward. But the greatness of the reading overrides any drawbacks.

Schwanengesang, D957

Schwanengesang. Herbst, D945. Der Wanderer an den Mond, D870. Am Fenster, D878. Bei dir allein, D866 No 2
Peter Schreier ten András Schiff pf
Decca 425 612-2DH (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1989 ●●●

Though Schwanengesang is not a song-cycle but a collection of Schubert's last (or 'swan') songs by their first publisher, it is generally felt to form a satisfying sequence, with a unity of style if not of theme or mood. This is certainly not weakened by the addition on the Decca disc of the four last songs which were originally omitted, all of them settings of poems by Johann Seidl. Seidl is one of the three poets whose work Schubert used in these frequently sombre songs and it is strange to think that all concerned in their creation were young men, none of the poets being older than Schubert. The listener can scarcely be unaware of a shadow or sometimes an almost unearthly radiance over even the happiest (such as 'Die Taubenpost', the last of all) and that is particularly true when the performers themselves have such sensitive awareness as here. Peter Schreier is responsive to every shade of meaning in music and text while András Schiff's playing is a miracle of combined strength and delicacy, specific insight and general rightness.

Schwanengesang. Sehnsucht, D879. Der Wanderer an den Mond, D870. Wiegenlied, D867. Am Fenster, D878. Herbst, D945
Brigitte Fassbaender mez Aribert Reimann pf
DG 429 766-2GH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1989-91 ●●●

Fassbaender and Reimann offer something equally compelling but rather different in their account of Schwanengesang. Fassbaender's interpretation, idiosyncratic in every respect, pierces to the heart of the bleak songs with performances as daring and challenging as the playing of her partner. More than anyone, these two artists catch the fleeting moods of these mini-dramas, and their searing originality of concept. Even the lighter songs have a special individuality of utterance. This is a starkly immediate interpretation that leaves the listener shattered. The extra Seidl settings, rarely performed, are all worth hearing. Both of these notable partnerships are superb in their own ways.

Additional recommendations
Schwanengesang, D957
Couplings: Die schöne Müllerin. Winterreise. Einsamkeit
Fischer-Dieskau bar Moore pf
EMI ③ 566146-2 (203 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau's 1962 Schwanengesang is, for some, the most all-embracing interpretation of the 'cycle' ever given. Here his voice is a little fresher than in 1972 (DG) – an essential purchase for Schubert lovers.

Couplings: 10 Lieder
Hotter bar Moore pf 🄷
EMI Références 565196-2 (78 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Hotter's pioneering 1954 recording is a deeply satisfying reading. The nobility and softness of voice, the refinement of his diction and profound understanding of the text remain touchstones in interpreting this 'cycle'.

Winterreise, D911

Christoph Prégardien ten Andreas Staier fp 🄿
Teldec Das Alte Werk 0630-18824-2 Ⓜ
(74 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded 1996 ●●

Prégardien and Staier have something new and important to offer. From the very first song, we are in the presence of a sensitive, inward man in fear of his fate. Something is actually happening to this sufferer's soul at the second 'des ganzen Winters Eis'; indeed the whole final verse of the second song expresses the youth's anguish. Just as memorable are the stab of pain in the repeated final line 'Da ist meiner Liebstens Haus' at the end of 'Wasserflut', the introverted misery of the ice-carving of the loved one's name in 'Auf dem Flusse' and the almost mesmeric feeling in the final verse as the torrent rages in the protagonist's heart. This is what the singing of this cycle is about: the exposing of raw nerves.

Staier is just as revelatory. Using his fortepiano to maximum effect, he finds so many fresh perceptions in his part, as in the precise weighting at the start of 'Einsamkeit' and, as important, ones that accord perfectly with those of his regular partner. Here you have the sense of performers who have lived together with the cycle and conceived a unified, thought-through vision. For example, listen to the way the pair mesh together to searing effect at the end of 'Irrlicht'. The ineffable sadness of 'Frühlingstraum' (the text ideally articulated, the close properly trance-like), the raw blast of winter in 'Der stürmische Morgen', the tense weariness of 'Der Wegweiser', the weary half-voice of 'Das Wirtshaus' – these and so much else contribute to the impression of a truly great performance. The recording is very finely balanced.

Winterreise
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Jörg Demus pf Ⓜ
DG The Originals 447 421-2GOR (71 minutes: ADD)
Text and translation included. Recorded 1965 ●●

On the verge of his fifth decade, the singer was in his absolute prime – and it shows. Indeed listening to his interpretation is like coming home to base after many interesting encounters away from the familiar. Indeed, it is possibly the finest of all in terms of beauty of tone and ease of technique – and how beautiful, how smooth and velvety was the baritone's voice at that time. That this is the most interior, unadorned and undemonstrative of Fischer-Dieskau's readings perhaps arises from the fact that Demus, a discerning musician and sure accompanist, is the most reflective of all the singer's many partners in the cycle. Demus never strikes out on his own, is always there unobtrusively and subtly supportive, with the right colour and phrasing, literally in hand.

Given an intimate, slightly dry recording, finely remastered, the whole effect is of a pair communing with each other and stating the sad, distraught message of Schubert's bleak work in terms of a personal message to the listener in the home. A deeply rewarding performance. Certainly if you want Fischer-Dieskau in the cycle you need look no further.

Winterreise
Peter Schreier ten András Schiff pf
Decca 436 122-2DH (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1991 ●

Schreier, in his note in the accompanying booklet, refers to the unique density and spiritual concentration of the Winterreise songs; that, and their hallucinatory nature, inform this riveting performance from start to finish, nowhere more so than in 'Wasserflut' and 'Einsamkeit'. The latter is a paradigm of the whole searing, almost unbearable experience. If you can tolerate it you will be engaged and surely moved by the whole. In this song, Schreier leans into the words and notes of 'Ach, das die Luft so ruhig!' suggesting the cry of a desperate, tormented soul – as does the emphatic enunciation of the single word 'Bergstroms' earlier, in 'Irricht'. Also arresting is the curiously daring way Schreier asks the question at the end of 'Die Post', as if it were a spontaneous afterthought. These make the moments of calm and repose all the more eerie. The sad delicacy of Schiff's playing at the start of 'Frühlingstraum' sets the scene of the imagined May to perfection, and the flowing lift of his left hand in 'Täuschung' is as deceptively friendly as the light described by the singer. 'Das Wirtshaus' is all false resignation: voice and piano tell us of the man's tired emptiness. Anger and defiance are registered in raw, chilling tone and phraseology.

The final songs taken simply, speak beautifully of acceptance. The recording is warm yet clear.

Winterreise
Bernd Weikl bar Helmut Deutsch pf
Nightingale Classics NC070960-2 Ⓕ
(70 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included
Recorded 1993

For those who prefer a baritone, Weikl seriously challenges the hegemony, among lower-voiced singers, of the many available versions. Indeed it is the absolute vocal security and evenness of Weikl's actual singing that so impresses even before one considers his view of the work. Nowhere is there any sign of strain, over-emphasis, faltering in pitch, or failure of nerve in executing a phrase with a long breath, and as the singer has such a strong voice one feels throughout that there is always something held in reserve.

As a reading the Weikl unerringly keeps that balance between detachment and subjectivity. Tempos are perfectly judged – and here Deutsch's well-observed, well-balanced playing makes a real contribution – a wonderful frozen feeling in 'Auf dem Flusse', for instance. Weikl displays many gradations of tone to enhance his thought-through reading – 'Gefrorne Tränen' is a good example – but he uses vocal emphases more sparingly, reserving his most pointed verbal accents for such things as 'Gras' in 'Erstarrung', 'Hähne' in 'Frühlingstraum' and 'Hunde' in 'Im Dorfe', but even these never upset the verities of line and firm tone, and the sheer beauty of the singing, as in 'Der Lindenbaum', is balm to the ear.

For those who find Fischer-Dieskau's more agonised readings too much to bear, or find his style too interventionist, Weikl is the obvious choice. A superb recording.

Additional recommendations
Winterreise, D911
Holzmair bar Cooper pf
Philips 446 407-2PH (70 minutes: DDD: 5/96) Ⓕ

A reading at the opposite extreme from Fischer-Dieskau's big-scale approach. Holzmair's and Cooper's natural, unvarnished view of this great work, earns them a strong recommendation.

Fassbaender mez; Reimann pf
EMI Encore 574989-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ

An account that plumbs the depths of emotional sorrow and despair. This is an arrestingly powerful and immediate interpretation of the cycle; some may find her treatment of rubato too idiosyncratic, others will find that the style breathes conviction. Even if you have another recording of the work already, this one is well worth adding for its dramatic truthfulness.

Die Verschworenen

Die Verschworenen, oder Der häusliche Krieg 🅿
Soile Isokoski sop Countess Ludmilla;
Peter Lika bass Count Heribert von Lüdenstein;
Rodrigo Orrego ten Astolf von Reisenberg;
Andreas Fischer ten Garold von Nummen;
Christian Dahm bass Friedrich von Trausdorf;
Thomas Pfützner bass Knight; Mechthild Georg mez Udolin; Anke Hoffmann sop Isella;
Lisa Larsson sop Helene; Susanne Behnes sop Luitgarde; Marion Steingötter sop Camilla; Iris Kupke sop Woman; Chorus Musicus; Das Neue Orchester / Christoph Spering
Opus 111 OPS30-167 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1996

Ignaz Castelli's neatly wrought text, loosely based on Aristophanes' Lysistrata, prompted, early in 1823, Schubert's most dramatically viable stage-work, a one-act Singspiel. Aristophanes' story of aggrieved womenfolk withholding their favours until their husbands abandoned their warmongering is transposed here to Vienna during the Crusades and softened with a liberal injection of Biedermeier sentiment. Schubert's parodistic martial music for the macho warriors can occasionally grow wearisome, especially in the finale. Otherwise he scarcely puts a foot wrong. His dramatic pacing is sure and lively, his invention witty, touching and colourful, with its intermittent echoes of Mozart. The opera's gem is Helene's bittersweet F minor Romanze, with its sinuous clarinet obbligato (beautifully played) and haunting modulation to the major in the very last bars.

With his polished orchestra and fresh-toned chorus Christoph Spering gives a sympathetic, shrewdly paced account of the score, allowing the lyrical numbers plenty of breathing space and revealing a light, pointed touch in the comic ensembles. Of the singers, Peter Lika's Count has plenty of 'face', though his bass can become coarse under pressure. Rodrigo Orrego, as the knight Astolf, displays an agreeable, soft-grained tenor; and all four principal female roles are well taken, with Lisa Larsson showing a bright, pure tone and a shapely sense of phrase as Helene, and Soile Isokoski bringing real distinction to the role of the Countess, her warm, vibrant soprano, with its hint of mezzo richness and depth, reminiscent of Schwarzkopf.

The recording is vivid and well balanced.

Ervin Schulhoff Bohemian 1894-1942

Schulhoff was a pupil of Reger in Leipzig GROVE (1908-10) and later in Germany (1919-23) he associated with Klee and the dadaists; back in Prague he was active as a pianist, in jazz and as an exponent of Hába's quarter-tone music. His works include stage pieces, six symphonies and two piano sonatas, displaying diverse styles. He died in a concentration camp.

Symphony No 3

Symphonies Nos 3 and 5
Prague Radio Symphony Orchestra / Vladimír Válek
Supraphon 11 2161-2 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Posthumous premières of these works in the 1950s aroused little interest, but Schulhoff has acquired quite a following in recent years and this latest addition to his discography should not be overlooked. As always in music where there is no performance tradition to speak of, the range of interpretative possibilities is wide. On this showing, Vladimír Válek is the most deft and neo-classical of Schulhoff conductors, offering well-prepared, notably fluent accounts of both pieces; his aim seems to be to reconcile their blatant Communistic idiom with the lighter, Roaring Twenties manner of the composer's previous creative period. In Israel Yinon's recording of the Third Symphony, you sense that the music is not just being given room to breathe; it can only be considered in the light of the composer's death in a Nazi concentration camp. Accordingly, Yinon adopts a much weightier tempo in the first movement, its ostinato unrelenting, its drums militantly thwacked.

Albrecht's idea of moderato is yet more funereal, suggesting that it is the Czech conductor who is out of line. Nevertheless, Válek's account is arguably the most persuasive of the three, executed with commendable crispness. In the Fifth Symphony, risking some loss of gravitas, Válek is again nothing if not urgent. The music makes better sense in his hands and any lack of clarity in the orchestral textures would seem to derive from deficiencies in the writing. Even the lack of a clinching melodic idea is made to appear less important. This is a valuable disc, well annotated.

Sextet

Sextet. String Quartet in G, Op 25. Duo[a]. Solo Violin Sonata[b]
Rainer Johannes Kimstedt va Michael Sanderling vc Petersen Quartet ([b]Conrad Muck, [a]Gernot Sussmuth vns Friedemann Weigle va [a]Hans-Jakob Eschenburg vc)
Capriccio 10 539 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

As Schulhoff enthusiasts will have come to expect, the works represented are not at all uniform in style. The early quartet is prematurely neo-classical. It was conceived in 1918 when the composer was still serving in the Austrian Army. The German group certainly gives it their all. Taut and tough, they seem intent on radicalizing the discourse whether through a heightened response to its finer points or a profound understanding of the Beethovenian models that lurk beneath the surface invention. As a result, the Quartet emerges as a witty, substantial piece.

The string Sextet was completed six years later but sounds quite different, its Schoenbergian first movement well integrated with the more eclectic idiom of the rest. Whatever the outward manner, Schulhoff's rhythmic phraseology is metrically conceived. Even if you already know the Sextet the Petersen makes a plausible first choice. The aggressive communication of their playing is emphasised by the bright, not quite top-heavy sound balance.

The Janáček-Bartók-Ravel axis of the Duo is equally well served. The Sonata for solo violin (1927) is at least as interesting as similar works by Hindemith. A thoroughly distinguished issue by an ensemble seemingly incapable of giving a dull performance.

String Quartet No 1

Schulhoff String Quartet No 1 Hindemith String Quartet No 3, Op 22 Weill String Quartet
Brandis Quartet (Thomas Brandis, Peter Brem vns Wilfried Strehle va Wolfgang Boettcher vc)
Nimbus NI5410 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

All three works bear witness to a culture that, in terms of tempo and sensation, was in the process of excited transformation. The period covered is 1923-24, the time of rocketing German inflation, the establishment of the USSR, Rilke's Duino Elegies as well as major Kafka (who died in 1924), Mann, Musil, Cocteau and Bréton (his Surrealist manifesto). This music is full of it all. Hindemith's bold Third Quartet launches its explorations within a relatively formal framework, certainly in comparison with Schulhoff and Weill. Rich invention is tempered by a sense of outward propriety. Weill's Quartet opens with real expressive warmth, although it soon busies itself with a whole range of interesting ideas (the finale is particularly rich in incident), with a hoot of a Scherzo that suddenly swerves to a Reger-like March, then waltzes gently forth in a manner that suggests Shostakovich before embarking on further discursive episodes and scurrying off to a cheeky diminuendo. Granted, one feels that Weill is in search of something he never quite finds, but the very act of searching makes for an absorbing adventure.

Even more compelling, however, is Schulhoff's dazzling First Quartet, the last piece in the programme and a highly dramatic musical mystery tour. Urgency rules right from the opening bars, while Schulhoff's tonal palette is both wide-ranging and ingeniously employed: pizzicato, col legno, sul ponticello, harmonics (wonderfully effective in the finale), dense harmonic computations and a rhythmic vitality that recalls Bartók at full cry. The work's pale, equivocal coda recalls the parallel quartet mysteries of Schulhoff's fellow Holocaust victims Krása and Haas, while the work as a whole is far more than the sum of its restless and endlessly fascinating parts. A fine programme, lustrously recorded.

William Schuman American 1910-1992

GROVE Schuman studied at Columbia University and under Harris at the Juilliard School. He came firmly to public notice with his Symphony no.3 (1941). He taught at Sarah Lawrence College, 1935-45, then became president of the Juilliard School, which he extensively reorganized. He was president of the Lincoln Center, 1962-9. He received many honours and awards. His symphonies (ten up to 1975) are central to his work; they embody vigorous drive, febrile rhythms and expansive musical and orchestral gestures, with a broad melodic line and a generally tonal idiom. Sometimes his music is layered, using different instrumental groups at different speeds. His chamber music includes four string quartets; he also composed, mainly after the mid-1970s, large-scale vocal pieces.

Violin Concerto

Schuman Violin Concerto[a]. New England Triptych
Ives Variations on 'America' (orch Schuman)
[a]Philip Quint vn Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / José Serebrier
Naxos 8 559083 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 2000 ●

The rediscovery here is the Violin Concerto. The work is in two substantial movements both showing Schuman's own kind of exuberant energy with brass and percussion as well as a special mystical stillness in soft music. The soloist plunges in right at the start of the first movement; there's an oasis of calm at and then a sprawling cadenza of nearly three minutes. The second movement has an aggressive start which clears the way for the delayed entry of the soloist. Again there's lyrical rapture as well as fireworks and – another Schuman fingerprint – a fugato. Philip Quint, the Russian-born American violinist, make his CD début here. It's a very capable performance in every way – look out for him again. Schuman's New England Triptych, based on three hymns by the first prominent American pioneer-composer, William Billings, is one of his most familiar pieces, well represented on CD. The Variations on 'America' – sending up the USA, royalty or both – ensures that this useful Schuman package ends with a good laugh.

Clara Schumann German 1819-1896

GROVE Developed by her father, Friedrich, into a musician of consummate artistry, she won dazzling success as a touring piano virtuoso both before and after she married Robert Schumann (1840), being praised not only for her mastery of a progressive repertory (Chopin, Schumann and Brahms) but also for her thoughtful interpretations and singing tone. She taught privately in Dresden and Düsseldorf and at the conservatories in Leipzig and Frankfurt. As a composer she showed imagination and control, notably in the Piano Trio, Op 17 and the songs, Op 23, but her ambitions were not serious; she ceased composing in 1854, the year of Robert's collapse. She prepared a complete edition of his music, attended to family duties and maintained a close relationship with Brahms to the end of her life.

Piano Concerto

Piano Concerto in A minor, Op 7
R Schumann Piano Concerto in A minor, Op 54
Brigitte Engerer pf
Cannes Regional Orchestra / Philippe Bender
L'Emprinte Digitale ED13146 Ⓕ
(53 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2001 ●

Clara Schumann's Concerto, composed amazingly when she was 16 (though partly composed three years earlier), proves conclusively that she was a serious, most individual composer as well as a legendary pianist. The opening Allegro maestoso moves with a heavier Teutonic tread than Robert's, and the bravura, while Hummel-based at one level, is closely integrated, recalling in its strenuousness and difficulty – at 3'12", for example – Chopin's Allegro de Concert (his 'third' Concerto). The 'Romance''s rocking rhythm is touched with a startling degree of dissonance and decoration, and the final Polonaise dips into the most piquantly harmonised and varied introspection at 2'14", once again suggesting a wholly personal voice and character.

Hearing such music side by side with a tirelessly celebrated and performed masterpiece is a most intriguing experience particularly when the performances of both Concertos are so superb. Brigitte Engerer's resilience and affection would surely have delighted her great predecessor.

Even more remarkably, she plays Robert's Concerto with such fervour and mastery that it sounds new-minted, as if recreated on the spot. Absolutely nothing is taken for granted. The theme itself, whether in its major or minor key manifestation, is memorably poised and inflected and in the cascading animato sections her playing glows and surges with a Romantic sense of impetus and momentum.

Never for a moment does this sound like a studio performance and the youthful orchestra under Philippe Bender respond with a scarcely less tingling vitality.

Robert Schumann German 1810-1856

GROVE The son of a bookseller, Schumann early showed ability as a pianist and an interest in composing as well as literary leanings. He was also enthusiastic over the writings of 'Jean Paul' (JPF Richter), girl friends and drinking champagne, tastes he retained. In 1821 he went to Leipzig to study law but instead spent his time in musical, social and literary activities. He wrote some piano music and took lessons from Friedrich Wieck. After a spell in Heidelberg, ostensibly studying law but actually music, he persuaded his family that he should give up law in favour of a pianist's career, and in 1830 he went to live with Wieck at Leipzig. But he soon had trouble with his hands (allegedly due to a machine to strengthen his fingers, but more likely through remedies for a syphilitic sore). Composition, however, continued; several piano works date from this period.

In 1834 Schumann founded a music journal, the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik; he was its editor and leading writer for ten years. He was a brilliant and perceptive critic: his writings embody the most progressive aspects of musical thinking in his time, and he drew attention to many promising young composers. Sometimes he wrote under pseudonyms, Eusebius (representing his lyrical, contemplative side) and Florestan (his fiery, impetuous one); he used these in his music, too. His compositions at this time were mainly for piano: they include variations on the name of one on his lady friends, Abegg (the musical notes A-B-E-G-G), the character-pieces Davidsbündlertänze ('Dances of the league of David', an imaginary association of those fighting the Philistines), Carnaval (pieces with literary or other allusive meanings, including one on the notes A-S-C-H after the place another girl friend came from), Phantasiestücke (a collection of poetic pieces depicting moods), Kreisleriana (fantasy pieces around the character of a mad Kapellmeister) and Kinderszenen ('Scenes from Childhood'). Affairs of the heart played a large part in his life. By 1835 he was in love with Wieck's young daughter Clara, but Wieck did his best to separate them. They pledged themselves in 1837 but were much apart and Schumann went through deep depressions. In 1839 they took legal steps to make Wieck's consent unnecessary, and after many further trials they were able to marry in 1840.

Schumann, understandably, turned in that year to song; he wrote c150 songs, including most of his finest, at this time, among them several groups and cycles, the latter including Frauenliebe und -leben ('A Woman's Love and Life') and Dichterliebe ('A Poet's Love'), which tells (to verse by Heine) a tragic Romantic story of the flowering of love, its failure and poet's exclusion from joy and his longing for death. Schumann, as a pianist composer, made the piano partake fully in the expression of emotion in such songs, often giving it the most telling music when the voice had finished.

In 1841, however, Schumann turned to orchestral music: he wrote symphonies and a beautiful, poetic piece for piano and orchestra for Clara that he later reworked as the first movement of his Piano Concerto. Then in 1842, when Clara was away on a concert tour (he disliked being in her shadow and remained at home), he turned to chamber music, and wrote his three string quartets and three works with piano, of which the Piano Quintet has always been a favourite for the freshness and Romantic warmth of its ideas. After that, in 1843, he turned to choral music, working at a secular oratorio and at setting part of Goethe's Faust. He also took up a teaching post at the new conservatory in Leipzig of which Mendelssohn was director. But he was an ineffectual teacher; and he had limited success as a conductor too. He and Clara moved to Dresden in 1844, but his deep depressions continued, hampering his creativity. Not until 1847-48 was he again productive, writing his opera Genoveva (given in Leipzig in 1850 with moderate success), chamber music and songs. In 1850 he took up a post in Düsseldorf as town musical director. He was at first happy and prolific, writing the eloquent Cello Concerto and the Rhenish Symphony (no.3: one movement depicts his impressions in Cologne Cathedral). But the post worked out badly because of his indifferent conducting. In 1852-53 his health and spirits deteriorated and he realised that he could not continue in his post. In 1854 he began to suffer hallucinations; he attempted suicide (he had always dreaded the possibility of madness) and entered an asylum, where he died in 1856, almost certainly of the effects of syphilis, cared for at the end by Clara and the young Brahms.

Cello Concerto in A minor, Op 129

Schumann Cello Concerto. Adagio and Allegro in A flat, Op 70. Fantasiestücke, Op 73. Fünf Stücke im Volkston, Op 102. Mass in C minor, Op 147 – Offertorium Bargiel Adagio in G, Op 38 🅿
Steven Isserlis vc Dame Felicity Lott sop
David King org Deutsche Kammerphilharmonie / Christoph Eschenbach pf
RCA Red Seal 09026 68800-2 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Only two of the works in this forwardly recorded anthology – the Fünf Stücke im Volkston of 1840 and the Cello Concerto of a year later – were originally inspired by the cello. But in closely attuned, super-sensitive partnership with Eschenbach as both conductor and pianist, Steven Isserlis somehow persuades us that no instrument better revealed 'the beloved dreamer whom we know as Schumann', as Tovey once put it. Helped by unhurried tempos and a lovely-voiced *c*1745 Guadagnini cello, Isserlis draws out the rich, nostalgic poetry of the concerto's first two movements with the eloquence of speech. And with his buoyancy of heart and bow he silences all criticism of the finale – even its low-lying cadenza (this he subsequently plays again with the composer's surely less effective flourish for the soloist in the closing bars). The five engaging Volkston pieces with piano are vividly characterised and contrasted in mood. And the Op 73 and Op 70 miniatures lose nothing through transfer from clarinet and horn respectively to one of the composer's two optional alternatives.

The Adagio and Allegro for horn surely gains in expressive intimacy and vitality when bowed rather than blown. The Offertorium is sung by Felicity Lott with heart-easing beauty. The inclusion of a hitherto unrecorded, noble Adagio by Clara Schumann's gifted half-brother, Woldemar Bargiel, also helps to make this disc a collector's piece.

Cello Concerto[a]. Adagio and Allegro in A flat, Op 70[b]. Fantasiestücke, Op 73[b]. Funf Stücke im Volkston, Op 102[b]
Heinrich Schiff vc Gerhard Oppitz pf Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips 422 414-2PH (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded [a]1988, [b]1991 (arr Grützmacher) ◉

Schumann's Cello Concerto is a fairly dark, troubled work, and sometimes cellists are tempted to adopt a somewhat overwrought approach when playing it. In fact, it responds best to a more balanced approach, as exemplified in the performance by Heinrich Schiff. His playing is very eloquent, and quite strong, but there is also a feeling of dignity and refinement in his response to the music. Everything is perfectly in scale, and the work's essential nobility is allowed to emerge in a most moving fashion. Schiff's technique is faultless, and his tonal quality is very beautiful. Haitink and the BPO seem totally in sympathy with the soloist, and the recording is warm and well detailed. The three items with piano accompaniment comprise a series of short pieces which are for the most part sunnier in outlook than the Concerto, and they make an effective contrast to the larger-scale work. Again Schiff's playing is expressive, but his phrasing is full of subtlety and poetry, and Oppitz is a highly responsive partner.

Violin Concerto

Schumann Violin Concerto in D minor, Op posth
Wieniawski Légende, Op 17.
Violin Concerto No 2 in D minor, Op 22
Juliette Kang vn Vancouver Symphony Orchestra / Sergiu Comissiona
CBC Records SMCD5197 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996-98 ◉

Juliette Kang here plays with quicksilver brilliance not only in the virtuosic Wieniawski concerto but in the rugged Schumann work, less grateful for the player. Yet, though she plays brilliantly, with dazzlingly clean articulation in bravura passages, these are comparatively small-scale readings. Where those virtuosos in the grand Romantic tradition are balanced relatively close, Kang is more naturally balanced in a slightly recessed acoustic. The impression is of a sweet, silvery violin tone that cannot expand so fully; the orchestral strings, too, sound relatively small-scale. What matters is that the performances are all very persuasive. The Schumann, with its bravura double-stopping at the start, finds Kang fiery and impetuous, making up for barnstorming power, and when it comes to lyrical passages the poetry is beautifully caught. So too in the slow movement – introduced in a tender account of the brief opening cello solo – while the finale is taken at a speed which allows a delicious lilt in the dance-rhythms, yet not eccentrically slow as in the Kremer/Harnoncourt.

Similarly, in the Wieniawski Concerto, Kang is light and volatile in the rapid passagework, and relaxes sweetly into the songful beauty of the motto theme, playing with a natural, unexaggerated lyricism.

Those who insist on display as the first essential may not be completely satisfied, but deeper qualities amply make up for that. For those who want this unique coupling, this is a first-class recommendation.

Piano Concerto in A minor, Op 54

Piano Concerto[a]. Piano Quintet in E flat, Op 44[b]
Maria João Pires pf [b]Augustin Dumay, [b]Renaud Capuçon vns [b]Gérard Caussé va [b]Jian Wang vc [a]Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Claudio Abbado
DG 463 179-2GH (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded [a]1997 and [b]1999 ◉◉

It makes an unusual and apt coupling to have the Schumann Piano Concerto alongside the most powerful of his chamber works. In both, Pires is inspired to give freely spontaneous performances, at once powerfully persuasive and poetic. In the Quintet it is a delight to get the feeling of interplay between musicians, distinguished individually, who plainly enjoy working together. The warmth of the whole performance is reflected in the way that Pires leads the team to play with natural, unselfconscious rubato in all four movements, the speeds perfectly chosen and the structure firmly held together. The rhythmic spring of the playing is a constant delight, too. In the Concerto Pires is also at her most persuasive. Abbado has conducted several previous recordings of the work, notably for Perahia on Sony and Pollini on DG, yet here with the Chamber Orchestra of Europe he is able to match the volatile quality in Pires's performance with beautifully transparent accompaniment. So the hushed Andante espressivo section in the first movement (track 1, 4'42") finds the COE flute and clarinet fully matching their soloist in expressiveness. The central Intermezzo is light and fresh at a flowing Andante grazioso, free rubato making it sound like an improvisation. It leads to a sparkling account of the finale, which lightly emphasises the scherzando quality of the writing at a relatively relaxed speed.

Two beautifully judged performances, both well recorded, make this an original coupling.

Piano Concerto in A minor, Op 54[a]. Carnaval, Op 9[b]. Waldszenen, Op 82[c] – Vogel als Prophet 🅷 💰
Dame Myra Hess pf [a]orchestra / Walter Goehr
Naxos Historical mono 8 110604 (62 minutes: ADD) Ⓢ
Recorded [a]1937, [b]1938 and [c]1931 ◉

Who else has played the A flat episode in the Concerto's first movement or spun off the central Intermezzo with such rapt engagement? Some may find Myra Hess's finale a trifle sober-suited, but it is intensely musical, a performance which Nalen Anthoni suggests in his excellent accompanying essay stems from a tradition which emphasised Schumann's gentleness rather than his wildness or schizophrenia. The recordings may show their age but the transfers have come up outstandingly, allowing one to savour Hess's past but ever-present glory to the full.

Unimpeachably honest, Hess's Carnaval may be less volatile or idiosyncratic than, say, Rachmaninov's but its special sensitivity and deep affection give it classic status. Hess was indeed 'a virtuoso in sound' (Stephen Kovacevich, her one-time student).

Piano Concerto[a]. Cello Concerto in A minor[b].
Introduction and Allegro appassionato, Op 92[a].
[a]Daniel Barenboim pf [b]Jacqueline du Pré vc
[a]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau; [b]New Philharmonia Orchestra / Daniel Barenboim 🏵
EMI Encore 574755-2 (74 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded [a]1974, b 1968 ●

If ever a performance of Schumann's Piano Concerto stressed the principle of dialogue between soloist and conductor, then this is it. True, the Philharmonia's string ensemble isn't as water-tight under Fischer-Dieskau as it might have been under some other conductors; and poetry is invested at the premium of relatively low-level drama. Orchestral textures are absolutely right for Schumann – warm yet transparent, full-bodied yet never stodgy – and poetry is a major priority. Add Barenboim's compatible vision and keyboard finesse, and you indeed have a memorable reading. Despite the extensive competition, Stephen Kovacevich's memorable recording with Colin Davis remains the top recommendation for this work (reviewed under Grieg) though.

The more discursive Introduction and Allegro appassionato has plenty of interest, but remembering that this isn't exactly top-drawer Schumann, the performance could be more arresting. The coupling is du Pré's Schumann Cello Concerto, the tear-laden quality in the slow movement more than matching that in her famous Elgar account. A rewarding disc.

Schumann Piano Concerto[a]
Beethoven Piano Concerto No 4[b]
Hélène Grimaud pf [a]Deutsches Symphony Orchestra, Berlin / David Zinman; [b]New York Philharmonic / Kurt Masur
Warner Elatus 0927-49617-2 (DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1995 ●

Such is Grimaud's immediacy of response to every change of mood in the opening Allegro affettuoso of Schumann's concerto that some listeners may think it a little too excitable – at the expense of maturer composure and poise. But never in this movement, nor in a finale of unflagging vitality and joie de vivre, is there any hint of mere keyboard display. You could certainly never hope to hear the first movement's nostalgic main theme played with a more eloquent simplicity. Piano and orchestra are in exceptionally close accord throughout, and not least in the intimate conversational exchanges of the Andantino grazioso. Warner's sound is clear-cut rather than lusciously cushioned, but never hard-edged: it falls agreeably on the ear.

Piano Concerto. Introduction and Allegro appassionato in G, Op 92. Introduction and Allegro in D minor, Op 134
Murray Perahia pf Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
Sony Classical SK64577 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●●

From Perahia and Abbado the Piano Concerto comes across with refreshing eagerness, as if Schumann could scarcely pause for breath in an uprush of inspiration. But unflagging strength of direction by no means excludes the personal. The first movement, in particular, brings intimately revealing nuances of phrasing from Perahia, with a finely shaped, richly expressive cadenza before a delectably light-fingered, effervescent coda. Free of coy cosseting the Andante has a natural, gracious flow. However, a more expansive melodic glow in the middle section would not have gone amiss, not least when the violins soar into the upper reaches (a masterstroke of orchestration) near its end. Piquantly crunched acciaccaturas at the start inject the finale with inexhaustible rhythmic buoyancy. Recorded in Berlin's Philharmonie, the sound quality is vibrantly full and forward.

Perahia adds Schumann's two later works for piano and orchestra as couplings, of which the sorely neglected last in D minor was part of a birthday present for Clara. Though less immediately ear-catching than the Mendelssohnian G major work , Schumann's farewell to the genre – as played here – is striking as by far the more intense of the two, with eventual major-key victory won after deeper internal struggle.

Additional recommendation
Lausanne Chamber Orchestra / Zacharias pf
Coupling: Introduction and Allegro appassionato in G. Concert-Allegro with Introduction in D minor
Dabringhaus und Grimm MDG340 1033-2 (62 minutes: DDD: 8/01) Ⓕ

Zacharias here establishes his own distinctive view, as compelling in its way as that of Perahia and Abbado. The scale is Mozartian, allowing extra transparency of texture, with Zacharias's articulation a consistent joy. A refreshing alternative, bright and alert, to Perahia.

Complete Symphonies

No 1 in B flat, Op 38, 'Spring'; No 2 in C, Op 61; No 3 in E flat, Op 97, 'Rhenish'; No 4 in D minor, Op 120

Symphonies Nos 1-4.
Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op 52
Staatskapelle Dresden / Wolfgang Sawallisch
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono
② 567768-2 Ⓜ
(148 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1972 ●●

Schumann's symphonies come in for criticism because of his supposed cloudy textures and unsubtle scoring, but in the hands of a conductor who is both skilful and sympathetic they are most engaging works. Sawallisch's recordings, brightly transferred, are a much admired set. His style, fresh and unforced, is not as high powered as some other conductors but it is sensible, alert and very pleasing. He achieves great lightness in the First and Fourth Symphonies – there's always a sense of classical poise and control but never at the expense of the overall architecture of the pieces. The Second and Third Symphonies, larger and more far-reaching in their scope, again benefit from Sawallisch's approach. The playing of the Staatskapelle Dresden is superlative in every department, with a lovely veiled string sound and a real sense of ensemble. With the Overture, Scherzo and Finale thrown in for good measure, this is not to be missed.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 2
Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Rafael Kubelík 🏵
Sony Classical Essential Classics SBK48269 Ⓑ
(74 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1978-79 ●

Symphonies Nos 3 and 4. Manfred, Op 115 – Overture
Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Rafael Kubelík
Sony Classical Essential Classics SBK48270 Ⓑ
(76 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1978-79

It is hard to understand why Kubelík's wonderful cycle failed to make an impact when it was first issued. His sensitivity to detail, his refusal to bully Schumann's vulnerable structures and his ability to penetrate occasional thickets of orchestration, make these especially memorable. Just listen to the cheeky bassoon backing clarinet, 1'44" into the Spring Symphony's fourth movement or the to-ing and fro-ing between first and second violins in the last movement of the Second. Only the first movement of the Fourth seems a little heavy-handed, but then the poetry of the Romanze and the exuberance of the finale more than make amends. First movement repeats are observed and the playing throughout is rich in felicitous turns of phrase. The sound, though, is a minor stumbling block: violins are thin, brass a little fuzzy and the whole production less focused than Sawallisch's set. But Kubelík's insights are too varied and meaningful to miss, and there is much pleasure to be derived from them. What with a stirring Manfred Overture added for good measure, they also constitute exceptional value for money.

Symphonies Nos 1-3; No 4 (1841 and 1851 G minor versions); WoO29, 'Zwickauer'. Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op 52. Konzertstück in F, Op 86 🅿
Roger Montgomery, Gavin Edwards, Susan Dent, Robert Maskell hns Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Archiv Produktion ③ 457 591-2AH3 Ⓕ
(202 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●

The first point to note is how much more comprehensive this is than previous cycles, even the outstanding RCA set of period performances from Roy Goodman and the Hanover Band. Gardiner offers both versions of Symphony No 4, 1841 and 1851, and his performances of them are very well geared to bringing out the contrasts. Still more fascinating is the inclusion of both the early, incomplete Symphony in G minor, and the Konzertstück of 1849 for four horns, with the ORR soloists breathtaking in their virtuosity in the outer movements, using horns with rotary valves crooked in F. Otherwise, except in three specified movements, natural horns are used, braying clearly through orchestration which always used to be condemned as too thick. In his note, Gardiner fairly points out the merits of the 1841 version in transparency and other qualities, suggesting, as others have, that the doublings in the later version make it safer and more commonplace. Paradoxically in performance, Gardiner is if anything even more electrifying in the later, more thickly upholstered version, as ever clarifying textures and building up to a thrilling conclusion. Even the Zwickauer Symphony of 1832 emerges as very distinctive of Schumann.

The contrasts between Gardiner and Goodman in their approach to the numbered works are not as marked as expected, often as much a question of scale and recording quality as of interpretative differences, with Goodman's orchestra more intimate, and with the RCA sound a degree less brightly analytical. Both prefer fast speeds, with Goodman a shade more relaxed and Gardiner more incisive, pressing ahead harder, with syncopations – so important in Schumann – more sharply dramatic. One advantage that Gardiner has in his slightly bigger scale is that he brings out more light and shade, offering a wider dynamic range. Hence the solemn fourth movement of the Rhenish Symphony inspired by Cologne Cathedral – as with Goodman taken at a flowing speed – builds up more gradually in a bigger, far longer crescendo, in the end the more powerful for being held back at the start. Though the Goodman set still holds its place, Gardiner offers a conspectus of Schumann as symphonist that is all the richer and more illuminating for the inclusion of the extra rarities.

Symphonies Nos 1-4. Manfred, Op 115 – Overture 🅷
Cleveland Orchestra / George Szell
Sony Classical Masterworks Heritage ②
MH2K62349 (135 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1958-60 ●

This famous set gives us the heart of George Szell, his feeling for style, for line and for Schumann's warming but fragile symphonic structures. Szell loved the Schumann symphonies, but readers should be warned that he attempts to correct – and here we quote Szell himself – 'minor lapses [in orchestration] due to inexperience' with 'remedies' that range from 'subtle adjustments of dynamic marks to the radical surgery of re-orchestrating whole stretches'. More often than not, the musical results serve Schumann handsomely. Szell sometimes takes crescendo to imply accelerando, but his insistence on watertight exchanges facilitates a snug fit between various instrumental choirs, the strings especially. Markings such as Animato (in the First Symphony's Allegro molto vivace) or piano dolce (in the same movement) are scrupulously observed, and so are most of Schumann's metronome markings. Playing standards are very high, but the close-set recordings occasionally undermine Szell's painstaking efforts to clarify Schumann's orchestration, the Rhenish being the worst offender.

The Rhenish again yields high musical dividends, with sensitively shaped central movements, but were we to single out just one track on the whole set, it would have to be the Second Symphony's Adagio espressivo, a performance of such warmth, nobility and elasticity (the latter not a quality normally associated with Szell) that it is tempting to grant it the accolade of 'best ever'. The Manfred Overture is given a wildly spontaneous performance, with extreme tempos and some brilliant playing. Sometimes you may feel that Szell was being overprotective towards the music and that the same interpretations played live might have thrown caution to the wind. Still, Szell should certainly be granted equal status with his bargain stablemates Kubelík and Sawallisch. Both are perhaps marginally more spontaneous in the First and Third Symphonies, but Szell's loving exegeses underline details in the music that you won't have heard on many other recordings. Transfers and presentation are superb.

Symphony No 2

Symphony No 2. Konzertstück in F, Op 86.
Manfred, Op 115 – Overture
Philharmonia Orchestra / Christian Thielemann
DG 453 482-2GH (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●

This programme is brilliantly designed for continuous listening. Thielemann is his own man, making no stylistic concessions to 'historically informed' performance. The disc begins with the Manfred Overture: its opening three chords are very smoothly delivered (they are usually incisive and strong), but they are justified by the spacious gravity and dignity of what follows. You may find this Manfred too ready to yield to introspective slower motion (a feature of the performance of the Second Symphony). Then Manfred's interior world is blown away by 'something quite curious' as Schumann described his Konzertstück for four horns and orchestra. Replace 'curious' with 'dazzling', even 'reckless', and you might gain a better idea of the piece. Here is playing of great brilliance and bravado.

We've not had a performance of the Second Symphony as satisfying since Karajan's and Sawallisch's from the early 1970s. On first hearing, one occasionally feels that Thielemann had lost his sense of proportion, principally in the Scherzo, whose much slower Trios can sound self-conscious. But, more often than not, a few bars further on, and the nature of the expression released by that slower tempo makes clear the reason for its choice. And in the Symphony's outer Allegros Thielemann always ensures enough urgent propulsion and springing energy to make workable his many slowings. Never do you feel the tension sagging as a result of a slowing; on the contrary, the contrasts invariably intensify the drama. The Symphony's Adagio is the disc's principal glory: a wondrously sustained and shaped cantabile, with the essential bass-line well defined. It might be thought a risky business recording Schumann in a church, but the microphones are close and this ample sound offers a convincing focus and proportion.

Symphony No 3

Symphony No 3. Overture, Scherzo and Finale,
Op 52. Genoveva Overture
Philharmonia Orchestra / Christian Thielemann
DG 459 680-2GH (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

Thielemann's Rhenish is less controversial than his recording of the Second Symphony; less prone, as his incensed detractors would put it, to being 'pulled about'. The Third Symphony is, after all, a less troubled piece, and here the degree of tempo modification is more traditional than radical. But this Rhenish is broadly conceived, with the kind of depth of tone and loving attention to detail that any fine orchestra would give willingly to Giulini. Parallels with Giulini extend to the surprisingly swiftly delivered 'cathedral polyphony' of the fourth movement. It is taken (like Norrington!) almost at Schumann's metronome marking – considerably quicker than Karajan and Sawallisch – and has, in context, the feeling of a prelude to the finale. But its grandeur is far from compromised. There is a marvellous depth of tone, attack and wonderful resonant glow to the playing, with the antiphonally divided first and second violins filling the spectrum and illuminating the counterpoint. Nowadays it is rare to encounter Schumann playing and recording that, to this degree, seeks out and illuminates the lyricism, the majesty, the poetry and the joy of the Rhenish, and always expands magnificently for its moments of arrival. It is also unusual to hear this kind of bloom on the playing. Some of it comes courtesy of DG's spacious Watford Colosseum setting (with its skilfully contrived perspectives), but the majority of it is enabled by Thielemann from his players.

The Overture to Genoveva is almost equally fine, if without the drama one might have expected. Rather, the texture and workings here are integrated into an immensely satisfying, euphonious whole. Only in the Overture, Scherzo and Finale does Thielemann's broad manner work against the music: maybe the playing is less consistently resolute because the 'interpretation' is less settled in Thielemann's mind, or perhaps all it needed was another complete take. After Sawallisch or Goodman, most of it will come across as an overly serious, if amiable chug, with moments of fussiness (Schumann's Vivo and Vivace markings are largely ignored). Yet, even here, the Meistersingerisch gait may appeal, and the rich and splendid maestoso realization of the finale's main idea from 6'47" a form of justification for the broad manner, though the indulged lyrical response to it half a minute later is dangerously close to parody. But Thielemann's Rhenish is very special.

Symphony No 4

Schumann Symphony No 4
Schubert Symphony No 4 in C minor, D417, 'Tragic'
Mendelssohn Die schöne Melusine, Op 32
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec 4509-94543-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1995

'I think of it as one of the greatest symphonic poems,' Harnoncourt has said of Die schöne Melusine. A bold claim, but here indeed is a bold and beauteous performance. Beauty first, 'the beauty of calm waters' as Tovey described the opening: upwardly curling mother-of-pearl Berlin winds and strings. Then boldness: and here the strongly rhythmic second theme is subjected to such a dramatic animato that its definition may strike you as initially blurred (a momentary impression though, and the Overture as a whole benefits from Harnoncourt's tempo contrasts).

The Berliners' musical collective would appear to have had a profound (and positive) effect on Harnoncourt in the Schubert. Compare, for instance, the slow movement with his Concertgebouw recording (part of a cycle: see the review under Schubert; refer to the Index to Reviews): there, the Andante's relatively detached period manners are here (at a slower tempo, though still an Andante) transformed into a very real beauty and eloquence of phrase and expression. Very startling, if you don't know Harnoncourt's Amsterdam recording, is the removal of eight bars (from the printed editions) in the first movement's exposition, and Harnoncourt's fateful ('Tragic'?) half-tempo delivery of the finale's closing unison C chords.

Dramatic delaying tactics – whether tiny hesitations or huge fermatas – have always been a feature of Harnoncourt's conducting. Together with his insistent accentuation, sudden contrasts of dynamics, texture and tempo, you may feel that this Schumann Fourth (the familiar revision) sets out to contradict the symphony's apparent continuity, certainly compared to a performance like Wand's on RCA. But then, this is a performance that can catch fire spectacularly in a way that few others do, especially in the symphony's closing stages.

The Berliners' playing is magnificent, the sound present and spacious.

Piano Quintet in E flat major, Op 44

Piano Quintet in E flat, Op 44. Andante and Variations, Op 46. Fantasiestücke, Op 73. Märchenbilder, Op 113.
Marie-Luise Neunecker hn Dora Schwarzberg, Lucy Hall vns Nobuko Imai va Natalia Gutman, Mischa Maisky vcs Martha Argerich, Alexandre Rabinovitch pf
EMI 557308-2 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1994

After 'one memorable day of rehearsal', as the introductory note puts it, Martha Argerich and a group of friends recorded this programme at a public concert in Holland 'with the enthusiasm and intimate inspiration of a house-party'. The rarity is the Andante and Variations, Op 46, here brought up with all the spontaneous freshness of new discovery in a performance as enjoyable for its self-generating continuity as its diversity. Argerich and her fellow pianist, Rabinovitch divide keyboard responsibilities in the remainder of the programme. Her own major triumph comes in the Quintet (with truly inspirational help from Maisky's cello). Every note tingles with life and colour in an arrestingly imaginative reading of exemplary textural transparency. In none of the more familiar works in the concert is that little extra stimulus of live as opposed to studio recording combined with more finesse and finish than here.

In the smaller pieces Argerich reaffirms herself as an artist of 'temperament', much given to the impulse of the moment. The recording itself is pleasingly natural. And there is heartening audience applause as a further reminder that we are at a live performance.

String Quartets, Op 41

String Quartets, Op 41 – No 1 in A minor; No 3 in A
Zehetmair Quartet (Thomas Zehetmair, Matthias Metzger vns Ruth Killius va Françoise Groben vc)
ECM New Series 472 169-2 (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 000

The Zehetmair Quartet's coupling focuses the music's alternating wildness and fragility with altogether unique perception. Theirs is an agitated, combustible and loving view of Schumann, a credible trip into his troubled world that reflects older playing styles not by exaggerating or abandoning vibrato but by constantly varying tone, tempo, bow pressure and modes of attack. Aspects of this trend are usefully exemplified by their handling of the pensive second section of the Third Quartet's third movement, and by the way they negotiate the sudden, bloodless moderato passage that forms the coda of the First Quartet's finale. In the less consistent but more challenging First Quartet, minute variations in pulse and emphasis are consistently engaging, ie they enjoy maximum freedom within the law of the page. Contrapuntal passages that other quartets present as dry or self-conscious – at 2'36" into the first movement of No 1, for example, where the viola takes the initial lead – assume new-found meaning. Indeed, their playing has similarities with Alfred Cortot in Schumann's piano music and Adolf Busch in his First Violin Sonata, both of whom focus the fantasy while keeping tabs on structure, much as the Zehetmair do here.

These are not comfortable performances. They pass on cosmetic appeal and would rather grate and rail than pander to surface 'gloss'. So be warned. But they are profoundly beautiful in their truthful appropriation of music that can be both poignant and aggressive. Delicate, too, in places (Mendelssohn with added fibre); in fact more comprehensive as musical statements than most of us had previously suspected. That realisation is due almost entirely to the persuasive powers of these supremely accomplished, and realistically recorded, performances.

String Quartets, Op 41 – No 1 in A minor; No 3 in A
St Lawrence Quartet (Geoff Nuttall, Barry Shiffman vns Lesley Robertson va Marina Hoover vc)
EMI 556797-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

String Quartets, Op 41 – No 1 in A minor; No 2 in F; No 3 in A 🅿
Eroica Quartet (Peter Hanson, Lucy Howard vns Gustav Clarkson va David Watkin vc)
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7270 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

After occasional music-making together, the St Lawrence Quartet formed a permanent group in 1989, and are now established as ensemble-in-residence at California's Stanford University. Here, in their début recording, studio discipline – plus respect for Schumann's own veering from wayward Romanticism towards a new Classical control – brings its rewards in performances of irresistible youthful immediacy and intensity while at the same time, through the individuality of each strand in the argument, opening your ears anew to the sheer skill of the craftsmanship. The full, forward succulence of the recorded tone will also play a large part in winning these works new admirers.

Whereas the St Lawrence's EMI coupling plays for just on an hour, the Eroica's Harmonia Mundi issue, lasting for some 80 minutes, offers all three works at the same full price. The recorded tone here is a little less voluptuous, a little more astringent. But the main difference lies in this group's avowed pursuit of 'period style'. This neither robs their playing of emotion in slow tempo, nor of vitality elsewhere. But the end result could be summarised as more objectively classical than that of the fervently committed, open-hearted, vibrato-full Canadians.

Their recourse to the autograph scores reveals a structural change of outstanding interest: that what we now know as the four-bar stringendo leading from the First Quartet's slow A minor introduction into the main Allegro (surprisingly in F major) was in fact originally conceived as an arresting start to the second F major Quartet itself. Other small changes of prime interest to this group would seem to lie in details of fingering and bowing possibly suggested by Ferdinand David (leader of Leipzig's Gewandhaus Orchestra) when the Quartets were first tried out at Clara's 23rd birthday party that September.

In the First Quartet's opening 6/8 Allegro one wonders if the Eroica's insistent second-main-beat accentuation slightly disrupts continuity of line (as again in the Scherzo's central Intermezzo). Nor do they dispel the feeling that Schumann's intricate syncopation in the course of the Second Quartet's variation movement defeats its own ends as the average ear so soon translates compound triple rhythm into simple duple. But both these new arrivals are more than welcome companions for the Melos Quartet's trilogy (DG – nla) of so many years ago.

Piano Trios

Awards 1999

Piano Trios – No 1 in D minor, Op 63; No 2 in F, Op 80
Florestan Trio (Anthony Marwood vn Richard Lester vc Susan Tomes pf)
Hyperion CDA67063 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●●●

For those who have always thought of Schumann's First Piano Trio as his finest chamber work after the Piano Quintet, the Florestan Trio may encourage you to think again about the Second Trio – a wonderful piece, full of poetic ideas. The artists make vigorous work of the first movement's urgent thematic interrelations but the real surprise is the third movement, a lilting barcarolle awash with significant counterpoint, although the heart of the Trio is its slow second movement – deeply personal music. The differences in the trios are more marked than their similarities. The Second Trio is mellow, loving and conversational, but the First is troubled, tense, even tragic – save, perhaps, for its Mendelssohnian finale. The Florestan Trio realises the music's myriad perspectives, coaxing its arguments rather than confusing them. Marwood employs some subtle portamento and varies his use of vibrato, whereas Susan Tomes never forces her tone. Real teamwork, equally in evidence for the gently cantering Scherzo and the fine, elegiac slow movement.

Piano Trio No 3 in G minor, Op 110. Fantasiestücke, Op 88. Piano Quartet in E flat, Op 47[a]
[a]Thomas Riebl va Florestan Trio (Anthony Marwood vn Richard Lester vc Susan Tomes pf)
Hyperion CDA67175 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

After their 1999 Gramophone Award-winning disc of the first two piano trios, these players now champion three works which are less frequently encountered in concert, proving once again how a revelatory interpretation can make all of us think again.

The G minor Piano Trio (No 3) of 1851 suffers from over-repetitive, at times perfunctory, rhythmic patterning. But thanks to the mercurial vitality and the spontaneous response to every passing innuendo from all three interwoven voices, not a note here sounds unmotivated.

The three fanciful 1842 miniatures for piano trio (revised under the title of Fantasiestücke in 1849) have long, and rightly, been criticised for the dominance of the keyboard in all but the third, entitled 'Duet'. Susan Tomes makes no attempt to disguise this.

Last but not least, the Piano Quartet of 1842, long overshadowed by its much-loved romantic forerunner, the Piano Quintet. Misha Donat's appreciative note reminds us that even the loyal Clara waited some seven years before taking it into her repertory. In this work the rarely silent piano must not be allowed to dominate, which is why first praise goes to Susan Tomes for so keen an ear for balance. The Scherzo has a Mendelssohnian, elfin fleetness, and the finale (surely Schumann's ne plus ultra in exhilarating contrapuntal ingenuity) an exemplary textural clarity. The slow movement, played with a touching simplicity, speaks as eloquently as any of the composer's Clara-inspired love-songs. Excellently recorded, this welcome disc should win all three works a new lease of life.

Schumann Piano Trio No 1 in D minor, Op 63^{b} 🄷
Mendelssohn Piano Trio in D minor, Op 94^{a}
Alfred Cortot pf Jacques Thibaud vn
Pablo Casals vc
Naxos Historical mono 8 110185 Ⓢ
(59 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1928/29

Tully Potter's introductory note reminds us that it was in Paris, in their later twenties, that these three legendary artists first made music together – just for pleasure. But international acclaim after a public début in 1907 soon led to their devoting a regular part of each year to this sphere for just over the next quarter-century.

We're told that Schumann's No 1 was always one of their recital favourites. Here it's difficult to evaluate their playing in technical terms such as minute attention to expressive detail without loss of flow, impeccable ensemble, and last but not least, choice of tempo (slower than Schumann's suggestions in the searching Langsam, mit inniger Empfindung). The impression is more of intimately shared awareness of, and response to, the music's inner secrets – as if personally communicated to them by the composer himself.

In reproduction you're at once aware of difficulty in doing justice to Thibaud's beguiling violin, notably in the higher reaches of Mendelssohn's agitated opening movement. Here it is outweighed by Casals' sumptuously ripe cello and Cortot's multi-voiced keyboard. But the immediacy and freshness of the playing wins the day in a beautifully nuanced Andante, a delectably mischievous Scherzo, and an unflaggingly urgent finale.

Ward Marston's skilful engineering is at its truest and best here.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas – No 1 in A minor, Op 105;
No 2 in D minor, Op 121
Gidon Kremer vn Martha Argerich pf Ⓕ
DG 419 235-2GH (49 minutes: DDD) ◉

Schumann's two violin sonatas are late works, dating from 1851, and both were written quickly, apparently in four and six days respectively. This rapidity of composition is nowhere evident except perhaps in the vigour and enthusiasm of the music. Argerich and Kremer, both mercurial and emotionally charged performers, subtly balance the ardent Florestan and dreamily melancholic Eusebius elements of Schumann's creativity. This is even more striking in the Second Sonata, a greater work than its twin, thematically vigorous with a richness and scope that make it a striking as well as ideally structured work. Kremer and Argerich have established a close and exciting duo partnership and this fine recording shows what like minds can achieve in music so profoundly expressive as this.

Violin Sonatas Nos 1 and 2; No 3 in A minor – Intermezzo
Ilya Kaler vn Boris Slutsky pf
Naxos 8 550870 (51 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993

These performances, powerfully recorded in Indiana by these two young Russian artists, are most enjoyable. The passion of their playing is perhaps not wholly Germanic, but every artist legitimately brings something of himself to the music he performs, and nothing here takes us out of touch with Schumann's world. There is an impressive intensity to this playing, although refinement and tenderness are rightly also present. Kaler and Slutsky mould these melodies well; it's a matter of timing as well as tone and dynamics, as the Allegretto of the A minor Sonata shows. The same movement also demonstrates how they follow Schumann naturally through his characteristically rapid changes of mood, while the finale that follows has power and purpose. The single movement from the composite 'FAE Sonata' dedicated to Joseph Joachim, in which Schumann collaborated with the young Brahms and Albert Dietrich, makes a useful bonus in a disc which would otherwise last under 50 minutes. The Naxos disc at super-bargain price represents fine value.

Davidsbündlertänze, Op 6

Davidsbündlertänze, Op 6. Etudes symphoniques, Op 13 (1852 version). Arabeske in C, Op 18. Blumenstück in D flat, Op 19

András Schiff pf
Warner Elatus 0927-49612-2 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1995

Schumann was a great re-thinker, in Schiff's opinion not always for the better in later life – hence his choice of Schumann's original (1837) conception of the Davidsbündlertänze rather than its more usually heard 1851 revision. Except for a touch of mischief (subsequently removed) at the end of No 9, textual differences are slight. But Schiff prefers the fewer repeat markings in the first edition, so that ideas never lose their freshness. More importantly, the exceptional immediacy and vividness of his characterization reminds us that initially Schumann signed nearly all of these 18 'bridal thoughts' with an F (the impetuous Florestan) or an E (the introspective, visionary Eusebius) – or sometimes both – as well as including literary inscriptions (and one or two more colourful expression marks) as a clue to the mood of the moment.

Schiff laughs and teases, storms and yearns, as if the hopes and dreams of the youthful Robert, forbidden all contact with his distant beloved, were wholly his own – there and then. The impatient Florestan fares particularly well. For the much metamorphosed Etudes symphoniques Schiff chooses the generally used late version of 1852 with its admirably tautened finale. Here, his bold, firmly contoured approach reaffirms it as the most magisterially 'classical' work the young Schumann ever wrote. Schiff emphasises its continuity and unity as a whole. Even the five so-called supplementary variations emerge as more purposeful, less ruminative, than often heard. These Schiff wisely offers as an independent group at the end. The recital is completed by the Arabeske and Blumenstück, again played with a very strong sense of direction, even if Schiff is not yet Richter's equal in disguising the repetitiveness of the latter. Nothing but praise for the naturalness of the reproduction.

Davidsbündlertänze, Op 6. Etudes symphoniques, Op 13. Carnaval, Op 9. Kreisleriana, Op 16. Papillons, Op 2. Kinderszenen, Op 15. Fantasiestücke, Op 12 – No 1, Des Abends. Waldszenen, Op 82 – No 7, Vogel als Prophet Ⓗ
Alfred Cortot pf
Music & Arts mono ② CD-858 (131 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1928-48 ●

It is good to have this Music & Arts sharply focused issue of Cortot's evergreen, ever-fresh performances on a well-presented two-CD set. These recordings have been reissued many times before. How many artists, today, one wonders, could hope to garner such tribute? So here, again, is that magically floated cantabile tugging at the heart-strings in 'Des Abends' (how one longs for the rest of the cycle) yet maintained with the flawless line and impetus of a great singer. In the Davidsbündlertänze, one of Cortot's most poetically potent if battle-scarred recordings, his confusion in Florestan's schneller in No 3 or in the vaulting leaps of No 12 is, perhaps, not quite what the composer had in mind in his instruction, Mit Humor. Yet who can resist his dolce cantando in No 14, the gem of his Schumann, alive with a rich polyphonic pianistic tradition that Alfred Brendel so sadly claims has virtually vanished from the music scene.

In Kinderszenen the 'poet' of the epilogue is at once Schumann and Cortot, creator and re-creator, and in the Etudes symphoniques the gold-dust scattering of the posthumous studies throughout the main work is done with such passion and inwardness that only a Beckmesser could possibly object. Playing like this seems light years away from today's style or standard. But pace Cortot, his idiosyncrasy, his pell-mell virtuosity and poetic ecstasy may strike a foreign and even alien note in our more puritan times yet, as Yvonne Lefebure so eloquently put it, 'even his wrong notes were those of a god'.

Davidsbündlertänze, Op 6.
Concert sans orchestre, Op 14
Maurizio Pollini pf Ⓕ
DG 471 369-2GH (52 minutes: DDD) ●

Maurizio Pollini brings as much temperament and intensity to these two wholly Clara-inspired works as if Schumann's youthful heart was his own. Anyone encountering him here for the first time might find it hard to believe that in former days his playing was often criticised as too objective, too impersonal. Rarely has playing of such contrasts been heard in the Davidsbündlertänze, mixed in with a strong note of petulance, even anger (Schumann's response to rejection by Clara's unyielding father).

Schumann devotees will immediately recognise the piece that follows as part of the work that eventually emerged in the early 1850s as his Piano Sonata No 3 in F minor. Predating the Davidsbündlertänze by a year, it grew from even darker days of despair during enforced separation from his beloved, despair which explodes in a tumult of notes that in incompetent hands can sound perfunctorily repetitive. But even in the lengthy prestissimo possible finale, Pollini, with his transcendental agility and magical transparency of texture, holds you spellbound to the very end. Never is there a moment's doubt that so very much in the work stems from Clara's falling F minor motto (always as symbolic as a ring for both young lovers) which generated the here so deeply laden variations of the central Andantino. The recording quality is excellent.

Davidsbündlertänze, Op 6. Papillons, Op 2. Carnaval, Op 9. Etudes symphoniques, Op 13. Kinderszenen, Op 15. Kreisleriana, Op 16. Fantasie in C, Op 17. Arabeske in C, Op 18. Humoreske in B flat, Op 20. Piano Sonata No 2 in G minor, Op 22. Vier Nachtstücke, Op 23. Drei Romanzen, Op 28. Waldszenen, Op 82. Bunte Blätter, Op 99 – No 9, Novelette
Wilhelm Kempff pf
DG Collectors Edition ④ 471 312-2GB4 Ⓜ
(297 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1967-75 ●●

Davidsbündlertänze, Papillons and Carnaval also available on DG Eloquence 469 765-2 Ⓑ

Kinderszenen, Drei Romanzen, Waldszenen and Papillons also available on DG Eloquence
469 645-2 Ⓑ

A collection which will give great pleasure. Sample it anywhere and there can be no mistaking who this is – you know great pianists by their sound. Kempff was one of the most distinguished German pianists of the last century, blossoming through two decades in the Austro-German repertory after the death of Schnabel and Edwin Fischer, but he never carried the flame quite as they did. Performing bravura pieces didn't interest him, so the Toccata, the Concert-Studies after Paganini, Op 10, and the Abegg Variations are not here. Nevertheless it's a good selection, lacking only the Fantasy Pieces, Op 12, to give a rounded picture of the phenomenal explosion of Schumann's creativity for the piano that took place between the age of 20 and 29.

Kempff's special quality seems to be a songfulness and cantabile style which is in danger of becoming a forgotten art nowadays. Listening to him in Schumann it is as if a wind is blowing through, rising and falling, sweeping incident along and carrying everything forward: song, dance, stories, poems, moods, portraits, parades of characters, visions of landscape, recollections. Few players have matched his infallible touch with the way the music holds together.

As pianism his Carnaval may not leave you astonished, but it is immaculately characterised: festive, buoyant, irresistible in movement, the comings and goings of the masked personages and the guest appearances of 'Chopin' and 'Paganini' all spot on. Of course there's no one right way to play this masterpiece, but his is vivid. Carnaval, Papillons and the Davidsbündlertänze are together on this first CD and it makes a great disc.

When he made the earliest of these recordings he was already 71; the latest are from his 78th year. In the later ones you notice more weight on the keys and perhaps a reduced inclination to be volatile; but he has kept his technique in good trim and continues to sound at ease with the instrument. The difficult numbers in the Davidsbündlertänze are hard for every pianist, but Kempff doesn't see them as virtuoso challenges to be confronted and dispatched. Always the music is paramount, and beautiful sound, and a control of voices under the fingers that seem to be following Schumann instinctively in the exploration of the piano's potential. The opening of Kreisleriana hangs fire as if he were feeling his way into it but the rest is magnificent and thrillingly projected, in a huge picture.

When at his best you have the impression his insights are not only musical but brought to bear on every area of Schumann's imagination. All the big works have this definition and can be counted among the best on record. The Fantasy comes high on the list, perhaps top, as does the undervalued Humoreske. He is a guide to Schumann you should not be without, authoritative and companionable, balanced and most human.

Additional recommendations

Davidsbündlertänze, Op 6
Coupling: Fantasiestücke, Op 12 Frith pf
Naxos 8 550493 (63 minutes: DDD:
recorded 1991) Ⓢ

Frith summons his excellent technique here for some exciting pianism. Recommended not just for the budget-conscious but for those who enjoy youthful pianistic exuberance.

Bunte Blätter, Op 99
Couplings: Mussorgsky Pictures at an Exhibition
Debussy Images – Cloches à travers les feuilles
Richter pf
BBC Legends/IMG Artists mono BBCL4103-2 Ⓕ
(72 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1968

Richter made a speciality of Bunte Blätter and his performance is a consummate reflection of its mood-swings: vivid yet never intrusive. Every repeat is lovingly observed, and his sympathy for Schumann declared in every bar. The Mussorgsky is extremely fine, too, the entire performance permeated with an unusual degree of inwardness.

Fantasie in C, Op 17

Fantasie in C, Op 17. Faschingsschwank aus
Wien, Op 26. Papillons, Op 2
Sviatoslav Richter pf 🏵
EMI Encore 575233-2 (67 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1961-62 ●●●

There can surely be no doubt as to Richter's current status as elder statesman of the piano world. And collectors now have a bewildering array of his recent, mainly live performances and reissues to choose from. Richter's Schumann is unequalled. The Fantasia is arguably Schumann's keyboard masterpiece. And Richter plays it better than other pianists. Nobody can phrase as beautifully as he can, or produce those marvellously soft accompaniments beneath quietly singing tunes or toss off the middle movement with such speed and brilliance. There is astonishing poetry in his playing. It almost amounts to a rediscovery of the work.

And the same could be said of Faschingsschwank aus Wien and Papillons. (The way he plays the main theme of the latter should make you buy this disc if nothing else does – he seems to add stature to the work.) His assets in all of these works are, first, an unusually musical sense of phrasing. Secondly, he can reduce an accompaniment to a mere murmur without any loss of evenness so that a tune above it can sing even when it is soft. Thirdly, he uses a great deal of rubato, but always with impeccable taste; his rubato in slow passages has a mesmeric quality only partly due to the fact that he usually plays such passages much slower than other pianists. Fourthly, he has faultless technique. His superiority is apparent throughout. The recording is magnificent for its date. Classic performances which no pianophile should be without.

Fantasie in C, Op 17
Piano Sonata No 1, Op 11
Maurizio Pollini pf Ⓕ
DG 423 134-2GH (63 minutes: ADD) ●●

These works grew from Schumann's love and longing for his future wife Clara. Pollini's performances are superb, not least because they are so truthful to the letter of the score. By eschewing all unspecified rubato in the Fantasie, he reminds us that the young Schumann never wrote a more finely proportioned large-scale work; this feeling for structure, coupled with exceptional emotional intensity, confirms it as one of the greatest love-poems ever written for the piano. His richly characterised account of the Sonata is refreshingly unmannered. Certainly the familiar charges of protracted patterning in the faster flanking movements are at once dispelled by his rhythmic élan, his crystalline texture and his ear for colour. The CD transfer is most successful.

Fantasie in C, Op 17. Piano Sonata No 1, Op 11
Leif Ove Andsnes pf
EMI 556414-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

Leif Ove Andsnes never lets us forget that Schumann was a mere 25 when writing his First Piano Sonata. His recording, with its youthful lightness of heart, is most refreshing. With fastish tempo and delectably light, scintillating fingerwork he dances through the first movement's sometimes all-too-persistent fandango rhythm, and though adopting an unspecified slower tempo for the smoother second subject maintains an unbroken continuity of flow from first note to last. The Aria sings with a spring-like wonderment and grace. And even if the tongue-in-cheek pomposity at the start of the 'Intermezzo' section is not fully relished, his lightness and clarity of texture and his rhythmic buoyancy win the day in the Scherzo, and yet again in the finale, which in heavier hands can so easily sound protracted.

The Fantasie comes across with arrestingly impulsive immediacy. Andsnes's extreme contrasts of urgency and poetic musing in the first movement might be thought over-episodic, but the requested fantasy and passion are all there. The central movement is brilliantly excitable and his acute response to every passing innuendo makes the finale a truly moving human confession – albeit in a different world from Pollini's trance-like, superhuman inner calm. Apart from brief loss of refinement in the Fantasie's moments of heightened fervour, the tone-quality of the recording matches the distinction of the playing.

Schumann Fantasie in C. March in G minor, Op 76 No 2. Concert Studies on Caprices by Paganini, Op 10 – No 4 in C minor; No 5 in B minor; No 6 in E minor. Novellette in F, Op 21 No 1. Blumenstück in D flat, Op 19. Vier Nachtstücke, Op 23 Brahms Piano Sonatas – No 1 in C, Op 1; No 2 in F sharp minor, Op 2. Variations on a Theme by Paganini, Op 35. Capriccio in C, Op 76 No 8. Intermezzo in E minor, Op 116 No 5. Ballade in G minor, Op 118 No 3. Rhapsody in E flat, Op 119 No 4
Sviatoslav Richter pf Ⓕ
Philips ③ 438 477-2PH3 (184 minutes: DDD) ●●

Variable reproduction, coupled with this highly-strung artist's own unpredictability, inevitably results in ups and downs. But for the one-and-a-half discs of Schumann alone, this album can be cherished as a collector's piece. There is surely no one more finely attuned to Schumann's secret inner world. The miniatures give particular pleasure and how keenly he responds to that element of 'strangeness blended with the beautiful' (as romanticism was once defined) in the four Nachtstücke written with a supernatural premonition of his brother's death. All technical challenges are dissolved into the purest poetry in the three all-too-rarely heard Concert Studies on Caprices by Paganini and in the major work, the great Op 17 Fantasie, his own emotional warmth is fortunately matched by some of the ripest sonority that we're given in this album. It's a performance which obviously comes from the deepest places of his heart.

There are memorable things too in the two early Brahms sonatas, not least the strain of nostalgic lyricism so beautifully drawn from the first movement of No 1 in C major. The two sets of Paganini Variations in their turn bring bewitchingly light and delicate prestidigitation and seductively sung melody. But in burlier bravura, and notably in both excitable homecomings, there are some gaucheries and inaccuracies that would certainly not have got through in a studio recording. Of the miniatures, the intimate, elusive E minor Intermezzo is exquisitely phrased and shaded.

Kreisleriana, Op 16

Kreisleriana, Op 16. Humoreske in B flat, Op 20
Kinderszenen, Op 15.
Radu Lupu pf
Decca 440 496-2DH (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●●

As piano playing this disc has an aristocratic distinction reminiscent of Lipatti. As music-making it is underpinned by unselfconscious intuition, making you feel you are discovering the truth of the matter for the first time. It is difficult to recall a more revealing performance of Schumann's Humoreske. Lupu captures all the unpredictability of its swift-changing moods while at the same time imparting a sense of inevitability to the sequence as a whole. Florestan's caprice is as piquant as Eusebius's tenderness is melting. Yet there is an underlying unity in the diversity from Lupu, enhanced by most beautifully timed and shaded 'links'.

Goodness knows how long this work has been in his repertory. But here it emerges with the keen edge of new love. Next, Kinderszenen: simplicity is its keynote. To begin with (as notably in the opening 'Von fremden Ländern und Menschen') you wonder if, in rejection of sentimentality, he might not be allowing himself enough time for wide-eyed wonderment. But you are soon won over by his limpid tonal palette and the sheer purity of his phrasing. Each piece tells its own magical little tale without the slightest trace of special pleading. Such pristine grace will never pall, however often heard. Kreisleriana in its turn offers rich contrasts of desperation, dedication and Hoffmannesque drollery. And except, perhaps, in the impetuous No 7 (taken dangerously fast), it brings further reminders that we are in the presence of a master pianist – among so much else able to rejoice in this work's endless dialogues between left hand and right with his opulent bass and gleaming treble. Reproduction is totally faithful throughout.

Kreisleriana, Op 16. Allegro in B minor, Op 8. Gesänge der Frühe, Op 133.
Maurizio Pollini pf
DG 471 370-2GH (48 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●●

There's no one to touch Pollini these days in Schumann. Formerly perhaps only Richter would have equalled him, and once or twice one is reminded of him here – not because of a similarity of character but rather because of that rare territory you glimpse where only the greatest of virtuosos and musical minds meet. Pollini may seem plain or his stance over-objective to some, but this reviewer would defend him to the death. You could not call him cold. He is impassioned, poetic, sometimes almost violent (a quality apt to parts of Kreisleriana) yet always airborne, and everything has been lived through. Above all he gives you Schumann in wonderful sound and with electrifying rhythmic grip.

This is a Kreisleriana to put with the best ever: rounded out to the extremes of its expression and engaged with the core of the music, not with ideas about the music.

And what an enterprising choice of items to complement this masterpiece. The Allegro in B minor of 1831 comes from the source of free, imaginative sonata-type first movements quarried around the time when Schumann projected more big sonatas than he eventually achieved. It is rarely played, and how good to have this powerful advocate for it.

The five Gesänge der Frühe ('Dawn Songs') are from the other end of his career (1853), when his final mental derangement was only months away; they are full in sound, complicated and sometimes overwritten. But the first, in particular, is wondrously strange, and all are to be enjoyed here as perhaps never before.

Wonderful sound, and you can tell it is – it draws you in – but sadly, not wonderful recorded sound. Though in itself balanced and at a suitable distance, it's a shade too open and diffuse. Sample the beginning of Kreisleriana to see if you agree, and then go on and enjoy.

Kreisleriana, Op 16. Kinderszenen, Op 15
Martha Argerich pf
DG 410 653-2GH (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1984 ●

'A positively wild love is in some of the movements' so Schumann wrote to Kreisleriana's only begetter, Clara Wieck. Martha Argerich's pianistically brilliant, highly charged recording makes that fact very clear. She is also at pains to emphasise the vein of caprice, even eccentricity, stemming from ETA Hoffmann, whose Kapellmeister Kreisler gave Schumann his title. Also, she is deeply appreciative of the searching introspective intensity of the slow numbers.

There's an enormous amount to admire and enjoy from this uncommonly individual artist, who always makes you listen to everything with new ears. Argerich's fast tempo is very fast – provocatively so in No 1 (especially the central episode in the major) and dangerously so in No 7 (where the fugal episode scarcely makes sense because it is so gabbled). As for the Hoffmannesque caprice, her No 8 is wholly winning. In the slow numbers the intensity of her involvement now and again finds outlet in impulsive little surges, alike of pace and dynamics, that can only be described as echt Argerich.

Argerich's Kinderszenen is a performance all children will love because of the vividness of the story-telling – not least in the whirlwind 'Catch me if you can', the dare-devil 'Knight of the Hobby-Horse', the eerie 'Frightening' and the deep drowsiness of 'Child falling asleep'. Adults, on the other hand, might find the reading over impressionable. Some may certainly prefer a rubato that draws less attention to itself.

Additional recommendation
Kreisleriana, Op 16
Kissin pf
Couplings: Bach/Busoni Chaconne. Beethoven Rondo, Op 51 No2 and Rondo capriccio, Op 129
RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 68911-2
(63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

The fantastic side of Kreisleriana is not always in focus here. That said, this is still a very enjoyable performance.

Novelletten, Op 21

Allegro in B minor, Op 8. Novelletten, Op 21. Drei Fantasiestücke, Op 111. Gesänge der Frühe, Op 133
Ronald Brautigam pf
Olympia OCD436 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

The note reminds us that even the eight Novelletten chosen as the centrepiece here are not often heard in sequence as a set. Brautigam prefaces them with the early (1831-32) B minor Allegro originally intended as the first movement of a sonata. They are followed by the last two suites Schumann ever wrote for the piano – the Gesänge der Frühe only a year before his final breakdown. Most enjoyable is Brautigam's vitality – of imagination no less than of fingers. You are immediately gripped by his plunge into the Op 8 Allegro, with its arresting octave 'motto'. His mercurial fancy and ear for hidden melodic strands in the ensuing stream makes nonsense of hasty dismissal of this work as mere old-style virtuoso note-spinning. Moreover, such is his unflagging impulse in the eight Novelletten that you are never tempted to accuse Schumann of over-repetitively patterned figuration. Potently characterised and contrasted as are the three Fantasiestücke, Op 111 of 1851, Brautigam leaves no doubt as to their unity as a set – as he does again in the more elusive spiritual world of the five Gesänge der Frühe. The bright, clear tonal reproduction is acceptable enough.

Piano Sonatas

Piano Sonatas – No 1 in F sharp minor, Op 11; No 3 in F minor, Op 14
Bernd Glemser pf ❀
Naxos 8 554275 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded c2002 ●●

Bernd Glemser's playing here is an exceptionally arresting experience in its graphic immediacy and freshness. With his prodigious technique, underpinned by exuberant imaginative vitality, it was no surprise to learn that in a wide-ranging repertory, he feels particularly drawn to the later Romantic virtuoso school. Some listeners might well think his approach to Schumann's F sharp minor Sonata (written at the age of 25) too overtly Lisztian in expression to be truly stylish. Sure, the more classically disciplined Clara, for example, would never have allowed herself such extreme changes of tempo in contrasting Florestan's turbulence with Eusebius's idyllic lyricism in the two spacious outer movements. Yet with his innate musicality Glemser somehow allows the argument to cohere. His challenging rhythm in the Scherzo (and the richly savoured burlesque of its trio), like the senza passione ma espressivo of the slow movement's intimate song, are all finely judged.

The F minor Sonata comes in Schumann's 1853 revision, restoring the second of the two Scherzos omitted when the work was first published 17 years earlier, as a three-movement Concert sans orchestre.

With Naxos's tonal reproduction at its best, this disc comes recommended as a true 'super-bargain' not to be missed – despite the catalogue's formidable list of rivals.

Duets

Duets – Ländliches Lied, Op 29 No 1[bc]. Die Lotusblume, Op 33 No 3[bc]. Vier Duette, Op 34[ac]. Gedichte aus 'Liebesfrühling', Op 37[ac] – No 7, Schön ist das Fest des Lenzes; No 12, So wahr die Sonne scheinet. Drei Lieder, Op 43[bc]. Spanisches Liederspiel, Op 74 – No 2, Intermezzo[bc]; No 3, Liebesgram[bc]; In der Nacht[ac]. Vier Duette, Op 78[ac]. Lieder-Album für die Jugend, Op 79[bc] – No 10, Das Käuzlein; No 16, Weihnachtslied; No 19, Frühlings Ankunft; No 21, Kinderwacht. Minnespiel, Op 101[ac] – No 3, Ich bin dein Baum; No 7, Die tausend Grüsse. Spanische Liebeslieder, Op 138[bc] – No 4, Bedeckt mich mit Blumen; No 9, Blaue Augen hat das Mädchen. Sommerruh[bc]
[a]Julia Varady sop [b]Peter Schreier ten [c]Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Christoph Eschenbach pf
DG Galleria 457 915-2GGA (61 minutes: ADD). Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1977 ●●

Although Schumann's duets were primarily intended for home performance around the piano, they benefit enormously from readings by such fine artists as the three taking part in this recital – recorded in 1977, but sounding as if committed to disc yesterday, so excellent is the sound, so spontaneous the singing. Fischer-Dieskau claims the lion's share of the programme, duetting in turn with his wife Varady and with Schreier. Just occasionally, as in the delightful serenade, 'Unterm Fenster' from the Op 34 Duets, one wishes he had given place to his tenor colleague, who is in most ingratiating, mellifluous voice. The young Varady, with her vibrant tone and intense manner, is just as winning as her partners, nowhere more so than for 'In der Nacht', a setting that goes deeper than any of the other duets. Over a sinuous, chromatic obbligato on the piano, Schumann weaves a long, elegiac line for the voices. Wolf also set this text memorably and it's interesting to hear what Schumann does with another poem, Bedeckt mich mit Blumen, set so unforgettably by Wolf: the writing here has little of Wolf's intensity but has its own validity when sung with such romantic passion by the two men. That's followed by the pair hugely enjoying themselves in the paean to the beloved, 'Blaue Augen hat das Mädchen'. Finally there's a fascinating alternative version for two voices of the Heine poem Die Lotusblume, one of the composer's most popular pieces in his solo setting. Eschenbach's vivid, positive playing is another notable asset of this highly recommendable issue.

Frauenliebe und -leben, Op 42

Frauenliebe und -leben, Op 42. Gesänge, Op 31 – No 1, Die Löwenbraut; No 2, Die Kartenlegerin. Gedichte, Op 35 – No 1, Lust der Sturmnacht; No 8, Stille Liebe. Rose, Meer und Sonne, Op 37 No 9. Fünf Lieder, Op 40. Der Schatzgräber, Op 45 No 1. Volksliedchen, Op 51 No 2. Die Soldatenbraut, Op 64 No 1. Lieder-Album für die Jugend, Op 79 – No 5, Vom Schlaraffenland; No 22, Des Sennen Abscheid; No 26, Schneeglöcken. Mein schöner Stern!, Op 101 No 4. Abendlied, Op 107 No 6. Die Meerfee, Op 125 No 1. Dein Angesicht, Op 127 No 2
Anne Sofie von Otter mez Bengt Forsberg pf
DG 445 881-2GH (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993 ●

This is one of those records where the promise of something exceptional in the first phrases is fully borne out by all that follows. The Frauenliebe cycle is sung by a character, as vividly defined as any Fiordiligi, Senta or Mimì in opera. Von Otter is one of those rare artists who can adapt the voice and yet be true to its natural identity. In these songs of Schumann (not only in the Frauenliebe) she seems, unselfconsciously, to find a new voice-personality for each and still to confine herself to what lies naturally within her scope, forcing nothing and falsifying nothing. The woman of the 'life and love' starts out as a girl. 'Seit ich ihn gesehen' has a shy, private rapture which then grows bold for 'Er, der Herrlichste von allen', frank in its enthusiasm, radiant as the voice rises to its highest notes. 'Ich kann's nicht fassen, nicht glauben' is fully outgoing, an expression of utter commitment, and the smile is always in the voice. The engagement-ring induces maturity, the girl now a woman. The wedding- day preparations, confiding of motherhood, and then the emptiness of life at the husband's death: all are caught as in reality and in character. It is a completely absorbed and absorbing performance.

The generous selection of songs which follows works its spell partly by contrasts. In these and in all else von Otter lights upon the right tone, and the right shades of that tone. The programme is well planned, too, rounded off with 'Rose, Meer und Sonne', sketching the melodies of Frauenliebe und -leben with which the recital began. Occasionally the piano is recorded too heavily or too prominently for the voice. But generally the sympathy of singer and pianist are all that could be desired – as is the recital in toto. This will be a much-prized addition to your shelves.

Frauenliebe und -leben, Op 42. Sieben Lieder, Op 104. Gedichte der Königen Maria Stuart, Op 135. Lieder und Gesänge – I, Op 27: No 1, Sag an, o lieber Vogel; No 4, Jasminenstrauch; III, Op 77: No 3, Geisternähe; No 4, Stiller Vorwurf; IV, Op 96: No 4, Gesungen!; No 5, Himmel und Erde. Romanzen und Balladen – III, Op 53: No 1, Blondels Lied; No 2, Loreley; IV, Op 64: No 1, Die Soldatenbraut. Die Kartenlegerin, Op 31 No 2

Juliane Banse sop Graham Johnson pf

Hyperion CDJ33103 (74 minutes: DDD) Texts and translations included. Includes readings of 'Traum der eignen Tage' and 'Nachschrift'. Ⓕ
Recorded 1997/8 ●

This offering places Banse and Johnson among the most thoughtful and convincing of Schumann interpreters in the history of recording the composer's Lieder. From start to finish, in well-loved pieces and in others that will be new discoveries to many, the pair at once work in close concord and get to the heart of Schumann's very particular genius. The pair wholly dispel the oft-repeated view that Schumann's later songs are by and large failures: it is simply that the older man wrote differently from his younger, Romantically exuberant self. Thus the 1852 settings of Mary Stuart unerringly capture the soul of the troubled Queen's predicaments through the most concise means. Not a florid or untoward gesture is allowed to destroy the mood of sustained concentration and intimate musings. Banse brings to the songs just the right sense of a person sharing her innermost thoughts with us, the mezzo-like warmth of her lower voice gainfully employed, Johnson's piano communing in consort with the voice.

Schumann showed himself equally in sympathy with the poems of Elisabeth Kulmann (Op 104), a susceptible girl who died at the age of 17, his writing here simple and apparently artless. The composer, amazingly, thinks himself into the thoughts of the imaginative, fanciful young poetess; so does his interpreter, Banse, here using a lighter, more palpitating tone.

The faultless recording completes one's pleasure in a very special issue.

Frauenliebe und -leben, Op 42. Liederkreis, Op 39

Soile Isokoski sop Marita Viitasalo pf

Finlandia 0630-10924-2 (49 minutes: DDD). Texts Ⓕ and translations included. Recorded 1993-95 ●

This interpretation from this young Finnish soprano can stand comparison with the best. In her wonderfully straightforward and musical performance, she marries a sincere spontaneity with a warming sense of line and phrase, a style well learnt yet put to her own, positive purpose. Before you is the rapturous bride-to-be in all her moods, then the young woman struck almost dumb by unexpected grief. Nothing in her portrayal is forced or in the least contrived yet everything, felt from the heart, goes to it. And the voice itself? Well, reminders of Flagstad's richness, Ameling's naturalness and Price's precision are here to be heard and enjoyed. She is just as imaginative in Op 39 as in Op 42, giving a very central, unaffected account of the Liederkreis encompassing all its varied moods and one that makes its points unobtrusively and, as with Op 42, with the emphasis on long-breathed phrasing and rock-steady tone. The partnership with Viitasalo is obviously a fruitful one. The two artists think and 'breathe' alike though in Op 42 he is just occasionally too prominent, at least as recorded.

Frauenliebe und -leben, Op 42. Myrthen, Op 25 – No 3, Der Nussbaum; No 7, Die Lotosblume. Die Kartenlegerin, Op 31 No 2. Ständchen, Op 36 No 2. Das verlassne Mägdlein, Op 64 No 2. Aufträge, Op 77 No 5. Lieder-album für die Jugend, Op 79 – No 13, Der Sandmann; No 29, Mignon. Lieder, Op 90. Nachtlied, Op 96 No 1

Bernarda Fink mez Roger Vignoles pf

Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1753 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included ●

Bernarda Fink proves conclusively here that she can be just as compelling in German song as she is in Baroque works. For a start few accounts of any of these pieces have been quite so beautifully and effortlessly sung. Not a note in this recital is ugly or mishandled; everything is projected on a stream of perfectly produced, mellow mezzo tone. That is in itself almost enough to recommend the disc. But Fink has so much more to offer. Her interpretation of the oft-recorded Frauenliebe cycle is not one with the kind of overwhelming emotional tug evinced by Baker and von Otter, yet in her slightly more reticent way Fink conveys just as much feeling as her rivals. Her sweet, reflective, slightly vibrant tone very much calls to mind Seefried's and Isokoski's equally artless style among soprano versions. With Roger Vignoles as a sympathetic and positive partner, Fink's version deserves to be equated with those of her distinguished predecessors. There is no anti-climax in the other performances. The very familiar 'Nussbaum' and 'Aufträge' are as delightfully eager and spontaneous as they ought to be. Those ineffably Schumannesque pieces, 'Die Lotosblume' and, in the Op 90 settings of Lenau, 'Meine Rose', receive treatment, in timbre and line and verbal assurance that would be hard to better.

The recording has the singer blessedly forward so one catches the true flavour of her voice and words. A joy from start to finish.

Liederkreis, Op 39 / Dichterliebe, Op 48

Dichterliebe, Op 48. Liederkreis, Op 39
Werner Güra ten Jan Schultsz pf
Harmonia Mundi HMC901766 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002 ●●

Güra delivers Dichterliebe with impeccable line and tone and in a style following the best traditions of German tenors in the work. Only in 'Ich will meine Seele tauchen' does he stray from grace, choosing an oddly dragging tempo, slower than any other singers in this song. Although Bostridge's singing for EMI (with Julius Drake at the piano) is slightly softer-grained, he opts for a more dramatic approach than Güra, distinctly underlining certain words, even syllables to press home the import of Heine's and Schumann's inspiration.

On repeated hearing you may find this a shade mannered. You can hear the contrast most markedly in 'Ich hab' im Traum geweinet'. Güra sings this in a pure dreamy legato as in a trance; Bostridge often breaks the shape of a phrase in order to give it a more histrionic edge. His very personal approach is underlined by a more intimate recording than Güra receives. Both pianists seem wholly in consort with their respective singer.

Bostridge adds to his disc more Heine, Op 24, and separate songs to texts by the same poet, a consistent policy, and it also has more music over all; but Güra's choice of Op 39 is entirely justified by his quite beautiful rendering of this haunting work. His classically wrought, plangent-voiced reading goes, without too much interpretative intervention, to the heart of Eichendorff, and to Schumann's imaginative response to the poems. Listen to such masterpieces as 'Die Stille', 'Mondnacht' (a perfect legato here again) and 'Wehmut' and you'll hear him at his most eloquent, pianist Jan Schultsz adding his own insights to the tenor's reading. This simpler, unsophisticated version goes to the heart of the matter, and deserves a place among the elite. In any case it is the only one by a tenor recommendable at present.

Awards 1998

Liederkreis, Op 24. Dichterliebe, Op 48. Belsatzar, Op 57. Abends am Strand, Op 45 No 3. Die beiden Grenadiere, Op 49 No 1. Lieder und Gesänge, Op 127 – No 2, Dein Angesicht; No 3, Es leuchtet meine Liebe. Vier Gesänge, Op 142 – No 2, Lehn deine Wang; No 4, Mein Wagen rollet langsam
Ian Bostridge ten Julius Drake pf
EMI 556575-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●●●

Bostridge makes one think anew about the music in hand, interpreting all these songs as much through the mind of the poet as that of the composer and, being youthful himself, getting inside the head of the vulnerable poet in his many moods. That, quite apart from his obvious gifts as a singer and musician, is what raises Bostridge above most of his contemporaries who so often fail to live the words they are singing. Every one of the magnificent Op 24 songs has some moment of illumination, whether it's the terror conveyed so immediately – and immediacy of reaction is of the essence allround here – in 'Schöne Wiege', the breathtaking beauty and sorrow of 'Anfang wollt ich' or the breadth and intensity of 'Mit Myrten und Rosen'. In between the two cycles comes a group of the 1840 Leipzig settings that adumbrates every aspect of Bostridge's – and his equally perceptive partner's – attributes.

The vivid word-painting in Belsatzar brings the Old Testament scene arrestingly before us. Perhaps best of all is the unjustly neglected Es leuchtet meine Liebe, a melodrama here perfectly enacted by both performers. Mein Wagen rollet langsam forms a perfect introduction, in its lyrical freedom, to Dichterliebe, an interpretation to rank with the best available in terms of the sheer beauty of the singing and acute response to its sustained inspiration. Listen to the wonder brought to the discovery of the flowers and angels in 'Im Rhein', the contained anger of 'Ich grolle nicht', the sense of bereavement in 'Hör ist das Liedchen' and you'll judge this is an interpretation of profundity and emotional identification, the whole cycle crowned by the sensitivity of Drake's playing of the summarising postlude. To complete one's pleasure EMI has provided an exemplary and forward recording balance.

Liederkreis, Op. 24. Dichterliebe, Op. 48. Gesange, Op. 142 – Lehn deine Wang; Mein Wagen rollet langsam. Myrthen, Op. 25 – Die Lotosblume; Was will die einsame Tranen?; Du bist wie eine Blume. Der arme Peter, Op. 53 No. 3. Tragodie, Op. 64 No. 3.
Wolfgang Holzmair bar Imogen Cooper pf

Philips 446 086-2PH (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●●

Here we have an ideal partnership in a thoughtfully conceived programme perfectly suited to its extraordinary talents. Holzmair's plangent, tenorish, gently vibrating voice, just right for Schumann, is beautifully supported and encouraged by Cooper's discerning, subtly arched playing, both wholly responsive to the love and longing expressed in Heine's wonderful poetry. The interpretations abound in verbal and musical perceptions yet nothing is ever in the least exaggerated. From the very first notes of the very first song, 'Mein Wagen rollet langsam', you know you are in for a special experience as you sense the rapport between the two artists, notice the flow and freedom of Cooper's playing, the feeling for the text in Holzmair's singing. Even when a word is emphasised, as at 'verdorben' at the end of 'Tragodie II' it is not done simply for effect, but because the underlining is wholly appropriate. In 'Die Lotusblume', the song's perfection untouched by familiarity, the plaintive quality in Holzmair's singing is wonderfully seconded by Cooper's soft-grained piano.

In Op 24, revelations come apace. Witness the lovely playing in the postlude to the third song, the unanimity of thought in the fourth, the dramatic impetus of the sixth, the sense of finality in the last. Dichterliebe is if anything even more satisfying, tempos, phrasing, inner feeling all confidently welded into a convincing whole, so much so that to single out any song, any detail would be out of place. Just listen – and be moved and delighted by a superb interpretation. To complete one's pleasure, the recording, made in the Esterhaza Palace at Eisenstadt, is faultlessly balanced, voice and instrument forward yet never obtrusively so. This is a 'must' for all Lieder enthusiasts. Those who aren't in that category ought to be converted if they try this disc.

Liederkreis, Op 24. Dichterliebe, Op 48
Matthias Goerne bar Vladimir Ashkenazy pf
Decca 458 265-2DH (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●●

Matthias Goerne is with little doubt the most probing male Lieder singer to emerge from Germany in recent years, an artist of extraordinary magnetism both in his live performances and on disc. With his dark, velvet timbre, intense legato line and searching response to the fluctuating shades of Heine's bittersweet verses, Goerne gives mesmeric readings of both Dichterliebe and the Op 24 Liederkreis. Partly because of the colour of his voice, partly because of some unusually broad tempos, both cycles emerge as more sombre and haunted than in the comparably fine recordings by Wolfgang Holzmair and Ian Bostridge. The fourth song of the Liederkreis, 'Lieb Liebchen', seems suffused with genuine death-weariness – barely a hint here of wryness or irony. In the following 'Schöne Wiege meiner Leiden', Goerne captures the feverishness of Heine's original which Schumann's lulling, nostalgic melody tends to mitigate; later in the song the lover's tottering reason and death-longing are chillingly realised.

In the first two songs of Dichterliebe Goerne underlines the sense of sorrow and regret with which Schumann shadows Heine's limpid love lyrics. Throughout, Ashkenazy is a positive, sympathetic partner, though here and there his sharply etched playing can be overassertive. If some may understandably prefer a higher, lighter voice in these cycles, Goerne is the equal of both Holzmair and Bostridge in interpretative insight and tonal beauty, and ventures a more daring range of expression than either.

Dichterliebe, Op 48. Die Lotosblume, Op 25 No 7. Die Minnesänger, Op 33 No 2. Romanzen und Balladen – II, Op 49: No 1, Die beiden Grenadiere; III, Op 53: No 3, Der arme Peter; IV, Op 64: No 3, Tragödie. Belsatzar, Op 57. Lieder und Gesänge – Op 127: No 2, Dein Angesicht; No 3, Es leuchtet meine Liebe. Gesänge, Op 142 – No 2, Lehn deine Wang; No 4, Mein Wagen rollet langsam C Schumann Lieder, Op 13 – No 1, Ich stand in dunklen Träumen; No 2, Sie liebten sich beide. Loreley. Volkslied
Christopher Maltman bar Graham Johnson pf
Hyperion CDJ33105 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000 ●●

With this superbly executed recital, Maltman leaps in a single bound into the front rank of Lieder interpreters today. Seemingly inspired by the wonderful programme assigned him by Johnson, he executes it with bitingly intense tone and an innate feeling for the German language, his high baritone easily encompassing every test placed on it by the lengthy programme. There are so many deeply satisfying performances here of mostly familiar songs that it is difficult to know which to alight on for special praise, but the last two groups – the sad, frightening tale of the near-deranged Peter and the great Dichterliebe cycle – undoubtedly and rightly form the climax of the recital.

Maltman's and Johnson's account of the cycle reminds one of the underrated version made long ago by Waechter and Brendel (Decca – nla): it has the same immediacy, the same perceptions, with the singer's voice on each occasion being of the ideal weight and tessitura, and in its absolute prime. All the inner melancholy of words and notes, all their variety of texture are adumbrated. And here we have the added advantage of Johnson's inspired exegesis of the work in his accompanying notes.

Johnson also points out the foretaste of Mahler in the third of the Peter songs, a piece Maltman sings with just the right touch of vulnerability. He is just as sensitive in such well-known pieces as Die Lotusblume and Dein Angesicht, and brings tremendous impulse of drama to the familiar Die beiden Grenadiere, here sounding new-minted. The songs by Clara are a pleasing bonus, but the difference between talent and genius is apparent in comparing her setting of 'Es fiel ein Reif' (from Heine's Volkslied) with Schumann's. A perfectly balanced recording adds to one's pleasure in listening to this generously filled CD, which is up to the high standard of this series to date.

Liederkreis, Op 24. Myrthen, Op 25 – No 7, Die Lotosblume; No 21, Was will die einsame Träne?; No 24, Du bist wie eine Blume. Romanzen und Balladen – Op 45: No 3, Abends am Strand; Op 49: No 1, Die beiden Grenadiere; No 2, Die feindlichen Brüder; Op 53: No 3, Der arme Peter; Op 64: No 3, Tragödie. Belsatzar, Op 57. Lieder und Gesänge, Op 127 – No 2, Dein Angesicht; No 3, Es leuchtet meine Liebe. Gesänge, Op 142 – No 2, Lehn deine Wang; No 4, Mein Wagen rollet langsam

Stephan Genz bar Christoph Genz ten

Claar ter Horst pf

Claves CD50-9708 (59 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996-97 Ⓕ ●

This is a recital of promise and fulfilment. Stephan Genz's voice and style are as wide-ranging as his mode of expression. He lives every moment of Op 24, entering into all aspects of Schumann's settings and Heine's originals yet never overstepping the mark in his verbal painting. The other Heine settings receive no less than their due. The sensuous and plaintive qualities in Genz's tone are well suited to the three Heine poems in Myrthen. In contrast he rises to the histrionic challenges of Die beiden Grenadiere, Belsatzar and the rarely encountered Die feindlichen Brüder, performances that are felt as immediately as if at the moment of composition. In Abends am Strand the voice follows to the full the song's romantic import. In the third song of Op 64, Tragödie, the baritone is joined by his talented tenor brother: their voices naturally blend well. Finally, Genz is inspired by that amazingly original song, Mein Wagen rollet langsam, to give of his absolute best. Here, as throughout, Claar ter Horst matches the perceptions of her partner, and both are caught in an amenable acoustic.

Lieder Recitals

Olaf Bär

Drei Gedichte, Op 30. Sechs Gedichte, Op 36. Fünf Lieder, Op 40. Romanzen und Balladen, Opp 45, 49 and 53. Belsatzar, Op 57. Der Handschuh, Op 87

Olaf Bär bar Helmut Deutsch pf

EMI 556199-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996

'Die beiden Grenadiere' apart, Schumann's ballads crop up too rarely in recital and on disc. All the more welcome, then, are Olaf Bär's bold and perceptive readings of some of the finest of them. In Op 45 he graphically realises the grand guignol of 'Der Schatzgräber' ('The treasure-seeker'), with Helmut Deutsch relishing the onomatopoeic keyboard part. Equally compelling is the neglected chivalric ballad, Der Handschuh ('The glove'): making vivid use, as ever, of his consonants, Bär slyly mocks the pomposity of the royal retinue in the opening recitative, savours Schumann's lion and tiger imitations (gleefully abetted by Deutsch) and catches to perfection the simpering, wheedling Lady Kunigunde. Scarcely better known than these ballads are the three Geibel settings, Op 30, and the six songs, Op 36 to homely, faded verses by Robert Reinick. Bär is both virile and incisive in the alfresco cheerfulness of 'Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' and the macho bravado of 'Der Hidalgo', with its swaggering bolero rhythms.

Bär's freshness and unsentimental tenderness are well suited to the relatively modest songs of Op 36. And he and Deutsch respond sharply to the character sketches of Op 40, from the shy delicacy of 'Märzveilchen' ('March violets') through the sinister, twilit 'Muttertraum' to the aching intensity of 'Der Soldat' and the desperation behind the wedding merriment in 'Der Spielmann'. These days Bär's softer singing can sometimes be a shade breathy and unfocused, with high notes not quite integrated into the line; nor is his legato always seamless. Random comparison with Fischer-Dieskau also finds the older baritone predictably wider in his emotional and coloristic range, freer and more fluid in his phrasing and often more subtle in his individual insights. But the more open, direct Bär is invariably a sympathetic singer and an involving and, in the ballads, vividly dramatic interpreter. He and the ever-attentive Deutsch certainly make a persuasive case for these less favoured products of the great song year of 1840.

Wolfgang Holzmair

'Liebesfrühling', Op 37 – No 1, Der Himmel hat ein Träne geweint; No 5, Ich hab' in mich gesogen. Myrthen, Op 25 – No 1, Widmung; No 2, Freisinn; No 3, Der Nussbaum; No 5, Lied aus dem Schenkenbuch im Divan I; No 6, Lied aus dem Schenkenbuch im Divan II; No 17, Venetianisches Lied I; No 18, Venetianisches Lied II; No 26, Zum Schluss

C Schumann Liebeszauber. Liebst du um Schönheit, Op 12 No 2. Lieder, Op 13 – No 2, Sie liebten sich beide; No 6, Die stille Lotosblume. Lieder aus Jucunde, Op 23 – No 2, An einem lichten Morgen; No 3, Geheimes Flüstern; No 6, O Lust, o Lust

Wolfgang Holzmair bar Imogen Cooper pf

Philips 462 610-2PH (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Notes, texts and translations included

Recorded 1999 ●

This welcome disc has something extra to offer in the wonderful rapport between Wolfgang Holzmair and Imogen Cooper. Singer and pianist work together almost by instinct in thinking themselves into the very heart of these songs. Anything of extrovert display or seeking the limelight is quite foreign to their natures. Each song is approached from within, so that the results are like being a witness at their communion with both composers. Holzmair's plangent, very Viennese voice bespeaks the vulnerability that lies at the soul of Robert's Eusebius side, heard to mesmeric effect in the great, slower songs of Op 35, but he is just as capable of tramping the ways with Schumann when he is in his Florestan mood. In his other songs, Holzmair is equally mesmeric in the Venetian song, so intimately done, almost whispered and the old favourite Der Nussbaum receives as delicate a reading as one could wish.

Clara is well represented especially by an inspired setting of a sad poem by Heine, Sie liebten sich beide, and it is interesting to hear what she does with Rückert's Liebst du um Schönheit, which Mahler set very differently a half century later. Clara doesn't pale by the comparison. Cooper is wholly in sympathy with Clara's pianistic style as she is – needless to say – with Robert's. Her playing throughout the programme is at once supportive of her partner and individual in itself. The recording is faultless.

Simon Keenlyside
Complete Lieder, Volume 2
Drei Gedichte, Op 30. Die Löwenbraut, Op 31 No 1. 12 Gedichte, Op 35. Lieder und Gesänge aus Wilhelm Meister, Op 98*a* – No 2, Ballade des Harfners; No 4, Wer nie sein Brot mit Tränen ass; No 6, Wer sich der Einsamkeit ergibt; No 8, An die Türen will ich schleichen. Vier Husarenlieder, Op 117
Simon Keenlyside bar Graham Johnson pf
Hyperion CDJ33102 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●●

In his notes Graham Johnson says that what we have always lacked is a convincing way of performing late Schumann songs, often spare in texture and elusive in style. Well, he and Keenlyside seem to have found one here in their wholly admirable versions of the very different Opp 98*a* and 117. The Op 98*a* settings of the Harper's outpourings from Wilhelm Meister have always stood in the shade of those by Schubert and Wolf. This pair show incontrovertibly that there's much to be said for Schumann's versions, capturing the essence of the old man's sad musings, as set by the composer in an imaginative, free way, alert to every nuance in the texts.

The extroverted Lenau Husarenlieder could hardly be more different. Keenlyside identifies in turn with the bravado of the first, the cynicism of the second, and the eerie, death-dominated mood of the fourth. The pair enter into the open-hearted mood called for by the Knabenhorn settings, most of all in the irresistible 'Der Hidalgo'. Keenlyside is just as forthright in Die Löwenbraut and in those of Op 35, the well-known Kerner settings, and he brings impressive control to the Eusebius ones, not least the all-enveloping 'Stille Tränen'. The interpretation of this quasi-cycle is convincing and unerringly paced. The recording and Johnson's persuasive playing are superb.

Geraldine McGreevy, Stella Doufexis, Adrian Thompson and Stephan Loges
Lieder, Op 40[a]. Spanisches Liederspiel, Op 74[b]. Spanische Liebeslieder, Op 138[c]
C Schumann Lieder aus Jucunde, Op 23[d]
[bcd]Geraldine McGreevy sop [bc]Stella Doufexis mez [bc]Adrian Thompson ten [abc]Stephan Loges bar Graham Johnson, [c]Stephen Hough pfs
Hyperion CDJ33106 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and texts included ●

This disc is a delight from start to finish. Songs and interpretations are on a high level of achievement, in this case all the more welcome as these groups, for various reasons, do not figure that often in recitals. Both the Spanish sets are of the highest order of composition though not often acknowledged as such. The Op 74 set is notable for many mood changes and its touches of fantasy, melded with a typically Schumannesque pull on the emotions. Alone or together, all four singers revel in their chances for expressive singing, none more than McGreevy, now a Lieder singer of major calibre, in 'Melancholie'. McGreevy also stands out in the wistful duet 'In der Nacht' with the sensitive Thompson, a poem set quite differently, as are some others, by Wolf later in the century. Loges contributes to concerted pieces with his expected artistry and has fun with 'Die Contrabandiste'.

The Op 138 set is even fuller of variety of mood and composition. All four singers seize their chances eagerly, with faultlessly sculpted readings under the tutelage of Johnson, who is here joined by no less a pianist than Stephen Hough in the two-piano accompaniments. The Andersen settings (Op 40) are fascinating songs delivered by Stephan Loges with refined tone and diction to which he adds a sure insight into their meaning in performances that compel one to place the set among Schumann's masterpieces in the genre. Add the naturally balanced recording and Johnson's extensive notes and this issue is treasure indeed.

Dorothea Röschmann
Myrthen, Op 25[a]. Four Duets, Op 34[a]. Four Duets, Op 78[a]. John Anderson, Op 145 No 4[b]
[a]Dorothea Röschmann sop [a]Ian Bostridge ten Graham Johnson pf [b]Polyphony / Stephen Layton
Hyperion CDJ33107 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●

Hyperion's Schumann song series has already produced some profoundly satisfying discs, but none quite to equal the pleasures found on this volume. Its centrepiece, Myrthen – the cycle of love songs celebrating the union of Clara and Robert – is framed by eight duets to form a wonderfully balanced offering, and one that could hardly be surpassed in execution, through the understanding and skills of the three participants. If one has to be singled out for particular praise, it must be Dorothea Röschmann. In tones at once fresh, warm and communicative, she sings all her contributions with an ideal balance between word and note. To such a familiar and lovely song as 'Der Nussbaum' she brings a heartfelt sense of anticipated pleasure that bears comparison with any of the heap of noted performances from the past, occasional vibrato used to arresting effect, as in all her readings. And 'Lied der Suleika' has its intensity underlined by the palpitating intimacy of her singing. Not to be outdone, Bostridge presents deeply considered accounts of all his songs, combining his silvery, lightly tremulous tone with his customary feeling for words, most notably in the song ‘Aus den hebräischen Gesängen’ and the two Venetian Songs. Even better is his sensitive enactment of the marvellous setting of Heine, ‘Was will die einsame Träne’, which reveals his complete understanding of the idiom, and of the popular ‘Du bist wie eine Blume’, where his half-voice is skilfully deployed.

Johnson is on his most alert and empathetic form at the piano throughout. In the two sets of duets, full of Schumann at his most easeful, the voices intertwine effortlessly. Some oldsters will recall the famous, endearingly romantic Lehmann/Melchior recordings of some of these: Röschmann and Bostridge are just as persuasive. With one of Hyperion’s best recordings to complement the performances, voices nicely forward, this disc is definitely one to have.

Christine Schäfer

Complete Lieder, Volume 1

Das verlassene Mägdlein, Op 64 No 2. Melancholie, Op 74 No 6. Aufträge, Op 77 No 5. Op 79 – No 7*a*, Zigeunerliedchen I; No 7*b*, Zigeunerliedchen II; No 23, Er ist’s!. Die Blume der Ergebung, Op 83 No 2. Röslein, Röslein!, Op 89 No 6. Sechs Gedichte und Requiem, Op 90. Op 96 – No 1, Nachtlied; No 3 Ihre Stimme. Lieder und Gesänge aus Wilhelm Meister, Op 98*a* – No 1, Kennst du das Land?; No 3, Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt; No 5, Heiss’ mich nicht reden; No 7, Singet nicht in Trauertönen; No 9, So lasst mich scheinen. Sechs Gesänge, Op 107. Warnung, Op 119 No 2. Die Meerfee, Op 125 No 1. Sängers Trost, Op 127 No 1. Mädchen-Schwermut, Op 142 No 3

Christine Schäfer sop Graham Johnson pf

Hyperion CDJ33101 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995 ●●●

This disc launches Hyperion’s Schumann Lieder project as auspiciously as Dame Janet Baker’s recital opened their Complete Schubert Edition. As ever, Graham Johnson shows an unerring gift for matching singer and song. These are almost all late pieces, written between 1849 and 1852 under the shadow of depression and sickness; and their intense chromaticism can all too easily seem tortuous. However, imaginatively supported by Johnson, Christine Schäfer illuminates each of these songs with her pure, lucent timbre, her grace and breadth of phrase and her unselfconscious feeling for verbal meaning and nuance. The voice is an expressive, flexible lyric-coloratura; she can spin a scrupulously even legato, integrates the high notes of, say, ‘Er ist’s’ perfectly within the melodic line, and has the breath control to sustain the long phrases of ‘Requiem’ with apparent ease.

Aided by Johnson’s lucid textures and uncommonly subtle feel for rubato and harmonic direction, Schäfer avoids any hint of mawkishness in songs like ‘Meine Rose’, Op 90 No 2, ‘Mädchen-Schwermut’ and ‘Abendlied. Several songs here have been overshadowed or eclipsed by the settings by Schubert, Wolf or Brahms, and Schäfer and Johnson do much to rehabilitate them.

Schäfer brings an exquisite wondering stillness to the Goethe ‘Nachtlied’, more disturbed and earthbound than Schubert’s sublime setting, but here, at least, scarcely less poignant. She also has the dramatic flair to bring off the difficult Mignon songs, especially the volatile, quasi-operatic ‘Heiss’ mich nicht reden’ and ‘Kennst du das Land’, where the final verse, evoking Mignon’s terrifying passage across the Alps, builds to a climax of desperate, almost demented yearning. At the other end of the emotional spectrum, Schäfer brings a guileful, knowing touch to the first of the Zigeunerliedchen; the Mendelssohnian ‘Die Meerfee’ glistens and glances and ‘Aufträge’ has a winning eagerness and charm, with a delicious sense of flirtation between voice and keyboard. In sum, a delectable, often revelatory recital. The recording is natural and well balanced, while Graham Johnson’s typically searching commentaries complement the performances perfectly.

Der Rose Pilgerfahrt, Op 112

Inga Nielsen, Helle Hinz sops Annemarie Møller, Elizabeth Halling mezzos Deon van der Walt ten Guido Päevatalu bar Christian Christiansen bass Danish National Radio Choir and Symphony Orchestra / Gustav Kuhn

Chandos CHAN9350 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Text included. Recorded 1993 ●

Amidst today’s great upsurgence of interest in Schumann’s later choral undertakings, the work’s long neglect is no doubt due to its all-too-naive tale of a rose who, after an eagerly sought transformation into a maiden to experience human love, chooses to sacrifice herself for her baby. Schumann’s own ready response to Moritz Horn’s poem can best be explained by its underlying moral message together with a strain of German rusticity then equally close to the composer’s heart. Having said that, how grateful Schumann lovers should be to Chandos for at last introducing the work to the English catalogue in so sympathetic yet discreet a performance from this predominantly Danish cast. All credit to the conductor, Gustav Kuhn, for revealing so much fancy in fairyland, so much brio in peasant merriment, and so much charm in more tender lyricism without ever making heavy weather of this essentially gemütlich little score. No praise can be too high for the Danish National Radio Choir: such immediacy of response leaves no doubt as to their professional status. Nor do the soloists or orchestra disappoint. Tonal reproduction is agreeably natural.

Der Rose Pilgerfahrt. Nachtlied, Op 108 🅿

Camilla Nylund, Anke Hoffmann, Simone Kermes sops Claudia Schubert contr Rainer Trost ten

Jochen Kupfer, Andreas Schmidt bars Chorus Musicus; Das Neue Orchester / Christoph Spering
Opus 111 OPS30-190 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1996 ●

This charming choral work is best described as a musical fairy-tale for the young at heart. Spering's version has the special interest of using chamber-like forces, with 'period' wind and brass, to reveal new subtleties of balance and colour in this composer's often unjustly criticised orchestration. The pleasing solo voices are tellingly contrasted and the lyrical eloquence of the narrator, Rainer Trost, deserves special mention; likewise the sensitive response, whether as elves, peasants or angels, of the chorus. The overriding reason for recommending this disc rather than the Chandos set (above) is its inclusion of the rarely heard Nachtlied. Inspired by a Hebbel poem, Schumann conveys the onset of night and the wonder of the nocturnal sky in a magnificent arch of arrestingly scored sound, before subsiding into sleep that 'comes softly as a nurse towards a child'. Lasting barely nine minutes, it surely ranks among Schumann's masterpieces – or so this finely shaped and deeply felt, mellow-toned performance persuades you.

Szenen aus Goethes Faust

Karita Mattila, Barbara Bonney, Brigitte Poschner-Klebel, Susan Graham sops Iris Vermillion mez
Endrik Wottrich, Hans-Peter Blochwitz tens
Bryn Terfel bass-bar Jan-Hendrik Rootering, Harry Peeters basses Tölz Boys' Choir; Swedish Radio Chorus; Berlin Philharmonic Orch / Claudio Abbado
Sony Classical ② S2K66308 (115 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included. Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1994 ●●

No one before Schumann had ever attempted to set Goethe's mystical closing scene, which he finished in time for the Goethe centenary in 1849. What eventually emerged as his own Parts 1 and 2 (in turn portraits of Gretchen and the by now repentant Faust) followed later, after his move from a Mendelssohn-dominated Leipzig to a Wagner-ruled Dresden, hence the striking difference in style. Nothing Schumann ever wrote is more dramatic than Faust's blinding and death in the course of Part 2. The Berlin Philharmonic is very forwardly recorded – occasionally perhaps a little too much so for certain voices. But never in the case of Bryn Terfel in the title-role. Any advance fears that he might disappoint were immediately banished not only by the generosity and flow of his warm, round tone but also the total commitment and conviction of his characterization. Moreover as Dr Marianus in Part 3 he offers some wonderfully sustained mezza and sotto voce. Karita Mattila's Gretchen is always sympathetically pure-toned, clean-lined and assured. At times, as positioned, the other male soloists seem a little outweighed by the orchestra. No praise can be too high for the Four Grey Sisters (so tellingly contrasted in vocal colour) led by Barbara Bonney: their midnight encounter with Faust and his eventual blinding is brilliantly done. And there is splendidly characterful choral singing thoughout from both adult and youthful choirs. In the more operatically conceived Parts 1 and 2 and the visionary Part 3, Abbado himself takes the music to heart and what he draws from his orchestra makes nonesense of the charge that Schumann was an inept scorer. This is worth every penny of its full-price.

Genoveva

Ruth Ziesak sop Genoveva; Deon van der Walt ten Golo; Rodney Gilfry bar Hidulfus; Oliver Widmer bar Siegfried; Marjana Lipovšek mez Margaretha; Thomas Quasthoff bar Drago; Hiroyuki Ijichi bass Balthasar; Josef Krenmair bar Caspar
Arnold Schoenberg Choir; Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec ② 0630-13144-2 (129 minutes: DDD) Notes, Ⓕ
text and translation included. Recorded live in 1996 ●

For most listeners, Schumann's only opera is still a relatively unknown quantity but lovers of Schumann will celebrate a work that is at once intimate, thought-provoking and gloriously melodious. The libretto (by Schumann himself, after Tieck and Hebbel) deals with secret passion and suspected adultery, while the music mirrors emotional turmoil with great subtlety, and sometimes with astonishing imagination. Copious foretastes are provided in the familiar overture, and thereafter, discoveries abound. Sample, for example, the jagged counter-motif that shudders as Genoveva's husband Siegfried entreats Golo (his own alter ego) to guard his wife while he is away at war; or the off-stage forces representing drunken servants; or the almost Expressionist writing at 4'00" into track 10 where Golo responds – with seething hatred – to Genoveva's vengeance. The entreaties of Drago's ghost aren't too far removed from Siegmund's 'Nothung!' in Act 1 of Die Walküre (track 4, at 6'10"), and Genoveva's singing from 'a desolate, rocky place' (track 5, first minute or so), sounds fairly prophetic of Isolde (who was as yet unborn, so to speak).

Harnoncourt suspects that Genoveva was a 'counterblast' to Wagner, and although Wagner apparently thought the opera 'bizarre', there remains a vague suspicion of sneaking regard, even a smidgen of influence.

Teldec's balancing is mostly judicious and the musical direction suggestive of burning conviction. The worthy though relatively conventional Gerd Albrecht (in Orfeo's mellow 1992 recording) only serves to underline the leaner, more inflected and more urgently voiced profile of Harnoncourt's interpretation. As to the two sets of singers, most preferences rest with the latter's line-up. Stage effects are well handled and the sum effect is of a top-drawer Schumann set within an unexpected structural context.

Heinrich Schütz German 1585-1672

GROVE In 1590 Schütz moved with his family to Weissenfels. In 1598 Landgrave Moritz, impressed by his musical accomplishments, took him to Kassel, where he served as a choirboy and studied music with the court Kapellmeister, Georg Otto. In 1609 Schütz proceeded to the University of Marburg to study law, but Landgrave Moritz advised him to abandon his university studies and to go to Venice as a pupil of G Gabrieli; moreover, the landgrave provided the financial means to do this. Schütz remained in Venice for over three years, returning to Moritz's court at Kassel in 1613. The following year he was seconded to serve for two months at the electoral court in Dresden, and in 1615 the Elector Johann Georg I requested his services for a further two years. Moritz reluctantly agreed, and was obliged, for political reasons, to comply when the elector insisted on retaining Schütz in his permanent employ.

As Kapellmeister at Dresden, Schütz was responsible for providing music for major court ceremonies, whether religious or political. He also had to keep the Kapelle adequately staffed and supervise the musical education of the choirboys. His pupils during the following decades included the composers Bernhard, Theile and Weckmann. In 1619 Schütz published his first collection of sacred music, the Psalmen Davids, dedicated to the elector, and later that year he married Magdalena Wildeck. She died in 1625, leaving Schütz with two daughters whom he placed in the care of their maternal grandmother; he never remarried.

Schütz was often absent from Dresden on his own or the elector's business, and in 1627 he was at Torgau, where his Dafne (the first German opera) was performed for the wedding of the elector's daughter Sophia Eleonora. Visits to Mühlhausen and possibly Gera were undertaken later in the year. Towards the end of the 1620s economic pressures of the Thirty Years War began to affect the electoral court. Musicians wages fell into arrears, and in 1628 Schütz decided on a second visit to Venice, where he was able to study developments in dramatic music under Monteverdi's guidance. He returned to Dresden in 1629, but two years later Saxony entered the war and musical activities at court soon came to a virtual halt. Schütz then accepted an invitation to direct the music at the wedding of Crown Prince Christian of Denmark. He arrived in Copenhagen in December 1633 and was paid a salary as Kapellmeister by King Christian IV until his return to Dresden in May 1635.

From Michaelmas 1639 Schütz was again absent from Dresden, this time for about 15 months in the service of Georg of Calenberg. On his return he found the Kapelle further depleted and its members living in penury, and for most of 1642-44 he was again employed at the Danish court. After a year in and around Brunswick he went into semi-retirement, spending much of his time in Weissenfels, though he retained the title and responsibilities of Kapellmeister at Dresden. The end of the Thirty Years War had little immediate effect on musical conditions and in 1651 Schütz renewed an earlier plea for release from his duties and the granting of a pension. This and later petitions were ignored and Schütz obtained his release only on the elector's death in 1656. He was far from inactive during his remaining 15 years. He continued to supply music for occasions at Dresden, frequently travelled and worked on the masterpieces of his last years – the Christmas History, the three Passions and the settings of Psalms cxix and c.

Schütz was the greatest German composer of the 17th century and the first of international stature. His output was almost exclusively sacred; he set mainly biblical texts and wrote little chorale-based music. His early works explore a variety of styles and genres: the polychoral Psalmen Davids (1619) are notable for their contrasting textures and sonorities, while the Cantiones sacrae (1625) present a wide range of motet settings, from the polyphonic to the concertato. Later, he exploited the Italian concertato idiom to the full, notably in the three books of Symphoniae sacrae (1629, 1647, 1650), which give equal weight to voices and instruments. His two sets of Kleine geistliche Concerte (1636, 1639), written after the Thirty Years War and for limited forces, emphasise the meaning of the text, combining principles of monody and counterpoint to create powerful and expressive declamation. Schütz's late works are dominated by the oratorical pieces and by the three unaccompanied 'dramatic' Passions, said to be the last great examples of the genre. His music, largely to German texts, constitutes the ultimate realisation of Luther's endeavours to establish the vernacular as a literary and liturgical language, and embodies the Protestant and humanistic concept of musica poetica in perhaps its most perfect form.

Secular Works

Freue dich des Weibes deiner Jugend, SWV453. Liebster, sagt in süssem Schmerzen, SWV441. Nachdem ich lag in meinem öder Bette, SWV451. Glück zu dem Helikon, SWV96. Haus und Güter erbat man von Eltern, SWV21. Tugend ist der beste Freund, SWV442. Teutoniam dudum belli atra pericla, SWV338. Wie wenn der Adler, SWV434. Siehe, wie fein und lieblich ists, SWV48. Vier Hirtinnen, gleich jung, gleich schön, SWVAnh1. Lässt Salomon sein Bette nicht umgeben, SWV452. Die Erde trinkt für sich, SWV438. Wohl dem, der ein Tugendsam Weib hat, SWV20. Itzt blicken durch des Himmels Saal, SWV460. Syncharma musicum, SWV49
Weser-Renaissance Bremen / Manfred Cordes
CPO CPO999 518-2 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●

Here is a discovery of several unrecorded byways of Schütz's miscellaneous secular oeuvre. Of course, the 17th century being what it is, secular and sacred are deliberately dovetailed into a cultural pea soup: these works are embedded in the literary morality of the age and are not entirely profane. There is a pleasing lightness of touch from the soloists (especially the soprano) and the instrumental consort does not attempt, as is so mistakenly regarded these days as the ideal, to ape the vocal lines at every turn in a wash of homogeneity; there are many distinctive virtuosic commentaries, as in Tugend ist der beste Freund, which Cordes (enhanced by the excellent recorded sound) allows to breathe naturally. Noble intensity and harmonious accord are the order of the day in the splendidly uplifting concerto Teutoniam dudum, which through its extraordinary structural clarity immediately delights the listener with a celebration of the cessation of hostilities after the miserable Thirty Years War. Most impressive, though, is the sympathetic and gentle treatment of the words from Weser-Renaissance, beautifully complemented by the soft articulation of the winds, especially in Siehe, wie fein and the domestic charm of Wohl dem, der ein Tugendsam. This is chamber music-making from the heart, tempered convincingly by the intellect and affectionately delivered.

Motets

Ich hab mein Sach Gott heimgestellt, SWV305. Ich will dem Herren loben allezeit, SWV306. Was hast du verwirket, SWV307. O Jesu, nomen dulce, SWV308. O misericordissime Jesu, SWV309. Ich leige und schlafe, SWV310. Habe deine Lust an dem Herren, SWV311. Herr, ich hoffe darauf, SWV312. Bone Jesu, verbum Patris, SWV313. Verbum caro factum est, SWV314. Hodie Christus natus est, SWV315. Wann unsre Augen schlafen ein, SWV316. Meister, wir haben die ganze Nacht gearbeitet, SWV317. Die Furcht des Herren, SWV318. Ich beuge meine Knie, SWV319. Ich bin jung gewesen, SWV320. Herr, wann ich nur dich habe, SWV321. Rorate coeli desuper, SWV322. Joseph, du Sohn David, SWV323. Ich bin die Auferstehung, SWV324 🅿

Tölz Boys' Choir / Gerhard Schmidt-Gaden with Roman Summereder org
Capriccio 10 388 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1989-90

Getting music published evidently encountered economic difficulties during the Thirty Years' War, for Heinrich Schütz had to issue his Kleiner geistlichen Concerten ('Little Sacred Concertos') – short motets for vocal soloists and continuo – in two parts in, respectively, 1636 and 1639. The voices of the soloists here are typically very individual and characterful, and all are remarkably adroit and stylish, so the personal witness that is so pronounced in the text is particularly well portrayed. These are performers well used to the subtleties of Baroque word-setting and they highlight all the ingenuity that Schütz lavished on these seemingly simple texts. There is an evident delight in the way the composer deployed his limited resources, constantly ringing the changes on traditional formulas to produce a richness of ideas that it took a Bach or Handel to emulate. The rather close recording allows all these intricacies to emerge undiminished and although the resonance of the acoustic seems restrained, this is no bad thing for repertoire that, despite its title, has the feel of chamber music.

Psalms of David

Psalmen Davids sampt etlichen Moteten und Concerten, SWV22-47
Cantus Cölln (Elisabeth Scholl, Annette Labusch sops Elisabeth Popien mez Stratton Bull counterten Gerd Türk, Wilfried Jochens, Jörn Lindemann tens Stephan Schreckenberger, Stephan MacLeod basses)
Concerto Palatino / Konrad Junghänel
Harmonia Mundi ② HMC90 1652/3 Ⓕ
(143 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded 1997 ●

Here is something to get excited about: a new recording, at last, of Schütz's first monumental publication of sacred music. Whether anything can be worth waiting for that long is a moot point, but Cantus Cölln and Concerto Palatino give us an interpretation that is unlikely to be surpassed. With eight singers and no fewer than two dozen instrumentalists, the scale is little short of symphonic. For sheer splendour, who can top Danket dem Herren (SWV45) or the next piece in the collection, Zion spricht?

It is easy enough to single out the most opulent pieces, but as Peter Wollny remarks in his admirable booklet-notes, the whole point of the Psalmen Davids is its variety in the treatment of a medium whose potential for cliché is very great. The musicians respond to Schütz's demands with verve and perception and the sort of confidence that would carry any music aloft in triumph.

The sound recording does them full justice. You will almost certainly listen, enthralled, to the entire collection – nearly two-and-a-half hours – in one sitting.

Symphoniae sacrae, SWV341-67

Emma Kirkby, Suzie Le Blanc sops James Bowman counterten Nigel Rogers, Charles Daniels tens Stephen Varcoe, Richard Wistreich basses Jeremy West, Nicholas Perry cornets Purcell Quartet (Catherine Mackintosh, Catherine Weiss vns Richard Boothby va da gamba Robert Woolley hpd) 🅿
Chandos Chaconne ② CHAN0566/7
(139 minutes: DDD)
Text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1993-94 ●

These discs are in various ways revelatory. Schütz's collection is difficult to get through in one sitting, but each item is a jewel. This is church music on a small scale in terms of physical resources, but of enormous invention and beauty. Sometimes the Purcell Quartet do not push the music along quite enough. In general, however, the instrumentalists respond with enthusiasm and great understanding of the style of these rather recondite works. It takes considerable sensitivity to bring out the rich textures of Meine Seele erhebt den Herren or Der Herr ist meine Stärke without enjoying such moments at the expense of the vocal soloist. The relatively well-known bass solo Herr, nun lässest du deinen

Diener is another example of a perfect match between voice and instruments.

Emma Kirkby brings all her customary charm and precision to her two solo arias. Both tenors are in their element, if sometimes a little understated, and Stephen Varcoe and Richard Wistreich really understand and communicate the glowing black and gold colours of Schütz's writing for the bass voice.

Schütz's debt to Monteverdi is very much evident in Der Herr ist mein Licht and even more so in Es steh Gott auf, but Schütz's natural reluctance to 'deck out my work with foreign plumage' means that his own voice as a composer is always in evidence. This reconciliation of Italian stile concertato with Schütz's northern reticence is one of the challenges in performing his music, and one to which this recording rises magnificently.

Alexander Scriabin Russian 1872-1915

GROVE Scriabin was a fellow pupil of Rachmaninov's in Zverev's class from 1884 and at the Moscow Conservatory (1888-92), where his teachers were Taneyev, Arensky and Safonov. From 1894 his career as a pianist was managed by Belyayev, who arranged his European tours and also published his works: at this stage they were almost exclusively for solo piano, and deeply influenced by Chopin (most are preludes and mazurkas), though in the late 1890s he began to write for orchestra. In 1903 he left Russia and his family to live in western Europe for six years with a young female admirer, and his musical style became more intensely personal, developing a profusion of decoration in harmony becalmed by unresolved dominant chords or whole-tone elements. The major works of this period include the Divine Poem and again numerous piano pieces.

In 1905 he encountered Madame Blavatsky's theosophy, which soon ousted the enthusiasm for Nietschean superhumanism that had underlain the immediately preceding works. The static and ecstatic tendencies in his music were encouraged, being expressed notably in the Poem of Ecstasy and Prometheus, the latter intended to be performed with a play of coloured light. Still more ambitious were the plans for the Mysterium, a quasi-religious act which would have united all the arts, and for the composition of which the exclusively piano works of 1910-15 were intended to be preparatory, this journey into mystical hysteria going along with a voyage beyond tonality to a floating dissonance often based on the 'mystic chord' (C-F sharp-B flat-E-A-D).

Piano Concerto

Scriabin Piano Concerto in F sharp minor, Op 20
Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No 1 in B flat minor, Op 23
Nikolai Demidenko pf BBC Symphony Orchestra / Alexander Lazarev
Hyperion CDA66680 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

The chief attraction here is the unusual coupling which pairs two sharply opposed examples of Russian Romanticism, and although the reasons for the neglect of Scriabin's Piano Concerto are not hard to fathom (its lyrical and decorative flights are essentially inward-looking), its haunting, bittersweet beauty, particularly in the central Andante, is hard to resist. Demidenko's own comments, quoted in the accompanying booklet, are scarcely less intense and individual than his performance: 'in the ambience, phrasing and cadence of his music we meet with a world almost without skin, a world of nerve-ends where the slightest contact can bring pain.' His playing soars quickly to meet the music's early passion head on, and in the first più mosso scherzando he accelerates to produce a brilliant lightening of mood. His flashing fortes in the Andante's second variation are as volatile as his pianissimos are starry and refined in the finale's period reminiscence, and although he might seem more tight-lipped, less expansive than Ashkenazy on Decca, he is arguably more dramatic and characterful. Demidenko's Tchaikovsky, too, finds him ferreting out and sifting through every texture, forever aiming at optimum clarity. While this is hardly among the greatest Tchaikovsky Firsts on record, it is often gripping and mesmeric. The recorded balance is not always ideal and the piano sound is sometimes uncomfortably taut.

Piano Concerto in F sharp minor, Op 20[a].
Prometheus, Op 60, 'Le poème du feu'[b].
Le poème de l'extase, Op 54[c]
Vladimir Ashkenazy pf Ambrosian Singers; [ab]London Philharmonic Orchestra; [c]Cleveland Orchestra / Lorin Maazel
Decca 417 252-2DH (66 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded [ab]1971, [c]1978 ●

This CD gives us the essential Scriabin. The Piano Concerto has great pianistic refinement and melodic grace as well as a restraint not encountered in his later music. With Le poème de l'extase and Prometheus we are in the world of art nouveau and Scriabin in the grip of the mysticism (and megalomania) that consumed his later years. They are both single-movement symphonies for a huge orchestra: Prometheus ('The Poem of Fire') calls for quadruple wind, eight horns, five trumpets, strings, organ and chorus as well as an important part for solo piano in which Ashkenazy shines. The sensuous, luminous textures are beautifully conveyed in these performances by the LPO and the Decca engineers produce a most natural perspective, as well as an appropriately overheated sound in the sensuous world of Le poème de l'extase.

Symphonies

Symphonies – No 1 in E, Op 26[a]; No 2 in C minor, Op 29; No 3 in C minor, Op 43, 'Divin poème'.
Le poème de l'extase, Op 54[b]. Prometheus, Op 60, 'Le poème du feu'[c]

[a]Stefania Toczyska mez [a]Michael Myers ten
[c]Dmitri Alexeev pf [b]Frank Kaderabek tpt
[a]Westminster Choir; [c]Philadelphia Choral Arts Society; Philadelphia Orchestra / Riccardo Muti
EMI ③ 567720-2 (188 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1985-90 ●●

There can be few more thrilling sounds on disc (and no more compelling reason for a totally sound-proofed listening room) than the climax to Muti's Poème de l'extase. The clamour of bells here (both literal and imitative) reveals an essentially Russian heart at the core of this most cosmopolitan of Russian composers, and the maestoso proclamation of the theme of self assertion has the raised Philadelphia horns in crucially sharp focus. As in the corresponding climax in Prometheus (at 18'21"), this 'éclat sublime' is filled out with a floor-shaking contribution from the organ. Like the organ, the wordless chorus at this point in Prometheus registers more as a device for enriching and exalting the texture, rather than as a striking new presence.

Muti's Prometheus is, arguably, the most complete realization of the mind-boggling demands of this score ever to have been recorded. The inert opening ('Original chaos' – lovely pp bass drum!) and mysterious awakening have rarely sounded so atmospheric. Alexeev's first entry is not as strong willed as some, but he seems to be saving a more imperious attack for the same point in the recapitulation. Muti builds the work superbly: the imposing clash of states in the development (and the changes of tempo) charted with mighty assurance. And thereafter Prometheus is airborne, with Alexeev both agile and articulate in the 'Dance of Life'.

Throughout the cycle, the tonal allure of the Philadelphia Orchestra is fully in evidence. Only in the Third Symphony, Divin poème, do Muti and the EMI team seem to be on less than their indomitable form. Compared with some versions, the tempo relationships in the first movement don't fully convince. However, this cycle is unlikely to be seriously challenged for many a year. As a whole it immeasurably enhances Scriabin's stature as a symphonist and offers the kind of playing and recording which, as recently as two decades ago, Scriabin enthusiasts could only have imagined in their dreams.

Prometheus

Scriabin Prometheus Stravinsky The Firebird
Alexander Toradze pf Kirov Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips 446 715-2PH (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

Stravinsky and the short-lived Scriabin were almost contemporaries; of these two exactly contemporary works (1909-10), Prometheus, as Oliver Knussen has put it, is 'so much more than a period piece; pregnant with possibilities for the future', whereas The Firebird, aside from its 'Infernal Dance', rarely does anything more startling than pick up from where Rimsky-Korsakov left off – indeed, in certain sections, it shows that Stravinsky also knew his Scriabin rather well (for example, the Firebird's 'Dance of Supplication'). Gergiev's Firebird is certainly a startling performance. All manner of things contribute to the impression of distinction, among them the fact that this is that rare thing on record, an all-Russian complete Firebird.

The music-making seems alive with a special presence: the orchestra is fairly close, though there is a real sense of the hall, never more so than when a heart-stopping crack is let loose from the drums on Kashchey's appearance. But the primary presence here (obvious enough, but it needs saying) is of a man of the theatre, maybe too audibly (for some) breathing life into the proceedings, moving from one section of the ballet to the next with the transitional mastery of a Furtwängler, and taking risks with tempo (do hear the end of the 'Infernal Dance'). The darkness to light of the ballet's last few minutes is nothing less than mesmeric.

Prometheus is equally compelling. Toradze's solo contribution is slightly less the centre of the piece's universe than Argerich in the sensational Abbado recording, in terms of both imaginative daring and recorded scale, though it never lacks character. The only reservation about the Abbado is the relatively fined down impression of Scriabin's huge orchestra. Yet with the more imposing-sounding Russian team you really know about it. Gergiev's is also a much broader view of the piece, but it never sounds overly languid, indeed it enables him and Toradze, unlike Argerich and Abbado, to achieve a dizzying accelerando prestissimo in the final bars that is faster than anything that has preceded it.

Etudes

Etude in C sharp minor, Op 2 No 1. 12 Etudes, Op 8. Etudes, Op 42. Etude in E flat, Op 49 No 1. Etude, Op 56 No 4. Three Etudes, Op 65
Piers Lane pf Hyperion CDA66607 Ⓕ
(56 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1992 ●

Although Scriabin's études do not fall into two neatly packaged sets in the same way as Chopin's celebrated contributions, there is nevertheless a strong feeling of continuity and development running throughout the 26 examples produced between the years 1887 and 1912. This is admirably demonstrated in this excellent issue from Hyperion, which, far from being an indigestible anthology proves to be an intriguing and pleasurable hour's worth of listening charting Scriabin's progression from late-romantic adolescence to harmonically advanced mystical poet. Indeed, although these studies can be counted as amongst the most digitally taxing and hazardous of their kind, Scriabin also saw them as important sketches and studies for his larger works, and as experiments in his gradually evolving harmonic language and mystical vision.

Piers Lane attains the perfect balance of virtuoso display and poetic interpretation. Expressive detail and subtle nuance are finely brought out, and he is more than receptive to Scriabin's sometimes highly idiosyncratic sound world; rarely, for instance, has the famous 'Mosquito' Etude (Op 42 No 3) been captured with such delicate fragility as here, and in No 1 of the three fiendishly difficult Etudes, Op 65 the tremulous, ghostly flutterings are tellingly delivered with a gossamer-light touch and a sense of eerie mystery. The clear, spacious recording is exemplary.

Mazurkas

10 Mazurkas, Op 3. Nine Mazurkas, Op 25. Two Mazurkas, Op 40
Gordon Fergus-Thompson pf Ⓕ
ASV CDDCA1086 (80 minutes: DDD) ●

Volume 4 of Gordon Fergus-Thompson's Scriabin series for ASV is of the complete Mazurkas. The Mazurka remains an intransigently indigenous dance genre, and Chopin's incomparable example is more than a hard act to follow. However, Scriabin was among the few who accepted such a challenge wholeheartedly and, while his gratitude to his beloved Polish master is obvious, so too is the skill with which he takes Chopin's Slavonicism on a journey through bittersweet nostalgia into a more convoluted idiom and, finally, into a pensive and hallucinatory shadowland. The elusive character of these fascinating and neglected works could hardly be presented more vividly and insinuatingly than by Fergus-Thompson.

How well he understands the way Scriabin's momentary high spirits (in, say, No 4) collapse into morbid introspection in No 5 – into a close-knit chromaticism later refined still further by dark and obsessive intervals and patterning. The balletic leaps of No 6 are deftly contrasted with its sinuous central melody, and, however circuitous the route, Fergus-Thompson travels it with a special clarity and romantic fervour. The two confidential Op 40 Mazurkas are a notable success, and the recordings are crystalline and immediate.

Preludes

Complete Preludes – Op 2 No 2; Op 9 No 1; Opp 11, 13, 15-17, 22, 27, 31, 33, 35, 37, 39; Op 45 No 3; Op 48; Op 49 No 2; Op 51 No 2; Op 56 No 1; Op 59 No 2; Opp 67 and 74
Piers Lane pf
Hyperion ② CDA67057/8 (127 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●

Everything about this two-disc set is ideal. Beautifully packaged and recorded, and superbly played, there is the added bonus of an outstanding essay by Simon Nicholls, in which acute musical analysis is presented within the wider context of Scriabin's bewildering genius. Nicholls sees Scriabin as 'a musical Fabergé', a composer who contrasted his love of the ambitious epic with an even greater love of miniatures that could be 'short as a sparrow's beak or a bear's tail'. And throughout the extraordinary journey from Op 2 No 2 to Op 74, where the memories of Chopin are subdued by 'scarifying documents of individual and social catastrophe', you are tossed abruptly from a serene or bitter introspection to a crazed violence and exuberance, encouraged by idiosyncratic directions such as patetico, con stravaganza, vagamente, irato impetuoso, sauvage belliqueux. Well may Stravinsky have asked, 'Scriabin, where does he come from and who are his followers?'

The demands on the pianist are fierce, but it would be hard to imagine a more focused or immaculate reading than that offered by Piers Lane. Few pianists could show more sympathy and affection for such volatile romanticism, or display greater stylistic consistency. He underlines the despondency of the left-hand Prelude, Op 9 No 1 (here separated from its celebrated Nocturne companion); and in, for example, Op 11 No 3 the fleeting melodic outline is always kept intact amid so much whirling activity. The turbulence of No 14 is caught just as surely, and as an instance of how his scrupulousness is combined with the most vivid imagination, he gives us No 16 in an agitated and freely expressive style rather than opting for a more conventional, stricter tempo, creating a novel and nightmarish dimension. He takes No 2 at a true Allegro (as marked) and is never tempted into the sort of virtuoso skirmish offered by lesser players. Indeed, his gift for clarifying even the most tortuous utterances with an exemplary poise and assurance is among his finest qualities. The machine-gun fire of Op 31 No 3 and the menacing tread of Op 33 No 4 are fully realised, and Lane ably taps the darkest regions of the imagination in the final Op 74 Preludes.

These discs complement Piers Lane's earlier Hyperion recording of the complete Scriabin Etudes, and although competition is strong in this repertoire, especially from Evgeny Zarafiants and from Gordon Fergus-Thompson in his ongoing series, this new set of the Preludes should be in any serious record collection.

Preludes – Op 22; Op 27; Op 31; Op 33; Op 35; Op 37; Op 39; Op 48; Op 67; Op 74. Prelude in E flat, Op 45 No 3. Prelude in F, Op 49 No 2. Prelude in A minor, Op 51 No 2. Prelude in E flat minor, Op 56 No 1. Prelude, Op 59 No 2 J Scriabin Prelude in C, Op 2. Preludes, Op 3 – No 1 in B; No 2. Prelude in D flat
Evgeny Zarafiants pf 🏵
Naxos 8 554145 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●

With this second volume Evgeny Zarafiants completes his superb survey of Scriabin's 86 Preludes, adding four Preludes by Julian Scriabin, the composer's precociously gifted son, as encores. Listening to music of such morbid and refined intricacy played with the finest musical poise and commitment returns us to Stravinsky's bemused question, 'Scriabin, where does he come from, and who are his followers?' Is the angst and angry convolution of, say, Op 27 No 1 a slavonic memory of Brahms's Op 118 No 1? Does the explosive whimsy of Op 35 No 3 take its cue from the Scherzo of Beethoven's Op 26 Sonata? The hair-raising presto of Op 67 No 2 recalls the menace and enigma of the finale from Chopin's Op 35 Sonata, while the terse and belligerant Op 33 No 3 looks ahead to Stravinsky's sharpest modernist utterances. Yet if there are countless examples of reflection and prophecy, there are still more of the most startling originality. Scriabin is always Scriabin, and as he journeys from Op 22 to Op 74 into the darkest reaches of the imagination you are reminded that this is hardly music for the faint-hearted.

Once again, Zarafiants is equal to each and every vivid occasion. Whether in the fragrant grazioso of Op 22 No 2, where the line twists and turns like so much honeysuckle, in the toppling argument of Op 31 No 3, or in the sauvage belliqueux of Op 59 No 2, he is richly responsive, his playing alive with a rare pianistic skill and imaginative brio. The Brandon Hill recordings are resonant and full-blooded.

Complete Piano Sonatas

No 1 in F minor, Op 6; No 2 in G sharp minor, Op 19, 'Sonata-fantasy'; No 3 in F sharp minor, Op 23; No 4 in F sharp, Op 30; No 5 in F sharp, Op 53; No 6 in G, Op 62; No 7 in F sharp, Op 64, 'White Mass'; No 8 in A, Op 66; No 9 in F, Op 68, 'Black Mass'; No 10 in C, Op 70

Piano Sonatas Nos 1-10. Fantasie in B minor, Op 28. Sonata-fantaisie in G sharp minor
Marc-André Hamelin pf
Hyperion ② CDA67131/2 (146 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989-90 OO

Scriabin was an ambitious composer. A romantic alchemist, he saw his music as a transmuting agent. Through its influence pain would become happiness and hate become love, culminating in a phoenix-like rebirth of the universe. With Shakespearian agility he would change the world's dross into 'something rich and strange'. Not surprisingly, given Scriabin's early prowess as a pianist, the 10 sonatas resonate with exoticism, ranging through the First Sonata's cries of despair, to the Second Sonata's Baltic Sea inspiration, the Third Sonata's 'states of being', the 'flight to a distant star' (No 4) and 'the emergence of mysterious forces' (No 5). Nos 7 and 9 are White and Black Mass Sonatas respectively, and the final sonatas blaze with trills symbolising an extra-terrestrial joy and incandescence.

Such music makes ferocious demands on the pianist's physical stamina and imaginative resource. However, Marc-André Hamelin takes everything in his stride. Blessed with rapier reflexes he nonchalantly resolves even the most outlandish difficulties. He launches the First Sonata's opening outcry like some gleaming trajectory and, throughout, his whistle-stop virtuosity is seemingly infallible.

You might, however, miss a greater sense of the music's Slavonic intensity, its colour and character; a finer awareness, for example, of the delirious poetry at the heart of the Second Sonata's whirling finale. Hamelin's sonority is most elegantly and precisely gauged but time and again his fluency (admittedly breathtaking) erases too much of the work's originality and regenerative force. However, he shows a greater sense of freedom in the Fifth Sonata, and in the opalescent fantasy of the later sonatas, he responds with more evocative skill to subjective terms, as well as to moments where Scriabin's brooding introspection is lit by sudden flashes of summer lightning.

The recordings are a little tight and airless in the bass and middle register, but the set does includes a superb essay on Scriabin.

'The Early Scriabin'
Piano Sonata in E flat minor. Sonate-fantaisie. Allegro appassionato, Op 4. Canon in D minor. Etude No 12 in D sharp minor, Op 8. Fugue. Nocturne in A flat. Two Nocturnes, Op 5. Two Pieces for the left hand, Op 9. Mazurkas – in B minor; in F. Valses – Op 1; Op 6, No 1; No 2. Variations on a theme by Mlle Egorova
Stephen Coombs pf
Hyperion CDA67149 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Stephen Coombs's 'The Early Scriabin' follows his previous Hyperion recitals of Russian music by Arensky, Bortkiewicz, Liadov and Glazunov, but any suggestion that he has moved on to more familiar territory is triumphantly rebuffed in a programme of fascinating rarities played with touching sensitivity and affection.

Coombs's booklet essay – a mine of information and research – tells the history of such oddities as the sombre D minor Canon and E minor Fugue (their titles essentially alien to Scriabin's precociously romantic and far-reaching sensibility) or the complex provenance of the masterly E flat minor Sonata. He also tells us that Scriabin's genius received short shrift from the academic ancien régime; allowing him to graduate in piano but not in composition.

Coombs's performances are, for the most part, what painters call 'low in tone', and even when you wish for greater voltage in, say, the nightmarish equestrian finale of the Sonata you can hardly wish for more gently persuasive accounts of the Waltzes or the A flat Nocturne. He is much less dazzling and rhetorical than, for example, Leon Fleisher in the Prelude and Nocturne for the left hand but, conversely his playing suggests a subtly characterful and communing alternative.

On the other hand he makes a full-blooded as well as finely graded assault on the cadenza just before the return of the principle idea in the Allegro appassionato so that, all in all, this record is a most impressive achievement, as beautiful in sound as it is endlessly thought-provoking.

Peter Sculthorpe

Australian 1929

GROVE Sculthorpe studied at Melbourne University and with Rubbra and Wellesz at Oxford (1958-61) and in 1963 he began teaching at Sydney University. His music features an expressive brilliance of colour and vigorous use of ostinato, sometimes reflecting his interest in Balinese music. His works include the opera Rites of Passage (1974), orchestral and vocal pieces (including the series Sun Music) and a sequence of nine string quartets.

Piano Concerto

Piano Concerto. Little Nourlangie. Music for Japan. The song of Tailitnama
Kirsti Harms mez Mark Atkins didjeridu Tamara Anna Cislowska pf David Drury org Sydney Symphony Orchestra / Edo de Waart
ABC Classics 8 770030 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1996

Sculthorpe has long been preoccupied with the music from other countries situated in and around the Pacific – and Japanese music in particular, elements of which he has incorporated into other works such as the present Piano Concerto of 1983. Sculthorpe's Piano Concerto is an imposing creation, less indigenous-sounding and 'pictorial' than many of his other compositions, including The song of Tailitnama (1974). Conceived for high voice, six cellos and percussion, this haunting piece was in fact written for a TV documentary.

Little Nourlangie dates from 1990. It takes its name from a small outcrop of rocks in Australia's Kakadu National Park on which can be found the Aboriginal Blue Paintings, depicting fish, boats and ancestral figures and which inspired the composer. Little Nourlangie is a characteristically striking creation, scored with much imaginative flair. It shares its diatonic main theme with that of Sculthorpe's 1989 guitar concerto, Nourlangie, and comprises four-and-a-half minutes of 'straightforward, joyful music' (to quote the composer). By contrast, Music for Japan exhibits a much more uncompromising demeanour, and according to annotator Graeme Skinner, is at once 'his most abstract and modernist orchestral score'.

Edo de Waart presides over a set of performances that exhibit great commitment and exemplary finish. The recording is excellent too.

John Sheppard

British c1515-1559/60

GROVE He was at Magdalen College, Oxford, 1543-48, and by 1552 was a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal. Most of his extant music for the Latin rite probably dates from Mary's reign. The six-voice Magnificat, for example with its florid counterpoint and lack of imitation, belongs to the tradition of the Eton Choirbook composers. Among his more modern works are the four-voice Magnificat, the Missa 'Cantate' and the Mass 'The Western Wynde'. He was at his best when writing vigorous counterpoint around a plainchant. The English works, which include 15 anthems and service music, seem to date from Edward's reign.

Mass 'The Western Wynde'

'The Western Wynde' Mass. Gaude, gaude, gaude Maria; Dum transisset Sabbatum I; Spiritus Sanctus procedens II; In manus tuas II; Audivi vocem de coelo; Libera nos, salva nos II; Beata nobis gaudia; Impetum fecerunt unanimes; Sancte Dei preciose; Sacris solemniis; Aeterne Rex altissime; Dum transisset sabbatum II; Hostes Herodes impie; In manus tuas III; Te Deum laudamus.
The Sixteen / Harry Christophers
Hyperion Dyad ② CDD22022 (DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1992 ●

This set centres round one of Sheppard's best-known four-part Masses, The Western Wynde. Though largely syllabic in style, in accordance with liturgical prescriptions at a time when taste in church music was turning towards ever greater emphasis on the text, this Mass still has moments that recapture the earlier visionary style in all its wonder. The section 'Et incarnatus est', coming after an amazing cadence at 'descendit de coelis' in the Credo, is a case in point. 'Pleni sunt coeli' is another, and also the opening of the Benedictus, where the melody unfolds unhurriedly over the delicate counterpoint of the mean and the bass. In such passages The Sixteen is in its element, each singer relating to the others with the intimacy and mutual understanding of performers of chamber music.

The supporting programme includes alternatim hymn settings, responsories and a Te Deum. In all of these the chant is sung with excellent phrasing and a smooth legato. Some subtle repercussions in the intonation to Dum transisset Sabbatum are particularly pleasing.

In all five pieces, though, the tempo of the chant sections bore little relationship to the polyphony – the least far removed being that of the hymn Aeterne Rex altissime, where the individual chant notes had roughly the duration of a half-beat of the polyphony. The English Magnificat and Nunc dimittis reveal Sheppard fully conforming to the later syllabic style in a rich and joyful texture. Here, and in the Latin Te Deum The Sixteen display to the full their glowing vocal qualities. This is wonderful singing, with a sense of freedom and flow that is almost overpowering.

Missa Cantate

Missa Cantate[a]. Verbum caro factum est
[a]Robert Evans celebrant [a]Donald Greig subdeacon [a]Michael McCarthy deacon [a]Julian Podger lesson clerk Salisbury Cathedral Boy Choristers; Gabrieli Consort / Paul McCreesh

Archiv Produktion 457 658-2AH (81 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

Something close to this reconstruction of the Third Mass of Christmas might have been heard in Salisbury Cathedral during the last years of the famous rite to which the Cathedral gave its name, the rite practised there since the 13th century. A reconstruction for the ears only, though. Even so, we can follow the slow peregrinations of the opening procession, 'Descendit de coelis', and visualise the highest point in the service, when the great bell tolls for the Consecration.

Hearing Sheppard's magnificent six-part Mass in its full musical context is a remarkable experience. The polyphonic singing is superb. The drama and strength, in particular of the Sanctus and the Agnus, are profoundly moving. Sheppard controls his material with exceptional skills of melody and structure, and the singers are able to match these at every point. Listeners may be astonished by the attempt to reproduce the Latin pronunciation of English clerics during this period – it was said by foreign ambassadors to be incomprehensible! The attempt to recover the style of the chant sections was courageous, though more flexibility in the longer stretches was needed. One surprising slip was the singing of only the cue of a collect ending; it could easily have been completed, since contemporary sources clearly indicate two more words for the collect in question. That said, these are in general excellent performances.

The Second Service

The Lord's Prayer. The Second Service – Magnificat; Nunc dimittis. Gaude, gaude, gaude Maria. Filie Ierusalem. Reges Tharsis et insulae. Spiritus sanctus procedens. Laudem dicite Deo nostro. Hec dies. Impetum fecerunt unanimes. Libera nos, salva nos

Choir of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford / Stephen Darlington

Nimbus NI5480 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995

This enjoyable recording opens with two works in English which were probably written within days of John Sheppard's early death, as Roger Bowers's introductory essay explains. The hypothesis is an intriguing one, for The Lord's Prayer and the Second Service largely lack the wayward dissonances that play an integral (and controversial) part in this composer's style. Whether the difference is due to the switch to the vernacular is a moot point, for the Latin Responds that make up most of the disc show off the older style more conspicuously. The most impressive of these is undoubtedly the elaborate Gaude, gaude, gaude Maria, but the piece that most clearly enunciates its composer's idiosyncrasies has to be the concluding Libera nos (Sheppard wrote two identically scored settings of this text, but neither the programme details nor Bowers's essay makes clear which one is performed here). Sheppard's special predilection for high voices makes the participation of boy trebles here particularly appropriate. In such traditional choral establishments, unanimity of ensemble is crucial. From that standpoint this choir is difficult to fault, although towards the end of the recital a certain tiredness is just perceptible. If anything, the sound is a shade top-heavy at times (as in Filie Ierusalem), but a couple of the Responds dispense with trebles altogether, providing a welcome contrast.

Dmitry Shostakovich

Russian/USSR 1906-1975

GROVE He studied with his mother, a professional pianist, and then with Shteynberg at the Petrograd Conservatory (1919-25): his graduation piece was his Symphony no.1, which brought him early international attention. His creative development, however, was determined more by events at home. Like many Soviet composers of his generation, he tried to reconcile the musical revolutions of his time with the urge to give a voice to revolutionary socialism, most conspicuously in his next two symphonies, no.2 ('To October') and no.3 ('The First of May'), both with choral finales. At the same time he used what he knew of contemporary Western music (perhaps Prokofiev and Krenek mostly) to give a sharp grotesqueness and mechanical movement to his operatic satire The Nose, while expressing a similar keen irony in major works for the ballet (The Age of Gold, The Bolt) and the cinema (New Babylon). But the culminating achievement of these quick-witted, nervy years was his second opera The Lady Macbeth of the Mtsensk District, where high emotion and acid parody are brought together in a score of immense brilliance.

Lady Macbeth was received with acclaim in Russia, western Europe and the USA, and might have seemed to confirm Shostakovich as essentially a dramatic composer: by the time he was 30, in 1936, he was known for two operas and three full-length ballets, besides numerous scores for the theatre and films, whereas only one purely orchestral symphony had been performed, and one string quartet. However, in that same year Lady Macbeth was fiercely attacked in Pravda, and he set aside his completed Symphony no.4 (it was not performed until 1961), no doubt fearing that its Mahlerian intensity and complexity would spur further criticism. Instead he began a new symphony, no.5, much more conventional in its form and tunefulness – though there is a case for hearing the finale as an internal send-up of the heroic style. This was received favourably, by the state and indeed by Shostakovich's international public, and seems to have turned him from the theatre to the concert hall. There were to be no more operas or ballets, excepting a comedy and a revision of Lady Macbeth; instead he devoted himself to symphonies, concertos, quartets and songs (as well as heroic, exhortatory cantatas during the war years).

Of the next four symphonies, no.7 is an epic with an uplifting war-victory programme (it was begun in besieged Leningrad), while the others display more openly a dichotomy between optimism and introspective doubt, expressed with varying shades of irony. It has been easy to explain this in terms of Shostakovich's position as a public artist in the USSR during the age of socialist realism, but the divisions and ironies in his music go back to his earliest works and seem inseparable from the very nature of his harmony, characterised by a severely weakened sense of key. Even so, his position in official Soviet music certainly was difficult. In 1948 he was condemned again, and for five years he wrote little besides patriotic cantatas and private music (quartets, the 24 Preludes and Fugues which constitute his outstanding piano work).

Stalin's death in 1953 opened the way to a less rigid aesthetic, and Shostakovich returned to the symphony triumphantly with no.10. Nos. 11 and 12 are both programme works on crucial years in revolutionary history (1905 and 1917), but then no.13 was his most outspokenly critical work, incorporating a setting of words that attack anti-semitism. The last two symphonies and the last four quartets, as well as other chamber pieces and songs, belong to a late period of spare texture, slowness and gravity, often used explicitly in images of death: Symphony no.14 is a song cycle on mortality, though no.15 remains more enigmatic in its open quotations from Rossini and Wagner.

Complete Cello Concertos

No 1 in E flat, Op 107; No 2 in G, Op 126

Cello Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Mischa Maisky vc London Symphony Orchestra / Michael Tilson Thomas
DG 445 821-2GH (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

The Second Cello Concerto is one of the major concertos of the post-war period – as potent a representative of the composer's later style as the last three symphonies, be it through irony (second movement), poetry (first and third) or anger (beginning of the third). Few cellists have tended the piano espressivo of the Largo's opening bars as lovingly as Mischa Maisky does, while the rapt quality of his soft playing and the expressive eloquence of his double-stopping wring the most from Shostakovich's extended soliloquy. Michael Tilson Thomas points and articulates with his usual skill. Only the opening of that movement (with its furious whoop horns) seems marginally underprojected, although the main climax later on is both immensely powerful and extraordinarily clear. The First Concerto harbours fewer mysteries than the Second and yet remains a pivotal work. Maisky phrases beautifully, while Tilson Thomas and the LSO again come up trumps, even though 1'33" into the finale the dramatic switch to 6/8 sounds less spontaneous than it does under, say, Maxim Shostakovich. In other respects, however, this is a forceful and fairly outgoing interpretation, beautifully recorded and a suitable coupling for the disc's star act – the finest available studio recording of the Second Concerto. In fact, this CD is now the prime recommendation for the two concertos coupled together.

Cello Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Heinrich Schiff vc Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Maxim Shostakovich
Philips 412 526-2PH Ⓕ
(61 minutes: DDD) ●

In the First Concerto, Heinrich Schiff's excellent version with the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra under Shostakovich fils can hold its own against all opposition. The first movement is taut and well held together and the second is beautifully shaped, the passion and poignancy of the climax being particularly well conveyed. Schiff makes one listen to every nuance and wait upon every rest.

The Second Concerto comes between the 13th and 14th Symphonies, neither of which endeared Shostakovich to the Soviet Establishment. The concerto did not meet with the enthusiastic acclaim that had greeted No 1 and has not established itself in the repertory to anywhere near the same extent, perhaps because it offers fewer overt opportunities for display. It is a work of eloquence and beauty, inward in feeling and spare in its textures. The opening Largo could hardly be in stronger contrast to the corresponding movement of No 1. It seems rhapsodic and fugitive, and it takes time before one realises how purposeful is the soloist's course through the shadowy landscape. Yet the sonorities have the asperity so characteristic of Shostakovich. It is a haunting piece, lyrical in feeling, and gently discursive, sadly whimsical at times and tinged with a smiling melancholy that hides deeper troubles. The balance is generally excellent: the soloist is perhaps marginally forward, but the result is still very natural. Recommended with enthusiasm.

Complete Violin Concertos

No 1 in A minor, Op 99; No 2 in C sharp minor, Op 129

Awards
1990

Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Lydia Mordkovitch vn Scottish National Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Chandos CHAN8820 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989. ●●●

This coupling completely explodes the idea of the Second Violin Concerto being a disappointment after the dramatic originality of No 1. Certainly No 2, completed in 1967, a year after the very comparable Cello Concerto No 2, has never won the allegiance of violin virtuosos as the earlier work has done, but here Lydia Mordkovitch confirms what has become increasingly clear, that the spareness of late Shostakovich marks no diminution of his creative spark, maybe even the opposite. In that she is greatly helped by the equal commitment of Neeme Järvi in drawing such purposeful, warmly expressive playing from the Scottish National Orchestra. With such spare textures the first two movements can be difficult to hold together, but here from the start, where Mordkovitch plays the lyrical first theme in a hushed, beautifully withdrawn way, the concentration is consistent.

The première recording of the work from David Oistrakh (on Chant du Monde but currently out of the catalogue), dedicatee of No 2 as of No 1, has remained unchallenged for a generation, and Mordkovitch does not always quite match her mentor in the commanding incisiveness of the playing in bravura passages. But there is no lack of power, and the more vital element in this work is the dark reflectiveness of the lyrical themes of the first two movements.

It is not just that Mordkovitch has the benefit of far fuller recording and a less close recording balance, but that her playing has an even wider range of colouring and dynamic than Oistrakh's. She conveys more of the mystery of the work and is perfectly matched by the orchestra. As in the First Concerto the principal horn has a vital role, here crowning each of the first two movements with a solo of ecstatic beauty in the coda. The Russian player on the Chant du Monde version is first-rate, no Slavonic whiner, but the SNO principal is far richer still, with his expressiveness enhanced by the wider dynamic and tonal range of the recording. The range of the recording helps too in the finale, where the Allegro has a satisfyingly barbaric bite, while the scherzando element is delectably pointed, as it is in the first movement too.

In the First Concerto Mordkovitch is hardly less impressive. As in Concerto No 2 one of her strengths lies in the meditative intensity which she brings to the darkly lyrical writing of the first and third movements. Here, too, she has never sounded quite so full and warm of tone on record before. In the brilliant second and fourth movements she may not play with quite the demonic bravura of Oistrakh, but again there is no lack of power, and in place of demonry she gives rustic jollity to the dance rhythms, faithfully reflecting the title of the finale, Burlesque. She is helped by recorded sound far fuller than Oistrakh's. This is a superb disc.

Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2

Shostakovich Violin Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Maxim Vengerov vn; London Symphony Orchestra / Mstislav Rostropovich
Warner Elatus 0927 46742-2 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1994 and 1995 ○○○
Concerto No 1 is a 1995 Gramophone Award winner

There is an astonishing emotional maturity in Vengerov's Shostakovich. He uses Heifetz's bow but it is to David Oistrakh that he is often compared. His vibrato is wider, his manners less consistently refined, and yet the comparison is well founded. Oistrakh made three commercial recordings of the Shostakovich and one can guess that Vengerov has been listening to those earlier Oistrakh renditions as there is nothing radically novel about his interpretation. Some may find Vengerov's impassioned climaxes a shade forced by comparison. Yet he achieves a nobility and poise worlds away from the superficial accomplishment of most modern rivals. He can fine down his tone to the barest whisper; nor is he afraid to make a scorching, ugly sound. While his sometimes slashing quality of articulation is particularly appropriate to the faster movements, the brooding, silver-grey 'Nocturne' comes off superbly too, though it seems perverse that the engineers mute the low tam-tam strokes. Rostropovich has the lower strings dig into the third movement's passacaglia theme with his usual enthusiasm. Indeed the orchestral playing is very nearly beyond reproach.

This is an exceptionally fine peformance of the Second, the desperate bleakness perfectly realised. There has been no finer account since that of the dedicatee, David Oistrakh (Chant du Monde). With Rostropovich rather than Kondrashin on the podium, tempos are comparatively deliberate in the first two movements, but there is no lack of intensity in the solo playing and rather more in the way of light and shade. In the stratospheric writing of the Adagio, Vengerov is technically superb, while the all-pervading atmosphere of desolation has never been more potently conveyed. The finale is more extrovert than some will like, the fireworks irresistible, and yet you do not lose the disquieting sense of a composer at the end of his tether, seemingly contemptuous of his own material.

Need one go on? This is an extraordinary disc.

Shostakovich Violin Concerto No 1
Prokofiev Violin Concerto No 2 in G minor, Op 63
Vadim Repin vn Hallé Orchestra / Kent Nagano
Erato 0630-10696-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ○○

Vadim Repin's interpretation of the Shostakovich comes across as less quintessentially Russian than Vengerov's in its avoidance of rhetorical overkill. Without in any way underplaying the bravura passages (the Scherzo is taken at an incredible speed), he stresses rather the chamber-like intimacy of Shostakovich's score. Rather surprising, perhaps, is the flowing tempo for the slow third movement, but, thanks also to Nagano and the Hallé, we do actually hear the music as a passacaglia. In the 'Nocturne' the tam-tam is perfectly caught here.

Given Repin's dazzling achievement in the Shostakovich concerto, his Prokofiev is a shade disappointing. The violin is less sweetly caught and Repin sometimes makes the kind of uningratiating noises which imply some impatience with the straightforward Romeo and Juliet-style lyricism of the work. The finale sounds spontaneous but the lovely slow movement could do with more space to indulge its sweetly singing lines. However, if the coupling appeals, Repin represents a clear first choice – and anyone who cares about the Shostakovich will want to hear this disc.

Shostakovich Violin Concerto No 1[a]
Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E minor, Op 64[b]
Hilary Hahn vn Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra / [b]Hugh Wolff, [a]Marek Janowski
Sony Classical SK89921 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

Years ago the merest mention of Shostakovich's First Violin Concerto brought just two key stylistic templates to mind: David Oistrakh and, a little later, Leonid Kogan. Oistrakh in particular had fashioned such a warm and intimate reading of the piece that it became almost impossible to imagine a credible alternative. And yet the passing years have brought many, not least Perlman, Mullova, Vengerov and Repin, to name some of the best.

Hilary Hahn is certainly in their league, though different again. She is a lean, athletic player, utterly still at the muted centre of the Concerto's first movement, and with elfin agility in the Scherzo. Hahn is to be preferred, primarily because her sweetness-and-steel tone, with its expressive but narrow vibrato, lends a fresh perspective to the work but also because of Marek Janowski's fine conducting.

Some might find Hahn's approach a trifle cool, especially in the cadenza. Hahn is a very clean player, colour-conscious but never dangerous in the manner of her most rival, Ilya Gringolts, though she does engage in some active dialogue with individual soloists. Only the finale seems a little short on what one might call ambiguous sparks – where sudden ignition could be taken either as celebration or protest – but as fiddle-playing per se, it really does cut the mustard. Among digital rivals Vengerov and Repin (especially) are still tops, though as Hahn is nearer than they are to the honeyed tones of pre-war players some collectors might favour her on that count alone.

As to the coupling, Hahn gives a swift, resilient, bright-toned reading, tender-hearted in the Andante and very fast in the finale. Too fast perhaps for true composure. Still, it's a fine display, and this is a thoroughly fine disc, confirming Hilary Hahn as among the most gifted and individual players on the concert circuit.

Complete Piano Concertos

No 1 C minor for Piano, Trumpet and Strings, Op 35; No 2 in F, Op 102

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 2. The Unforgettable Year 1919, Op 89 – The assault on beautiful Gorky
Dmitri Alexeev pf Philip Jones tpt English Chamber Orchestra / Jerzy Maksymiuk
Classics for Pleasure CD-CFP4547 Ⓑ
(48 minutes: DDD) ●

Shostakovich's piano concertos were written under very different circumstances, yet together they contain some of the composer's most cheerful and enlivening music. The First, with its wealth of perky, memorable tunes, has the addition of a brilliantly-conceived solo trumpet part (delightfully done here by Philip Jones) that also contributes to the work's characteristic stamp. The Second Concerto was written not long after Shostakovich had released a number of the intense works he had concealed during the depths of the Stalin era. It came as a sharp contrast, reflecting as it did the optimism and sense of freedom that followed the death of the Russian dictator. The beauty of the slow movement is ideally balanced by the vigour of the first, and the madcap high spirits of the last. The poignant movement for piano and orchestra from the Suite from the 1951 film The Unforgettable Year 1919, 'The assault on beautiful Gorky', provides an excellent addition to this disc of perceptive and zestful performances by Alexeev. He is most capably supported by the ECO under Maksymiuk, and the engineers have done them proud with a recording of great clarity and finesse. A joyous issue.

Piano Concertos. Three Fantastic Dances, Op 5. Ⓗ
24 Preludes and Fugues, Op 87 – No 1 in C; No 4 in E minor; No 5 in D; No 23 in F; No 24 in D minor
Dmitri Shostakovich pf Ludovic Vaillant tpt French Radio National Orchestra / André Cluytens
EMI Composers in Person mono 754606-2
(76 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1958-59 Ⓕ

Before devoting himself entirely to composition Shostakovich pursued a successful parallel career as a concert pianist, playing mostly romantic repertoire. These recordings were made at a time when he still played his own works in public, and they show him to have been a highly skilled player. His performances of both concertos are quite brilliant, and have a particularly vivacious, outgoing quality. In the First Concerto Ludovic Vaillant plays the trumpet part with character and great virtuosity, and the orchestral playing under Cluytens matches that of the composer in its joyous high spirits.

The three little Fantastic Dances are wittily brought to life. A different, far more serious, academic world is evoked by Shostakovich in his Preludes and Fugues. Here the composer shapes his own long contrapuntal lines with great skill, and these are very compelling, highly concentrated performances. The mono recordings are all very acceptable, save that of the last Prelude and Fugue, where a certain rustiness creeps into the sound. All these items have historical importance, but they also offer many rewards to the listener who is primarily interested in the music.

Film and light music

The Film Album
The Counterplan, Op 33 – Presto; Andante (with Alexander Kerr vn); The Song of the Counterplan.

Alone, Op 26 – March; Galop; Barrel Organ; March; Altai; In Kuzmina's hut; School children; Storm Scene. The Tale of the Silly Little Mouse, Op 56 (arr Cornall). Hamlet, Op 116 – Introduction; Palace Music; Ball at the Castle; Ball; In the Garden; Military Music; Scene of the Poisoning. The Great Citizen, Op 55 – Funeral March. Sofia Perovskaya, Op 132 – Waltz. Pirogov, Op 76*a* (arr Atovmian) – Scherzo; Finale. The Gadfly, Op 97 – Romance (Kerr)
Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Riccardo Chailly
Decca 460 792-2DH (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

Only ardent film buffs and die-hard Shostakovich completists will cavil at this selection of Chailly's rather offbeat collection, cutting across as it does several more serious-minded projects. He gives us some genuine novelties too. 'The Song of the Counterplan' (track 3) was transmogrified into an MGM production number in the 1940s for the film Thousands Cheer. The 'Funeral March' from The Great Citizen turns up again in the 11th Symphony (track 22). And the much later 'Waltz' from Sofia Perovskaya is also unfamiliar. Less committed listeners should perhaps sample track 11 for Shostakovich's take on the spooky weirdness of the theremin, and track 25 for the ubiquitous 'Romance' from The Gadfly.

There may be no great music here – some of the darker numbers from Hamlet come closest with their echoes of Stepan Razin and the 13th Symphony – but with music-making of this quality it scarcely matters. Chailly has rarely sounded so unbuttoned in the studio and the selection is generous, if random. Only the final chord of the 'Finale' from Pirogov is a bit of a puzzle. Given the top-notch Decca production values on display, what sounds here like a drop-out or similar technical fault could be either the conductor executing a tricksy hairpin diminuendo or Shostakovich perpetrating a Mahler 7-type joke. Warmly recommended in any event.

The Dance Album

Moscow-Cheryomushki, Op 105 – concert suite (ed Cornall). The Bolt – ballet suite, Op 27*a* (1934 version). The Gadfly, Op 97 – Overture; The Cliff; Youth; Box on the Ear; Barrel Organ; Contredanse; Galop; At the Market Place; The Rout; The Passage of Montanelli; Finale; The Austrians; Gemma's Room
Philadelphia Orchestra / Riccardo Chailly
Decca 452 597-2DH (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

Although entitled 'The Dance Album', interestingly only one of the items on this disc (The Bolt) is actually derived from music conceived specifically for dance. However, what the disc reveals is that Shostakovich's fondness for dance forms frequently found expression in his other theatrical/film projects. The world première recording of a suite of four episodes from the 1959 operetta Moscow-Cheryomushki will be of particular interest to Shostakovich devotees. Despite the somewhat mundane plot, the score produces some surprisingly attractive and entertaining numbers, most notably perhaps the invigorating 'A spin through Moscow' and the 'Waltz'. For the suite from the ballet The Bolt Chailly brings us the less frequently heard 1934 version in which the composer dropped two of the eight numbers and changed some of the titles in order to deflect from the story-line of the ballet. Lots of parody and plenty of Shostakovich with his tongue planted firmly in his cheek is what we get, and if this aspect of the composer's output appeals then you will certainly enjoy Chailly's and his players' spirited and colourfully buoyant performances of this energetic score. Less familiar light is also shed on the music from the film The Gadfly which is heard here in a version which brings together 13 of the score's episodes and preserves Shostakovich's original orchestration, as opposed to the suite prepared and re-orchestrated by Levin Atovmyan. All the performances on the disc are superbly delivered and the recorded sound is excellent.

The Jazz Album

Jazz Suites Nos 1 and 2. Taiti trot, Op 16
Concerto for Piano, Trumpet and Strings in C minor, Op 35
^{a}Peter Masseurs tpt ^{a}Ronald Brautigam pf
Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Riccardo Chailly
Decca 433 702-2DH (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ ●●

Shostakovich's lively and endearing forays into the popular music of his time were just that, and light years away from the work of real jazz masters such as, say Jelly Roll Morton or Duke Ellington And yet they do say something significant about Shostakovich's experience of jazz, as a comparison of these colourful, Chaplinesque Jazz Suites with roughly contemporaneous music by Gershwin, Milhaud, Martinu, Roussel and others will prove. Shostakovich engaged in a particularly brittle almost Mahlerian form of parody – his concert works are full of it – and that is what comes across most powerfully here. Besides, and as annotator Elizabeth Wilson rightly observes, 'real' jazz was treated with suspicion in Soviet Russia and Shostakovich's exposure to it was therefore limited.

The two Jazz Suites were composed in the 1930s, the First in response to a competition to 'raise the level of Soviet jazz from popular cafe music to music with a professional status', the Second at the request of the then-newly formed State Orchestra for Jazz (!). The First will make you chuckle, but it is the Second (subtitled 'Suite for Promenade Orchestra') that contains the best music, especially its achingly nostalgic Second Waltz. The instrumentation is light (the saxophone and accordion add a touch of spice to a generally bland recipe), while the playing here is quite superb. In fact, there's little to be said about Chailly's direction other than that it is good-humoured, affectionate and utterly professional, his Royal Concertgebouw players sound at home in every bar and the recording (Grotezaal, Concertgebouw) is both clean and ambient.

Taiti trot came to life when Nikolai Malko challenged Shostakovich to score Vincent Youmans's Tea for Two in an hour, or less – which he did, as a sort of mini-concerto for orchestra, each refrain being dealt to different instrumental forces. Fun that it is, its charm is terminal. Which leaves the Piano Concerto, music that for sophistication and inventive ingenuity is actually closer to what we now think of as jazz than the Jazz Suites (sample the free-wheeling, improvisatory opening to the last movement, on track 7).

Ronald Brautigam's instrument is twangy at the bass end, which mightn't seem too inappropriate, but as it was recorded two years before the other items on the disc (1988), I doubt that that was the intention. Still, it's a lively and fairly intense reading, neatly supported by Chailly and trumpeter Peter Masseurs, but ultimately less memorable than Alexeev (HMV Classics) or Jablonski or the composer himself (both nla).

The Golden Age

Royal Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra / Gennadi Rozhdestvensky
Chandos ② CHAN9251/2 (134 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

The Golden Age (1930) is an industrial exhibition organised in a capitalist country, at which a group of Soviet sportsmen have been invited to compete. The general idea of Shostakovich's characterization is to differentiate between goodies and baddies by assigning them respectively healthy-folk and decadent-bourgeois idioms. But then the trouble was, he couldn't stop himself enjoying being decadent.

Not all of the 37 movements stand up independently of the stage-action. But the finales and the whole of Act 3 are top-notch stuff, at times surprisingly threatening in tone and symphonic in continuity; and there are several movements which could undoubtedly be promoted alongside the four in the familiar concert suite (the Tap Dance of Act 2 is especially appealing, for instance). Those who know their Shostakovich will be constantly intrigued by foretastes of Lady Macbeth, the Fourth Symphony and the Hamlet music, and by the appearance of Shostakovich's 'Tea for Two' arrangement as an Interlude in Act 2.

This first complete recording is a major coup for Chandos. Admittedly not even their flattering engineering can disguise a certain lack of confidence and idiomatic flair on the part of the Royal Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra.

But let that not deter anyone with the least interest in Shostakovich, or ballet music, or Soviet music, or indeed Soviet culture as a whole, from investigating this weird and intermittently wonderful score. A really fascinating disc.

Complete Symphonies

No 1 in F minor, Op 10; No 2 in B, Op 14, 'To October'; No 3 in E flat, Op 20, 'The first of May'; No 4 in G minor, Op 43; No 5 in D minor, Op 47; No 6 in B minor, Op 54; No 7 in C, Op 60, 'Leningrad'; No 8 in C minor, Op 65; No 9 in E flat, Op 70; No 10 in E minor, Op 93; No 11 in G minor, Op 103, 'The year 1905'; No 12 in D minor, Op 112, 'The year 1917'; No 13 in B flat minor, Op 113, 'Babiy Yar'; No 14, Op 135; No 15 in A, Op 141

Symphonies Nos 1 and 3[a]
London Philharmonic [a]Choir and Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca London 425 063-2DM (65 minutes: ADD/DDD)
Texts and translations included. Ⓜ
Recorded 1980-81
The cycle is also available as an 11-disc set: 🏵
444 430-2LC11 Ⓑ

Symphonies Nos 2[a] and 10
London Philharmonic [a]Choir and Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca London 425 064-2DM (76 minutes: ADD/DDD)
Texts and translations included. Ⓜ
Recorded 1981

Symphony No 4
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca London 425 065-2DM (68 minutes: ADD/DDD)
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1979 Ⓜ

Awards 1982/83

Symphony Nos 5[a] and 9[b]
[a]Concertgebouw Orchestra; [b]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca London 425 066-2DM Ⓜ
(76 minutes: ADD/DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1981 ◉◉◉

Symphony Nos 6 and 12
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca London 425 067-2DM (74 minutes: ADD/DDD)
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1983 Ⓜ

Symphony No 7
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca London 425 068-2DM (79 minutes: ADD/DDD)
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1979 Ⓜ

Symphony No 8
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca London 425 071-2DM (62 minutes: ADD/DDD)
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1982 Ⓜ

Symphony No 11
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca London 425 072-2DM (61 minutes: ADD/DDD)
Texts and translations included Ⓜ
Recorded 1983 ◉

Symphony No 13
Marius Rintzler bass Concertgebouw Choir and Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca London 425 073-2DM (64 minutes: ADD/DDD) Texts and translations included Ⓜ
Recorded 1982 ◉

Symphony No 14. Six Marina Tsvetaeva Poems, Op 143
Julia Varady sop Ortrun Wenkel contr Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca London 425 074-2DM
(72 minutes: ADD/DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1980 Ⓜ ●

Symphony No 15[a]. From Jewish Folk Poetry, Op 79[b]
Elisabeth Söderström sop Ortrun Wenkel contr Ryszard Karczykowski ten [a]London Philharmonic Orchestra; [b]Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca London 425 069-2DM (73 minutes: ADD/DDD)
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1978 Ⓜ

This, the first complete Western cycle of the symphonies, conducted by Bernard Haitink, returns to the catalogue at mid price, Decca having jettisoned a few minor works and decoupled several major ones. It is hard to argue with this presentation when it includes modern annotations and full recording data. Concerned for tradition, and with the need to challenge it, the young Shostakovich could be classical and modern, polemical and prankish by turns. Haitink, not entirely po-faced, turns in a thoroughly decent account of the First Symphony, missing just a little of the element of pastiche. The recoupling with the Third does strike sparks, the language of the later music variously foreshadowed in divergent contexts. In the Fourth, Haitink offers no stupendous revelations, content to bring out the dignity of the writing in a piece where we have come to expect something more sensational, less perfectly controlled. His outer movements are helpfully split, by additional cues – but his literalness and sobriety fall short of the ideal, as, marginally, does the playing.

Haitink's Fifth, deeply considered and almost indecently well upholstered, is not easy to assess. Originally greeted with extreme reverence, it is an earnest attempt to make structural sense of the music's grand symphonic aspirations. It is only because the orchestral playing is generally so immaculate that one registers the curious glitch 2'13" into the Largo. That movement is less affecting than it can be, yet the preceding Allegretto is triumphantly brought off as a heavy-footed Mahlerian ländler. Then again, the first movement's long-limbed second subject chugs along reluctantly, dourly unphrased, with none of the easeful balm found in other interpretations. Haitink's Fifth is now generously paired with his solid, untrivial but scarcely earth-shattering Ninth. His Sixth and 12th are characterised by playing of gravitas and tonal splendour. This 12th could be seen as the 'best' modern version.

The Leningrad is another matter. It has rightly been praised for its symphonic integrity and splendid sound. Haitink's stoical view of the Eighth is highly impressive, though not very varied in mood. Curiously, the finale is mis-cued. Kurt Sanderling's reading (Berlin Classics) is also highly impressive. The 10th has always seemed less dependent on a conductor steeped in the Russian tradition, and the only drawback of Haitink's well-played, well-recorded account is his unsubtle, over-confident tone in the enigmatic third movement Allegretto. There is real demonic abandon in the Scherzo. Karajan's 10th (DG) is very desirable but he offers no makeweight. Haitink offers a well-prepared account of No 2, where the choral contribution has the odd awkward moment but the overall effect is very arresting. His 11th too has such weight and precision that his customary detachment is mostly less noticeable than his phenomenal control. Haitink's 13th boasts another of Decca's huge, reverberant recordings, of such 'cinematic' brilliance and range that it threatens to dwarf the music-making. The chorus and orchestra are on terrific form and the soloist, Marius Rintzler, would seem to be at one with Haitink's brooding approach (reviewed further on).

As one of the first of Shostakovich's late scores to be taken seriously in the West, it is odd that the 14th should have been so poorly represented in the CD catalogue. Haitink's polyglot reading does not really represent a viable solution – too much vital and specific tone colour is lost along with the original note-values. To make matters worse, Fischer-Dieskau is in hectoring mode and both soloists' proximity to the microphones makes for uncomfortable listening, though the orchestral contribution is excellent. Barshai (Russian Disc) can lay claim to absolute authenticity. It is a fascinating document, as he and Vishnevskaya rage against the dying of the light in every song, slicing seconds (sometimes minutes) off the timings of the Western account. Generally speaking the sound is close and crude, by no means intolerable but sufficiently prone to distortion to inhibit a general recommendation. In its way, however, this disc is indispensable.

Haitink's 15th has always been highly regarded, despite some less than needle-sharp contributions from the percussion where it matters most. At medium price, and with a rather high-level transfer of its coupling (whose historical significance is ably outlined in the insert-note), this merits a place at or near the top of anyone's list. To sum up: Haitink's set, superbly engineered, is nothing if not reliable. For those who prize technical finesse over raw passion, Haitink remains a plausible first choice.

Symphony No 1

Symphonies Nos 1 and 6
Scottish National Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Chandos CHAN8411 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1984-85

The First Symphony, the 19-year-old composer's graduation piece from the then Leningrad Conservatory in 1925, may be indebted to Stravinsky, Prokofiev, Tchaikovsky and even Scriabin. But it rarely sounds like anything other than pure Shostakovich. The sophisticated mask of its first movement is drawn aside for a slow movement of Slav melancholy and foreboding, and the finale brilliantly stage-manages a way out. The Sixth (1939) takes the familiar Shostakovichian extremes of explosive activity and uneasy contemplation (that the composer reconciles in the finale of the First) and separates them into individual movements. Two swift movements (a mercurial but menacing Scherzo, and a real knees-up of a finale) follow on from an opening Largo whose slow lyrical declamations eventually all but freeze into immobility. Järvi has a will (and Chandos, the engineering) to explore the extremes of pace, mood and dynamics of both symphonies; his account of the First Symphony convinces precisely because those extremes intensify as the work progresses. Some may crave a fuller, firmer string sound, but the passionate intensity of the playing (in all departments) is never in doubt.

Symphony No 4

Shostakovich Symphony No 4
Britten Russian Funeral
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 555476-2 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

This could just be the most important Western recording of the Fourth since the long-deleted Ormandy and Previn versions. Naturally, it complements rather than replaces Kondrashin's reading (Chant du Monde), taped shortly after the work's belated unveiling in December 1961: papery strings and lurid brass cannot disguise that conductor's unique authority even when Shostakovich's colouristic effects are muted by rudimentary Soviet sound engineering. In his recording, Rattle's approach is more obviously calculated, supremely brilliant but just a little cold. A certain firmness and self-confidence is obvious from the first. The restrained Hindemithian episode is relatively square, the first climax superbly built. The second group unfolds seamlessly with the glorious espressivo of the strings not much threatened by the not very mysterious intrusions of harp and bass clarinet. Tension builds again, some way into the development, with the lacerating intensity of the strings' moto perpetuo fugato passage.

Six miraculously terraced discords herald the two-faced recapitulation. Kondrashin and Järvi (Chandos) find more emotional inevitability in Shostakovich's destabilizing tactics hereabouts. Rattle doesn't quite locate a compensating irony, although his closing bars are convincingly icy, with nicely audible gong. Even in Rattle's experienced hands, the finale is not all plain sailing. The initial quasi-Mahlerian march is underpinned by disappointingly fuzzy timpani strokes which lose the point of their own lopsidedness. But then the section's mock-solemn climax is simply tremendous (and tremendously loud). The incisive Allegro is launched with (deliberate?) abruptness at an unbelievably fast tempo and, even if the music doesn't always make sense at this pace, the results are breathtaking. The denouement is approached with real flair. A superbly characterised trombone solo, hushed expectant strings and the most ambiguous of all Shostakovich perorations is unleashed with devastating force. The coda is mightily impressive too. After this, the Britten encore risks seeming beside the point; this really is emotional play-acting. In sum, neither Kondrashin's nor Järvi's more direct emotional involvement are easily passed over. On the other hand, Rattle does give us a thrilling example of what a relatively objective, thoroughly 'modern' approach has to offer today. With its huge dynamic range and uncompromising, analytical style, EMI's recording pulls no punches, and the awesome precision of the CBSO's playing makes for an unforgettable experience.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 4
Coupling: Symphony No 8
National Symphony Orchestra / Rostropovich
Warners Ultima ② 8573-87799-2
(DDD: recorded 1992) Ⓑ

Rostropovich's Fourth is an extremely fine reading, verging on self-recommendation; the Eighth isn't quite so good but at this price no one's going to complain!

Symphony No 5

Symphony No 5. Ballet Suite No 5, Op 27*a*
Scottish National Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Chandos CHAN8650 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988

There are more Shostakovich Fifths than you can shake a stick at in the catalogue, and several of them are very good. Järvi's makes perhaps the safest recommendation of them all: it has a generous coupling (which cannot be said of many of its rivals), it has no drawbacks (save, for some tastes, a slight touch of heart-on-sleeve in the slow movement) and a number of distinct advantages. A profound seriousness, for one thing, and an absolute sureness about the nature of the finale, which many conductors feel the need to exaggerate, either as brassy optimism or as bitter irony. Järvi takes it perfectly straight, denying neither option, and the progression from slow movement (the overtness of its emotion finely justified) to finale seems more natural, less of a jolt than usual. The SNO cannot rival the sheer massiveness of sound of some of the continental orchestras who have recorded this work, but while listening one hardly notices the lack, so urgent and polished is the playing. A very natural recording, too, and the lengthy Suite (eight movements from Shostakovich's early ballet The Bolt, forming an exuberantly entertaining essay on the various modes that his sense of humour could take) makes much more than a mere fill-up.

Symphony No 5[a]
Chamber Symphony, Op. 110a
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Mariss Jansons

EMI 556442-2 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
^{a}Recorded live in 1997

Setting a course somewhere between Sanderling's grey-faced stoicism and Bernstein's relentless exposure of nerve-endings, Jansons exercises tight technical control, imparting rather less in the way of inner character. As usual he goes for maximal rhythmic clarity, smooth legato lines and extreme dynamic contrasts. Inevitably, some will feel that the luscious string sound only gets in the way and there are a few agogic touches. Isn't there something unnatural about the shift up a gear in the first-movement development (around 8'00"), the cliff-edge dynamics of the slow movement, the self-conscious pacing of the start of the finale?

More positively, there are some wonderfully sustained pianissimos from both strings and winds – try the return of the first movement's second subject (from 12'26"). EMI's recording is not quite ideal, cavernous and a little occluded in the bass; the presence of an audience is never betrayed and does not seem to have influenced the character of the music-making. The Chamber Symphony is distinguished by its unique atmosphere. If the magnificent Vienna strings are arguably too suave, it is also the conductor's coolly calculated conception that lacks the last ounce of brutality.

Symphonies Nos 5^{a} and 6^{b} 🄷
Philadelphia Orchestra / Leopold Stokowski
Dutton Laboratories mono CDAX8017 Ⓜ
(79 minutes: ADD). Recorded ^{b}1940 and ^{a}1942

Edward Johnson's useful notes seek to portray Stokowski as 'one of the foremost interpreters of a great 20th-century composer', but what will strike many younger listeners at first is the 'period' quality of these performances. While the playing as such is enormously impressive, the interpretations even relatively 'straight', Stokowski's use of (carefully rehearsed) portamento to create a languorous legato line at emotional peaks is wholly out of step with current thinking. And contemporary recordings of this repertoire from published scores are much less prone to copyist's error.

Stokowski sets a sensible speed for the first movement of the Fifth and at once one is aware of the lustrous quality of the Philadelphia strings. The long-limbed second subject is indescribably luscious, taken at a deliberate tempo not exactly signalled by the preceding bars. The effect is repeated in the recapitulation. The Scherzo is rather uncomfortable, almost a gabble with details smudged, but the slow movement – huge portamentos at the start of course – is marvellous and has great depth of feeling.

Stokowski's reading of the Sixth is if anything even finer, the recording rather firmer too. A surprisingly deliberate tempo for the first movement is effortlessly sustained throughout. The second movement is here sometimes more piercingly loud than you feel the conductor would have wanted, but the Presto finale is the surprise, relatively steady to bring parallels with the Prokofiev of the Classical Symphony. There is an odd break 3'28" into the movement.

Stokowski gave the Sixth its Western première and this was its first recording. He remade both symphonies in the LP era but these earlier versions are preferable, glamorised only at the most superficial level: the warmth and intensity are real. Michael Dutton's transfers are, as ever, technically adroit, removing all trace of swish to present the musical information in its purest form even if this means uprooting and remaking the sound too radically for some ears. There are of course excellent recordings of both symphonies in stereo, but Stokowski's pioneering efforts should not be overlooked.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 5
London Symphony Orchestra / Previn 🏵
RCA 74321 24212-2 (76 minutes: ADD: 5/66^{R}) Ⓢ
André Previn's classic 1960s recording of the Fifth still figures among the very finest accounts, and at this price it represents a superb bargain.

Symphony No 6

Symphonies Nos 6 and No 10
Dallas Symphony Orchestra / Andrew Litton
Delos ② DE3283 (83 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 2000

Apparently far more difficult to bring off than the 10th Symphony, the Sixth here receives a performance of profound insight, and with no extraneous fuss. From the first phrase of his beautifully shaped opening Largo, Litton is right inside the idiom. And he stays there through the scherzo, following its phantasmagorical progress like a boy going goggle-eyed from one grotesque circus-act to another. Virtually matching Mravinsky for intensity, he drives the manic finale as though there is something behind the musicians that won't bite so long as they don't turn round to look at it.

Litton's latest version of the 10th (he's recorded it once before for Virgin) still doesn't cut the mustard, however. Though the Dallas Symphony players pull out all the stops, once again the performance is marred by applied nuances that speak of careful rehearsal rather than true conviction. Overall, the 10th offers no serious challenge to Karajan's classic account. But a truly great performance of the Sixth.

Symphony No 7

Symphonies Nos 1 and 7
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG ② 427 632-2GH2 (120 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1988 OO

The Leningrad Symphony was composed in haste as the Nazis sieged and bombarded the city (in 1941). It caused an immediate sensation, but posterity has been less enthusiastic. What business has the first movement's unrelated long central 'invasion' episode doing in a symphonic movement? Is the material of the finale really distinctive enough for its protracted treatment? Michael Oliver, in his original Gramophone review, wrote that in this performance 'the symphony sounds most convincingly like a symphony, and one needing no programme to justify it'. Added to which the work's epic and cinematic manner has surely never been more powerfully realised. These are live recordings, with occasional noise from the audience (and the conductor), but the Chicago Orchestra has rarely sounded more polished or committed. The strings are superb in the First Symphony, full and weightily present, and Bernstein's manner here is comparably bold and theatrical of gesture. A word of caution: set your volume control carefully for the Leningrad Symphony's start; it is scored for six of both trumpets and trombones and no other recording has reproduced them so clearly, and to such devastating effect.

Symphony No 7 in C, 'Leningrad', Op 60
Cologne Radio Symphony Orchestra / Rudolf Barshai
Regis Records RRC1074 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded live in 1992 ●

With the disappearance of the Melodiya catalogue (at least in the UK), seekers after truth – or at least some measure of authenticity – in their Shostakovich symphonies will have to look elsewhere. One option is to investigate the recordings made outside Russia by musicians closely associated with the composer. Rudolf Barshai certainly qualifies for inclusion in this select group. Certain musicians seem to have found him more pernickety than inspirational, but Sviatoslav Richter for one praised his honesty and professionalism. Now, belatedly, cult status has arrived, thanks in part to the 'underground' success of a live account of Mahler's Fifth Symphony.

It is idle to pretend that the players of Bernstein's Chicago Symphony need look to their laurels. Nor does Barshai feel the need to go for broke (and bombast?) in the Bernstein manner. That said, his first movement is both 'felt' and fluent, the main material presented with convincing elegance and lucidity at a flowing pace. Barshai's slow movement glows with (rather than oozes) compassion, and it is principally in the finale that the conducting doesn't always succeed in disguising the fact that Shostakovich was, of necessity, composing on automatic pilot. Even here, timps are well tuned, and Barshai's diligence is always readily apparent in the detailed phrasing of his strings. The recorded sound has been well managed too, the crystalline textures obtained by the conductor and the attractively spacious acoustic compensating for a relatively constricted dynamic range and limited bass response. This disc is a clear winner in its price range: it is vastly superior to Ladislav Slovák's bargain basement alternative on Naxos. Expect a few fluffs and some audience noise and you won't be disappointed.

Symphony No 8

London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn
HMV Classics HMV5 74370-2 (61 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1973 ●●

The Eighth Symphony, written in 1943, two years after the Leningrad, offers a wiser, more bitterly disillusioned Shostakovich. The heroic peroration of the Seventh's finale is here replaced by numbed whimsy and eventual uneasy calm. André Previn has since re-recorded the Eighth (DG) but this youthful account serves to remind us that the music is the product of a young man's imagination. The remake has greater breadth in every sense and, note for note, the orchestral playing is often finer. Even so the urgency of this earlier version is to be preferred. At that time, Previn seemed content to add a patina of mid-Atlantic gloss, and a good deal of subtlety, to the raw expressivity of the earlier Soviet recordings; he had not yet adopted the self-consciously epic manner thought appropriate today. With Sanderling among the few who know how to bring off the symphony as a gloomy and spiritless in memoriam, the lithe freshness of the Previn remains a compelling alternative. EMI's transfer is punchy and focused, but the orchestra seems smaller than before, drier and cleaner in the bass.

Shostakovich Symphony No 8
Mozart Symphony No 33 in B flat, K319
Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra / Evgeny Mravinsky
BBC Legends/IMG Artists ② BBCL4002-2 Ⓜ
(82 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1960 ●

There was a time when Mravinsky's greatness had to be taken on trust, such was the paucity of his representation in the record catalogues. The situation has been transformed in recent years; hence this version of the Shostakovich has to find its niche in a market-place documenting the orchestra's prowess in the piece from the 1940s to the 1980s. In a variety of different transfers (and at a variety of different pitches) Mravinsky's March 1982 concert performance is widely known. But in 1960, when the orchestra made an epochal visit to these shores with Rostropovich, Rozhdestvensky and Shostakovich himself in tow, the work had never been heard here and was unavailable on disc. Small wonder the event was such a sensation, with the November 1960 Gramophone leading the call for new recordings of the Soviet repertoire played on the tour.

Mravinsky was a conductor in the Karajan mould both in his undemonstrative, albeit politically ratified, exercise of authority and the way in which his interpretations remained broadly consistent from one decade to the next. The authentic timbre of the Leningrad Philharmonic is there for all to hear – the winds tearing into their phrases like scalded cats, the string sound huge and inimitable, dominating the sound-stage and yet never fat or complacent.

In almost every respect, Mravinsky's London performance lives up to its legendary status, and the sound has been reprocessed to yield excellent results in compartmentalised stereo. Unfortunately, the listeners in the hall are surprisingly restless. The first movement is patiently built, stoic, even bleaker than usual from this source and with only minor technical imperfections: the problem is the veritable barrage of coughing. The power and control of the second and third movements is awesome by any standards and here the audience is less intrusive. In the finale, Mravinsky keeps a tight rein on his players, adopting marginally slower tempos and securing finer results than he did in 1982. This is the conductor at his peak. The climax is cataclysmic with the paying public at last stunned into silence during the magical coda.

Shostakovich dedicated the symphony to Mravinsky, and it is for this work that most people will want to acquire the set.

Symphony No 10

Shostakovich Symphonies Nos 1^{a} and 10^{b}.
Concerto for Piano, Trumpet and Strings, Op 35^{c}
Mussorgsky^{b} (orch Shostakovich) Songs and Dances of Death
^{b}Robert Lloyd bass ^{c}Mikhail Rudy pf ^{c}Ole Edvard Antonsen tpt ^{ac}Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; ^{b}Philadelphia Orchestra / Mariss Jansons
EMI Double Forte ② 575178-2 (DDD) Ⓜ
^{ab}Recorded 1994

In the West the 10th Symphony is now widely regarded as the finest of the cycle of 15, not just for its sheer depth of personal feeling, but because it finds the purest and subtlest musical representation of that feeling. Perhaps this is why it is less dependent than some of Shostakovich's major works on a conductor steeped in the Russian idiom. Anyone expecting a welter of hairpin diminuendos and expressive nudges will be disappointed by Jansons's Shostakovich – solid, sturdy and rhythmically taut rather than overly individualistic. Jansons's first movement is basically brisk, with thrustful strings and conscientiously Soviet-style woodwind. It is a cogent enough view and yet the sense of underlying desolation is lacking, despite the conductor's vocal exhortations. The Scherzo is brilliantly articulated – even if the relatively leisurely pace robs the music of its potential to intimidate. The 'difficult' third movement is more convincing. The main body of the finale is launched with precise rhythmic clarity rather than irrepressible enthusiasm. In short, this is an excellent, sometimes dazzling choice among modern versions but it may strike seasoned listeners as slightly sterile. There is more passion in the Mussorgsky. Robert Lloyd is curiously under-represented on CD in the Russian repertoire that suits him so well. His admirers are bound to want this performance, which is very impressive as sheer singing. Throughout the disc, the close focus of the recording exposes a few instances of less than perfect synchronisation but with playing so spectacularly accomplished, this must be counted an outstanding achievement in its way.

Symphony No 10
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG 439 036-2GHS (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1981 ●

Few works give a deeper insight into the interior landscape of the Russian soul than the 10th Symphony of Shostakovich, and this is a powerful and gripping account of what is, by general consent, Shostakovich's masterpiece. Karajan has the measure of its dramatic sweep and brooding atmosphere, as well as its desolation and sense of tragedy. Haitink's is nowhere near so intense or for that matter so well played, though the recording has impressive transparency of detail. There are many things here (the opening of the finale, for example) which are even more succesful than in Karajan's 1966 recording (DG Galleria), though the main body of the finale still feels too fast – however, it is (at crochet=176) what the composer asked for. His earlier account of the first movement is for some more moving – particularly the poignant coda. However, the differences are not significant and this is hardly less impressive. The CD enjoys the usual advantages of greater range and presence, and deserves a strong recommendation.

Additional recommendation
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Karajan
DG Galleria 429 713-2GGA (51 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Karajan's powerful 1966 recording is a steal at mid price.

Symphony No 11

Symphony No 11 in G minor, 'The Year 1905', Op 103
London Symphony Orchestra / Mstislav Rostropovich 🏆
LSO Live LSO0030 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded live in 2002 ●●●

The critical reputation of Shostakovich's cinematic evocation of the first Russian Revolution of 1905 has been rising of late. Not that our supposed ability to 'decode' a subtext has led inexorably to readings of superior insight.

Rostropovich clearly has something unique to say about this work, transcending any doubts about his conducting technique per se. On its initial appearance nearly a decade ago, his studio recording had some negative press, but there was real atmosphere in it and an epic breadth from which so many performers have shied away. That conception remains basically unchanged here, and the buzz of a special event is felt from the start in the eerie, almost inaudible breath of sound with which the strings conjure up the frozen hush and epic breadth of Mother Russia. While there are few notes on the page – at Rostropovich's tempo, they seem fewer than ever – the atmosphere is potent indeed. His reading is surprisingly objective until the build up to the 'Bloody Sunday' massacre. Here, you can't miss the trombones' astonishing, leering glissandi. Nor the bizarre, highly personal nuancing at the very height of the clamour, something which must surely pall on repetition.

The opening paragraph of the finale is articulated with tremendous cut and thrust, the sheer heft of the strings mightily impressive. So, too, in a quite different way, is the evocative cor anglais solo from track 4, 9'42".

All in all, this has to be one of the strongest releases yet from LSO Live, not least because the production team seem to have come to terms with the 'improved' Barbican Hall; there is more depth and distance now, with instruments more convincingly 'placed' and string sonorities realistically full. At the price, this sweeps the board. Play loud or not at all.

Symphony No 13

Marius Rintzler bass Concertgebouw Orchestra Choir (male voices); Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Decca 425 073-2DM (64 minutes: DDD). Notes, texts and translations included. Recorded 1984 Ⓜ ●●

With one single reservation Haitink's account of Babiy Yar is superb. The reservation is that Marius Rintzler, although he has all the necessary blackness and gravity and is in amply sonforous voice, responds to the anger and the irony and the flaming denunciations of Yevtushenko's text with scarcely a trace of the histrionic fervour they cry out for. The excellent chorus, though, is very expressive and it makes up for a lot, as does the powerful and sustained drama of Haitink's direction. He has solved the difficult problems of pacing a symphony with three slow movements (one is gripped throughout) and the atmosphere of each movement is vividly evoked, with a particular care for the subtleties of Shostakovich's orchestration. The orchestral sound, indeed, is magnificent: one can readily believe that the huge forces called for in the score were actually provided, but this does not necessitate any unnatural focusing on (say) the celeste in order that it shall register. The perspective is very natural throughout, and there is an excellent sense of the performance taking place in a believable space.

Symphony No 14

Symphony No 14. Two Pieces for String Quartet (arr Sikorski)
Margareta Haverinen sop Petteri Salomaa bass Tapiola Sinfonietta / Joseph Swensen
Ondine ODE845-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1994-95 ●

The multilingual version of the 14th Symphony was sanctioned by the composer but it remains a rarity on disc; some vital and specific tone colour is lost along with the original note values, and the 'three lilies' adorn the grave of 'The Suicide' more elegantly in the Russian. Haitink may not agree. He elected to use the multilingual text in his 1980 recording and now Joseph Swensen presents this compelling alternative. We tend to take sonic excellence for granted these days but this is a true state-of-the-art recording with the soloists more naturally placed than in the rival Decca issue and an orchestral sound combining great clarity with just enough hall resonance. The performance has character too, if lacking the pervasive chill of the earliest Soviet accounts. The conductor secures excellent results from the Tapiola Sinfonietta.

Of the soloists, the bass-baritone Petteri Salomaa is particularly impressive: his is a voice of rare tonal beauty, a Billy Budd rather than a Boris. His pronunciation is a little odd at times, but you may not see this as a problem. Tempos are perceptibly more 'extreme' than Haitink's, with the opening 'De profundis' dangerously slow in the modern manner and a strikingly well-characterised instrumental contribution to 'A la Santé' ('In the Santé Prison'). The fillers, larger than life, brilliantly dispatched and curiously inappropriate, are based on original quartet pieces which only came to light in the mid-1980s. The first shares material with Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk; the second appears as the polka from The Age of Gold! This is nevertheless a more rewarding, more probingly conducted disc than most of the current Shostakovich crop.

Symphony No 15

Symphonies Nos 1 and 15
Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra / Jesús López-Cobos
Telarc CD80572 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

These are extremely well played and cleanly recorded performances, and in a field surprisingly lacking in strong contenders they deserve serious consideration. By dint of careful preparation López-Cobos brings exceptional clarity to the First Symphony, forcing you to admire afresh the sheer inventiveness of the teenage Shostakovich's counterpoint. His Cincinnati players are suave, without ever sounding emotionally complacent, and they seem to appreciate better than most Western orchestras the extraordinary depth of feeling at the heart of the finale. That said, there is little of the bite and sheer recklessness that make Kondrashin's interpretation so special, though sadly that classic version is hampered by poor recording quality, and the Moscow Philharmonic's first oboe in the slow movement is excruciating.

López-Cobos's account of Symphony No 15 lacks a fanatical edge in the fast movements, a sense of mystery in the slow ones and of strangeness throughout, but this Cincinnati version is as good as anything currently available, and certainly better than the over-praised Haitink, Rostropovich or Sanderling. López-Cobos plays the symphony straight and keeps the stylistically competing elements in balance. He negotiates the treacherous finale successfully, building the passacaglia to a properly passionate climax.

Complete String Quartets

No 1 in C, Op 49; No 2 in A, Op 68; No 3 in F, Op 73; No 4 in D, Op 83; No 5 in B flat, Op 92; No 6 in G, Op 101; No 7 in F sharp minor, Op 108; No 8 in C minor, Op 110; No 9 in E flat, Op 117; No 10 in A flat, Op 118; No 11 in F minor, Op 122; No 12 in D flat, Op 133; No 13 in B flat minor, Op 138; No 14 in F sharp minor, Op 142; No 15 in E flat minor, Op 144

Awards 1977

String Quartets Nos 1-15
Fitzwilliam Quartet (Christopher Rowland, Jonathan Sparey vns Alan George va Ioan Davies vc) Decca ⑥ 455 776-2LC6 Ⓑ
(377 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1975-77 ○○○

If Shostakovich's cycle of 15 symphonies can be said to represent a musical thread passing through the whole of the composer's public life, then it can be argued that his cycle of 15 string quartets represents the private persona of the man behind the mask, from the beginning of his personal anguish in the late 1930s, until his death in 1975. At the time of his First Quartet, composed in 1938, he was already an experienced and respected composer with five symphonies to his credit as well as much music for stage and film. Thenceforth his symphonic music inscrutably presented the emotions – albeit largely ironically – that the State expected from its leading composer, while the quartets provided an outlet for the emotions within and for his personal responses to the events taking place in the world around him. If the music is rich in irony, then the language the composer uses is straightforward, with a defined tonality, simple melodies, uncluttered rhythms and clear textures. There is only one possible composer, so recognizably individual is the voice.

The Fitzwilliam Quartet originally recorded its cycle in the mid-1970s, shortly after a concentrated period of study with the composer. Despite being recorded in analogue, the sound quality is still remarkably good. The group has a remarkable understanding of the idiom and of the music's underlying motivation. In the First Quartet it captures the uneasy mood (reminiscent of the Fifth Symphony) behind the seemingly placid surface. In the Fourth Quartet, it gives the Jewish idioms – a metaphor for the oppressed artist – a more deliberate, and thus more natural-sounding, tempo. Probably the best known of the quartets is No 8, composed in Dresden in 1960 and dedicated to the victims of Fascism and of the War, and in view of the constant use of the DSCH motif and the quotations from several of his own pieces, there can be little doubt that Shostakovich considered himself among their number. It's a grim, often macabre, work and once again the Fitzwilliam captures the loneliness of the composer. So often, his solo melodies, set against a stark and sombre accompaniment, sound like a voice crying in the wilderness. The quartets are well worth getting to know and the performances by the Fitzwilliam Quartet, despite their age, still seem to reach the heart of the composer's intentions.

Awards 2000

String Quartets – Nos 1-5[c]; 6-10[b]; 11-15[a]. Two Pieces[b]
Emerson Quartet (Eugene Drucker, Philip Setzer vns Lawrence Dutton va David Finckel vc)
DG ⑤ 463 284-2GH5 Ⓕ
(360 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in [a]1994, [b]1998 and [c]1999 ○○○

The Emerson Quartet have played Shostakovich all over the world, and this long-pondered intégrale sets the seal on a process that has brought the quartets to the very centre of the repertoire – the ensemble's and ours. Operating here out of Aspen, Colorado, several geopolitical worlds away from the old Soviet Union, the Americans outpace the classic Borodin recordings in almost every movement, their virtuosity powerfully evident in the many scherzos and toccata-like passages. While some listeners will miss the intangible element of emotional specificity and sheer Russianness that once lurked behind the notes, the playing is undeniably committed in its coolness, exposing nerve endings with cruel clarity. The hard, diamond-like timbre of the two violins (the leader's role is shared democratically) is far removed from the breadth of tone one might associate with a David Oistrakh, just as cellist David Finckel is no Rostropovich. But these recordings reveal surprising new facets of a body of work that is not going to stand still. The Fourth Quartet is a case in point, more delicate than most rivals with the finale relatively pressed, less insistently Jewish. The Fifth sometimes seems closer to Ustvolskaya or American minimalism than the mid-century Soviet symphonic utterance we are used to; the Emerson's almost hectoring mode of address and unfluctuating tempo are maintained for as long as (in)humanly possible. The very vehemence of, say, the finale of the Ninth tends to blunt the harmonic sense of the music, leaving something more visceral and rosiny than the argument can stand. To get the unique feel of this set, sample one of the encore pieces, the 'Polka' from The Age of Gold. Humanity and wit are in short supply, but can you resist the sheer explosive brilliance of the technique?

DG's recording is exceptionally vivid if somewhat airless, the separation of the instruments being achieved at the expense of tonal blend.

Given that all the quartets were taped live with only remedial patching, the audience is commendably silent: their enthusiastic applause is retained for Nos 1, 2, 9 and 12 only. This, surely, is a Shostakovich cycle for the 21st century.

String Quartets Nos 1, 3 and 4. Two Pieces for String Quartet (1931)
Shostakovich Quartet (Andrei Shishlov, Sergei Pishchugin vns Alexander Galkovsky va Alexander Korchagin vc)
Olympia OCD531 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1978-85 ●

String Quartets Nos 2, 5 and 7
Shostakovich Quartet
Olympia OCD532 (78 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1978-85 ●

String Quartets Nos 6, 8 and 9
Shostakovich Quartet
Olympia OCD533 (74 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1978-85

String Quartets Nos 10, 11 and 15
Shostakovich Quartet
Olympia OCD534 (78 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1978-85 ●●

String Quartets Nos 12-14
Shostakovich Quartet
Olympia OCD535 (73 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1978-85 ●

Any attempt to rank these players in relation to their more widely acclaimed opposite numbers in the Borodin Quartet seems pointless at this level of dedication; both teams have lived through this most extraordinary of 20th-century quartet-cycles many times. If any general observation about the two can be made, it is that the Borodin finds more corporate subtleties and passing shades in some of the earlier quartets, while the individual members of the Shostakovich Quartet make even stronger, more vibrant soloists. In the context of Shostakovich's many, very vocal solos and recitatives, it hardly seems invidious to single out the first violinist, Andrei Shishlov – dark, powerful and flawless of intonation throughout. Listen to his sleight-of-hand freedom in the unaccompanied melody of No 6's finale: the Borodin's Mikhail Kopelman doesn't begin to touch imagination like that.

These players also teach us to hold in equal awe the more classically contained quartets – No 6 and the outer movements of No 10 have a special grace – and all the slow movements are impressively unfolded with a steady fluency (notable in the passacaglias). As for the last rites of No 15, not even the Borodin finds such implicit human warmth in the still fugato of the Elegy. In tandem with the impassioned solos of the later movements, it's an impressive summing-up of this team's best intentions. Balances in the earlier recordings are less than kind to second fiddle and cellist and are uncomfortably boxy. You'll also have to adjust the volume-level for consecutive listening. If you seek only a single-disc token of the achievement, that with Nos 10, 11 and 15 is the one to have.

String Quartet No 14

String Quartets Nos 4, 11 and 14
Hagen Quartet (Lukas Hagen, Rainer Schmidt vns Veronika Hagen va Clemens Hagen vc)
DG 445 864-2GH (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993-94

The Hagen has chosen a fascinating journey to the unusual at-one-with-the-world radiance that ends the 14th. Already in this interpretation of the Fourth we hear those voices from beyond the grave that trouble the later quartets. The introspective shading of the Andantino's earlier stages, climax included, sounds as if the mutes are already on. And when in fact the players do take them up – for the rest of the movement and the whole of the ensuing Allegretto – the sound becomes even more refined; note how first violin Lukas Hagen sings out his solo at fig. 29 (track 2, 3'31") with a frail, unearthly beauty which sounds as if it emanates from a viola d'amore.

Corporate work is faultlessly and subtly in sympathy with the essence of the piece; the only individual weakness occurs when Shostakovich asks the cellist to come to the fore in the finale's build-up of tension – Clemens Hagen's tone doesn't really make itself felt here – though the collective fortissimo cry from the heart shortly afterwards makes amends with even more intensity than some of the Hagen's senior counterparts (including the Shostakovich Quartet on Olympia) have previously found there.

Clemens lacks the presence to take the lead in Quartet No 14, dedicated to the cellist of the Beethoven Quartet, and emphasising his role accordingly; the sound can be lovely, but right at the start he has the misfortune to be echoed by his more characterful brother. Still, the F sharp major ending is as implicitly moving as it can be, and joint string power in crises comes very close to the genuine Russian article. Indeed, in the fifth-movement Humoresque of the 11th the limelighted second violin – Rainer Schmidt, the quartet's febrile and ever-impressive outside influence – brings so much forceful tone to the swelling of his two repeated notes that it sounds as if two violins are playing in unison, not just the one. Again, the joint approach to chants and combats, not to mention Lukas's extraordinary handling of the glissandos in the second movement, bring an urgently vocal quality to the work.

Piano Quintet in G minor, Op 57

Piano Quintet in G minor, Op 57[a]. Piano Trio No 2 in E minor, Op 67. String Quartets Nos 1 and 15
Elisabeth Leonskaja pf Borodin Quartet (Mikhail Kopelman, [a]Andrei Abramenkov vns [a]Dmitri Shebalin va Valentin Berlinsky vc) 💰

Warners Ultima ② 8573 87820-2 (DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1995 ●

The Piano Quintet is almost symphonic in its proportions, lasting some 35 minutes, and has been popular with audiences ever since its first performance in 1940. Much of its popularity stems from Shostakovich's highly memorable material, particularly in the boisterous and genial Scherzo and finale movements. Because of the presence of a piano and of the powerful emotions expressed in them, the Quintet and Trio are commonly given very big performances. Those on this recording are by no means small, but they are chamber music, and that seems to be the view of the pianist as well as the string players. The finale of the Piano Trio actually gains in power from this, the greatest weight of tone being reserved for the true climax, and half the intensity of the Quintet, in this reading, comes from a remarkably wide and masterfully controlled range of sonority and dynamic. Leonskaja is a superb partner in both works. The Quartets Nos 1 and 15 make a superb coupling (the playing style mirroring the richness of the one and the austerity of the other). The recordings are very fine, with the balance just right. A bargain.

Piano Trios

Shostakovich Piano Trios – No 1 in C minor, Op 8; No 2 in E minor, Op 67 Schnittke Trio
Vienna Piano Trio (Wolfgang Redik vn Marcus Trefny Stefan Mendl pf)
Nimbus NI5572 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

Shostakovich's adolescent First Trio's ramshackle structure seems to matter less than its surprisingly Gallic-sounding, passionately late-romantic invention. The Vienna Piano Trio offers a rich-toned and meticulously prepared account. The tricky cello opening to the Second Trio is wonderfully ethereal here, and the even more tricky accumulating tempo over the entire movement is steady and logical, though this and the main tempo for the Scherzo are both more reined in than in the composer's own account (once available on Supraphon). The passacaglia and finale are properly intense and none the worse for being kept within the bounds of euphony, though the ideal performance, yet to be realised on CD, would be one which drained bitterer dregs of sorrow and took excitement closer to the point of hyperventilation.

Schnittke's Trio is more than an interesting makeweight. The String Trio original dates from 1985, the fateful year of the composer's first stroke and a period when he seemed to have a direct line to a kind of other-worldly inspiration. True, the two longish movements occasionally seem at a loss, but overall this is one of Schnittke's most economical and restrained scores, and one of his finest. At every turn the Vienna Piano Trio is sensitive to the character and flow of this haunting music. A fine disc, then – imaginative programming, accomplished performances, and rich, well-balanced recording.

24 Preludes and Fugues, Op 87

No 1 in C; No 2 in A minor; No 3 in G; No 4 in E minor; No 5 in D; No 6 in B minor; No 7 in A; No 8 in F sharp minor; No 9 in E; No 10 in C sharp minor; No 11 in B; No 12 in G sharp minor; No 13 in F sharp; No 14 in E flat minor; No 15 in D flat; No 16 in B flat minor; No 17 in A flat; No 18 in F minor; No 19 in E flat; No 20 in C minor; No 21 in B flat; No 22 in G minor; No 23 in F; No 24 in D minor

Shostakovich Preludes and Fugues Nos 4, 12, 14, 15, 17 and 23 Scriabin Poème-nocturne, Op 61. Two Danses, Op 73. Vers la flamme, Op 72. Fantasie in B minor, Op 28 Prokofiev Piano Sonatas – No 4 in C minor, Op 29; No 6 in A, Op 82. Pieces, Op 12 – Legend. Visions fugitives, Op 22 – Allegretto; Animato; Molto giocoso; Con eleganza; Commodo; Allegretto tranquillo; Con vivacita; Feroce; Inquieto; Con una dolce lentezza. Pieces, Op 32 – Danse; Waltz. Three Pieces from Cinderella, Op 95 – Gavotte. 10 Pieces from Cinderella, Op 97 – Autumn fairy; Oriental dance. Six Pieces from Cinderella, Op 102 – Grand waltz; Quarrel
Sviatoslav Richter pf Ⓕ
Philips ② 438 627-2PH2 (152 minutes: DDD) ●

Richter's greatest triumphs are in the Shostakovich Preludes and Fugues. From the glacial spaces of the E flat Prelude to the benediction of the F major, each is placed in its own world, each projected as a long, steady accumulation of musical thought. No recorded performances, not even the composer's own, are as compelling. This two-disc set is a mixture of live and studio recordings. At times the piano tone lacks lustre (particularly in the Prokofiev Sixth Sonata), but overall the quality is fine. Which is to say that while this may not be exactly a voluptuous sonic experience at least there are no barriers between the listener and Richter's elevated music-making. The compilation begins with four of the most vaporous and highly charged of Scriabin's late pieces. Disdaining their invitations to lurid nuance and indulgent phrasing, Richter brings to them an intensity and concentration which dispel any thoughts of decadence. In its place are purity and idealism, and the apparent restriction of tone colour conceals a myriad of precisely chiselled lines and weighted chords. Without making any obvious show of it he releases the inner power of the music – the menace in the galloping triplets of 'Flammes sombres' (second of the two Danses, Op 73), the fierce ecstasy of Vers la flamme, for instance.

Less successful, however, is the earlier Fantasie, which runs out of steam rather seriously in the culminating stages. But this is virtually the only sign of any decline in Richter's virtuoso powers. If any work puts those powers to the test it is Prokofiev's Sixth Sonata, and here the finale goes at a tremendous lick, as irresistible as a river in full spate. Both middle movements are also fast-flowing streams, but again it is structural inevitability rather than surface excitement which makes the pulse race, the more so for the fact that the opening Allegro is deliberately held back – obstinately insistent in rhythm and dry in tone. As the Sonata's first performer back in his student days Richter speaks with obvious authority in this work. And over the years he has made the smaller-scale Fourth Sonata very much his own property too, investing every moment of it with meaning.

Preludes and Fugues Nos 1-24
Vladimir Ashkenazy pf
Decca ② 466 066-2DH2 (142 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

Here is a Shostakovich Preludes and Fugues cycle to be reckoned with. Admittedly, it starts none too promisingly with, by the highest standards, a rhythmically stiff, tonally lumpy C major Prelude and some overpedalling in the fugue. The neo-Baroque figuration of the A minor Prelude and its spiky Fugue, on the other hand, presents his true credentials. On form and well prepared, as here, Ashkenazy remains a formidably fluent pianist, and the clarity and energy he brings to the faster, denser pieces is surpassed only by Richter (Philips). The sound itself is quite 'pingy', with a generous ambience behind it. That serves to heighten the impact of the more demonstrative pieces, but makes it difficult for Ashkenazy to sustain the atmosphere of the more meditative ones. Or maybe he simply doesn't feel the music that way. In the final D minor Fugue (No 24), where you can almost hear Shostakovich's 10th Symphony being born, Ashkenazy fails to build the texture as mightily as the early stages lead you to expect. Nikolaieva surpasses him here, and in general she reveals both subtler and grander perspectives, especially in her tauter, more drily recorded 1987 Melodiya set. Even so the balance-sheet for Ashkenazy comes out comfortably in the black. For consistency of pianism, straightforward integrity of interpretation and high quality of recording, his set can be warmly recommended.

From Jewish Folk Poetry, Op 79

From Jewish Folk Poetry, Op 79. The New Babylon – suite (arr Rozhdestvensky)
Tatyana Sharova sop Ludmila Kuznetsova mez
Alexei Martynov ten Russian State Symphony Orchestra / Valéry Polyansky
Chandos CHAN9600 (70 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded 1995-96 Ⓕ ●

This recording of Shostakovich's song-cycle From Jewish Folk Poetry is first-rate. For a start Polyansky's three vocal soloists are uncommonly well chosen: the light, youthful, slightly vulnerable soprano, the rich, world-weary mezzo and the ardent but unheroic tenor are ideally suited to the texts Shostakovich cunningly chose to convey his solidarity with mass suffering. Polyansky sets spacious tempos which allow every nuance of that suffering to register, and his orchestra is responsive and idiomatic in colouring. The recording, by Russian engineers, feels almost too good to be true in its excessive warmth; otherwise this version is preferable to the rival Rozhdestvensky on RCA. Polyansky's choice of the first of Shostakovich's 35 or so film scores makes for a more than welcome coupling. Polyansky offers an admirably idiomatic version of the Suite. He is especially adept at choosing timbres to reflect mood and situation. Even if you don't know the story-line the music was designed to accompany, this performance is so vividly characterised it can hardly fail to engage you.

Songs

'Complete Songs, Volume 1'
Four Monologues on Poems by Alexander Pushkin, Op 91[d]. Spanish Songs, Op 100[c]. Five Romances, 'Songs of Our Days', Op 98[d]. Two Romances to Lyrics by Lermontov, Op 84[b]. Four Songs to Lyrics by Dolmatovsky, Op 86[a]. Four Greek Songs[c]
[a]Victoria Evtodieva sop [b]Natalia Biryukova mez
[c]Mikhail Lukonin bar [d]Fyodor Kuznetsov bass
Yury Serov pf
Delos DE3304 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002 ●●

'Complete Songs, Volume 2'
Four Verses of Captain Lebyadkin, Op 146[c]. Seven Romances on Verses by Alexander Blok, Op 127[a]. Six Marina Tsvetayeva Poems, Op 143[b]. Preface to the Complete Edition of my Works and a Brief Reflection apropos of this Preface, Op 123[c]. Five Romances, Op 121[c]
[a]Victoria Evtodieva sop [b]Liubov Sokolova mez
[c]Fyodor Kuznetsov bass [a]Lidia Kovalenko vn
[a]Irina Molokina vc Yury Serov pf
Delos DE3307 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002 ●●

Here are two CDs dedicated to some of the finest and most under-recorded song repertoire of the 20th century. Yury Serov is the presiding spirit; his sharply characterised piano playing radiating musical and cultural understanding, and his singers are first-rate.

The first volume is dedicated to the 1950s and contains several first recordings; few, if any, of the songs have ever appeared on CD before. Much of his music from this time is marked by various nuances of cheerfulness (tentative, determined, over-stated, but never as brattish as in his first maturity). Often these seem rather to belie his true nature. Indeed, only the four Pushkin Monologues, with their topics of suffering, sorrow, imprisonment and resistance, are easily recognisable as the voice of Shostakovich, the Chronicler and Conscience of his Times. Fyodor Kuznetsov is slightly unsteady of voice here, but he still manages to convey a quality of wise, noble weariness that rings absolutely true.

It is to the enormous credit of all four singers that most of the remaining songs come across not as mere sops to authority but as genuine attempts to take on new artistic challenges. Was it still possible to do something worthwhile with the homespun, soft-centred verses of Yevgeny Dolmatovsky? Many of Shostakovich's countrymen certainly thought he had done so, at least in respect of 'The Homeland is Listening' (first of the Op 86 Songs), since this was taken up as a signature tune for All-Union Radio and was actually sung by Yuri Gagarin during the first manned space-flight. Seemingly looking back to the tradition of Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov and Rachmaninov, Shostakovich's two Lermontov Romances are gorgeously atmospheric and tender. By contrast his earthier Greek and Spanish Songs reflect his long-standing interest in poetry from other national traditions. Was his heart in them? Again you would find it hard not to think so after hearing these fine performances.

Volume 2 gathers together the cycles from the last decade of Shostakovich's life, with the exception of his massive Suite on Verses by Michelangelo. While this repertoire isn't quite so rare as that on Volume 1, the performances are just as fine. In the Blok cycle – surely the finest songs on the disc – Evtodieva may not be the last word in subtlety, but she is still far preferable to the crude hectoring of Natalia Gerasimova on Chant du Monde. Given that the Four Verses of Captain Lebyadkin are otherwise unavailable, and the extraordinarily elusive Six Marina Tsvetayeva Poems can currently be obtained only in the composer's orchestrated version, this disc is again pretty well self-recommending.

Altogether this enterprise is a winner. The recording quality is good, though there is a slight 'pinginess' to the piano sound.

Lady Macbeth of the Mtsensk District

Galina Vishnevskaya sop Katerina Izmailova; Nicolai Gedda ten Sergey Dubrovin; Dimiter Petkov bass Boris Izmailov; Werner Krenn ten Zinovy Borisovich Izmailov; Robert Tear ten Russian peasant; Taru Valjakka sop Aksinya; Martyn Hill ten Teacher; Leonard Mroz bass Priest; Aage Haugland bass Police Sergeant; Birgit Finnila mez Sonyetka; Alexander Malta bass Old convict; Leslie Fyson ten Milhand, Officer; Steven Emmerson bass Porter; John Noble bar Steward; Colin Appleton ten Coachman, First foreman; Alan Byers bar Second foreman; James Lewington ten Third foreman; Oliver Broome bass Policeman; Edgar Fleet ten Drunken Guest; David Beaven bass Sentry; Lynda Richardson mez Female convict
Ambrosian Opera Chorus; London Philharmonic Orchestra / Mstislav Rostropovich
EMI Great Recordings of the Century ②
567776-2 (155 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes text and translation included ●

Rostropovich's cast has no weak links to it. More importantly, he gives a full-blooded projection of the poignant lyricism that underlies the opera's brutality. Vishnevskaya's portrayal of Katerina is at times a bit too three-dimensional, you might think, especially when the recording, which favours the singers in any case, seems (because of her bright and forceful tone) to place her rather closer to you than the rest of the cast. But there is no doubt in her performance that Katerina is the opera's heroine, not just its focal character, and in any case Gedda's genially rapacious Sergey, Petkov's grippingly acted Boris, Krenn's weedy Zinovy, Mroz's sonorous Priest, and even Valjakka in the tiny role of Aksinya, all refuse to be upstaged.

The 'minor' parts are luxuriously cast from artists who may not have had the advantage of singing their roles on stage but have clearly relished building them into vivid portraits. The close focusing on the voices and the relative distancing of the orchestra into a warmer, more ample acoustic is a bit more noticeable on CD than it was on LP.

Lady Macbeth of the Mtsensk District
Maria Ewing sop Katerina Izmailova; Sergei Larin ten Sergey; Aage Haugland bass Boris Izmailov; Philip Langridge ten Zinovi Izmailov; Heinz Zednik ten Shabby Peasant; Kristine Ciesinski sop Aksinya; Ilya Levinsky ten Teacher; Romuald Tesarowicz bass Priest; Anatoly Kotcherga bass Police Sergeant; Elena Zaremba mez Sonyetka; Kurt Moll bass Old Convict; Grigory Gritziuk bar Millhand; Carlos Alvarez bass Officer; Guillaume Petitot bass Porter; Jean-Pierre Mazaloubaud bass Steward; Alan Woodrow ten Coachman; Jean-Claude Costa, Jean Savignol, Jose Ochagavia tens First, Second and Third Foremen; Philippe Duminy bass Policeman; Mario Agnetti ten Drunken Guest; Johann Tilli bass Sentry; Margaret Jane Wray sop Woman Convict
Chorus and Orchestra of the Opera-Bastille, Paris / Myung-Whun Chung
DG ② 437 511-2GH2 (156 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included.

The main flaws in Rostropovich's historic recording of this opera with Galina Vishnevskaya in the title-role (reviewed above) are its very close focus on the solo voices and the at times distracting use of dramatising effects. Both are corrected in this new account, which has a very natural balance between voices and orchestra, and allows a cast of pungent singer-actors to do their own dramatising.

Rostropovich's version is luxuriously cast; Chung's cast may be less familiar, but it is no less distinguished: Larin is less characterful than Gedda but a real Russian tenor with impressive line and care for words, Haugland is a formidable bully of a Boris, Tesarowicz and Kotcherga are vivid in their roles, Zaremba a Carmen-like bitch of a Sonyetka while Kurt Moll as the Old Convict contributes much more than a cameo: he adds a whole tragic dimension to Act 3 that Alexander Malta, for Rostropovich, cannot approach. Maria Ewing's voice is nowhere near as commanding as Vishnevskaya's, and the recorded focus emphasises this. There are times when you can hardly hear her above the orchestra; others indeed where you certainly cannot, and she is an unequal partner in the duet scenes with Larin and Haugland. This goes with such an intensely dramatic utterance, swooping up to and away from notes, that her singing and her parlando (her Sprechstimme, indeed) are sometimes hard to distinguish. The crucial test of her style of interpretation is the tragic 'aria' in Act 3 where Katerina realises the worthlessness of the man for whom she has murdered and suffered both humiliation and a destruction of all hope. Ewing is graphically expressive, every word placed in poignant relief, but at times you have to guess at what notes she's sketching and the whole passage is taken at about half its marked speed. Time standing still at such a moment is effective and not inappropriate; you only have to turn to Vishnevskaya and Rostropovich to realise that the passage can be lyrically sung and given a sense of forward movement without any loss of pathos.

Chung is a first-rate Shostakovich conductor, and he gets a warmer, fuller sound from his spaciously recorded Paris players than the no doubt intentionally leaner quality that Rostropovich asks of the LPO. Oddly enough the extra brass players that the score calls for make more impact in the slightly drier older recording, and there are sufficient pages on which Rostropovich finds a touch more hysterical energy or lurid colour to prefer his account even if Ewing had been a closer match for the imperious, but for that very reason more moving, Vishnevskaya.

Jean Sibelius

Finnish 1865-1957

GROVE Sibelius studied in Helsinki from 1886 with Wegelius, also gaining stimulus there from Busoni, though at the same time he fostered ambitions as a violinist. In 1889 he went to Berlin to continue his composition studies with Becker, then after a year to Vienna under Goldmark and Fuchs. He returned to Helsinki in 1891 and immediately made a mark with his choral symphony Kullervo, though it took him another decade to establish a wholly consistent style and to emerge from the powerful influence of Tchaikovsky: important stages on the journey were marked by the Karelia suite, the set of four tone poems on the legendary hero Lemminkäinen (including The Swan of Tuonela), the grandiose Finlandia and the first two symphonies.

As these titles suggest, he was encouraged by the Finnish nationalist movement (until 1917 Finland was a grand duchy in the Russian empire), by his readings of Finnish mythology (Kullervo and Lemminkäinen are both characters from the Kalevala, which was to be the source also for subjects of later symphonic poems) and in some degree by the folk music of Karelia. But the most important stimulus would seem to have been purely musical: a drive towards continuous growth achieved by means of steady thematic transformation, and facilitated by supporting the main line very often with highly diversified ostinato textures instead of counterpoints. The singleness of purpose also has to do with the frequently modal character of Sibelius's harmony.

The Violin Concerto of 1903 was effectively a farewell to 19th-century Romanticism, followed by a pure, classical expression of the new style in the Symphony no.3. This was also a period of change in his personal life. In 1904 he bought a plot of land outside Helsinki and built a house where he spent the rest of his life with his wife and daughters, removed from the city where he had been prone to bouts of heavy drinking. Also, his music gained a large international following, and he visited England (four times in 1905-12) and the USA (1914). Symphony no.4, with its conspicuous use of the tritone and its austere textures, took his music into its darkest areas; No 5 brought a return to the heroic mould, developing the process of continuous change to the extent that the first movement evolves into the scherzo.

But that work took him some time to get right (written in 1915, it was revised in 1916 and again in 1919), and after World War I he produced only four major works: the brilliant and elusive Symphony No 6; No 7, which takes continuity to the ultimate in its unbroken unfolding of symphonic development; the incidental music for The Tempest; and the bleak symphonic poem Tapiola. He lived for another three decades, but published only a few minor pieces; an eighth symphony may possibly have been completed and destroyed. His reputation, however, continued to grow, and his influence has been profound, especially on Scandinavian, English and American composers, reflecting both the traditionalism and the radical elements in his symphonic thinking.

Violin Concerto in D minor, Op 47

Awards 1991

Violin Concerto (original 1903-04 version and final 1905 version)
Leonidas Kavakos vn Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä
BIS BISCD500 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 199 ○○○

It is difficult to conceive of a masterpiece in any other form than it is. The impression the listener receives from Sibelius's Fifth Symphony – or The Rite of Spring or La mer – must convey what Schoenberg called the illusion of spontaneous vision. It is as if the artist had caught a glimpse of something that has been going on all the time and that he has stretched out and effortlessly captured it. One of Sibelius's letters written to his friend Axel Carpelan in the autumn of 1914 puts it perfectly: 'God opens his door for a moment, and his orchestra is playing Sym 5'. But of course it is not like that and Sibelius worked for seven years (1912-19) before the Fifth Symphony reached its final form. Sibelius was nothing if not self-critical and a number of his works underwent their birthpangs in public. The main theme came to him much earlier than 1903 and he recognised it for what it was, an inspired idea which remained unchanged. After its first performance in Helsinki in 1904 Sibelius decided to overhaul it. He realised the necessity to purify it, to remove unnecessary detail that impedes the realization of a cogent structure. In its finished form, it was given in Berlin with Karl Halir as soloist and Richard Strauss conducting.

Listening to Sibelius's first thoughts played with great virtuosity and excellent taste by Leonidas Kavakos and the superb Lahti orchestra is an absorbing experience. One is first brought up with a start by an incisive orchestral rhythmic figure at what would be fig. 1 of the 1905 score (track 1, 1'23") from whereon the orchestra plays a more assertive role in the proceedings. In the unaccompanied cadenza 21 bars later (2'11") there is some rhythmic support while to the next idea on cellos and bassoon (fig. 2), the soloist contributes decoration. And then at seven bars before fig. 3 (3'41") a delightful new idea appears which almost looks forward to the light colourings of the later Humoresques. Although it is a great pity that it had to go, there is no doubt that the structural coherence of the movement gains by its loss both here and on its reappearance (14'03"). It is the ability to sacrifice good ideas in the interest of structural coherence that is the hallmark of a good composer. There are other changes Sibelius must have regretted though not, one suspects, the second long and unaccompanied cadenza whose removal greatly improves the overall shape of the movement. The fewest changes are in the slow movement which remains at the same length. As in the case of the Fifth Symphony, where the revision is far more extensive than it is here, the finished work tells us a great deal about the quality of Sibelius's artistic judgement, and that, of course, is what makes him such a great composer.

This disc offers an invaluable insight into the workings of Sibelius's mind. Kavakos and the Lahti orchestra play splendidly throughout and the familiar concerto which was struggling to get out of the 1903–04 version emerges equally safely in their hands. The BIS team have put us greatly in their debt by making the two versions available for study side by side.

Sibelius Violin Concerto
Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D, Op 35
Kyung-Wha Chung vn London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn
Decca The Classic Sound 425 080-2DCS Ⓜ
(66 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1970 ●

If the vital test for a recording is that a performance should establish itself as a genuine one, not a mere studio run-through, Chung's remains a disc where both works leap out at you for their concentration and vitality, not just through the soloist's weight and gravity, expressed as though spontaneously, but through the playing of the LSO under Previn at a vintage period. The great melodies of the first two movements of the Sibelius are given an inner heartfelt intensity rarely matched, and with the finale skirting danger with thrilling abandon. Chung's later Montreal version of the Tchaikovsky (also Decca) is rather fuller-toned with the tiny statutory cuts restored in the finale. Yet the very hint of vulnerability amid daring, a key element in Chung's magnetic, volatile personality, here adds an extra sense of spontaneity. This remains breathtaking playing, and the central slow movement, made to flow without a hint of sentimentality, has an extra poignancy. The Kingsway Hall sound, full and sharply focused, gives a sense of presence to match or outshine today's digital recordings.

Violin Concerto[a]. Symphony No 2 in D, Op 43[b] 🄷
[a]Ginette Neveu vn [a]Philharmonia Orchestra / Walter Susskind; [b]New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli 🏵
Dutton mono CDBP9733 (71 minutes: ADD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1940-46 ●●

In Ginette Neveu's fêted account of Sibelius's Violin Concerto, the strength, passion and stamina of the solo playing is particularly admirable, though Walter Susskind's Philharmonia accompaniment is rather foursquare, especially in the finale. Heifetz and Beecham triumph every time. Still, EMI's famous recording is a fine memento of a fiery interpretation, and the solo line comes across with miraculous immediacy in Mike Dutton's transfer – better, in fact, than the orchestra, which tends to retreat under a veil whenever the music quietens. Barbirolli's impulsive New York recording of the Second Symphony burns bright and fast, but there are countless minor imprecisions that may irritate on repetition. A handful of slow but distant swishes suggests that Dutton's generally excellent refurbishment might have been based on an early LP transfer.

Additional recommendations
Violin Concerto
Couplings: Tchaikovsky and Glazunov 🄷
Violin Concertos
Heifetz vn London Philharmonic Orchestra / Beecham; Barbirolli
EMI Références mono 764030-2 Ⓜ
(80 minutes: AAD: 10/92)

A masterly interpretation from 1935 – Heifetz's virtuosic, cool approach is more than matched by Beecham, an ideal Sibelian.

Violin Concerto[a]
Coupling: Two Serenades, Op 69[b]. Six Humoresques, Opp 87/89[c]. Suite in D minor
[a]Fried vn [b]J Kuusisto, [c]Kavakos vns
Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra / Kamu
Warner Apex 0927-40606-2 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

An extremely useful compilation of Sibelius's complete music for violin and orchestra. The concerto is beautifully played and conducted, if not a first choice; it's the couplings that make this a really very competitive library choice.

Coupling: Nielsen Violin Concerto
Lin vn Philharmonia; Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra / Salonen
Sony Classical SK44548 (69 minutes: DDD: 1/89) Ⓕ

A Gramophone Award-winning coupling. Beautiful playing from the ever-sensitive Cho-Liang Lin.

Coupling: Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto
Mullova vn Boston Symphony Orchestra / Ozawa
Philips 50 Great Recordings
464 741-2PM (67 minutes: DDD: 5/87) Ⓜ

Viktoria Mullova's début disc captured two powerful, high-octane readings – fire and ice combined!

Couplings: Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto
Repin vn London Symphony Orchestra / Krivine
Erato 4509 98537-2 (67 minutes: DDD: 5/96) Ⓜ

Another fine coupling of this popular pair. Vadim Repin shows great imagination and technical flair.

Couplings: Karelia Suite. Belshazzer's Feast.
Kuusisto vn Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra / Segerstam
Ondine ODE878-2 (65 minutes: DDD: 5/96) Ⓕ

There's nothing like the Helsinki orchestra in Sibelius – a performance with great character.

En saga, Op 9

En saga, Op 9. Night Ride and Sunrise, Op 55. The Dryad, Op 45 No 1. Dance-Intermezzo, Op 45 No 2. Pohjola's Daughter, Op 49. The Bard, Op 64. The Oceanides, Op 73
Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä
BIS BIS-CD1225 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●●●

Anyone who has already encountered the Lahti/ Vänskä partnership in Sibelius will know to expect performances of great vitality and freshness. And the expectation is fully met – perhaps even surpassed; in these tone poems he simply allows his profound grasp of musical inner workings to dictate the course of events. The trenchant Lahti strings, the ecstatically floating woodwind and the rasping brass all play their part. But while their contributions are gripping in their own right, they are the more impressive for being so precisely placed at the service of the music's larger-scale unfolding.

Each of the longer works feels as though composer and performers alike have imagined them in one huge mental breath. Vänskä knows exactly when and how much to hold back, when to push on, and, crucially, when simply to stand back and let the music tick over to the beat of some higher rhythm. The same sense of inevitability informs the more compact masterpieces – The Dryad and the extraordinarily cryptic The Bard. Only the Dance-Intermezzo, companion piece to The Dryad, is in any way negligible.

All the other tone poems have been recorded many times over, but rarely with such a consistent feeling of idiomatic rightness. (Vänskä himself has, of course, recorded the 1892 original version of En Saga as well – coupled with the original Fifth Symphony on a Gramophone Award-winning set, reviewed under Symphony No 5 – and a fascinating contrast it makes with the more compact 1902 revision offered here.) BIS's recording is of demonstration quality. An outstanding release.

Finlandia, Op 26

Finlandia, Op 26^{a}. Karelia Suite, Op 11^{a}. Tapiola, Op 112^{a}. En Saga^{a}. Luonnotar, Op 70^{a}. Pohjola's Daughter, Op 49^{b}. Nightride and Sunrise, Op 55^{b}. Legends, 'Lemminkäinen Suite', Op 22^{b}
^{a}Philharmonia Orchestra / Vladimir Ashkenazy;
^{b}Orchestra de la Suisse Romande / Horst Stein
Double Decca ② 452 576-2DF2 (DDD/ADD) Ⓜ
^{a}Recorded 1980-85 ●

Ashkenazy makes a superb job of Finlandia, which boasts some of the most vibrant, powerful brass sounds on disc.

More than 30 years separate En Saga and Tapiola, yet both works are quintessential Sibelius. The latter is often praised for the way Sibelius avoided 'exotic' instruments, preferring instead to draw new and inhuman sounds from the more standard ones; and the former is, in many ways, just as striking in the way the orchestration evokes wind, strange lights, vast expanses and solitude. Both works suggest a dream-like journey: En Saga non-specific, though derived from Nordic legend; Tapiola more of an airborne nightmare in, above and around the mighty giants of the Northern forests inhabited by the Green Man of the Kalevala, the forest god Tapio (the final amen of slow, bright major chords brings a blessed release!). Ashkenazy's judgement of long-term pacing is very acute; the silences and shadows are as potent here as the wildest hurricane. And Decca's sound allows you to visualise both the wood and the trees; every detail of Sibelius's sound world is caught with uncanny presence, yet the overall orchestral image is coherent and natural.

Additional recommendations

En Saga and Tapiola
Couplings: Spring Song. Scenes with Cranes. Canzonetta. Valse romantique. The Bard. Valse triste
Claesson cl Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra / Järvi
DG 457 654-2GH (71 minutes: DDD: 12/00) Ⓕ

You are always in safe musical hands with Neeme Järvi, and his Sibelius never fails to please. The Gothenburgers plays these short pieces with great charm and panache.

En Saga and Tapiola
Couplings: The Bard. The Oceanides. Pohjola's Daughter
Iceland Symphony Orchestra / Sakari
Naxos 8 555299 (70 minutes: DDD: rec c2001) Ⓢ

En Saga unfolds with enviable naturalness and vigour, yet the dusky mystery of the coda is also very well conveyed. Tapiola, too, receives a stimulating interpretation, with a gripping climax to its famous storm. If the programme appeals, don't hesitate.

Six Humoresques, Opp 87 and 89

Six Humoresques, Opp 87 and 89. Two Serenades, Op 69. Two Pieces, Op 77. Overture in E.

Ballet scene
Dong-Suk Kang vn Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra / Neeme Järvi Ⓕ
BIS CD472 (62 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1989 ●

The music for violin and orchestra here is marvellously rewarding and gloriously played. The six Humoresques, Opp 87 and 89 come from the same period as the Fifth Symphony, at a time when Sibelius was toying with the idea of a second violin concerto, and some of the material of the Humoresques was possibly conceived with a concerto in mind. Sibelius wrote that these radiant pieces convey something of 'the anguish of existence, fitfully lit up by the sun', and behind their outward elegance and charm, there is an all-pervasive sadness. This is even more intense in the Serenades, which are glorious pieces and quintessential Sibelius. Dong-Suk Kang is an outstanding player. His impeccable technique and natural musical instinct serve this repertoire well and he seems to have established an excellent rapport with Järvi and the Gothenburg orchestra. The two fill-ups are juvenilia and are only intermittently characteristic. The Overture is very much in his Karelia idiom, though they are of undoubted interest to all Sibelians. The recording up to BIS's usual high quality.

Karelia Suite

Karelia Suite. Incidental music – King Christian II; Pelleas and Melisande (all original versions)
Anna-Lisa Jakobsson mez Raimo Laukka bar Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä
BIS CD918 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997-98

Sibelius supplied four numbers for the February 1898 Helsinki première of Adolf Paul's historical drama King Christian II – the 'Minuet', 'The Fool's Song', 'Elegy' and 'Musette' – and these eventually took their place in the five-movement concert suite alongside the 'Nocturne', 'Serenade' and 'Ballade' which the composer completed the same summer. The street music of the 'Musette' is simply delightful in its original garb without added strings, and in both the 'Serenade' and 'Ballade' Vänskä uncovers strong thematic and stylistic links with the almost exactly contemporaneous First Symphony. The defiant quality these fine artists bring to 'The Fool's Song' (eloquently delivered by Raimo Laukka) is also very likeable. Music-making of refreshing perception and meticulous sensitivity similarly illuminates this first complete recording of Sibelius's original incidental music for a 1905 production of Maeterlinck's symbolist play (the venue was again Helsinki's Swedish Theatre). There are 10 numbers in all.

The performance of the Karelia Suite in its original scoring (which acts as a splendid curtain-raiser here) has been compiled from Vänskä's complete recording of the original Karelia music. Both outer movements have a real sense of pageantry about them (Vänskä directs with exhilaratingly clean-limbed swagger), though there are certain reservations about his occasional predilection for exaggerated and affected pianopianissimos. Thus, at around 3'30" in the central 'Ballade' (track 2), the dynamic level drops almost below the threshold of audibility and has you rushing to boost the volume control (Vänskä repeats this trick twice in the King Christian II 'Elegy', and towards the end of the final number in Pelléas). For optimum results, therefore, playback needs to be higher than many listeners may think reasonable. That said, the engineering is quite spectacularly truthful throughout and there is no doubt that this is an unusually absorbing collection.

Kullervo, Op 7

Lilli Paasikivi mez Raimo Laukka bar Helsinki University Chorus; Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä
BIS CD1215 (81 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 2000 ●●

Vänskä is undoubtedly a Sibelian of strong instinct, and his Kullervo enshrines an interpretation of extraordinary grandeur and slumbering, runic mystery. After an ideally paced opening Allegro moderato (the Lahti strings lacking just a touch in sheer muscle), 'Kullervo's Youth' lasts an eyebrow-raising 19'18", well over three minutes longer than any predecessor. Courageously, Vänskä sticks to his guns, the music's unnervingly tragic portents distilled with mournful gravity. It's in the big central scena that BIS's sumptuously realistic, excitingly wide-ranging production really comes into its own. Vänskä directs with keen observation and tingling narrative flair, not missing the wondrous poetry of the nature music accompanying the lament of Kullervo's sister. What's more, his soloists and chorus are first-rate, though baritone Raimo Laukka is not quite as fresh-voiced here as he was for Segerstam's in 1994. Following a splendidly lusty 'Kullervo goes to War', Vänskä crowns proceedings with a thrillingly grim and inevitable 'Kullervo's Death', with eloquent contributions from the men of the Helsinki University Chorus. As should be clear by now, this recording must feature high on any short list. The recent reappearance on EMI Double Forte of Berglund's pioneering Bournemouth version is certainly welcome, though the deletion of that conductor's Helsinki digital remake (also for EMI) is disappointing. Despite one or two eccentricities, both Segerstam and Paavo Järvi quarry the staggering originality of Sibelius's youthful vision to often riveting effect. The fleeter Saraste, too, gives a humane, thoroughly likeable performance, whereas Salonen's stunningly articulate realisation with the Los Angeles PO perhaps is marginally too slick for comfort. Only Sir Colin Davis adopts as daringly expansive a view as Vänskä, but his hard-working LSO forces simply don't sound as wholly attuned to the idiom as their Finnish rivals. Whether Vänskä's epic conception as a whole 'stacks up' with quite the same cumulative majesty as, say, the digital Berglund is debatable, but its insights are legion and for many it will be a natural first choice.

Kullervo, Op 7
Marianne Rørholm contr Jorma Hynninen bar
Helsinki University Chorus; Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra / Esa-Pekka Salonen
Sony Classical SK52563 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1992 ●

Sibelius's Kullervo was the symphonic poem-cum-symphony with which he made his breakthrough in Finland in 1892. Common to all recordings, including Salonen's, is the magisterial presence of Jorma Hynninen. Salonen keeps a firm grip on the proceedings and maintains a real sense of momentum throughout. Moreover, temptations to dwell on beauty of incident or to indulge in expressive emphasis are resisted, and this extraordinary piece is all the more telling as a result. The drama of the central scena is vividly realised and both Marianne Rørholm and Jorma Hynninen are impressive – as are the male voices of the Finnish chorus. An impressive performance, and the orchestral playing and recording are absolutely first-class.

Legends, 'Lemminkäinen Suite', Op 22

Legends, 'Lemminkäinen Suite', Op 22. En Saga, Op 9
Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra / Mikko Franck
Ondine ODE953-2 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

Mikko Franck presides over the most intrepidly individual and pungently characterful performance of the Lemminkäinen Legends since Leif Segerstam's 1995 Helsinki PO account for this same label. Clocking in at an eyebrow-raising 53'48" overall, Franck's conception evinces an unhurried authority, a generous expressive scope and a richly stocked imagination remarkable in one so young.

'Lemminkäinen and the Maidens of the Island' unfolds in especially gripping fashion here. Even more than Segerstam, Franck takes an extraordinarily long-breathed, flexible view of this heady tableau, imparting an unashamedly sensual voluptuousness to the secondary material in particular. It's a risky, impulsive approach, but one that pays high dividends in terms of intoxicating sweep, brazen ardour and, well, sheer daring. Both 'The Swan of Tuonela' (which, in a refreshing change from the norm these days, Franck places second, according to Sibelius's final wishes) and 'Lemminkäinen in Tuonela' combine dark-hued grandeur with tingling atmosphere, the latter's haunting A minor central episode handled with particular perception. True, 'Lemminkäinen's Return' lacks something in animal excitement, but its unruffled sense of purpose, rhythmic spring and sinewy, clean-cut textures serve up plenty of food for thought none the less.

The Legends are preceded by an uncommonly fresh En Saga, brimming with watchful sensitivity and interpretative flair, and once again studded with revelatory detail. Throughout, the Swedish RSO responds with heartwarming application and genuine enthusiasm, audibly galvanised by Franck's fervent, always invigorating direction. The engineering, too, is very good, without perhaps being absolutely in the top flight.

An auspicious recording début, then, from a young artist of clearly prodigious potential.

Legends, 'Lemminkäinen Suite', Op 22.
Finlandia, Op 26. Karelia Suite, Op 11
Iceland Symphony Orchestra / Petri Sakari
Naxos 8 554265 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1997 ●

Most impressive. In its keen intelligence, fiery snap and thrust, Petri Sakari's account of the four Legends proves more than a match for the finest. The Iceland SO may not be world-beaters, but they respond to their thoughtful young Finnish maestro's illuminating direction with clean-limbed zest and commitment to the cause (their winds are an especially personable bunch).

Perhaps the highlight of the new set is 'Lemminkäinen in Tuonela', which, like Segerstam and Salonen before him, Sakari places second (reverting to the composer's original scheme), and where he distils a relentless concentration and pin-sharp focus (only Segerstam is more gripping in this brooding essay). Of course, no one should miss out on the heady opulence of Ormandy's magnificent Philadelphia strings in those glorious singing lines of 'Lemminkäinen and the maidens of the island', but the Icelanders play their hearts out and anyway Sakari gives a dramatic reading of bold contrasts and strong symphonic cohesion. No grumbles, either, about 'The Swan of Tuonela' or 'Lemminkäinen's Homeward Journey' which is firmly controlled, dashingly detailed and genuinely exciting (as opposed to merely excitable).

Sakari's rewarding Legends comes very near the top of the heap alongside (though, ultimately, not ahead of) Segerstam, Saraste and Ormandy. In the popular couplings, Sakari's unhackneyed approach once again pays dividends, though his unusually brisk (and ever-so-slightly hectic) tempo for the main portion of the Karelia Suite's opening 'Intermezzo' isn't always convincing . None the less, this is quite a bargain. Eminently pleasing sound, too: free of gimmickry and tonally very true.

Legends, 'Lemminkäinen Suite', Op 22. Tapiola
Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra / Leif Segerstam
Ondine ODE852-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

The four Legends first began to surface in Sibelius's mind in 1893, at the same time as he was working on his Kalevala opera, The Building of the Boat, the prelude to which became 'The swan of Tuonela'. (It is not the only thing from the opera that found its way into the Legends. The lovely A minor idea for muted strings in the middle section of 'Lemminkäinen in Tuonela' is also among the sketches, where Sibelius scribbled over it the words, 'the Maiden of Death'. In the opera she would have rowed Väinämöinen across the river to Tuonela. In the tone-poem she symbolises the very opposite, the loving mother whose ministrations return Lemminkäinen to life.) In 1954 Sibelius reversed the order of the inner movements so that 'The swan' preceded 'Lemminkäinen in Tuonela'. Perversely Segerstam disregards the composer's wishes and places them in the old order. To be fair, there is a case for this order in that you otherwise have two highly dramatic pieces ('Lemminkäinen in Tuonela' and 'Lemminkäinen's Homeward Journey') placed alongside each other; most CD players are programmable anyway. Segerstam gets very good results from the Helsinki orchestra which responds with a keen enthusiasm that is inspiriting. The performance is free from excessive mannerisms and his account of Tapiola is very impressive. He tellingly evokes the chilling terrors and awesome majesty of the Nordic forest.

Luonnotar, Op 70

Luonnotar, Op 70. Karelia Suite. Andante festivo. The Oceanides, Op 73. King Christian II, Op 27 – Suite. Finlandia
Soile Isokoski sop Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
DG 447 760-2GH (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1992-95 ●

This CD offers the Karelia and King Christian II suites, both from the 1890s, together with outstanding accounts of two of the strangest and most haunting masterpieces of Sibelius's maturity, Luonnotar and The Oceanides. Of special interest is Luonnotar, which tells of the creation of the world as related in Finnish mythology and was written for the legendary Aino Ackté. Not surprisingly, perhaps, it places cruel demands on the soloist both in terms of tessitura and dynamics. Soile Isokoski is magnificent and possesses an impressive accuracy both in intonation and dynamics above the stave. Järvi gets an excellent response from his fine Gothenburg players and tellingly conveys the atmosphere and mystery of this extraordinary score. The excellent note speaks of it as 'unlike anything else in the entire repertoire' – which indeed it is! What a wonderfully evocative score The Oceanides is, and what an atmospheric, magical account, we have here. The performances of the Karelia and King Christian II suites are not quite in this class but they are enjoyable, and the recording is quite exemplary.

Pelleas and Melisande

Cassazione, Op 6. Pelleas and Melisande, Op 46. Suite mignonne, Op 98a. Suite champêtre, Op 98b. Suite caractéristique, Op 100. Presto
Tapiola Sinfonietta / Tuomas Ollila
Ondine ODE952-2 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999-2000

Don't let the low opus number hoodwink you: Cassazione dates from 1904 and was first given under Sibelius's baton at the same Helsinki concert as the première of the first version of the Violin Concerto. Revised the following year but never published, it's well worth hearing, containing as it does echoes of both Pelleas and Melisande and the Second Symphony's finale. The dashing Presto began life as the third movement of Sibelius's Op 4 String Quartet in B flat of 1889-90, and was subsequently transcribed for string orchestra in 1894. The three suites date from 1921-22. True, the Suite caractéristique serves up a pretty thin brew, but both the Suite mignonne and Suite champêtre contain their fair share of felicities and are delightfully scored.

These performances from Tuomas Ollila and the Tapiola Sinfonietta evince a bracing, unsentimental thrust and high degree of technical finish, though some will crave more in the way of affectionate charm and tingling atmosphere. However, it's in the Pelleas and Melisande incidental music that these newcomers truly throw down the gauntlet. There's no hint of the customary portentous grandeur in Ollila's 'At the Castle Gate', a nervy urgency that resurfaces with a vengeance in 'Melisande at the Spinning Wheel' and the ensuing 'Entr'acte'. Elsewhere, those screaming winds and sul ponticello strings at the heart of 'At the Seashore' set one's teeth on edge, while textures throughout are uncommonly transparent. What's missing is any real sense of poignancy or pathos: 'The Death of Melisande' is very cool, the characteristically bleached string timbre emphasising the disconcertingly pristine, self-conscious mood. An intriguing and intelligent re-think, then, but not to all tastes (anyone brought up on, say, Beecham will be in for a shock). Crystal-clear, slightly clinical sound.

Swanwhite, Op 54

Swanwhite, Op 54. Scènes historiques – Suite No 1, Op 25; Suite No 2, Op 66. Belshazzar's Feast, Op 51 – Suite
Norwegian Radio Orchestra / Ari Rasilainen
Finlandia 0927-41935-2 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

Here we have a particularly generous selection of Sibelius's extensive output of incidental music, played with a rather special freshness and sensitivity that makes each of the 17 movements feel like a miniature masterpiece.

Sibelius derived the first set of Scènes historiques from his Press Celebrations Music of 1899, the series of tableaux that concluded with 'Finland Awakes', later to be turned into Finlandia. The second set is a very different affair, consisting of original pieces added in 1912, more abstract in feeling than the first set and strongly connected to the Fourth Symphony of the previous year and to the symphonies still to come. Belshazzar's Feast was a play by Hjalmar Procopé, mounted in Helsinki in November 1906. The 11 numbers of Sibelius's score have been recorded in their entirety (superbly by Osmo Vänskä on BIS), but the four-movement concert suite here recorded picks out the shiniest gems. Shortly afterwards Sibelius supplied 14 musical numbers for Strindberg's Swanwhite, a kind of Pelleas and Melisande with a happy ending. This is one of his most powerful theatre scores, marvellously economical yet telling in each tiniest gesture.

Throughout this excellently recorded CD the playing is precise and idiomatic, with that elusive blend of transparency and warmth that still comes most naturally to Nordic orchestras and conductors. If the coupling suits, or if you are looking for just one disc as a sampler of Sibelius's music for the theatre, you shouldn't hesitate.

The Wood Nymph, Op 15

The Wood Nymph, Op 15. The Wood Nymph (melodrama). A lonely ski-trail. Swanwhite, Op 54 – incidental music (original version)
Lasse Pöysti narr
Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä Ⓕ
BIS CD815 (62 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●

Although most Sibelians will know of the tone-poem, The Wood-Nymph, they will not have heard it, as the score has remained in Helsinki University Library. It opens very much in Karelia mode, and as one might expect, inhabits much the same world as the Lemminkäinen Legends. Though it is less developed than the 1892 En saga, let alone the Legends in their definitive form, it still bears the characteristic Sibelian hallmarks. The present disc gives us an opportunity to put it alongside the melodrama of the same name, scored for speaker, horn, strings and piano. This is a setting of the mainland-Swedish poet, Viktor Rydberg, best known in the Sibelius context for Autumn Evening ('Höstkväll').

Not content with these interesting novelties, the CD also gives us two other works new to the catalogue, another short melodrama, A lonely ski-trail to words by Bertel Gripenberg, which in its piano form dates from 1925 and which Sibelius scored for harp and strings as late as 1948, a short, slight and atmospheric piece; and above all, the complete incidental music to Strindberg's Swanwhite. The score runs to some 30 minutes and is full of that special light and sense of space characteristic of Pelleas and Melisande. The playing of the Lahti orchestra under Osmo Vänskä is excellent and the recording, too, is very fine: spacious and refined.

Complete Symphonies

No 1 in E minor, Op 39; No 2 in D, Op 43; No 3 in C, Op 52; No 4 in A minor, Op 63; No 5 in E flat, Op 82; No 6 in D minor, Op 104; No 7 in C, Op 105

Symphonies Nos 1-7. The Oceanides. Kuolema – Scene with cranes. Nightride and Sunrise[a]
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, [a]Philharmonia Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI ④ 764118-2 (267 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
●

Symphonies Nos 1-4 and 6 are also available on HMV Classics: HMV5 740602; HMV5 72319-2; HMV5 73048-2 Ⓑ

Simon Rattle's reissued Sibelius cycle is now accommodated on four mid- (as opposed to five full) price CDs, losing among the fill-ups only Kennedy's well-played account of the concerto. The first movement of Symphony No 1 is impressive and its epic quality is splendidly conveyed. You may be less taken with the slow movement: the rather mannered closing bars, not particularly acceptable in the concert hall, are distinctly worrying on disc. The measured tempo of the Scherzo is also a problem: it is slower than the metronome marking and the movement lacks fire. However, The Oceanides is the finest on disc. In the Second Symphony, Rattle's first movement is again on the slow side and the Trio section of the Scherzo is pulled about. The Fourth and Seventh find him at his finest and the magnificent EMI recording is very richly detailed and well defined.

The Fourth distils a powerful atmosphere in its opening pages; one is completely transported to its dark landscape with its seemingly limitless horizons. Only Beecham has surpassed Rattle in the slow movement.

Rattle's version of the Sixth is still among the best around, with tremendous grip and concentration. In both the Third and the Fifth he is equally impressive, although his handling of the celebrated transition in the first movement of the Fifth in his Philharmonia version is preferable (reviewed further on).

However, the inducement of The Oceanides, Nightride and Sunrise and an evocative account of the 'Scene with cranes' from Kuolema tips the scales in Rattle's favour.

Symphonies Nos 1-7
Philharmonia Orchestra / Vladimir Ashkenazy
Double Decca ② 455 402-2DF2 and ② 455 405-2DF2 (144 and 150 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1980-96 ●●

Of all the cycles of Sibelius's symphonies recorded during recent years this is one of the most consistently successful. Ashkenazy so well understands the thought processes that lie behind Sibelius's symphonic composition just as he is aware, and makes us aware, of the development between the Second and Third Symphonies. His attention to tempo is particularly acute and invariably he strikes just the right balance between romantic languor and urgency. The Philharmonia plays for all it's worth and possesses a fine body of sound. The recordings are remarkably consistent in quality and effectively complement the composer's original sound world.

Symphony No 1

Symphonies Nos 1, 2 and 4. Karelia Suite. Finlandia
Philharmonia / Vladimir Ashkenazy
Double Decca ② 455 402-2DF2 Ⓜ
(144 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1979, 1980 and 1984 ●

Vladimir Ashkenazy's account of the First Symphony is a strong one, arguably as successful artistically as it is in terms of recorded sound. It is well held together and finely shaped: it is every bit as committed as Simon Rattle's with his Birmingham orchestra but free from the occasional mannerism that disfigured that account. Ashkenazy is exactly on target in the Scherzo (dotted minim = 104), fractionally faster than Karajan and much more so than Rattle, who is far too measured here. The resultant sense of momentum is exhilarating.

The opening of the work is strongly projected and boldly contrasted with the movement which grows out of it. In fact, this movement has real grip – and a powerful sense of its own architecture. But throughout, the sheer physical excitement this score engenders is tempered by admirable control. Only at the end of the slow movement might you feel that Ashkenazy could have given it greater emotional restraint.

The playing of the Philharmonia is superb. The Fourth rather disappoints – one is left with a feeling that Ashkenazy could have wrung more from the desolate woodwind solos of the Largo. However, his Karelia and Finlandia are very good indeed. This set will give you hours of listening pleasure.

Symphony No 2

Symphonies Nos 2 and 6
London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 68218-2 Ⓕ
(73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994 ●●

The eloquent polyphony, purity of utterance and harmony of spirit give the Sixth Symphony a special place in the canon. Sibelius's mastery enables him to move with a freedom so complete that the musical events are dictated by their own inner necessity. And in Davis's hands this music unfolds with a freedom and naturalness that are totally convincing. As Sibelius said of the Fourth Symphony, this is music 'with nothing of the circus about it', and in this reading there is no playing to the gallery.

There is no playing to the gallery either in Sir Colin's account of the Second. He views the work as a whole and does not invest detail with undue expressive vehemence at its expense, but strikes just the right balance between the nationalist-romantic inheritance on the one side and the classical power of Sibelius's thinking on the other. The first movement has dignity and breadth, and as with Karajan (EMI), the pacing of climaxes is magisterial. The recording has splendid presence and space.

Symphony No 2. Pohjola's Daughter, Op 49. 🄷
Legends – No 2, The Swan of Tuonela; No 4, Lemminkäinen's return. Finlandia
NBC Symphony Orchestra / Arturo Toscanini
Naxos Historical mono 8 110810 (76 minutes: ADD) Ⓢ
Recorded live in 1940

As the symphony's finale builds to its apotheosis, you'll have to contend with trumpets that sound as if they more usually play at wedding parties for The Godfather. This is presumably how Toscanini liked his trumpets (and woodwinds and strings) to sound when singing, just as he liked them to deliver more forceful, rhythmical figures with a vengeance – the 'vengeance' perhaps a result of close microphones and/or little evidence of a hall acoustic. All of which means that if your notions of Nordic nobility in the symphony are gathered across the decades from recordings by Kajanus, Collins, Koussevitzky and Karajan, you should probably give Toscanini a wide berth. If you did, however, you would be depriving yourself of perhaps the most dramatically intense and physically exciting performances of the symphony and Pohjola's Daughter ever recorded. The present Naxos accounts of the symphony and Pohjola's Daughter are already available (at twice the price) in RCA's Toscanini Edition. The only audible difference lies in the more 'filtered' (and arguably smoother) sound of the Naxos transfer. The same could be said of Pohjola's Daughter, but here Naxos has used a different source, with a noisier surface, though less flutter. By way of shorter items, the Naxos release offers, as does RCA's, 'The Swan of Tuonela' and Finlandia, but the RCA performances are later ones with cleaner, clearer and more boldly projected sound. Which leaves Naxos's extra carrot (apart from the price) – a 'Lemminkäinen's return' electric with energy.

Symphonies Nos 2 and 3
Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä
BIS BISCD862 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996-97

The first issue in the Sibelius cycle by Osmo Vänskä and the Lahti orchestra (Symphonies Nos 1 and 4) made a strong impression. Indeed it holds its own against the most exalted competition, including the coupling by the LSO and Sir Colin Davis. The present set does not disappoint either: these artists are right inside this music.

First, the Second Symphony where competition is stiffest, with Karajan, Barbirolli and Colin Davis leading a field that includes Szell (Philips – nla), Kletzki (EMI – nla) and Ormandy (Sony). Admittedly it would have been preferable if Vänskä had set a slightly brisker tempo at the very opening, though he is not alone in the pace he adopts. Karajan and Sir Colin are equally measured. Kajanus took 8'14" over this movement and Sibelius's first biographer, the scholar-critic Erik Furuhjhelm, records that the composer took it even faster! Perhaps the briskest of all modern performances is Neeme Järvi and the Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra. Vänskä's reading is both powerfully wrought and well thought-out though there are some self-conscious touches. He pulls back a little too much at the tranquillo marking in the first movement (track 1, 4'31"), of which one becomes too aware. Elsewhere he makes one think afresh about the score. The F sharp major tune on the strings in the slow movement marked ppp is played as a barely audible whisper (track 2, 4'40") and so exaggerated does it seem that the wind four bars later sound (and are) much louder than the marked pianissimo. But these are minor matters in a performance marked by feeling and eloquence.

It is good to see the Third Symphony doing so well on record. Vänskä sets the right tempo for the first movement and gets the right atmosphere. The opening bars do not build up as powerfully as they do in the hands of the LSO and Sir Colin, and it is possible to feel a certain want of momentum in the slow movement by their side and in comparison with Kajanus's pioneering set. On the whole, however, this is a very good performance, well paced and full of perceptive touches. The sound is excellent and, exceptionally wide-ranging.

Additional recommendations

Symphony No 2
Coupling: Romance for Strings
Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra / Järvi
BIS CD252 (DDD: 10/84) Ⓕ

This is a performance full of sinew and fire. Fast and vigorous in the first movement, the orchestra play with tremendous commitment.

Symphonies Nos 2, 3 and 5
Couplings: Valse Triste. Andante festivo.
Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra / Jansons
EMI Double Forte ② 575 673-2
(DDD: 7/93) Ⓜ

This is a beautiful performance of the Second Symphony, full of incidental detail and given a majestic, aristocratic sweep. This is a version with no playing to the gallery. The Third is just as fine – masses of detail and some superb playing.

Symphony No 3

Symphony No 3. Pohjola's Daughter, Op 49. 🄷
Pelleas and Melisande – No 2, Melisande; No 6, Pastorale; No 7, At the spinning wheel; No 8, Intermezzo; No 9, Death of Melisande.
Nightride and Sunrise
London Symphony Orchestra / Anthony Collins
Beulah mono 3PD8 (68 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1954-55 ◉

The name Anthony Collins (1893-1963) probably doesn't mean a great deal to the majority of younger readers, but for quite a few serious Sibelius aficionados his 1950s Decca recordings hold cult status. In these transfers the original recordings are revealed for the fine achievements they were: beautifully balanced, clear and vivid, allowing us to hear these performances in intimate detail – which is how they deserve to be heard. Collins is a first-rate musical landscape-painter. He doesn't just give us the bold sweeping brush-strokes; he shows how the landscapes team with minute life. Rustling string textures aren't blandly homogenised – tiny details catch the ear, and then vanish again. Woodwind bird calls or horn calls can be acutely expressive – some passages remind one of Sibelius's comments about quasi-human voices in the nature sounds around his forest-home. But exaggeration is alien to the Collins approach. Nothing is forced, almost everything is fresh and vital.

Symphonies[a] Nos 3 and 5. March of the Finnish 🄷
Jaeger Battalion, Op 91 No 1[b]
[a]London Symphony Orchestra; [b]Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra / Robert Kajanus
Koch Historic mono 37133-2 (62 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1928-1933 ◉

Finlandia has already reissued all Kajanus's London recordings on a three-disc set. That edition contains transfers made by Anthony Griffith for World Records, issued in the 1970s, and they still sound very good indeed. Griffith had the advantage of working from original masters: Koch's Mark Obert-Thorn has been obliged to use commercial pressings and while he has obtained good sound, there is inevitably more background noise and an unevenness in the quality which is not present in Finlandia's transfers. However, Koch has scored an important point by including Kajanus's only Sibelius recording with his own Helsinki orchestra. The piece itself is perhaps the composer's weakest, but the performance has great historical importance, for it is played by an orchestra with which Sibelius had close links, and under a conductor who was his chosen interpreter. We can hear clearly just why Sibelius admired Kajanus so much in the two symphonies here. At the age of 76 he was still able to generate a good deal of tension and energy in the London Symphony Orchestra's playing, yet there is a particular sense of balanced, logical music-making, a seemingly natural authority in the phrasing and an apparent inevitability in the way he unfolds the composer's symphonic argument. Everything seems perfectly in place, and the music speaks to us in a very direct and compelling fashion.

Additional recommendations

Symphony No 3
Coupling: Symphony No 1
Iceland Symphony Orchestra / Sakari
Naxos 8 554102 (68 minutes: DDD: 1/99) Ⓢ

Well worth considering for those on a budget. Good, committed playing from the Iceland SO.

Symphonies Nos 3 and 4
Couplings: Symphonies Nos 1 and 2
Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra / Berglund
EMI Double Forte ② 568643-2 Ⓜ
(140 minutes: DDD: 5/96)

Berglund's Sibelius is always worth listening to;

few conductors have such experience in this music. Quite a bargain!

Symphony No 4

Symphonies Nos 4 and 7. Kuolema – Valse triste
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG Galleria 439 527-2GGA (66 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1965-67 ●●

Karajan recorded the Fourth Symphony three times, once in the 1950s with the Philharmonia and twice with the Berlin Philharmonic. The work obviously meant a great deal to him. He insisted on its inclusion in his very first concert on his appointment at the Berlin Philharmonic in the early 1960s at a time when Sibelius's cause had few champions in Germany, so keen was he to stake its claim as one of the great symphonies of the day. Karajan's account has withstood the test of time as one of the most searching, profound and concentrated performances of this masterpiece, and its reappearance at mid price was very welcome. The Seventh is finer than his earlier Philharmonia version but does not enjoy quite the same classic status. Karajan's Valse triste is wonderfully seductive. Indispensable!

Symphonies – Nos 4 and 7[a]. H
Pelléas et Mélisande, Op 46. Swanwhite, Op 54. The Tempest – Dance of the Nymphs. Tapiola, Op 112
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Thomas Beecham
BBC Legends/IMG Artists ② BBCL4041-2 Ⓜ
(139 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in [a]1954 and 1955.
Includes Beecham on Sibelius, broadcast 1955 ●

In a broadcast concert to mark Sibelius's 90th birthday on December 8, 1955, the RPO under Sir Thomas Beecham (friend of the composer for nearly 50 years and one of his doughtiest champions) played to a capacity Royal Festival Hall. The inclusion here of the British and Finnish national anthems, both stirringly done, recreates the necessary sense of occasion. In the delightful, too rarely encountered Swanwhite suite, from which Beecham omits the powerfully sombre fifth movement ('The Prince alone'), one may at first miss his characteristic concentration and charisma, but his leisurely, affectionate rendering grows on one. Orchestral discipline takes a dip with the Fourth Symphony, but far more disconcerting is the all-pervading air of loose-limbed impatience: the opening Tempo molto moderato, quasi adagio is wayward and fussy. There are glimpses of greatness in the third movement (the strings at the climax have a refulgent warmth about them), as well as some effective dynamic emendations in the finale, but overall it's a curiously uninvolving display.

Only in the concert's second half does this legendary partnership really begin to show what it's capable of. The Pelléas suite distils a poetic enchantment (try the ineffably touching 'Mélisande') and tingling sense of atmosphere that not only make you forget about the maddeningly bronchial audience, but also act as a timely reminder that these artists' glorious studio recording dates from exactly the same period (EMI – unavailable at present). Tapiola is even finer, a performance of giant authority, devastating emotional candour and towering humanity – indeed Beecham's most powerful Tapiola currently available. As an encore, the fetching 'Dance of the Nymphs' from The Tempest is delectably done. As a substantial bonus there's a radiantly moving Sibelius Seventh from the 1954 Proms, and a personable, at times entertainingly scatty talk on Sibelius and his music by the inimitable maestro recorded for the BBC's Third Programme two weeks before that 90th-birthday concert. A mandatory purchase for the frequently spellbinding contents of disc 2 alone.

Additional recommendations
Symphonies Nos 1 and 4
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Maazel
Belart 461 325-2 (69 minutes: ADD: 2/97) Ⓢ
Maazel's early 1960s Sibelius cycle still sounds good and his interpretations have aged very well. A real bargain.

Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Vänskä
BIS BISCD861 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Osmo Vänskä is one of today's leading Sibelians and this fine coupling plays to his strengths.

Symphonies Nos 1, 2 and 4
Coupling: Symphony No 5
Boston Symphony Orchestra / Davis, C
Philips Duo ② 446 157-2PM2
(154 minutes: ADD: 3/77[R]) Ⓜ
Davis's late-1970s Boston Sibelius cycle has a lot of admirers and should entrance a new generation of music-lovers in this competitive reissue.

Symphony No 5

Awards 1996

Symphony No 5 (original 1915 version).
En saga (original 1892 version)
Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä
BIS BISCD800 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●●●

Every so often a CD appears which, by means of some interpretative insight, changes our view of a piece of music. This disc changes our whole perspective in a wholly different sense, for it gives us a glimpse of two familiar masterpieces in the making. Sibelius struggled with the Fifth Symphony for almost seven years from about 1912 until it reached its definitive form in 1919. Although the finished score of the first version does not survive, the orchestral material does, so it was not difficult to reconstruct the score.

To study how the two scores differ is to learn something important about the creative process and it is this mystery that makes this disc imperative listening – and not just for Sibelians. The four-movement 1915 score has a more complex harmonic language than the final score and so it provides a missing link, as it were, between the Fourth Symphony and the definitive Fifth. The opening horn motive has yet to emerge, and the finale's coda has yet to acquire its hammer-blow chords. And in between you will find that the various themes, some distinctly recognizable, others taking off in totally unexpected directions and charting unknown regions.

The version of En saga with which we are familiar does not come between the Kullervo Symphony and the Karelia music but from 1901 between the First and Second Symphonies and was made for Busoni.

The original offers fascinating material for comparison: there is a brief glimpse of Bruckner, whose work he had encountered in Vienna a year or two earlier, and the orchestral writing, though not always as polished as in the later version, still has flair. Praise to the Lahti orchestra and their fine conductor, and the excellent and natural balance.

Sibelius Symphony No 5[a] Nielsen Symphony No 4, 'The inextinguishable', FS76[b]. Pan and Syrinx FS87[b]
[a]Philharmonia Orchestra, [b]City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 764737-2 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1981-84 ●●

Symphony No 5 is also available on 🏅
HMV Classics HMV5 72158-2 Ⓑ

Rattle's 1982 recording of the Sibelius Fifth is a remarkable achievement for a young man; it was (and remains) one of the very best in the catalogue. He handles the transition between the first movement and the Scherzo section in masterly fashion – more convincingly than in his later CBSO performance, good though that is. It received (and more to the point, deserved) numerous accolades at the time and it is a pleasure to have it reissued at mid and recently bargain price. Rattle's version of Pan and Syrinx, is one of the most poetic interpretations of this little masterpiece ever committed to disc, while his account of Nielsen's Fourth is perceptive and well shaped, though it lacks some of the fire and abandon recalled from a broadcast he made with the Philharmonia Orchestra in the late 1970s. Strongly recommended.

Symphony No 6

Symphonies Nos 6 and 7. Tapiola, Op 112
Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä
BIS BISCD864 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

The Lahti orchestra bring total dedication to these great scores and Osmo Vänskä, as we have observed in his remarkable accounts of the First and Fourth Symphonies, is a Sibelian of substance. With this account of the Sixth and Seventh he brings his survey to a triumphant conclusion. Indeed this is every bit as impressive as the First and Fourth. To the Sixth Symphon he brings total concentration: a serene slo movement but a very fast Scherzo and taut held-together finale. The Seventh is finely conceived and paced and though the Lahti orchestr are not the equal of the Finnish RSO for Sarast or the Helsinki PO for Berglund (both conductor fine Sibelians), directed by Vänskä they give th more compelling and convincing performance

The Tapiola is thrilling: atmospheric an powerfully built up and though it does no displaces Karajan, Koussevitzky, Beecham an so on, it is a measure of its splendour and powe – and the terror it evokes – that it invites only th most exalted comparisons. Of course, in th Sixth Symphony one would not want to b without either Sir Colin Davis, the Beechar or any of the Karajan versions – least of all hi 1981 reading – and for the Seventh the roll-ca must certainly include Koussevitzky's semina account as well as both Sir Colin's Boston an LSO accounts (the latter recently deleted).

However, this impressive issue should, withou a shadow of a doubt, be heard by all Sibelians. Th recorded sound is in the first flight and there ar excellent notes by Andrew Barnett, too.

Symphonies Nos 6 and 7. The Tempest – Suite No 2, Op 109
Iceland Symphony Orchestra / Petri Sakari
Naxos 8 554387 (71 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 2000

A most enjoyable conclusion to Petri Sakari' Sibelius symphony cycle. Sakari's Sixth impresse by dint of its unpretentious honesty and quie cogency. As on previous instalments within thi series, the Icelanders respond with a kee fervour as contagious as it is heartwarmin Their woodwind roster comprises an especiall personable bunch, and if the strings inevitabl lack that very last ounce of tonal clout and shee composure provided by, say, Karajan's Berli Philharmonic or the San Francisco Symphon under Blomstedt – to name but two of th strongest rivals – there's no missing the touchin expressive warmth they bring to the work's transcendental closing pages. In Sakari's hands bot outer movements develop real fire and purpos and he uncovers plenty of happy detail along th way – the distinctive colouring of the bass clarine being one of this performance's chief pleasures.

Sakari's Seventh, too, is very good indee patient and imaginative in the manner o Vänskä, or Sanderling's much underrated, irresistibly sinewy 1974 recording with the Berli Symphony Orchestra. Perhaps the Iceland Symphony's principal trombonist could have bee just a touch more assertive for that heroic initia solo six bars after fig C, and the timpanis appears to enter a bar late just before fig E, bu the only sizeable niggle concerns Sakari's no quite-seamless handling of that tricky Poco a poc affrettando transition passage into the Vivacissim section beginning at fig J, itself not entirely fre of a certain breathless fluster. All of whic means, of course, that Sakari's conception as whole is not as thrillingly inevitable an experience as Koussevitzky's, Maazel's (a magnificent reading, sounding fresher than ever on a new Decca Legends compilation) or Boult's masterly 1963 concert relay with the RPO. That said, Sakari builds the shattering Largamente climax at fig Z superbly, and the closing bars are exceptionally fine. Not a front-runner, perhaps, but no mean achievement all the same. Well worth investigating at Naxos price.

Additional recommendations
Symphonies Nos 5 and 6
Coupling: Tapiola
Boston Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips Eloquence 468 198-2 (75 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ

Sir Colin Davis's Sibelius Symphony series with the Boston SO is held in great affection by many Sibelians (many prefer it to his later LSO cycle for RCA). The Boston SO's distinctive sound proves ideal for this music – there is a sheen to the sound that is almost luminous in quality.

Symphonies Nos 5 and 6
Couplings: Legends, 'Lemminkaïnen Suite', Op 22
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Karajan
DG Galleria 439 982-2GGA
(69 minutes: ADD: 1/95) Ⓜ

Couplings: Symphonies 4-7.
The Swan of Tuonela. Tapiola
DG The Originals ② 457 748-2GOR2 (ADD) Ⓜ

Karajan's glorious account of the Sixth remains, for some, unsurpassed. His DG Berlin Fifth is also very fine and indisputably the best of his four accounts.

Symphony No 6
Couplings: Symphony No 4. The Tempest – incidental music, Op 109: Prelude. Legends, 'Lemminkaïnen Suite', Op 22 – Lemminkaïnen's return. The Bard
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra; London Philharmonic Orchestra / Beecham
EMI Beecham Edition 764027-2 Ⓜ
(79 minutes: ADD: 3/92)

A disc to prove why Beecham is one of the finest of Sibelius interpreters: he really understands every note.

Symphony No 7

Symphony No 7 in C, Op 105. SymphonyNo 1 in E minor, Op 39
Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra / Leif Segerstam
Ondine ODE1007-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●

This is an issue to rank alongside Segerstam's outstanding Helsinki PO coupling of the Legends and Tapiola (Ondine) in its pungent character and re-creative spark.

Segerstam's Seventh is well paced and keenly phrased, hitting real heights in the darkly boiling maelstrom beginning at 13 bars before fig L (9'53") and awe-inspiring culmination at fig Z (18'06"). His orchestra responds with zest and no mean poise. In fact, despite what sounds suspiciously like an edit at 15'50", this Seventh is one of the most imposing and highly charged of recent years. Bracing drama and a bold emotional scope are the keynotes to Segerstam's deeply pondered reading of the First Symphony. Assisted by alert and enthusiastic playing from his Helsinki band, he uncovers much illuminating detail within Sibelius' meticulous canvas, yet seldom to the detriment of the grander scheme. You may not agree with every interpretative decision, but Segerstam never sells the music short, revelling in its passion and often daring originality (sample the untamed fury of the Allegro molto material in the finale – nature red in tooth and claw). If Segerstam's strikingly pliable account lacks the thrust of, say, Vänskä's exhilarating Lahti SO performance, his Helsinki strings generate greater lyrical breadth.

True, the recording is very good rather than exceptional, but Segerstam is never dull and makes you listen.

Symphony No 7[a] 🄷
Pelleas and Melisande[a] – Melisande; Spring in the park; Intermezzo; The death of Melisande.
The Tempest[b] – incidental music, Op 109: Prelude; The oak-tree; Humoresque; Caliban's Song; Berceuse; Prospero; Miranda. Scenes historiques, Op 25[b] – Festivo. In memoriam, Op 59[b]. Legends, Op 22[b] – Lemminkäinen's return
[a]New York Philharmonic Orchestra; [b]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Beecham
Dutton Laboratories CDAX8013 (76 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1936-42 ●●

One of the special things about Beecham's Sibelius is its sheer sonority: the strings have a fresh, vernal sheen quite different from the opulence of Koussevitzky or Karajan, though Sir Thomas had all their flexibility and plasticity of phrasing, perhaps even more, together with the ability to create an atmosphere easier to discern than define. This still comes across despite the more limited frequency range of these early recordings, in which the strings easily lose their bloom. In all, Beecham recorded the Seventh Symphony three times – his last version was in 1955 with the RPO (HMV Classics), but this 1942 account is easily his best: it has a powerful thrust and an intensity altogether missing from his RPO reading. Although Sir Thomas never passed the records, possibly due to 'the rather hollow sound' of the acoustic or some minor blemishes of execution, they were released in America and, as Lyndon Jenkins reminds us, fortunately for us, he lost the subsequent lawsuit. Mind you, the sound at the opening of the 1942 'Melisande' is undoubtedly hollow and not the equal of Beecham's pre-war Sibelius Society version (EMI). The performance of the symphony is quite magisterial and is altogether tougher and stronger in profile than either of his later ones. The transfer is pretty magisterial too.

Some of the remaining material on this disc has not been available since the days of shellac.

Of particular interest are the items from Beecham's first Pelleas and Melisande and his earlier recordings of the pieces from The Tempest. The Prelude is undoubtedly the most terrifying so far put on disc, his account of 'The oak-tree' is more atmospheric and chilling than his 1955 reading, and the same goes for the 'Berceuse'. In short, strongly recommended.

Symphonies Nos 2^{a}, 5^{a} and 7^{b}. Swanwhite^{c} – The maidens with roses. Tapiola^{d}. Pohjola's Daughter^{c} 🄷
^{acd}Boston Symphony Orchestra; ^{b}BBC Symphony Orchestra / Koussevitzky
Pearl ② GEMMCDS9408 (125 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded ^{b}1933 (live), ^{a}1935, ^{c}1936 and ^{d}1939 ●●●

Among the great conductors closely identified in the public mind with Sibelius (Kajanus, Beecham and Karajan), Koussevitzky is the one whose star has faded. Not among serious collectors, of course, but as far as the wider musical public is concerned. But if he has not acquired cult status, his claims on our allegiance is every bit as strong. In the 1930s and 1940s, Koussevitzky's reputation as a great Sibelius conductor was second to none. Less well known is the fact that he was a relatively late convert to his cause: not until the mid 1920s was his enthusiasm really fired. In 1926, two years after he had come to Boston, he presented the Seventh Symphony, and his celebrated recording was made seven years later during his guest appearances with the BBC Symphony Orchestra. It remains the most electrifying performance ever committed to disc, an account of extraordinary intensity and concentration, and the new transfer gives it a body and presence that are exhilarating.

Koussevitzky recorded the Second Symphony in Boston two years later, in 1935, and then again in 1950. The present version of the work was the second to appear – Kajanus's pioneering account had been made in 1930 for Columbia. Koussevitzky's, however, is very different: the opening allegretto is far more measured and has the greater breadth, though one suspects that Kajanus was closer to Sibelius's intentions. Of course, the orchestral playing of the Boston Symphony is vastly superior, particularly the strings, which positively glow. Throughout this Boston performance there is a sustained feeling for line, a tenuto of remarkable quality and a sense of direction and power that are altogether exceptional. Koussevitzky's account of the Fifth Symphony has been surpassed in dramatic fire only by Toscanini, and Pohjola's daughter has the same wonderful sense of line Koussevitzky achieved in the Symphonies Nos 2 and 7.

The wonderfully concentrated and thrilling account of Tapiola is among the pantheon of great performances on record; such is its intensity that one wonders whether it has ever been surpassed, even by Beecham and Karajan. In Koussevitzky's hands the forests seem to howl in some kind of primaeval agony. His performance of 'The Maidens with roses' from Swanwhite is equally seductive. A marvellous set, superbly transferred.

Additional recommendations
Symphonies Nos 6 and 7
Coupling: Nightride and Sunrise
Berlin Symphony Orchestra / Sanderling
Berlin Classics 0092 812BC (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

A coupling that enjoys quite a following among informed Sibelians. By no means mainstream but worth exploring.

Couplings: Symphony No 5. The Oceanides. Finlandia. Tapiola
Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra / Berglund
EMI Double Forte ② 568646-2
(112 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

The other half of Berglund's 1980s Sibelius cycle. Notable for its rugged intensity.

Symphonies Nos 3, 6 and 7
Couplings: Violin Concerto. Finlandia. Tapiola. Legends, 'Lemminkaïnen Suite', Op 22
Accardo vn Boston Symphony Orchestra; London Symphony Orchestra / Davis, C
Philips Duo 446 160-2PM2 ② (146 minutes: ADD:11/75^{R}) Ⓜ

Another 'second half' of a cycle. The symphonies have a wonderful sheen and the couplings are particularly generous.

Symphony No 7
Couplings: Schubert Symphony No 8. Bizet Jeux d'enfants – excerpts. Ravel Daphnis et Chloé
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Boult
BBC Music Legends/IMG Artists BBCL4039-2 Ⓜ
(75 minutes: ADD: 12/00)

Boult was not a conductor you'd immediately associate with Sibelius but this honest reading forms part of a highly enticing concert.

Further listening
Simpson Symphony No 5
Coupling: Symphony No 3
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley
Hyperion CDA66728 (71 minutes: DDD: 2/95) Ⓢ

A powerful symphonic vision forged from fierce emotions and vivid imaginings. Overwhelming.

Works for Violin and Piano

Five Pieces, Op 81. Novelette, Op 102. Five Danses champêtres, Op 106. Four Pieces, Op 115. Three Pieces, Op 116
Nils-Erik Sparf vn Bengt Forsberg pf
BIS CD625 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

No one listening to this music would doubt that Sibelius had a special feeling for the violin. Whether he is composing lighter music such as the captivating 'Rondino' from the Op 81 set or the more substantial later pieces, such as the first of the Danses champêtres, which comes close to the world of The Tempest. Neither the Op 115 nor the Op 116 set contains great music but they are much finer than they have been given credit for. Both 'On the heath' and the 'Ballade', Nos 1 and 2 of Op 115, have an innocence that calls to mind the wonderful Humoresques for violin and orchestra. In particular 'The Bells', Op 115 No 4 is a rather cryptic miniature and the 'Scène de danse' of Op 116, with its striking tonal juxtapositions, is a kind of Finnish equivalent of the Bartók Romanian Dances. Nils-Erik Sparf and Bengt Forsberg are dedicated and sensitive exponents who make the most of the opportunities this repertoire provides. One small reservation: the piano tone sounds a little thick at the bottom end, and the violin is by no means the dominant partner. Enthusiastically recommended.

Songs

King Christian II, Op 27 – Fool's Song of the Spider. Five Christmas Songs, Op 1. Eight Songs, Op 57. Hymn to Thaïs. Six Songs, Op 72 – No 3, The kiss; No 4, The echo nymph; No 5, Der Wanderer und der Bach; No 6, A hundred ways. Six Songs, Op 86. The small girls
Monica Groop mez Love Derwinger pf
BIS CD657 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994

Monica Groop, following her success in the Cardiff Singer of the World Competition, has built up a busy career. Communication is her strength, and unevenness of line a relative weakness. Sibelius's songs are a rich and still undervalued part of the song repertoire. Still only four or five are really well known, and none of those is included here. Not all are of very special quality: the title is probably the best thing about the 'Fool's Song of the Spider' (from King Christian II), and the Hymn to Thaïs gains interest through being Sibelius's only song in English rather than through intrinsic merit. Yet there are many delights here, including the closing waltz-song, The small girls. The acoustic is perhaps somewhat too reverberant but has plenty of presence.

Songs, Volume 3. Seven Songs, Op 13. Six Songs, Op 50. Six Songs, Op 90. The Wood Nymph. Belshazzar's Feast – The Jewish Girl's Song. Resemblance. A Song. Serenade. The Thought[a]
Anne Sofie von Otter, [a]Monica Groop mezzos
Bengt Forsberg pf
BIS CD757 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1994-95 ●

The vast majority of Sibelius's songs are in Swedish, the language with which he grew up as a child, and here they are given by a distinguished native Swedish partnership. The Seven Songs, Op 13, are all Runeberg settings and come from the composer's early years (1891-2). Best known, perhaps, are 'Spring is flying' and 'The dream', but there are others, such as 'The young hunter', that are no less delightful and characterful. The other Runeberg settings here, the Six Songs, Op 90, come towards the end of Sibelius's career as a song composer (1917-18). 'The north', as in all the nature poetry of Runeberg, touches a very special vein of inspiration. Along with 'Die stille Nacht', Op 50 No 5, which is equally affectingly given by these two artists – it is among his finest songs. Interest naturally focuses on the rarities.

The Wood Nymph, not to be confused with the melodrama or the tone-poem, is recorded here for the first time. As well as A Song, there are two other early Runeberg settings, the 1888 Serenade and Resemblance, both of them also première recordings. 'The Jewish Girl's Song' will be familiar from the incidental music to Belshazzar's Feast, and is affecting in this form – particularly sung as it is here. Given the artistry and insight of this splendid partnership, and the interest and beauty of the repertoire, this is a self-recommending issue.

To evening, Op 17 No 6. Six Songs, Op 36. Five Songs, Op 37. Six Songs, Op 50. Belshazzar's Feast, Op 51 – The Jewish Girl's Song. I am a tree, Op 57 No 5. The Elf-King, Op 57 No 8. The North, Op 90 No 1. Who has brought you here?, Op 90 No 6. Under the fir-trees, Op 13 No 1.
Spring is flying, Op 13 No 4
Katarina Karnéus mez Julius Drake pf
Hyperion CDA67318 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included ●

Sibelius's songs have taken a long time to come in from the cold. After all, the few that are relatively well-known (Black roses and Op 37 No 5, 'The Tryst') are passionate enough to have come from Italian opera, and others which over the years have found a place in the repertoire have a span of phrase and a melodic surge that encourage the voice to rise thrillingly, as in 'The Tryst's' predecessor, 'Was it a dream?'. The tingle of a Nordic chill in among this is in fact a further excitement of the blood. Given a voice that can combine the sparkle of sunlight on snow with the dark splendour which lies at the heart of those black roses, an entire programme of Sibelius's songs offers not an austere pleasure but almost a rich indulgence.

But from both singer and pianist there must also be a ready supply of imagination. Katarina Karnéus and Julius Drake answer these calls magnificently. The voice is firm and resonant, purest in quality in the upper D-to-F region and of ample range. In Julius Drake she has a pianist who extends the normal field of vision, and the two work together to great effect.

In the opening song, To evening ('Illalle'), Karnéus and Drake 'build' the verses with such effective graduations of power and intensity that everything is enhanced – the vocal line, the piano's tremolandos, words, mood, the poem-as-painting, the song as miniature epic.

In some others – 'Little Lasse' in Op 37 and the remarkable 'Tennis in Trianon' of Op 36 are examples – von Otter and Bengt Forsberg bring a further sophistication, more rightfully placed in the second example than the first. But if you want a single disc of 25 to to represent Sibelius's output of roughly 100 songs then this disc must take first choice.

Everyman, Op 83

Incidental Music – Everyman, Op 83; Belshazzar's Feast, Op 51. The Countess's Portrait, Op posth
Lilli Paasikivi mez Petri Lehto ten Sauli Tiilikainen bar Pauli Pietiläinen org Leena Saarenpaä pf
Lahti Chamber Choir; Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä
BIS CD735 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995 ●

These are all first recordings and interest centres on the score Sibelius wrote for Hofmannsthal's morality play, Jedermann ('Everyman') in 1916. The final score comprises 16 numbers and runs to some 40 minutes. Some of the music is fragmentary and hardly makes sense out of context, though most of it is atmospheric and all of it is characteristic. The sustained Largo section for muted, divided strings (track 11), is among the most searching music Sibelius ever wrote for theatre and, artistically, is fit to keep company with The Tempest music. Overall the material does not lend itself to being turned into a suite in the same way as Belshazzar's Feast but this recording rescues from obscurity some strangely haunting and at times really inspired music – the last 25 minutes are very powerful.

By all accounts Hjalmar Procopé's Belshazzar's Feast was a feeble play and when it first appeared, one newspaper cartoon showed the playwright being borne aloft in the composer's arms. There seems little doubt that his name would not be alive were it not for Sibelius's music. The latter certainly makes an expert job of creating an effective and (in the case of the 'Notturno') a moving concert suite. The Countess's Portrait (1906) is a wistful, pensive and charming piece for strings, which was only published two years ago. Obviously this is a self-recommending issue of exceptional interest.

Karelia

Incidental Music – Karelia; Kuolema. Valse triste, Op 44 No 1 (1904 versions)
Heikki Laitinen, Taito Hoffren sngrs Kirsi Tiihonen sop Raimo Laukka bar Lahti Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä
BIS CD915 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997

This is a disc which will be of great interest to Sibelians. The original score of the Karelia music was discovered in the conductor Kajanus's library after his death in 1933 and his widow returned it to Sibelius three years later. The music extended to eight tableaux which portrayed various episodes in Karelian history. In the 1940s Sibelius destroyed the score, about which he had had second thoughts since its première in 1893, sparing only the overture, the movements familiar from the suite and the first number, 'A Karelian Home – News of War'. Fortunately for posterity, a set of orchestral parts came to light, albeit incomplete, and were put into shape by Kalevi Kuoso. It was these that the composer Kalevi Aho used in preparing the edition on which this recording is based.

In all there are some 40 minutes of music, over half of which is new. Those familiar with the 'Ballade' from the Op 11 Suite will no doubt be slightly disconcerted to hear the familiar cor anglais melody taken by a baritone and will find the piece too long in its original form. The opening of the fifth tableau, 'Pontus de la Gardie at the gates of Käkisalmi [Kexholm Castle] in 1580', is highly effective and leads into the famous 'Alla marcia'. It is fascinating to hear what the piece is like, and what Sibelius was prepared to lose. Listening to this reaffirms and illumines both the sureness of his artistic judgement and the vitality of his creative imagination. Sibelius's incidental music to Kuolema, the play by his brother-in-law, Arvid Järnefelt, dates from 1903. The most familiar music from it is the Valse triste, which Sibelius revised the following year, adding flute, clarinet, horns and timpani and making it altogether more sophisticated harmonically and melodically. Osmo Vänskä and his Lahti players prove reliable and responsive guides in this atmospheric music and it is hard to imagine their performances being improved on. Wide-ranging and expertly balanced recorded sound.

The Tempest

The Tempest – Incidental Music, Op 109
Kirsi Tiihonen sop Lilli Paasikivi mez Anssi Hirvonen, Paavo Kerola tens Heikki Keinonen bar
Lahti Opera Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Osmo Vänskä
BIS CD581 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1992 ●

A first recording of the full score! Sibelius's music for The Tempest, his last and greatest work in its genre, was the result of a commission for a particularly lavish production at the Royal Theatre, Copenhagen in 1926. The score is far more extensive than the two suites and consists of 34 musical numbers for soloists, mixed choir, harmonium and large orchestra. Readers will be brought up with a start by the music for the 'Berceuse', the second item, which uses a harmonium rather than the strings with which we are familiar from the two suites and although it is still more magical in the familiar orchestral suite, the original has an other-worldly quality all its own. The music is played in the order in which it was used in the 1927 production of the play and there are ample and excellent explanatory notes. The 'Chorus of the Winds' is also different but no less magical in effect. Of course, taken out of the theatrical context, not everything comes off – but even if the invention is not consistent in quality, at its best it is quite wonderful. The singers and chorus all rise to the occasion and Osmo Vänskä succeeds in casting a powerful spell in the 'Intermezzo', which opens Act 4. The recording is marvellously atmospheric though it needs to be played at a higher than usual level setting as it is a little recessed. For Sibelians this is a self-recommending issue.

Additional recommendation
The Tempest
Viljakainen sop Groop mez Silvasti ten Hynninen, Tilikainen bars Finnish Opera Festival Chorus; Finnish Radio Symphony Orchestra/Saraste
Ondine ODE813-2 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

A fine alternative version with idiomatic singing and playing from these Finnish performers.

Choral Songs

Partsongs, Op 18[a] – No 1, The Broken Voice; No 3, The Boat Journey of Väinämöinen; No 4, Fire on the Island; No 6, The Song of my Heart. Busy as a Thrush[a]. Play, Beautiful Girl[a]. Rakastava, Op 14[a]. The Thrush's Toiling[a]. Festive March[a]. Cantata for the Helsinki University Ceremonies of 1897, Op 23[a]. To Thérèse Hahl[a]. Nostalgia[c]. Not with Grief[a]. Wonderful Gifts[c]. March of the Finnish Jaeger Battalion, Op 91 No 1. Three Runeberg Songs[a]. Awaken![a]. Choir of the Winds. Ballad[a]. The Son's Bride. Men from Plain and Sea, Op 65*a*[a]. Dreams[a]. Christmas Song[a]. Give Me No Splendour, Op 1 No 4[a]. Bell Melody of Berghaill Church, Op 65*b*[a]. Three Introductory Antiphons, Op 107*b*. Ode, Op 113 No 11[a]. Carminalia[bc]. Primary School Children's March[c]. In the Morning Mist[c]. Hail, O Princess[a]. The Landscape Breathes, Op 30[a]. Three American School Songs. The Way to School[a]. School Song[a]. March of the Labourers[a]. The World Song, Op 91*b*. Song of the Athenians, Op 31 No 3[bc]. To the Fatherland[a]. Song for the People of Uusimaa[a]. Finlandia[a]
[a]Tapiola Chamber Choir; [b]Friends of Sibelius / Hannu Norjanen; [c]Tapiola Choir / Kari Ala-Pöllänen with Ilmo Ranta pf Johanna Torikka org/harm
Finlandia 0630-19054-2 ② (147 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996-97

This survey of Sibelius's complete choral songs is important – and irresistible – for both its consistently fine performance and its historical context. The two-disc set begins where – in the mythology of Finnish oral tradition – all music began: with the life-giving song of Väinämöinen from the Kalevala's compilation of folk poetry; the verse which tuned Sibelius's ear to the musicality of the Finnish language (at a time when he and his social class still spoke Swedish) also inspired his first distinctive song settings. Here, excellent production most sensitively captures the division and shifting of the finely blended voices of the Tapiola Chamber Choir, as solo and ensemble voices trace the asymmetrical metres and modal cadences of works such as 'The Boat Journey' from Op 18 and 'The Lover'. References to the Kalevala return in the group of songs for ceremonies and festivities in which solo exhortations are pitted against shifting choral harmonies, as images of journey, hope and freedom are expressed in the supple melodies of 10 songs for a university degree ceremony from 1897 (Op 23).

A fervent and optimistic tribute to Finland's great Romantic painter Albert Edelfelt sets works by Sibelius's beloved Swedish-language poet, Rüneberg: and his 'Autumn Evening' could be an aural re-creation of one of the painter's own canvases. Sibelius's music pierces dark, close harmonies with high lines of anguish, presaging the imaginative virtuosity of later masterpieces such as 'Men from Plain and Sea' and 'Dreams' with their sense of the wandering and yearning of the human spirit. The second disc follows three simple Christmas carols with the composer's sacred and liturgical pieces. The songs for children range from uninspired English-language commissions for American schools, to a tiny and perfect setting of 'The Landscape Breathes', in which the girls' voices slowly and chromatically thaw from their unison freeze. Finland's and Sibelius's unjingoistic patriotism returns at the end with gently yet distinctively harmonised hymns to specific regions of the motherland and, finally, with the great Finlandia hymn.

Robert Simpson

British 1921-1997

GROVE Simpson, a pupil of Howells (1942-6), worked for the BBC (1951-80). His main achievement was his cycles of nine symphonies and eight string quartets, both begun in 1951 and both displaying a dynamic tonality quite individual in its energy and purposefulness, encouraged more than influenced by his admiration for Beethoven, Bruckner and Nielsen (on whom he published studies).

Symphonies Nos 1 and 8

Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Vernon Handley
Hyperion CDA66890 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Here is an inspiring encounter with music whose surface affinities (the dynamism of Beethoven, the registral awareness of Berlioz, the obsessional drive of Bartók and so on) fade from the mind as its unique blend of unquenchable energy and alert meditation takes you over. Like a number composers, Simpson seems to have responded to the power of late Beethoven and thought, 'I can do that'; like very few, he can.

The First's construction on the basis of proportionally related tempos enables it to be simultaneously part of the world of conflict and feeling and yet at the same time somehow soaring above it. The Eighth, by contrast, seems to embody some colossal inner rage. Each partial untying of its knotted psyche unleashes apocalyptic fury, and the quietus of harmonic resolution is denied until the very last moment.

The Eighth had an unhappy première performance in 1982. For this recording Vernon Handley hasclearly devoted a labour of love to it, and he seems to have persuaded the Royal Philharmonic to do the same.

Symphonies Nos 2 and 4
Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / Vernon Handley
Hyperion CDA66505 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

The opening of the Second Symphony is breathtaking – an 'active but mysterious' idea, utterly distinctive in its silvery harmonic colouring, it holds the key to a world where wistfulness can transmute into energy and where energy itself occasionally has to be rescued from the obsessional corners it drives itself into. The slow movement is no less characteristic of its composer in its gentle restorative quality, probing unfamiliar areas of the mind and conjuring them to life. For the finale it is doubtful if there is any parallel in Simpson's output; the rhythmic drive and grittiness of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is there in the background, but there is an almost irresponsible rollicking character similar to the Hindemith of the Symphonic Metamorphoses.

The Fourth Symphony contains perhaps the most remarkable and certainly the most instantly communicative of Simpson's Beethoven paraphrases. The model here is the scherzo of the Choral Symphony, with a Haydn quotation supplying material for the Trio section. To stay so close to the structure of the original and yet to create such an entirely new and individual experience is a feat of genuine compositional virtuosity. It is like Icarus and the sun all over again, except that Simpson gets away with it.

Some may find the following slow movement featureless. But experience suggests that a mind-stretching power will eventually disclose itself. In the meantime there are the constantly renewing horizons of the first movement to savour, with that special combination of transparent texture, blunt rhythms and polytonal shadings that gives Simpson's musical paragraphs their forward-looking momentum. And finally there are the massively energizing shouts which crown the work. All this gives Handley and his orchestra plenty to get their teeth into, and their response is as splendid as in their Gramophone Award-winning account of Simpson's Ninth.

Symphonies Nos 3 and 5
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Vernon Handley
Hyperion CDA66728 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●●

The Third Symphony is Simpson's best-known work and Vernon Handley play the symphony like the repertoire piece it deserves to be, and Hyperion's recording reveals a wealth of unsuspected detail and beauty. The Beethovenian impulse still comes across, and the abrasive edge is only slightly softened. But what has been gained is clarity, blend and perspective, plus a sense of dialogue (Simpson's polyphony never ceases to amaze) and an altogether subtler realisation of the luminosity of Simpson's scoring. The long accumulating second movement is absorbingly poetic, witty in its dialogue, and inevitable in its conclusion.

The Fifth Symphony is surely one of Simpson's most vivid pieces. Moods of terror, anger, anxious probing and fierce determination are right on the surface, and there is a feeling of terrific will-power being exerted to transmute those moods into a symphonic experience. This is one of the great symphonies of the post-war era, magnificently realised by all concerned.

Symphonies Nos 6 and 7
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Vernon Handley
Hyperion CDA66280 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1987

The first performances of these symphonies had shown many characteristic and admirable qualities, but there was a suspicion of some tentativeness a lowering of sights even, after the explosive Fifth Symphony. One should have guessed that closer acquaintance and more expert performance would show this to be more a matter of concentration of ideas and of conscious change of direction. The Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra and Vernon Handley show the Sixth to be a work of immense inner power, and if the Seventh is a more cryptic statement this recording certainly brings it into a clearer focus than previously.

Whereas Tippett (in the same year, curiously) wrote a birth-to-death symphony (his Fourth) Simpson's Sixth shifts the process one stage back – from conception to prime of life. Intense expectancy gives way to a memorable downward-stalking unison figure, the fertilised seed which becomes the most active force in the early stages of the work. From here to the irresistible energy of the final pages Simpson's control of musical momentum can only be marvelled at; and if you don't marvel at it, that may be because you are worrying about the apparent restriction on colour and lyricism, and thus missing the point.

As yet the final D major outcome still refuses to register as a natural outcome, although presumably there is any amount of logical justification for it. The neutral, non-triadic conclusion to the Seventh rings truer, though in this work the processes before it are more inscrutable—not in the technical sense, but simply in terms of what the techniques are driving at. But anyone who has puzzled over, and then clicked with, say, Sibelius's Fourth or Shostakovich's 15th, will know how dangerous it is to jump to conclusions. And even if the click never happens, one probable masterpiece is surely enough to be getting on with.

Awards
1989

Symphony No 9
Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / Vernon Handley
Hyperion CDA66299 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988
Also includes an illustrated talk on the work by the composer ●●●

If you know that feeling of expectancy, of vast potential energy, at the outset of a great symphony, you will surely respond to the opening of Simpson's Ninth – and be wholly engrossed. You will be led through shifting pedal-points and wedge-shaped themes encompassing a specific harmonic universe; through waves of energy pulsating fit to burst, until burst they do into a titanic scherzo; through slow, disembodied traceries of string lines, through awe-inspiring climaxes to a no less awe-inspiring hushed coda. And as rising scales pass through the coda's pedal-points into the final glacial sonority you will know that you have heard one of the finest symphonies of the post-war era.

The composer adds an explanatory 18-minute talk. Here are laid bare some of the salient constructional features of the work – the opening's basis in chorale prelude procedures (a fairly cosmic rethinking thereof!), the single underlying pulse of the entire work (a recurrent feature in Simpson's output, but never before applied on this scale), the palindromic variations in the second half, the debts to Bach, Beethoven and Bruckner. To which one might add that the rigorous processes described in this talk suggest a somewhat unlikely kinship with Bartók at his most abstract (as in the first movement of the Music for strings, percussion and celesta).

Bartók, it is safe to say, has as little to do with this work's symphonic instincts as any other 'big name' of the last 50 years or so. Simpson stands not at any fixed pole of today's music, but rather at a kind of magnetic north, free from attempts of musical cartographers to pin down his position, spiritually allied to composers of any age and style who have penetrated to the essence of music's motion in time. A totally absorbing symphony and the performance and recording are surely the best possible tribute to all concerned.

String Quartets

String Quartets Nos 7 and 8
Hyperion CDA66117 (51 minutes: AAD) Ⓕ
Delme Quartet (Galina Solodchin, Jeremy Williams vns John Underwood va Stephen Orton vc)
Recorded 1983 ●●

String Quartet No 9
Hyperion CDA66127 (58 minutes: AAD) Ⓕ
Delme Quartet (Galina Solodchin, Jeremy Williams vns John Underwood va Stephen Orton vc)
Recorded 1984

Quiet music with a sense of purpose and forward-looking destiny; slow music which bears the promise of a controlled release of energy, these are rare and treasurable qualities in music of our time, and they make their presence felt at the beginnings of Simpson's Seventh and Eighth Quartets. How he progresses through subdued scherzo to vehement climax is something to reflect on at length, and with further acquaintance comes the Beethovenian thrill of hearing the music think. But at first these things just steal up on you and take the breath away.

The Seventh Quartet is dedicated to Susi Jeans, widow of astronomer and mathematician Sir James Jeans, the Eighth is dedicated to entomologist David Gillett and his wife. Both works draw on the kind of motion suggested by those areas of scientific enquiry. On the other hand the Ninth calls up what would seem to be the bitterest enemy of forward movement – the palindrome; 32 variations and a fugue, in fact, on the minuet from Haydn's Symphony No 47 and all of them, like the original theme, palindromic. If Simpson's powers of invention falter at any stage in this hour-long tour de force you would be hard pushed to discover where. But then this music so completely absorbing that the necessary critical detachment is difficult to achieve. The only reservation that did register was over recording quality, which for the Ninth Quartet is disappointingly boxy – sensuous appeal is not what this music is about, but a more ingratiating acoustic would not do it any harm – and to hear the Seventh without the distraction, however faint, of traffic noise would be preferable.

The Delme Quartet's performances are outstandingly dedicated. The Ninth Quartet was composed for their 20th anniversary and they prove themselves entirely worthy of the honour.

String Quartet No 13. String Quintet No 2
Clarinet Quintet
Thea King cl Christopher van Kampen vc Delmé Quartet (Galina Solodchin, John Trusler vns John Underwood va Jonathan Williams vc)
Hyperion CDA66905 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

An invigorating and thought-provoking disc. In the Clarinet Quintet of 1968 the wind partner is treated as an equal of the strings, which makes the linear and contrapuntal inventiveness all the more remarkable and absorbing, though for some it may make the music seem no more than monochrome. Like late Beethoven, Simpson seems to begin by charting a realm just out of emotional reach yet somehow crucial to one's psychic well-being. The mental energy gained then spills over into actual fast music, even into an engaging jigginess. The Quintet feels as though it could go on much longer than its actual 31 minutes without the inventive resources drying up. The rarefied conclusion is all the more moving for its steadiness of gaze. The 13th Quartet (1989) retains many familiar Simpson hallmarks. It opens with a sinewy, deceptively triadic theme which soon gives way to spidery, triplety counterpoint. It is all very ascetic and self-denying and the second and fourth movements go into an interior, attenuated world in which it is difficult to feel entirely at home.

The even more recent String Quintet No 2 keeps its cards just as close to its chest. Again the design alternates austere, lyrical music with a knotty Allegro, initially short-lived but gradually expanding, while the slower sections are more or less constant in duration. The impression is less of conflict and resolution than of a stand-off between the two tempo-types, eyeing one another in mutual suspicion; the conclusion is bleak-Sibelian. The Delmé is a longstanding Simpson advocate and it seems to have the ideal sound for him – crystalline, alert and focused, as though beyond obvious human expressiveness in a realm of higher wisdom. The same goes for their admirable partners, Thea King and Christopher van Kampen. This may be one of the less immediately accessible Simpson programmes, but it is still richly rewarding.

Vocal Works

Canzona[a]. Media morte in vita sumus[b]. Tempi[c].
Eppur si muove[d]
[d]Iain Quinn org [ab]Corydon Brass Ensemble;
[bc]Corydon Singers / Matthew Best
Hyperion CDA67016 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1997 ●

Simpson would never have claimed that choral music was his métier. Yet for lovers of his music there is something especially revealing about the two pieces recorded here. In Media morte in vita sumus ('In the midst of death we are in life') he deliberately reverses the scriptural motto in order to articulate his personal 'anti-pessimist' creed. The musical setting for chorus, brass and timpani is appropriately austere, and Simpson's words are translated into Latin for the sake of universality. Tempi for a cappella chorus is a jeu d'esprit, the text consisting entirely of Italian tempo and character markings. The Corydon Singers offers superbly confident performances, as does the Corydon Brass Ensemble which also shines in the comparatively well-known Canzona. It's impossible to avoid comparisons with Nielsen when it comes to the 31-minute Eppur si muove ('But it does move') for organ. This 12-minute ricercare followed by a 19-minute passacaglia sets its jaw squarely against conventional organ-loft grandiosity. Its intellectual monumentality is clearly in the Commotio mould, though it's considerably tougher going than Nielsen's late masterpiece. Iain Quinn joins the long line of dedicated performers who have made Hyperion's Simpson series such a consistent triumph. Recording quality leaves nothing to be desired.

Nikos Skalkottas

Greek 1904-1949

GROVE Skalkottas studied as a violinist at the Athens Conservatory and as a composer in Berlin with Juon, Kahn, Jarnach (1925-7), Weill (1928-9) and Schoenberg (1927-31). In 1933 he returned to Athens, where he worked as a back-desk violinist. His Berlin works are relatively compact and high-spirited, being almost exclusively instrumental and following the neo-classicism of his teachers (in 1927 his music became atonal, but not yet serial). But the bulk of his music dates from 1935-45, when the genres remained traditional but the forms were greatly expanded to contain a deep complexity of serial thematic working: major works of this period include the Third Piano Concerto (1939), the Fourth Quartet (1940) and the overture The Return of Odysseus (1943); he wrote several concertos, chamber and vocal music. He also produced tonal works, including a collection of 36 Greek Dances for orchestra (1936).

Piano Concerto No 1, AK16

Piano Concerto No 1, AK16[a].
The Maiden and Death – Ballet Suite, AK12.
Ouvertüre concertante, AK46
[a]Geoffrey Douglas Madge pf Iceland Symphony Orchestra / Nikos Christodoulou Ⓕ
BIS CD1014 (56 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998 ●

BIS's Skalkottas cycle started very well and gets better with each release. The First Piano Concerto's characteristic use of a family of note-rows, rather than just one, may have ignited the rift between the apprentice composer and his teacher, Schoenberg. The neo-classical elements cannot have been to the latter's liking, either. Geoffrey Douglas Madge gives a barnstorming performance and the accompaniment is electrifying. The orchestra is heard at its best and in its own right in the suite from the folk-ballet The Maiden and Death (1938). Here Skalkottas's brilliant orchestration shines through in what is much more than a pre-run of The Mayday Spell. The idiom is less fragmentary than the latter; indeed, it suggests a Greek Miraculous Mandarin, if less overtly spectacular in sound or scandalous in plot.

The disc concludes with a further movement from the unfinished Second Symphonic Suite (1944-5; compare the Largo sinfonico on the first disc). This Ouvertüre concertante is pretty much what the title leads you to expect it to be, a superbly scored sonata-derivative, employing the composer's note-row-complex manner in a most attractive fashion.

Violin Concerto, AK22

Violin Concerto, AK22[a]. Largo Sinfonico, AK4a.
Greek Dances, AK11 – Epirotikos; Kretikos; Tsamikos; Thessalikos; Mariori mou-Mariori mou; Arkadikos; Kleftikos (arr cpsr)
[a]Georgios Demertzis vn Malmö Symphony Orchestra / Nikos Christodoulou Ⓕ
BIS CD904 (78 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997 ●

From Skalkottas's earliest works, a personal idiom was clearly in evidence, combining European modernism with the rhythmic dynamism of Greek traditional music, and characterised by a tensile strength and translucency of sound. Like Bartók, Skalkottas wrote 'popular' music without compromise. The Greek Dances are ideal encore pieces, not least in these suave arrangements for strings.

The Violin Concerto of 1937 is among his major works, with a solo part that is demanding yet integral to the symphonic nature of the score – something that Georgios Demertzis's vital account readily conveys here. The close of the Andante possesses true lyrical repose, before the finale provides fireworks as well as clinching the musical design.

The Largo Sinfonico, completed in 1944, embodies some of Skalkottas's most personal music; a seamless fusion of variation and sonata forms, it is as satisfying formally as it is emotionally. Nikos Christodoulou's accompanying notes speak of a private musical universe, yet the plangency of the cello theme and the remorseless tread of the central climaxes betray an unease that must surely be inseparable from the time of composition. The final bars, with the thematic material recast as a series of unearthly chords, feel as much a stoic acceptance of reality as they are a 'harmony of the spheres'. With the Malmö orchestra fully attuned to the idiom, Christodoulou's powerfully shaped reading makes for a compelling experience.

String Quartet No 3, AK34

String Quartets – No 3, AK34; No 4, AK35
New Hellenic Quartet (Georgios Demertzis, Dimitris Chandrakis vns Paris Anastasiades va Apostolos Chandrakis vc)
BIS CD1074 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

Make no mistake about it, BIS's Skalkottas cycle is among the most stimulating recording projects of recent years, and the present disc further enhances its status. The Third Quartet (1935) marked his full return to composition after four years of depression and likely stylistic uncertainty, and the contrasts in idiom evident from his Berlin years are replaced by a tight integration of form and content. The alternate harmonic and melodic presentation of material throughout the opening movement is paralleled by the modal cadential idea which increasingly pervades the Andante, in turn governing the tonal outcome of the finale. What appears an overtly classical structure takes on a unity akin to Bartók's Third Quartet.

In terms of musicianship, the New Hellenic Quartet are significantly superior to rivals' accounts, while their dedication establishes the previously unrecorded Fourth Quartet as the missing masterwork in the 'golden age' of interwar quartet writing.

In his booklet-note, Kostis Demertzis speculates that the work may have been originally planned as a symphony for strings, but the rhythmic velocity of the first movement and Scherzo is such that few larger ensembles would be able to do it justice. Formally, the work has intriguing parallels with Beethoven's Op 127 quartet, not least the variation sequence comprising the lengthy second movement; and the fantasia-like third variation seems almost a thematic nucleus for the whole work. Quartet No 4 needs repeated listening for its myriad subtleties to come through, but the New Hellenic ensure that this is as pleasurable as it is enthralling. Natural recorded sound, with a realistic dynamic range, sets the seal on this most rewarding disc.

Violin Sonatinas

Violin Sonatinas[a] – No 1, AK46; No 2, AK47; No 3, AK48; No 4, AK49. March of the Little Soldiers, AK53[a]. Rondo, AK54[a]. Nocturne, AK55[a]. Little Chorale and Fugue, AK56[a]. Gavotte, AK57[a]. Scherzo and Menuetto Cantato, AK58[a]. Solo Violin Sonata, AK69
Georgios Demertzis vn [a]Maria Asteriadou pf Ⓕ
BIS CD1024 (66 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1998 ●

Here's a window onto Skalkottas's music for his own instrument, itself a microcosm of his development. There is nothing stylistically tentative about the early Solo Violin Sonata (1925). Written with a Bachian economy of manner, the composer draws in references to jazz and popular music; the finale serves notice of his technical skill with an arching four-part fugue, reaching maximum intensity at the point where it returns to the prelude. The sense of a still-emerging personality is reinforced by the first two Sonatinas (both 1929, the Andantino is all that survives from No 1). Skalkottas's rhythmic incisiveness owes something to Stravinsky and even Bartók, but the tang of the harmonic writing is his alone. With the Third and Fourth Sonatinas (both 1935), the Skalkottas idiom, sinuous and expressive, is in place. The thematic integration of No 3 is breathtaking, as is the variety of tone with which the violin sustains continuity in the Andante. If the Fourth Sonatina is almost too diverse in mood, its Adagio is one of Skalkottas's finest: a threnody unfolding in three waves of mounting intensity, it looks forward to the expansive slow movements of the composer's last decade.

The miniatures are anything but trifles. March of the Little Soldiers is a savage take on militarism, while Nocturne reinterprets the expressive vocabulary of the 'song without words' for the 20th century. There could be no more sympathetic advocate than Georgios Demertzis. As in his recording of the Violin Concerto (BIS), he gets to the heart of Skalkottas's demanding but deeply felt music, with Maria Asteriadou an attentive partner. Inquiring performers and listeners alike should not hesitate to acquire this disc.

Musik für Klavier: 32 Piano Pieces, AK70. Suite No 1, AK71. Four Etudes, AK74
Nikolaos Samaltanos pf Ⓕ
BIS ② BIS-CD1133/4 (119 minutes: DDD) ●

Sixty-one years after its completion, Skalkottas's Musik für Klavier – the overall title of his 32 Piano Pieces – can assume its place among the major piano cycles of the 20th century. Formidably difficult technically, its apparently disparate content – there is not the conceptual focus of, say, Messiaen's Vingt regards sur l'enfant Jésus – may have militated against its wider recognition. So it is a tribute to Nikolaos Samaltanos, in this first complete recording, that he projects the work as an integral entity, and as the compendium of mid-century pianism that the composer intended.

Achieving equal conviction across such diversity is a tall order, given the absence of a performing tradition against which to assess an interpretation. His playing of individual pieces may be open to question but Samaltanos has the measure of the cycle and the way that its groupings of pieces interconnect. The powerful rhetoric of the 'Passacaglia' (XV) and sombre poetry of 'Nachtstück' (XVI), a double-apex on all levels, are impressively wrought, while the relative nonchalance of the closing divertissement (XXV-XXXII) is dispatched with élan. Other recordings will surely follow but rivals will be hard pressed to match the scintillating virtuosity of Samaltanos in 'Katastrophe' (IV) or the 'Etüde phantastique' (XIX).

Wide-ranging sound, lacking only the last degree of clarity in the more heavily chorded pieces, and detailed notes from Christophe Sirodeau. Urgently recommended.

Bedřich Smetana

Bohemian 1824-1884

GROVE Smetana took music lessons from his father, a keen violinist, and from several local teachers. In his teens he attended the Academic Gymnasium in Prague, but neglected school work to attend concerts (including some by Liszt, with whom he became friendly) and to write string quartets for friends, until his father sent him to the Premonstratensian Gymnasium at Plzen. At first he earned a precarious living as a teacher in Prague until, in January 1884, he was appointed resident piano teacher to Count Leopold Thun's family, which provided him with the means to study harmony, counterpoint and composition with Josef Proksch. When he failed in an attempt to launch a career as a concert pianist in 1847, Smetana decided to found a school of music in Prague. This showed little profit, but he was able to earn something by teaching privately and by playing regularly to the deposed Emperor Ferdinand, and in 1849 he was able to marry Katerina Kolárová, whom he had known since his Plzen days.

Smetana's financial situation improved little in the years that followed, and political uncertainty and domestic tragedy only added to his unrest: three of his four daughters died between 1854 and 1856. When he heard there was an opening for a piano teacher at Göteborg he jumped at the chance. In Sweden his prospects improved, and he was in demand as a pianist, teacher and conductor. Inspired by Liszt's example, he composed his first symphonic poems. His wife's health forced him to return to Bohemia with her in 1859, but she died at Dresden on the way home. After two further summers in Göteborg, between which he found a second wife in Bettina Ferdinandová, Smetana felt the need to return permanently to Prague in order to play an active role in the reawakening of Czech culture that followed the Austrian defeat by Napoleon III at Magenta and Soferino.

He was disappointed to find himself no more successful in Prague than he had been before. It was not until his first opera, The Brandenburgers in Bohemia, was enthusiastically received in January 1866 that his prospects there improved. His second, The Bartered Bride, was speedily put into production and soon found favour, though (as with his other operas) foreign performances long remained rarities. As principal conductor of the Provisional Theatre, 1866-74, Smetana added 42 operas to the repertory, including his own Dalibor (on a heroic national theme) and The Two Widows. Dalibor and Libuše (performed at the opening of the National Theatre in Prague in 1881) are Smetana's two most nationalistic operas; when completing the latter he also planned a vast orchestral monument to his nation which became the cycle of symphonic poems entitled Má vlast ('My fatherland'), including the evocative and stirring Vltava, a picture of the river that flows through Prague.

In 1874 the first signs of the syphilis appeared that was to result in Smetana's deafness. The String Quartet From my Life (1876) suggests in its last movement the piercing whistling that haunted his every evening, making work almost impossible. He somehow managed to complete two more operas, a second string quartet and several other works, but by 1883 his mental equilibrium was seriously disturbed. In April 1884 he was taken to the Prague lunatic asylum, where he died the following month.

Smetana was the first major nationalist composer of Bohemia. He gave his people a new musical identity and self-confidence by his technical assurance and originality in handling national subjects. In his operas and symphonic poems he drew on his country's legends, history, characters, scenery and ideas, presenting them with a freshness and colour which owe little to indigenous folksong but much to a highly original and essentially dramatic musical style.

Má vlast

Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Rafael Kubelík
Supraphon 11 1208-2 (78 minutes: DDD) ℗
Recorded live in 1990 ●●

Smetana's great cycle of six tone-poems, Má vlast, celebrates the countryside and legendary heroes and heroines of Bohemia. It is a work of immense national significance encapsulating many of the ideals and hopes of that country. What a triumphant occasion it was when Rafael Kubelík returned to his native Czechoslovakia and to his old orchestra after an absence of 42 years and conducted Má vlast at the 1990 Prague Spring Festival. Supraphon's disc captures that live performance – not perfectly, since the sound is efficient rather than opulent – but well enough to show off what is arguably the finest performance on record since Talich's early LP set.

You'd never imagine that Kubelík had emerged from five years of retirement and a recent serious illness, such is the power and eloquence of his conducting. He takes a lyrical rather than a dramatic view of the cycle, and if there is strength enough in more heroic sections there is also a refreshing lack of bombast. Kubelík's intimate knowledge of the score shows time and time again in the most subtle touches. Even the weakest parts of the work are most artfully brought to life, and seem of much greater stature than is usually the case. 'Vltava' flows beautifully, with the most imaginative flecks of detail, and in 'From Bohemia's Woods and Fields' there are vivid visions of wide, open spaces. The orchestra rewards its former director with superb playing.

Má vlast
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Antál Dorati
Philips Solo 442 641-2PM (79 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1987 ●

The Concertgebouw Orchestra, vividly directed by Antál Dorati, gives a strongly characterised performance of this epic cycle. The romantic opening of 'Vyšehrad' benefits from the glowing hall ambience, while 'Vltava' builds impressively from the gentle trickling streams to the river's powerful course through the St John's rapids – and how beautifully the Concertgebouw strings sing the main theme. 'Sárka', for all its bloodthirsty scenario, never descends into melodrama, 'From Bohemia's woods and fields' is gloriously diverse, and the darkly sombre opening of 'Tábor' contrasts with the hammered forcefulness of 'Blaník', which never becomes bombastic because of the crisply pointed orchestral articulation, while the performance is enhanced by the lovely playing in its enchanting pastoral interlude. Dorati's imaginative grip on this last, wayward piece holds the listener throughout all its episodes to the grandiloquent final peroration. The recording is out of Philips's top-drawer.

Má vlast H
Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Václav Talich
Supraphon mono 11 1896-2 (74 minutes: AAD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1954 ●●●

Try listening from just before six minutes into 'From Bohemia's Woods and Fields' and you reach the very heart of this great performance. The CPO brass lunges towards the main melody with unconstrained eagerness, their impact much aided by smiling glissandos. And as Talich and his players climb aboard Smetana's homespun melody, everything assumes a sunny glow: it's almost as if the entire work thus far had prepared for that one magical moment. But there are countless additional splendours: the luminous mobility of 'Vltava', the grimness of 'Sárka' (so different here to the excitable Kubelík), the sense of foreboding in 'Tábor' and the chest-swelling patriotism of 'Blaník'. The strings retain more than a hint of the portamentos that were such a distinctive feature of Talich's 1929 recording, but the woodwinds are notably superior and the basically excellent sound releases more of the music's dynamism than was easily audible on 78s.

The transfer makes a warmer case for the original tapes than did the old LPs, and generally serves Talich well – except in one maddening respect. A couple of bars have dropped from 'Tábor', thus utterly ruining the contour of a major climax. The offending cut was not present on the original recording. If you can write off the missing bars as 'historical wear and tear', then expect a Má vlast that's way above average, an inspired affirmation of national pride by a wonderful people who had only recently escaped one form of tyranny, and would subsequently fall prey to another.

Additional recommendation
Má vlast
Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Mackerras
Supraphon SU3465-2 (76 minutes: DDD: A/00)

A live recording from the Rudolfinum in Prague finds the West's leading Czech music specialist utterly at home with the music and the orchestra. The sound is excellent.

Libuše – Prelude

Má vlast – Vltava. The Bartered Bride – Overture; Polka; Furiant; Dance of the Comedians. The Kiss – Overture. Libuše – Prelude. The two widows – Overture
Cleveland Orchestra Chorus;
Cleveland Orchestra / Christoph von Dohnányi
Decca 444 867-2DH (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included
Recorded 1993-94 ●

Pride of place must go to the magnificent Overture to Libuše, a work that was completed in 1872 but not actually premièred until 1881, two years before Dvořák composed his Hussite Overture along vaguely similar lines.

The opening brass-and-timpani fanfare anticipates Janáček's Sinfonietta, although ensuing incident is more reminiscent of Smetana's own Má vlast and, especially, Wagner. Dohnányi effects ideal pacing and tapers a beautifully graded diminuendo away from the bold opening, but the strings are occasionally less than precise. The two widows opens somewhat in the manner of late Verdi though the overall flavour is unmistakable. Then there is the delightful 'Polka' and the lively Overture to The Kiss, both prime-cut samplings of Smetana's mature style.

The Bartered Bride suite is very nicely done, although don't expect Dohnányi's 'Dance of the Comedians' to match Szell's Cleveland recording of 30 years earlier for precision, especially among the strings. In the 'Polka', vivid stereophony lends considerable presence to the chorus, which makes a very bold entrance: You may feel you have been gatecrashed by a crowd of unannounced guests! 'Vltava' is equally effective, what with its stylishly phrased opening, sensitive transitions (especially into the 'Peasant's Wedding' episode) and powerful current later on.

The sound is resonant and full-bodied.

Piano Works

Three Poetic Polkas, B95. Three Salon Polkas, B94. Polkas – E; G minor; A; F minor. Two Souvenirs of Bohemia in the form of Polkas, B115. Two Souvenirs of Bohemia in the form of Polkas, B116
András Schiff pf
Teldec 3984-21261-2 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

The E flat Allegro, tempo rubato from the Souvenirs of Bohemia in the form of Polkas, Op 13 presents a blend of yearning chromaticism typical of the composer, with additional elements drawn from Chopin. The work was composed during Smetana's Swedish sojourn and suggests aching homesickness expressed in musical terms. Op 12 is also Chopinesque, though the expansive moderato second movement (the longest piece on the programme) has a folk-like melodic slant, harmonic richness and sense of narrative that are entirely Smetana's own. The three Salon (or 'Drawing Room') Polkas, Op 7, dedicated to Smetana's first wife, are among the most charming, especially the first piece. Much of this music was written in the wake of great loss (annotator Graham Melville-Mason suggests the second of the three Poetic Polkas could reflect the illness and death of Smetana's second daughter), but its cheerful demeanour spells courage and optimism.

Perhaps the most immediately appealing piece on the disc is the delightful A major Polka that in some bizarre way anticipates the Waltz from Bernstein's 1980 Divertimento. Schiff's programme is of varying levels of technical difficulty but the same interpretative virtues are common throughout: a marked liking for inner voices, a lilt to the rhythms (notably in the second Op 13 piece), crisp fingerwork and a natural approach to rubato. Comparing Schiff to the excellent Jan Novotný on Supraphon (which programmes the majority of pieces included here) shows that while the Hungarian is more prone to employ colouristic effects, the Czech more likely to lay equal stresses on all voices (which is useful for underlining Smetana's often sombre harmonies).

Both players are undeniably masterful, although Schiff's delicious brand of pianistic sorcery will probably win this music the largest audiences, and Teldec's recording is marginally the better of the two.

The Bartered Bride

Gabriela Beňačková sop Mařenka; Peter Dvorský ten Jeník; Miroslav Kopp ten Vašek; Richard Novák bass Kecal; Jindřich Jindrák bar Krušina; Marie Mrázová contr Háta; Jaroslav Horáček bass Mícha; Marie Veselá sop Ludmila; Jana Jonášová sop Esmeralda; Alfréd Hampel ten Circus master; Karel Hanuš bass Indian; Czech Philharmonic Chorus and Orchestra / Zdeněk Košler
Supraphon ③ 10 3511-2 (137 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1980-81 ●

There is something special about a Czech performance of The bartered bride and this one is no exception. The hint of melancholy which runs through the work is wonderfully evoked, as well as its marvellous gaiety. Zdeněk Košler has the rhythm and lilt of the music in his bones, like any Czech conductor worth his salt. The Czech Philharmonic has long had one of the finest of all woodwind sections, and especially in this music they play with a sense of their instruments' folk background, with phrasing that springs from deep in Czech folk-music.

This sets the musical scene for some moving performances. The warm, lyrical quality of Gabriela Beňačková's voice can lighten easily to encompass her character's tenderness in the first duet, 'Věrné milováni', or 'Faithful love', the considerable show of spirit she makes when Jeník appears to have gone off the rails. Her Act 1 lament is most beautifully sung. Peter Dvorský as Jeník plays lightly with the score, as indeed he should, or the character's maintaining of the deception can come to seem merely cruel. Even old Kecal comes to new life, not as the conventional village bumbler, but as a human character in his own right as Richard Novák portrays him – quite put out, the old boy is, to find his plans gone astray. In fact, all of the soloists are excellent. The chorus enjoys itself hugely, never more so than in the Beer chorus. Altogether this is a delightful, touching and warming performance.

Libuše

Gabriela Beňačková sop Libuše; Václav Zítek ten Přemysl; Antonín Svorc bass Chrudoš; Leo Marian Vodička ten Stáhlav; Karel Průša bass Lubtor; René Tuček bar Radovan; Eva Děpoltová sop Krasava; Věra Soukupová mez Radmila; Prague National Theatre Chorus and Orchestra / Zdeněk Košler
Supraphon ③ 11 1276-2 (166 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included. Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1983 ●

Libuše is a patriotic pageant, static and celebratory, with such plot as there is concerning the mythical founder of Prague, Libuše, and her marriage to the peasant Přemysl, founder of the first Czech dynasty. Václav Zítek makes a fine, heroic Přemysl; but the triumphant performance comes, as it must, from Gabriela Beňačková. The opera concludes with a series of tableaux in which Libuše prophesies the future kings and heroes who will assure the stability and greatness of the nation. At the end of a long performance her voice is undimmed in its ringing splendour; and earlier, as near the very start, the beauty of her tone and line seeks out all the warmth, character and humanity which she proves to be latent in Smetana's spacious but seemingly plain vocal writing. Libuše is scarcely Smetana's greatest opera, as he liked to claim, but especially in so splendid a performance from Beňačková, and under the grave but impassioned direction of Zdeněk Košler, it makes compelling listening. The live recording does include some applause, but there is little else in the way of distraction.

Fernando Sor

Spanish 1778-1839

GROVE After leaving Spain, Spanish composer and guitarist Fernando Sor lived in Paris (1813-15 and from 1826) and London (1815-26) and visited Russia (1823). He was a famous concert performer and wrote over 60 guitar works (sonatas, studies, variations etc) and an important method (1830). His guitar music is notable for its part-writing. He was also admired for his songs and eight ballets (1821-28); other works include an opera (1797) and chamber and keyboard pieces.

Guitar Works

Fantaisies – No 12, Op 58; No 13, Op 59, 'Fantaisie élégiaque'. Studies, Op 60
Nicholas Goluses gtr
Naxos 8 553342 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994

Sor's guitar works is an oeuvre that is perhaps the most consistent in quality, and most manageable in quantity of any major guitar composer of the period. While Sor was born and died later than Beethoven his language was closer to that of Mozart, barely on the edge of Romanticism.

He was a polished, elegant composer, whose works have more quiet emotional content and expressiveness than those of his contemporaries, and though he often calls for technical virtuosity he doesn't lean too heavily on it. The Fantaisie, Op 58 is not one of Sor's more riveting works. Goluses plays it in a somewhat matter-of-fact way. The Fantaisie élégiaque, arguably Sor's finest single work, elicits a very different response, a deeply sensitive and dignified reading in which the moments of silent grief are given the breathing-space they call for. Sor devoted five opus numbers to his 97 studies, of which Op 60 was the last. Each has a clear technical and/or musical purpose and even the simplest is lovingly crafted music – which is how Goluses treats it, with lots of care lavished on it.

The guitar of Sor's time differed from today's in construction, stringing and sound, and Sor played without using the right-hand nails. Goluses uses a modern instrument and plays with nails, which inevitably leads to differences in sound and, to some extent, interpretation. Accepting the differences, Goluses sets a benchmark for present-day guitarists.

Grand Sonatas – C, Op 22; C, Op 25.
Divertissement, Op 23. Eight Short Pieces, Op 24
Adam Holzman gtr
Naxos 8 553340 (75 mins: DDD). Recorded 1994 Ⓢ

The major works in Holzman's programme are the two sonatas, each with four movements. Of these Op 25 is by far the finer – and the best work of its kind from the period; the last movement is a Minuet, a final lightening of atmosphere that was not then uncommon. The Divertissement, Op 23 contains 10 pieces – Valses, Allegrettos, Andantes, a Minuetto and an Allemande. With a few exceptions they are more likely to be of interest to guitarists than to the general listener. Holzman plays very well, with a softer sound than Goluses (see above), and in a tighter acoustic. At slower tempos he exercises a pleasing degree of rubato and commendable dynamic shading; one wishes he had done likewise in the quicker ones, which incline to the metronomic. These are two discs that should, both in their own right and at super-budget price, be irresistible to guitarists.

Introduction and Variations on 'Que ne suis-je la fougère!', Op 26. Introduction and Variations on 'Gentil Housard', Op 27. Introduction and Variations on 'Malbroug', Op 28. 12 Studies, Op 29. Fantaisie et Variations brillantes, Op 30
Jeffrey McFadden gtr
Naxos 8 553451 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995

This contribution to Naxos's integral archive of Sor's guitar music consists neatly of the last works he published with Meissonnier, before transferring to Pacini. Sets of variations, whether per se or framed in the Fantaisie, Op 30, abound. The 12 Studies, Op 29 are described as 'Book 2', those of Op 6 being 'Book 1', and are here given as Nos 13-24, as they were in the original edition of 1827. Jeffrey McFadden is a very musical player, with the clear and three-dimensional tone for which his fingers are admirably suited. No composer for the guitar of the time wrote studies that were more truly expressive than those of Sor; McFadden plays them, and everything else here, with humanity and respect. An outstanding disc.

Louis Spohr

German 1784-1859

GROVE Spohr gained his first important experience as a chamber musician at the Brunswick court, soon becoming a virtuoso violinist and touring throughout Germany; his playing was influenced particularly by his admiration for Rode. As Konzertmeister in Gotha (1805-12) he took up conducting (with a baton) and had some of his own works performed but was most successful as a touring artist (1807-21) with his wife, the harpist Dorette Scheidler. Operatic conducting posts at Vienna (1813-15) and Frankfurt (1817-19) coincided with significant bursts of composing activity, yielding chamber music and the successful operas Faust (1813) and Zemire und Azor (1819). He settled down as Kapellmeister at Kassel in 1822, where the premières of Jessonda (1823; his greatest operatic success), the oratorio Die letzten Dinge (1826) and the Symphony No 4 (1832) were major achievements; here too he contributed to the cultivation of interest in both Bach and Wagner. A favourite in England, he received international honours and became Generalmusikdirektor at Kassel (1847), but by the 1850s he was an aging, middle-class representative of a rather sober tradition, and after his death his works were largely forgotten.

Spohr's early Romantic origins and his devotion to Mozart largely determined his style, with its careful craftsmanship and adherence to classical forms but also its freely expressive elements (much chromaticism and a fondness for the elegiac). Among his instrumental works (15 violin and 10 other concertos, ten symphonies, virtuoso solo works, scores of chamber works, including a series of double quartets), the four clarinet concertos, the string quartets, the Violin Concerto No 8 ('In the form of a vocal scene') and the Octet and Nonet for wind and strings are noteworthy. His operas anticipate Wagner in being through-composed and in their use of leitmotif.

Violin Concertos

Violin Concertos – No 1 in A, Op 1; No 14 in A minor, Op 110, 'Sonst und Jetzt'; No 15 in E minor, Op 128
Ulf Hoelscher vn Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra / Christian Fröhlich
CPO CPO999 403-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1995

Hoelscher has the elegance and almost vocal quality with which Spohr's violin writing is associated, but he can also master the virtuosity which is needed for the oddest work here, entitled Sonst und Jetzt, or 'Then and Now'. There is something of an in-joke for violinists here. Irritated by the playing of the Norwegian virtuoso, Ole Bull, whom Schumann regarded as the equal of Paganini, Spohr wrote this piece contrasting the lyrical qualities of the violin (in an expansive re-creation of the Minuet) with a hectic Tarantella embodying all he disliked in the showy 'modern' style. The idea falls flat as a piece of music criticism, simply because Spohr produces rather a good Tarantella and integrates it ingeniously and not contentiously with his more lyrical music. Hoelscher could have made the point by playing the two kinds of music in more extreme fashion; but, if it is true that nothing is colder than the ashes of dead controversies, the more musical course is to play the work as he does, warmly and without parti-pris. The Concerto No 15 is a rather more weary piece, in which Spohr goes through the motions expertly but without his full creative attention. Op 1 is a juvenile work (he was 18), obviously close to his beloved Mozart in spirit but also heavily influenced by Kreutzer, Rode and especially Viotti. The best movement is the delightful Siciliano, which Spohr embellishes lovingly.

Piano Trios

Piano Trios – No 3 in A minor, Op 124; No 4 in B flat, Op 133 Borodin Trio (Rostislav Dubinsky vn Laszlo Varga vc Luba Edlina pf)
Chandos CHAN9372 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Spohr's late piano trios are virtuoso works, in every sense. They are ingeniously composed and are difficult to balance with true effect; above all they demand great technical dexterity, and the dexterity to allow many extremely difficult passages to play a secondary or supporting role. In particular No 3 in A minor places demands on the players who need virtuosity of the kind which the Borodin Trio are well able to provide. Their skills need no recommendation; here, they also have a subtlety and quickness of response that come from a proper sympathy with Spohr's idiom. They rise to the occasion with, for instance, the racing piano fingerwork in the Variations of No 3; they also respond with the flexibility of tempo the music needs for its full expressive effect. Moreover, in places where Spohr seems to have lost concentration for a moment – his capacity to meander down beguiling but distracting chromatic paths, his habit of striking a cliché chord like a dramatic attitude, his gear-changing modulations – the Borodin hold faith and make the music come off effectively. The A minor Trio is the more worthwhile piece, and deserves all this interpretative concentration; but the rather less well invented work in B flat, apparently here receiving a first recording, is worth having for some recreational music.

The recording team can't always have had an easy task with balance; it all works excellently.

Sir John Stainer

British 1840-1901

English organist, scholar and composer GROVE Stainer, after appointments at St Michael's College, Tenbury, and Oxford University, became organist at St Paul's Cathedral (1872-88), reforming the musical service there, increasing the number of musicians and expanding the repertory. He soon became a pre-eminent church musician, scholar and composer, helping found the Musical Association, and becoming professor at Oxford University. He was knighted in 1888. As a scholar he made valuable editions of music before Palestrina and Tallis (Early Bodleian Music, 1901). His services and anthems were fashionable during his lifetime and his hymn tunes are still used; his oratorio The Crucifixion (1887) is one of his best-known works.

The Crucifixion

Martyn Hill ten Michael George bass
BBC Singers; Leith Hill Festival Singers / Brian Kay with Margaret Phillips org
Chandos CHAN9551 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1997 ●

Stainer's Crucifixion unfolds with a seamless ease, never jolting the listener with gratuitous theatricality or the type of rhetorical intensity which the English find mildly embarrassing. The emotional engagement here is about an unintrusive sobriety, affected by a glowing sentimental identification with the Saviour's plight. One has to admire Stainer for writing a challenging work of sensible length which, without an orchestra, is achievable and satisfying for a capable parish choir: Stainer's Crucifixion is a celebration of amateurism, that cherished English virtue. Brian Kay has worked a great deal with committed amateurs, in this case the Leith Hill Festival Singers, the festival of which he is director. There is indeed an underlying freshness of expression here, of singers with eyes and ears on stalks and a real sense of purpose. They are fortified by the excellent BBC Singers. Margaret Phillips's imaginative, genial registrations, not to mention her skilful accompaniment, provide notable support to the fine contributions of the solosits. An unselfregarding and genuine performance.

Sir Charles Villiers Stanford

Irish/British 1852-1924

GROVE Stanford was educated at Cambridge (1880-84), where he was appointed organist of Trinity College in 1873 and professor in 1887; from 1883 he also taught at the RCM (his own education had been completed under Reinecke in Leipzig, 1874-5, and Kiel in Berlin, 1876). A demanding and highly influential teacher, he also demanded much of himself in living up to the great tradition, though the weight of academic responsibility could be leavened by his Irish heritage of folksong and mysticism and by his keen feeling for English words. Yet, apart from his Anglican cathedral music, little of his large output (nearly 200 opus numbers) has remained in performance. His works include ten operas (notably Shamus O'Brien, 1896; Much Ado about Nothing, 1901; and The Travelling Companion, given posthumously,1926), a quantity of choral music and songs (his B flat Service of 1879 is still used, and some of his sensitive partsongs are remembered, particularly The Blue Bird), seven symphonies and other orchestral scores (Clarinet Concerto, 1902, and a series of Irish Rhapsodies), eight string quartets, and organ and piano music.

Violin Concerto

Violin Concerto in D, Op 74. Suite for Violin and Orchestra, Op 32
Anthony Marwood vn BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Martyn Brabbins
Hyperion CDA67208 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

This is a discovery of major importance. Hubert Parry (no mean critic) regarded Stanford's Violin Concerto as one of his finest works, yet it has been played rarely, if at all, since his death in 1924. One preliminary word of warning though: despite Stanford's reputation as a disciple of Brahms, don't listen to this concerto expecting it to sound Brahmsian. Often enough it does, but when it doesn't it isn't because Stanford has failed to match the quality of his 'model'; far more often it's because he is going his own way, speaking with his own and not a derivative voice.

The very opening of the concerto is a case in point: the soloist's melody is accompanied by a beautifully delicate texture of plucked strings and rippling woodwind. There's nothing quite like it in Brahms; nor is Brahms always so generous with his thematic material as Stanford is in this movement. After that 'first subject' and an extensive and varied 'second subject group', a big and dramatic orchestral tutti leads not to the expected development but to a new and quite splendid theme. There's plenty of room for virtuosity, but very often the display is modified by a pensive quality, a reticence, that is seemingly Stanford's own, and most attractive.

The slow movement is also notable for its individual scoring (very spare at the outset; a magical return of the melancholy opening melody at the end over murmuring tremolando strings) and for its melodic distinction. The sadness of the first theme is again reticent, adding greatly to the eloquence of the heartfelt tutti that leads to the finest theme in the entire work, upon which Stanford lavishes rhapsodic figuration of great beauty.

There's not a player better suited to bringing this concerto back to life than Anthony Marwood. He easily surmounts its technical demands, but his distinction as a chamber musician enables him to seek out all its quieter subtleties and pensive asides. The Suite is a lesser but still highly entertaining work, an exercise in neo-Baroque designed as a warmly affectionate tribute to Joseph Joachim. Its sheer ingenuity (the first movement, for example, is a combination of sonata form and two sets of interlocked variations) saves it from being a mere exercise, and its melodic freshness from being a mere makeweight to the masterly concerto. First-class orchestral playing, sympathetically conducted, and a recording that is both clean and spacious.

Symphony No 3 in F minor, 'Irish'

Stanford Symphony No 3 in F minor, 'Irish', Op 28
Elgar Scenes from the Bavarian Highlands, Op 27
Bournemouth Symphony Chorus; Bournemouth Sinfonietta / Norman Del Mar
EMI British Composers 565129-2 (70 minutes: Ⓑ
ADD). Text included. Recorded 1981-82 ●

A valuable addition to the catalogue on its initial appearance, Norman Del Mar's characteristically enterprising 1982 recording of Stanford's Irish Symphony re-emerges in splendidly vital fashion on this beautifully presented release. Compared with Vernon Handley and the excellent Ulster Orchestra on Chandos, Del Mar is perhaps just a touch lacking in charm and it is undoubtedly the former who more effectively minimises the element of dutiful convention which occasionally afflicts both outer movements (Handley is nearly three minutes quicker in the opening Allegro moderato, yet there is no feeling of undue haste). However, Del Mar draws the threads together most satisfyingly for the symphony's ample peroration, and his Bournemouth band responds with commendable vigour throughout. Preceding the Stanford here is a rare outing for the orchestral version of Elgar's Scenes from the Bavarian Highlands. This six-movement choral suite shows Elgar at his most carefree and joyous, qualities savoured to the full in Del Mar's exuberant performance.

Piano Quartet No 1

Piano Quartet No 1, Op 15[a]. Piano Trio No 1, Op 35
[a]Philip Dukes va Pirasti Trio (Nicholas Miller vn Alison Wells vc Jeffrey Sharkey pf)
ASV CDDCA1056 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

Stanford was 26 when he completed his First Piano Quartet in April 1879. It's a delightful discovery in every way, whose purposeful, driving outer movements frame a delectably clean-cut, skipping scherzo and an autumnal, at times very Brahmsian Poco adagio of burnished lyrical beauty. In the similarly assured First Piano Trio of 10 years later, Brahms's shadow looms more intimidatingly over the landscape and there is perhaps not quite the same youthful, carefree quality to Stanford's sturdy inspiration. All the same, there are a few surprises in store, not least the extended Tempo di menuetto ma molto moderato third movement with its two trio sections – and the way the winsome second movement coquettishly dallies between the home key of G minor and relative major of B flat.

The Pirasti Trio prove eloquent, unfailingly stylish advocates throughout. For the Piano Quartet, they are joined by that admirable violist, Philip Dukes. Boasting truthful sound and pleasing balance, this exemplary coupling earns a firm recommendation.

Requiem, Op 63

Requiem, Op 63[a]. The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan[b]
– Overture; Ballet music: No 1; No 2;
There's a Bower of Roses
Frances Lucey, Virginia Kerr sops Colette McGahon mez Peter Kerr ten Nigel Leeson-Williams bass; RTE Philharmonic Choir; National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / [a]Adrian Leaper, [b]Colman Pearce
Marco Polo ② 8 223580/1 (104 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 ●

It is most moving to hear this Requiem and to reflect that for the best part of a century a work so rich in feeling and craftsmanship has lain largely silent and unregarded. The opening Requiem aeternam ought of itself, one would think, to have ensured at least the occasional revival: a warm, lyrical composition, firmly structured and with something unmistakably personal about it, rather as with Dvořák. The Kyrie seems to express affection, though 'For what?' one wonders – perhaps for the sheer beauty of sound. The 'Gradual' allows interest to slip, recaptured by the 'Sequence', plentiful in ideas and rising to a generous climax in the 'Lacrimosa'. The 'Offertorium' brings a touch of 19th-century Grand Manner, tightening up later with a robust, fugal 'Quam olim Abrahae'. The Sanctus ends vigorously with its 'Pleni sunt caeli', and a sweet, well-sustained orchestral passage (perhaps with Beethoven in mind) leads into the 'Benedictus'. A Funeral March introduces the Agnus Dei, and the whole work, not all that much shorter than the Verdi Requiem, ends with a spacious, steadily developed 'Lux aeterna'. Soloists and chorus are used with relish for the capabilities of the human voice, and in listening one thinks quite as much of opera as of oratorio.

As a fill-up on the second disc we are given further rarities, the Overture and other excerpts from The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan, the first of Stanford's operas. The Overture, which is more Brahms than Mendelssohn and has a genial suggestion of the Irish jig, is a thoroughly likeable piece, so once more we are left feeling that here is still another area of Stanford's output that might well reward attention. The performances are able and enthusiastic. Recorded sound might be sharper, but at least it falls more kindly on the ears than do many of more vaunted origin. In any case, we are deeply in Marco Polo's debt for this revival.

Stabat mater, Op 96

Stabat mater, Op 96. Te Deum, Op 10 No 1.
Six Bible Songs, Op 113
Ingrid Attrot sop Pamela Helen Stephen mez
Nigel Robson ten Stephen Varcoe bar Ian Watson org Leeds Philharmonic Chorus; BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9548 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995 ●

Writing of his old teacher in 1952, Vaughan Williams foretold that his time would come round again: 'With the next generation the inevitable reaction will set in and Stanford will come into his own.' It has taken more than a generation, but at last it does begin to look as though he was right. This recording of a 'symphonic cantata', the Stabat mater, strong in ideas, deeply felt and structurally assured, will certainly strengthen the steadily growing appreciation of his worth. The Prelude, impressive as it is, is almost too soundly constructed, and the first choral movement, rich in its Verdi-like foreground of soloists, signs off with a slightly self-conscious repetition of the opening words by the soprano. Stanford is never abashed by the prospect of melodic commitment, and the orchestral Intermezzo comes out boldly with what promises to be a good, old-fashioned Grand Tune; but then he seems to remember where he is, and the piece ends with murky explorations that seem not quite to find what they may be seeking. The work itself ends, as Lewis Foreman suggests in his useful notes, in Eternity: 'we seem to reach the crest of a hill only to find the path stretching onward and upward to another.' The performance carries conviction, with Hickox exercising that natural rightness of his so that in a work such as this, without predecessors on record, a listener will feel that this is how it should 'go'.

Fine orchestral playing and choral singing give pleasure throughout. The solo quartet is led by Ingrid Attrot's colourful but none too evenly produced soprano, and in the Bible Songs Stephen Varcoe sings sensitively to the judiciously registered organ accompaniment of Ian Watson. The most tuneful of Te Deums follows, blithe and buoyant in its orchestrated version.

Morning and Evening Services

Morning and Evening Services in B flat, Op 10[a].
Evening Services – A, Op 12[a]; F, Op 36[a]; E flat[b].
Two Anthems, Op 37[b]. Three Motets, Op 38. Pater noster. The Lord is my Shepherd[a]
Winchester Cathedral Choir / David Hill with
[a]Stephen Farr, [b]Christopher Monks org
Hyperion CDA66964 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1997 ●

The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat major dates back to 1873 is not with any certainty known even to have been performed. Perhaps this is because both settings are almost indecently tuneful: an apocalyptic 'scattered the proud', a broadly melodious 'to be a light' and a 'Gloria' as catchy as a comic opera. As for the B flat major settings written six years later, these (both Morning and Evening services) have long owed their popularity to a melodic gift that is almost Schubertian and a correspondingly deft mastery of construction.

Winchester Cathedral Choir is surely one of the best in the UK. Under David Hill, the trebles have some of the bright, distinctive tone of the Westminster Cathedral boys. The men are excellent, and all of them sound as though they are singing for the joy of it. Several of these works involve more than the customary four parts, and the eight-part Pater noster, recorded for the first time, has splendid richness, with the choir forming massive pillars of sound in the powerful climax. Stanford's writing for the organ is also a delight, and at times we might wish that the fine playing of both organists had been brought into sharper focus. The choir we hear with rare clarity.

Evening Service in G, Op 81. Services in C, Op 115.
Six Short Preludes and Postludes: Set 2,
Op 105 – No 3, Prelude in G; No 6, Postlude
in D minor. For lo, I raise up, Op 145. 🏵
Three Motets, Op 38. St John's College Choir, Cambridge / Christopher Robinson org Ⓢ
Naxos 8 555794 (72 minutes: DDD) ●

The mean old saying that 'those who can, do, and those who can't, teach' would have withered in the presence of Stanford; and no doubt one of the reasons why he was such a great teacher is that he could and did, and so set an example. His C major services (Morning, Evening and Communion, all included in this programme) are so eminently the works of a master who knows how to get from here to there in one move, to keep always something in reserve for later use but never to write without a good clear melodic idea in the first place. Everything in this programme has freshness and well-founded assurance. It is music with clarity of purpose: it knows where it is going and doesn't put a foot wrong.

Under Christopher Robinson, the choir has enjoyed a period in which the distinguishing mark has been a renewed vitality of style. It is well caught in this CD. The start of the first track, the C major Te Deum, has it straightaway – the praise carries spirit and conviction. The final track opens still more strikingly. This is For lo, I will raise up, for which Stanford, writing in 1914, set his imagination free to bestir the choir-stalls into an almost fiercely dramatic life. The St John's choir bite into the words with relish, while the acoustic and their well-judged tempo reinforce the rhythmic energy of the passage.

Even in the best-stocked collection this would prove a welcome addition, and for those who have as yet nothing of the master, it should provide a lively introduction.

Evening Service in G, Op 81. Morning Service in C, Op 115. Six Bible Songs and Hymns, Op 113
Winchester Cathedral Choir / David Hill org with Stephen Farr, Christopher Monks orgs
Hyperion CDA66965 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1997 ●

Stanford's Bible Songs are occasionally introduced into programmes one or two at a time, but it is rare to have all six. Four of the songs take their text from the Psalms, the others from Isaiah and Ecclesiasticus, but each has a generic title: 'A Song of Freedom', 'A Song of Wisdom' and so forth. They are written for baritone with organ accompaniment, and here we hear what is a rarity indeed, namely the alternation of songs and hymns as Stanford intended. The songs were published in 1909, the hymns a year later, but they are designed to slot in so that the cycle takes the form of a cantata. This bare description gives no idea of the enriched effect. The hymns are mostly well known (Let us with a gladsome mind is the first), and there is always a strong emotional effect to be gained from such a process. Stanford had no formulated design, as upon an audience, but if he had he could hardly have achieved it with a surer touch.

The great revelation of this disc is afforded by the performance of the songs and hymns as an entity. Only four of the six songs fall to William Kendall, who sings them well though the tessitura is occasionally a little low for him. 'A Song for Peace' is allocated to the choir's fine treble soloist, Kenan Burrows. The corresponding allocation of 'A Song of Wisdom', however, seems not entirely an act of wisdom: the visionary text and broad, powerful setting call for a different kind of timbre. The choral singing is excellent, as are the organists. In particular, it is good to find the changes of tempo in the Te Deum so effectively carried through. Indeed, the whole of the C major Service – is surely the masterpiece.

Evening Service in C, Op 115. Ye Choirs of New Jerusalem, Op 123. Gloria in B flat, Op 128. St Patrick's Breastplate. Motets, Op 135 – No 2, Eternal Father; No 3, Glorious and Powerful God. For lo, I raise up, Op 145. Magnificat in B flat, Op 164. Lighten our Darkness. How beauteous are their feet
Winchester Cathedral Choir / David Hill with Stephen Farr, Christopher Monks orgs
Hyperion CDA66974 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1997 ●●

This disc includes some of Stanford's best work, starting with the Evening Service in C. At Winchester they take a broad view of this, bringing out a meditative grandeur rather than the more pressing enthusiasm in favour elsewhere. In general, the tempo is brisk, matched with verbal and rhythmic life in abundance. For lo, I raise up is particularly exciting. Written in 1914, this marvellous setting of Habakkuk's vision of a war-torn world that is eventually to 'be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord' needs a choir that can forget it is 'in church'. The narrative must be eager-eyed, crisp on the words and intense in drive and attack; and that is just about how it is here. In the eight-part Magnificat the speed is risky, and may indeed be a little too headlong at the expense of clarity; but again it is rhythmically exhilarating. The anthem Lighten our Darkness is recorded here for the first time (Stanford wrote it in 1918 for St George's, Windsor, but the manuscript got lost, and having been found in 1935 was neglected till the present day). The prayer is lovingly treated, and the performance is worthy of the honour bestowed.

Songs

Tragödie, Op 14 No 5. Op 19 – No 2, A Lullaby; No 5, To the Rose. Windy Nights, Op 30 No 4. Clown's Songs from 'Twelfth Night', Op 65. The Fairy Lough, Op 77 No 2. Songs of the Sea, Op 91. Songs of Faith, Op 97 – No 4, 'To the Soul'; No 6, 'Joy, Shipmate, Joy'. Phoebe, Op 125. A Fire of Turf, Op 139. The Pibroch, Op 157 No 1. For Ever Mine. Tom Lemminn
Stephen Varcoe bar Clifford Benson pf
Hyperion CDA67124 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●

Stanford's Songs of the Sea have kept the British baritone afloat for the best part of a century. Drake's hammock and the barnacles of The Old Superb used to be familiar in parlours and drawing-rooms throughout the land. The cries of Captain Keats and his crew ('"Ship ahoy!" a hundred times a day'), the alliterative mysteries of 'Fetter and Faith ... Faggot and Father' and the assurance that Drake even now was 'ware and waking' were assimilated almost as the words of folksongs, while the music seemed part of our flesh and blood. They are splendid songs, and the set of five constitutes a small masterpiece. Sceptical readers should try them again in this new recording. Stephen Varcoe and Clifford Benson give a most sensitive performance, not emasculated but treating them thoughtfully. The two quieter songs, 'Outward Bound' and 'Homeward Bound', become more central, better integrated, than usual, and the very fact that this is the solo version, without the male-voice chorus added later, makes it easier to hear them (the whole set) as a personal utterance. With 'Drake's Drum', for instance, Varcoe is very intent upon seeing sense, where others have often sought for little beyond a generalised patriotic earnestness. These, perhaps, are The Songs of the Sea as Captain Edward Fairfax Vere might have sung them.

In reviewing the first volume, Michael Oliver wrote of the difficulty of reconciling the Irishman and the Brahmsian in Stanford: the melodic vein of the one seemed at odds with the harmonic language of the other. The occasions here when a dichotomy of style does cause trouble are found in the Songs of Faith. Whitman's auto-intoxication incites Stanford to indulge in grandiose gestures that are not natural to him at all. He is much more at home with Shakespeare and Dekker, or, for that matter, with Quiller-Couch and Winifred M Letts, whose A Fire of Turf provides him with poems for some masterly settings.

All are beautifully performed by these excellent artists.

Wilhelm Stenhammar

Swedish 1871-1927

GROVE Stenhammer was brought up in a cultivated and musical family; he composed from childhood and had little formal training. His earlier music is in a late Romantic style showing influences from Wagner, Liszt and Brahms, but from 1910 he moved towards a more classical manner, stimulated by contrapuntal studies and a profound concern with Beethoven. Much of his music has a Nordic colour, though he did not use folk material. His works include two symphonies (1903, 1915), two piano concertos, a Serenade (1913), cantatas (Sången, 1921), six string quartets (1894-1916) and songs. An admired pianist, he was also conductor of the Göteborgs Orkesterförening (1906-22), making the city a musical rival to Stockholm.

Piano Concertos

Piano Concerto No 1 in B flat minor, Op 1.
Symphony No 3 in C – fragment
Mats Widlund pf Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra / Gennadi Rozhdestvensky
Chandos CHAN9074 (51 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●

Piano Concerto No 2 in D minor, Op 23[a]. Serenade in F, Op 31[b]. Florez och Blanzeflor, Op 3[b]
Ingvár Wixell bar Janos Solyom pf [a]Munich Philharmonic Orchestra; [b]Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra / Stig Westerberg
EMI Matrix 565081-2 (73 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1970-74

The First Piano Concerto comes from 1893, when Stenhammar was 22, and such was its success during the 1890s that he was invited to play it with the Berlin Philharmonic under Richard Strauss. In time, however, he grew tired of it and became careless as to its fate. Both the autograph and the orchestral parts were destroyed when Breslau was bombed during the Second World War. But recently a copy probably made for the American première came to light in the Library of Congress. Chandos also offers a short fragment from the Symphony No 3 in C major, on which Stenhammar embarked in 1918-19. At not much under 50 minutes it is perhaps overlong, but still has much charm, and Widlund and Rozhdestvensky make a most persuasive case for it. The recording has great depth and warmth and the strings of the Stockholm orchestra have great richness of sonority.

Symphony No 2 in G minor, Op 34

Symphony No 2 in G minor, Op 34. Excelsior!, Op 13. Two Songs, Op 4 (orch cpsr). Reverenza
Anne Sofie von Otter mez Royal Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra / Paavo Järvi
Virgin Classics 545244-2 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1996 ●

This account of the G minor Symphony has a lot going for it. Järvi is eminently straightforward and sensitive, the architecture of the piece is well shaped and detail attentively handled. He hardly puts a foot wrong and has great feeling for the piece. It is a distinguished performance – and what a wonderful score! The fill-ups are generous: the Reverenza movement which Stenhammar included in the original version of the Serenade for orchestra but subsequently excised, comes off well. The two Op 4 Songs – 'The girl came from meeting her lover' is a subtle and refined song and its companion, 'The girl on Midsummer's Eve', is even lovelier – have never been recorded before in their orchestral form. Von Otter is on home ground and in radiant voice. The exhilarating Excelsior! overture is the standard coupling, and is given here with great panache. The only caveat is that the recording is not in the top flight. There is insufficient transparency in climaxes and the sound is two-dimensional with little front-to-back depth. Reverenza fares much better and so do the songs. In any event these performances score strongly on artistic grounds and will give pleasure and delight.

Alessandro Stradella

Italian 1644-1682

GROVE Stradella spent most of his career in Rome, where he lived independently but composed many works to commissions from Queen Christina of Sweden, the Colonna family and others. Most of his stage works there were prologues and intermezzos, notably for operas by Cavalli and Cesti revived at the new Tordinona Theatre in 1671-2. His life included many scandals and amorous adventures. He left Rome in 1677 after a dispute, and went by way of Venice and Turin (escaping an attempt on his life) to Genoa (1678). His only comic opera, Il Trespolo tutore, was given there in c 1677; later he presented several other operas, including Il Corispero. He was killed there in 1682, again a consequence of an amorous intrigue.

Stradella was one of the leading composers in Italy in his day and one of the most versatile. His music was widely admired, even as far afield as England. Most of it is clearly tonal, and counterpoint features prominently. His vocal output includes c 30 stage works, several oratorios and Latin church works and some 200 cantatas (most for solo voice). In his operas the orchestra consists of two violin parts and continuo, but some other works, such as the oratorio S Giovanni Battista (1675, Rome), follow the Roman principal of concerto grosso instrumentation. There is a clear differentiation between aria and recitative (which sometimes includes arioso writing), but their succession is still fluid; various aria forms are used. Stradella's 27 surviving instrumental works are mostly of the sonata da chiesa type. The scoring and textures of a Sonata di viole of his make it the earliest known concerto grosso; it was apparently a model for Corelli's concertos Op 6.

Cantatas

Ah! troppo è ver. Si apra al riso ogni labro.
Sonata di viole
Lavinia Bertotti, Emanuela Galli, Barbara Zanichelli sops Roberto Balconi counterten Maurizio Sciuto ten Carlo Lepore bass Orchestra Barocca della Civica Scuola di Musica di Milano / Enrico Gatti
Arcana A79 (67 minutes: DDD). Texts included Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

This disc features two Christmas cantatas, Si apra al riso for three mixed solo voices, two violins and continuo, and the larger Ah! troppo è ver for mixed solo voices, with a concertino of violin, cello and continuo, and ripieno strings supplying the concerto grosso. The disc also contains a Sonata consisting of concertino and ripieno elements, a concerto grosso, in fact, of which form Stradella was a pioneer. Gatti and his almost all-Italian ensemble of singers and instrumentalists enliven this music, his imagination responding unfailingly to Stradella's often individual, at times, quirky style, and his feeling for texture and declama-tion most impressive. These and other qualities may be sensed at once in the splendid, larger-than-life account of Ah! troppo è ver. The performances have rough patches, but they convey with fervour the spirit and atmosphere of the music.

San Giovanni Battista

Catherine Bott, Christine Batty sops Gérard Lesne counterten Richard Edgar-Wilson ten Philippe Huttenlocher bar Les Musiciens du Louvre / Marc Minkowski 🅿

Awards 1993

Erato 2292-45739-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Notes, text and translation included

Recorded live in 1991 ●●●

Although an outstanding oratorio composer, Stradella was considered in his time foremost as a composer for the theatre, and he treated the New Testament story of the imprisonment and murder of John the Baptist with real dramatic force. San Giovanni Battista was first performed in Rome in 1657. The librettist, a Sicilian priest, Girardo Ansaldi, dispensed with a testo or narrator, concerning himself more directly with the exchanges between Herod and John the Baptist. Stradella portrays this relationship with great subtlety, as he does equally that between Herod, his wife Herodias and their daughter Salome.

The work is in two parts. Events in Part 1 are presented in three stages. After a Sinfonia there follows a pastoral scene in which John bids farewell to the countryside as he prepares to travel to Herod's court. In the second stage the scene moves to the court where the king's birthday festivities are in full swing. Stage three is marked by the arrival of John who interrupts proceedings with a command that Herod give up his brother's wife. Herod is enraged and orders John to be thrown into prison. Part 2 contains the well-known events leading to the beheading of John and concludes with a masterly duet in which the contrasting emotions of foreboding and joy are expressed by Herod and Salome, respectively.

Marc Minkowski has assembled a strong team of soloists with Gérard Lesne in the title-role. Additionally there are three brief sections allotted to a chorus fulfilling various functions in the first part of the oratorio. Minkowski paces the music well, making the most of Stradella's admirably effective contrasts of texture and mood. Lesne's portrayal of John the Baptist is affecting, and his warm tone and subdued vocal colour suit the music in Part 2 especially well. Herodias and Salome both come over well though neither singer succeeds in concealing the difficulties presented by Stradella's wide tessitura. Catherine Bott gives a virtuoso performance of her aria 'Sù, coronatemi' and Huttenlocher's Herod is splendid.

To conclude, this animated and imaginative approach to a masterly score does the work justice. Minkowski realises the inherent richness of invention and the sheer beauty of the music with insight, affection and a lively awareness of its dramatic intent. The recording is excellent.

Eduard Strauss
Austrian 1835-1916

Johann Strauss I
Austrian 1804-1849

Josef Strauss
Austrian 1827-1870

Johann Strauss II
Austrian 1825-1899

GROVE This Austrian family of dance musicians and composers gave the Viennese waltz its classic expression. Johann senior, a violinist in Josef Lanner's dance orchestra, formed a band in 1825 which became famous for its open-air concerts with his original dance music and paraphrases on the symphonic and operatic music of the day, all performed with exquisite precision. He took the band on European tours from 1833, creating a sensation with the fire and finesse of his conducting, violin in hand. His music, its Austrian folk flavour refined by a characteristic rhythmic piquancy (cross-rhythms, syncopations, pauses and rests), includes over 150 sets of waltzes, besides galops, quadrilles (which he introduced to Vienna), marches (notably the Radetzky-Marsch Op 228), polkas and potpourris.

Johann had three sons who were composer-conductors. Johann II, also a violinist and the most eminent member of the family, directed his own orchestra, 1844-49, in rivalry with his father's; after 1849 the two Strauss bands were merged into one. Vienna's imperial-royal music director for balls, 1863-71, and Austria's beat-known ambassador (the 'king of the waltz'), he was acclaimed by swarms of admirers, especially on European tours, 1856-86, and in the USA (1872). In form, his waltzes resemble his father's – slow introduction, five waltzes and coda – but the sections are longer and more organic; the melodies, often inspired, are wide and sweeping, the harmonic and orchestral details richer and more subtle, even Wagnerian in places. Among his most celebrated waltz masterpieces, dating from the 1860s and early 1870s, are Accellerationen Op 234, Wiener Bonbons Op 307, An die schönen, blauen Donau ('The Blue Danube') Op 314, Wein, Weib und Gesang Op 333 and Wiener Blut Op 354. Of his 17 operettas, the sparkling Die Fledermaus (1874) and the colourfulDie Zigeunerbaron (1885) deservedly claim a central place in the repertory.

His brother Josef was a melancholy introvert, shared the direction of the family orchestra in the 1850s and 1860s, and composed waltzes in a more serious, Romantic vein, as well as polkas, quadrilles and marches. The younger brother Eduard, Vienna's imperial-royal music director for balls, 1872-1901, became the best conductor of the family and was much sought after by orchestras throughout Europe.

'Ein Straussfest II'

E Strauss Ohne Aufenthalt, Op 112
Josef Strauss Plappermäulchen, Op 245.
Sphären-Klänge, Op 235. Jockey, Op 278
J Strauss I Chinese Galop, Op 20
J Strauss II Ägyptischer Marsch, Op 335a.
Künstler-Quadrille, Op 71. Kaiser-Walzer, Op 437.
Freikugeln, Op 326. Jubelfest-Marsch, Op 396.
Tritsch-Tratsch-Polka, Op 214. Geisselhiebe, Op 60.
Klipp Klapp, Op 466. Wein, Weib und Gesang,
Op 333. Perpetuum mobile, Op 257
Cincinnati Pops Chorale and Orchestra /
Erich Kunzel
Telarc CD80314 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991-92 ●

This collection sets out to adorn popular Strauss pieces with sound effects to outdo anything one hears at a Vienna New Year Concert. It starts with Eduard Strauss's Ohne Aufenthalt, which is accompanied by steam railway effects, has bullets flying mercilessly in the Freikugeln Polka, and includes neighing nags and swishing whips in the Jockey Polka. The fun is increased by the inclusion of the Künstler-Quadrille, a sort of 1850s 'Hooked on Classics' that begins with Mendelssohn's 'Wedding March' and continues through the likes of Mozart's Symphony No 40 and Chopin's 'Funeral March' Sonata to Beethoven's Ruins of Athens and Kreutzer Sonata. If the Viennese lilt is just a shade lacking in the waltzes, the playing is nevertheless excellent throughout. The Strausses themselves would have approved.

New Year's Day Concerts

'New Year's Day Concert 2002'
J Hellmesberger II Danse diabolique
J Strauss I Radetzky-Marsch J Strauss II
Die Fledermaus – Overture. Hünstlerleben. Zivio!
Eisen-Polka. Wiener Blut. Tik-Tak. An der schönen, blaüen Donau Josef Strauss Die Schwätzerin.
Vorwärts! Aquarellen. Die Libelle. Plappermäulchen!
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Seiji Ozawa
Philips 468 999-2PH (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 2002 ●

Ozawa, always happy in balletic music, which in effect Strauss's waltzes and polkas are, draws the most refined playing from the Vienna Philharmonic. If there were some raised eyebrows at the choice of Ozawa, plainly there is complete rapport between players and conductor.

Fully at home in the idiom, Ozawa dares to exaggerate the Viennese lilt in waltzes, encouraging the orchestra to indulge in a habit, once more marked than it usually is now, of anticipating the second beat of the bar. Certainly, Harnoncourt in 2001's concert (Teldec), though Viennese in his background, took a more purist attitude. As it is, the waltzes Artist's Life, Aquarellen, Vienna Blood and the traditional encore, The Blue Danube, have a coaxing persuasiveness impossible to resist, and the recording is not just ripe in the way one expects of the venue, but clearer on detail than it sometimes has been. If one quality marks out the whole concert, it is the daring of Ozawa's control of rubato, aided by the unfailing responsiveness of the VPO. A truly Viennese experience.

'New Year's Day Concert 2000'
E Strauss Mit Extrapost, Op 259. Gruss an Prag,
Op 144 J Strauss I Radetzky March, Op 228
J Strauss II Lagunen-Walzer, Op 411. Hellenen-Polka,
Op 203. Albion-Polka, Op 102. Liebeslieder, Op 114.
Ritter Pasman – Csárdás. Wein, Weib und Gesang,
Op 333. Persischer Marsch, Op 289. Process, Op 294.
Éljén a Magyar!, Op 332. Vom Donaustrande, Op 356.
An der schönen, blauen Donau, Op 314
Josef Strauss Die Libelle, Op 204. Künstlergruss,
Op 274. Marien-Klänge, Op 214
Suppé Ein Morgen, ein Mittag, ein Abend in Wien – Overture
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Riccardo Muti
EMI ② 567323-2 (92 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 2000 ●

The title Mit Extrapost ('By Special Post') of the final item in the first half of this New Year's Concert might just as readily apply to the remarkable way in which record companies these days get out the finished article within 10 days or so of the actual performance. The only trace of corners being cut is in the absence of track timings. Otherwise the result is perfection itself – a polished presentation of a concert that seemed exhilarating and stylish on television on New Year's Day and does so no less now. The balance between familiar and unfamiliar in the programme is as well judged as ever. The latter includes a fair homage to various nationalities – to the Greeks in the Hellenen-Polka, the British in the Albion-Polka, the Czechs in Gruss an Prag – to complement the more familiar Persischer-Marsch and Eljen a Magyar! Utterly delightful is another piece that is, surprisingly, receiving its first performance at these concerts – Josef's Marien-Klänge Waltz, which confirms the second brother's unique sensitivity and refinement. Among the more familiar items, Muti also takes the right option in giving the full version of the Wein, Weib und Gesang Waltz, which is too often played with its introduction abridged. Most importantly, the music throughout flows along as naturally and beguilingly as the Danube itself. Nobody who has enjoyed any previous Vienna New Year Concert should be disappointed with this new one.

Orchestral Works

J Strauss II Complete Works, Volume 34
Russischer Marsch, Op 426. Slaven-Potpourri, Op 39.
Fünf Paragraphe, Op 105. La favorite, Op 217.

Nikolai-Quadrille, Op 65. Abschied von St Petersburg, Op 210. Der Kobold, Op 226. Im russischen Dorfe, Op 355 (orch Schönherr). Dolci pianti (with Jozef Sikora vc). Niko-Polka, Op 228
Bratislava Radio Symphony Orchestra / Michael Dittrich
Marco Polo 8 223234 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991

J Strauss II Complete Works, Volume 35
Zivio!, Op 456 (orch Fischer). Architecten-Ball-Tänze, Op 36. Jäger, Op 229. Accelerationen, Op 234. Der Liebesbrunnen, Op 10 (orch Kulling). Die Zeitlose, Op 302. Königslieder, Op 334. Im Sturmschritt, Op 348. Der Blitz, Op 59 (orch Babinski). Heut' ist heut', Op 471 (orch Babinski). Die Wahrsagerin, Op 420
Košice State Philharmonic Orchestra / Johannes Wildner
Marco Polo 8 223235 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991

J Strauss II Complete Works, Volume 36
Matador-Marsch, Op 406 (orch Fischer). Kreuzfidel, Op 301. D'Woaldbuama (Die Waldbuben), Op 66 (orch Babinski). Process, Op 294. Elfen-Quadrille, Op 16 (orch Kulling). Mephistos Höllenrufe, Op 101. Bitte schön!, Op 372. Die Extravaganten, Op 205. Fledermaus-Quadrille, Op 363. Der Klügere gibt nach, Op 401. Neu-Wien, Op 342. Diplomaten-Polka
Košice State Philharmonic Orchestra / Alfred Walter
Marco Polo 8 223236 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989-91 ●

Volume 34 offers a distinct Russian flavour. The most obviously familiar item is the opening Russischer Marsch, while the waltz Abschied von St Petersburg will also be familiar to some. It's a fine swinging waltz, with an attractive cello solo in the introduction. Dolci pianti, one of three romances surviving from Strauss's Russian visits, provides further material for a cello soloist, while the piquant Niko-Polka offers as good an example as any of the delights to be found among the unfamiliar works of the Waltz King. Not the least attraction of Vol 34 is the conductor Michael Dittrich and his alert, echt-Wienerisch performances here. On Vol 35 Johannes Wildner's conducting shows up to much better effect than has often been the case. Marches have always been his strong point, and the collection thus gets off to a good start with Zivio! from the operetta Jabuka. There are other attractive pieces on offer, too, from the perpetual favourite Accelerationen, through the delicate polka-mazurka Die Zeitlose to the magisterial Königslieder (a waltz from Strauss's most successful period) and the polka-mazurka Die Wahrsagerin on melodies from The Gypsy Baron.

Volume 36 offers perhaps the most attractive music of the three volumes. Again the performance of the haunting waltz Mephistos Höllenrufe may not erase memories of some previous versions, but such pieces as the Neu-Wien waltz and the excellently played Fledermaus-Quadrille are among the composer's most agreeable creations. Perhaps the most pleasant surprise of all is the waltz Die Extravaganten which, with its endearing themes and richly inventive harmonic and orchestral touches, shows above all the merits of Marco Polo's voyage of Straussian rediscovery.

J Strauss II Complete Works, Vol 43
Reitermarsch, Op 428. Walzer-Bouquet No 1. Postillon d'amour, Op 317. Simplicius-Quadrille, Op 429. Wilde Rosen, Op 42 (arr Babinski/Kulling). Die Tauben von San Marco, Op 414. Auf dem Tanzboden, Op 454 (arr Pollack). Des Teufels Antheil (arr Pollack). Trifolien (comp with Josef and Eduard Strauss). Herrjemineh, Op 464
Slovak State Philharmonic Orchestra, Košice / Christian Pollack
Marco Polo 8 223243 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

J Strauss II Complete Works, Vol 44
Maskenfest-Quadrille, Op 92. Aschenbrödel-Walzer. Von der Börse, Op 337. Monstre-Quadrille (with Josef Strauss). Autograph Waltzes (arr Cohen). Auf freiem Fusse, Op 345. Schützen-Quadrille (with Josef and Eduard Strauss). Altdeutscher Walzer (arr Pollack). Nur nicht mucken, Op 472 (arr Peak). Hinter den Coulissen (comp with Josef Strauss)
Slovak State Philharmonic Orchestra, Košice / Christian Pollack
Marco Polo 8 223244 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

J Strauss II Complete Works, Vol 45
Fest-Marsch, Op 452. Zigeunerbaron-Quadrille, Op 422. Ischler Walzer. Ritter Pasman – ballet music. Pasman-Quadrille (arr Pollack). Eva-Walzer. Potpourri-Quadrille. Der Carneval in Rom – ballet music (arr Schönherr)
Slovak State Philharmonic Orchestra, Košice / Alfred Walter
Marco Polo 8 223245 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

Volumes 43 and 44 explore the more remote corners of the Waltz King's output. They include as many as four collaborations between Johann and his two brothers, of which the Trifolien waltz and Schützen-Quadrille most engagingly permit a comparison of all three brothers' strengths. Both volumes also include a waltz from the composer's 1876 visit to the USA. The Walzer- Bouquet No 1 is a convincingly authentic Strauss arrangement of themes from his earlier waltzes, but it is difficult to feel as sure of the worth or authenticity of the Autograph Waltzes, which may merely comprise themes thrown off by Strauss and worked up by an eager US publisher. The other particular curiosities here are Auf dem Tanzboden, a musical evocation of a painting, and the Altdeutscher Walzer, which is really no more than an entr'acte from the operetta, Simplicius. The attractive early waltz Wilde Rosen receives a compelling performance from Christian Pollack, without the somewhat heavy beat he imparts to the Walzer-Bouquet. Generally Pollack seems better in the polkas and quadrilles, which he gives genuine 'lift' and sparkle, as here in several delightful polkas and the Maskenfest-Quadrille. By contrast, Vol 45 is relatively free of the polkas and polka-mazurkas that tend to sound somewhat leaden in the hands of Alfred Walter. Over half this CD is devoted to items from Strauss's only opera Ritter Pasman – not just the ballet music, but also the Pasman-Quadrille and Eva-Walzer arranged by other hands from the score. The posthumous Ischler Walzer proves a piece of genuine charm, and the Potpourri-Quadrille compiled by Strauss for his visit to London in 1867 provides fun value with its quotations from earlier Strauss quadrilles interspersed with a selection of Scottish airs. The inclusion of the Carneval in Rom ballet music in a modern arrangement seems unfor-tunate in a collection such as this with an accent on authenticity. In sum, all three CDs rank among the more interesting and enjoyable in this adventurous series.

Additional recommendation
Waltzes
Vienna Johann Strauss Orchestra / Boskovsky
EMI Encore 575239-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ ●

> There have been no finer recordings of Johann Strauss than those by Willi Boskovsky. If you've no waltzes in your collection, this disc is a must.

Arrangements

J Strauss I (arr Weinmann) Wiener Gemüths, Op 116. Beliebte Annen, Op 137. Eisele und Beisele Sprünge, Op 202 J Strauss II Schatz, Op 418 (arr Webern). Wein, Weib und Gesang, Op 333 (arr Berg). Kaiser-Walzer, Op 437 (arr Schoenberg) Lanner (arr Weinmann) Marien-Walzer, Op 143. Steyrische-Tänze, Op 165. Die Werber, Op 103
Wolfgang Schulz fl Ernst Ottensamer cl Alois Posch db Heinz Medjimoreč pf Alfred Mitterhofer harm Alban Berg Quartet (Günter Pichler, Gerhard Schulz vns Thomas Kakuska va Valentin Erben vc)
EMI 754881-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●

In the Alexander Weinmann arrangements of Lanner and the elder Johann Strauss, one is able to appreciate to the full the clear lyrical lines of works whose full orchestration is very much built upon the foundation of the string quartet. Likewise, in the large-scale waltzes of the younger Strauss one cannot but admire the skill and affection with which Webern, Berg and Schoenberg used the limited resources available to their Society for Private Musical Performances. Indeed, if string quartet, piano, flute and clarinet inevitably struggle to capture the full splendour of the march introduction to the Kaiser-Walzer, the imaginative way in which Schoenberg finds a chamber ensemble substitute for Strauss's full orchestral sound is perhaps the most impressive aspect of the various arrangements here. On its own terms, the collection is extremely impressive. The Alban Berg Quartet has made a fine selection of some of the most melodic works from over half a century of prodigious invention, and it plays them with affection and relish. From Lanner's tender Marien-Walzer, through to Strauss Junior's most magisterial waltz, the clarity and refinement of the playing is tempered with a sense of lightheartedness and fun. If you fancy a Viennese dance collection with a different slant, don't hesitate to go for this admirable release.

'A Tribute to Johann Strauss'

J Strauss II Schwipslied[a]. Die Fledermaus – Overture; Spiel' ich die Unschuld[a]. Frühlingsstimmen, Op 410[a]. Im Krapfenwald'l, Op 336. Liebeslieder, Op 114[a]. Eine Nacht in Venedig – Frutti di mare!...Seht, oh seht![a]. Pesther Csárdás, Op 23. Pizzicato Polka. Die Tänzerin Fanny Elssler – Draussen in Sievering[a] (arr Stalla). Wiener Blut – Wiener Blut[a] (arr Müller). Wienerwald Lerchen[a] (arr Schönherr). Wo die Zitronen blüh'n, Op 364[a] (arr Genée)
[a]Sumi Jo sop Vienna Volksoper Orchestra / Rudolf Bibl
Erato 3984-25500-2 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●

Here is an imaginatively conceived and brilliantly executed collection of vocal Johann Strauss numbers. In an exciting performance of the original soprano solo version of Frühlingsstimmen, Sumi Jo's luxurious coloratura soars gloriously over the orchestra. The vocal arrangement of the Liebeslieder-Walzer and Richard Genée's show-piece adaptation of Wo die Zitronen blüh'n are no less thrilling. But it is by no means just the coloratura pieces in which Sumi Jo excels. The characterisation she gives to the contrasted parts of the audition song from Die Fledermaus makes it as compelling an interpretation as any. The fish-selling song from Eine Nacht in Venedig comes up with equal freshness. Add the way she skips from note to note in 'Draussen in Sievering' and the gentle hiccup at the end of the 'Tipsy Song' (an adaptation of the Annen-Polka), and one has an uncommonly well-thought-out and superbly varied collection. The participation of the Vienna Volksoper players under veteran conductor Rudolf Bibl ensures the authentic style not only in the vocal items but also in the short linking orchestral pieces. There was no need, though, for yet another Fledermaus Overture. It's a pity, too, that Erato claims 10 minutes' more playing time than there actually is, and that Michael Rot's excellently scholarly notes are sadly mangled in their English translation. Nothing, though, can diminish the exquisite quality of Sumi Jo's singing.

Die Fledermaus

Julia Varady sop Rosalinde; Lucia Popp sop Adele; Hermann Prey ten Eisenstein; René Kollo ten Alfred; Bernd Weikl bar Doctor Falke; Ivan Rebroff

bass/mez Prince Orlofsky; Benno Kusche bar Frank; Ferry Gruber ten Blind; Evi List sop Ida; Franz Muzeneder bass Frosch; Bavarian State Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Carlos Kleiber
DG The Originals ② 457 765-2GOR2 Ⓜ
(107 minutes: ADD).
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1975 ●●

Twenty-five years after its original release there is still no recording of Die Fledermaus that, for many collectors, matches this one for the compelling freshness of its conductor's interpretation – the attention to every nuance of the score and the ability to bring out some new detail, all allied to extreme precision of vocal and instrumental ensemble. The ladies, too, as so often seems to be the case in recordings of Die Fledermaus, are quite superlatively good, with ideally characterised and projected singing. If the men are generally less outstandingly good, one can have no more than minor quibbles with the Eisenstein of Hermann Prey or the Alfred of René Kollo. But it is less easy to accept Ivan Rebroff singing the role of Orlofsky falsetto. Some collectors find that his contribution quite ruins the whole set, but most will find it tolerable enough for the glories to be found elsewhere on the recording. DG remastered the set to make it sound as though it were recorded only yesterday; but it continues to provoke puzzlement by the break between discs, which occurs during the Act 2 finale. If a split into such uneven lengths is to be made, why not have it between Acts 1 and 2? Enough of minor quibbles – this set is a 'must buy'.

Die Fledermaus 🄷
Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Rosalinde; Rita Streich sop Adele; Nicolai Gedda ten Eisenstein; Helmut Krebs ten Alfred; Erich Kunz bar Doctor Falke; Rudolf Christ ten Prince Orlofsky; Karl Dönch bar Frank; Erich Majkut ten Doctor Blind; Luise Martini sop Ida; Franz Böheim buffo Frosch; Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono ②
567074-2 (110 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1955 ●●

This classic set is the aptest of candidates for EMI's Great Recordings of the Century. Such is the CD transfer that one completely forgets that this is in mono, not stereo, and the extra sense of presence and space makes for a clearer separation of the voices, well-forward in the manner of EMI's recordings in the mid-1950s. In his note, Richard Osborne quotes Schwarzkopf on what Karajan (and her husband, Walter Legge, as producer) were seeking to bring out: 'grit, dash, pep'. That may sound as though the result is serious rather than comic, but not at all so. What is striking above all is the animation of the production. The dialogue is so strongly characterised and so brilliantly acted, with each character so sharply defined, that even the most determined non-German-speaker will not only follow but be charmed by it. Legge's editing down of the dialogue was very much part of his concept, alongside the immaculate, inspired casting of soloists. The very first confrontation between Streich as the parlourmaid, Adele, and Schwarzkopf as Rosalinde, her mistress, is delicious, with the characters so vividly heightened. So it is throughout the set.

One may question the choice of a tenor Orlofsky, but Karajan and Legge were following the example of Max Reinhardt in his famous Berlin production of 1929, and Rudolf Christ in cabaret style presents a wonderfully convincing portrait of an effete, slightly tipsy nobleman. As for the others, it would be hard to imagine more compelling portraits than these, consistently reflecting Legge's genius in assembling his team. The musical performance, like the deft speaking of the dialogue, is both polished and exuberant. It is astonishing what precision Karajan achieves in his moulding of Viennese rubato, not only from his singers but from the Philharmonia players. Unlike the previous CD incarnation (also at mid-price) this one offers a complete libretto and translation. The dialogue is tracked separately, but few will want to omit it when it adds so much – very economically in time – to the total joy of the experience.

Der Zigeunerbaron

Pamela Coburn sop Saffi; Herbert Lippert ten Barinkay; Wolfgang Holzmair bar Homonay; Rudolf Schasching ten Zsupán; Christiane Oelze sop Arsena; Júlia Hamari mez Czipra; Elisabeth von Magnus contr Mirabella; Jürgen Flimm bar Carnero; Robert Florianschutz bass Pali; Hans-Jürgen Lazar ten Ottokar; Arnold Schoenberg Choir; Vienna Symphony Orchestra / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec ② 4509-94555-2 (150 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live in 1994 ●

This is an uncommonly interesting and enjoyable release. The extra music comes becauseHarnoncourt and Johann Strauss specialist Norbert Linke have sought to restore Der Zigeunerbaron to the form it had before Strauss made various cuts. The real merits of the set lie elsewhere. Not least, Harnoncourt has stripped away generations of Viennese schmaltz and per-forming tradition.

This is the first recording to include every number of the published score, and for once the music is sung at its original pitch, without the usual downward transpositions for Zsupán and Homonay. Most particularly Harnoncourt has completely rethought the style of the performance. Der Zigeunerbaron is a long work, described as 'Komische Oper' rather than 'Operette', and much of its music is unusually solid for Strauss. Harnoncourt gives the major numbers their full weight, phrasing them beautifully, and drawing refined singing from the soloists, among whom Herbert Lippert and Pamela Coburn combine beautifully in the duet 'Wer uns getraut?', and Christiane Oelze is a delectably sweet Arsena.

The necessary light relief comes not only from Zsupán (Rudolf Schasching in fine voice) but from usually omitted subsidiary numbers. Elisabeth von Magnus sings Mirabella's 'Just sind es vierundzwanzig Jahre' with exhilarating comic zest, and joins with Jürgen Flimm (more actor than singer) to make the trio 'Nur keusch und rein' an irresistible delight. The live recording comes with some audience laughter and coughs but with the applause suppressed. This deserves to win new admirers both for Harnoncourt and for Strauss's masterly score.

Richard Strauss

German 1864-1949

GROVE Strauss's father, a professional horn player, gave him a musical grounding exclusively in the classics, and he composed copiously from the age of six. He went briefly to university, but had no formal tuition in composition. He had several works given in Munich, including a symphony, when he was 17, and the next year a wind serenade in Dresden and a violin concerto in Vienna. At 20, a second symphony was given in New York and he conducted the Meiningen Orchestra in a suite for wind. In 1885 he became conductor of that orchestra, but soon left and visited Italy. He had been influenced by Lisztian and Wagnerian thinking; one result was Aus Italien, which caused controversy on its première in 1887. By then Strauss was a junior conductor at the Munich Opera.

Other tone poems followed: Macbeth, Don Juan and Tod und Verklärung come from the late 1880s. It is Don Juan that, with its orchestral brilliance, its formal command and its vivid evocation of passionate ardour (he was in love with the singer Pauline von Ahna, his future wife), shows his maturity and indeed virtuosity as a composer. With its première, at Weimar (he had moved to a post at the opera house there), he was recognized as the leading progressive composer in Germany. He was ill during 1891-3 but wrote his first opera, Guntram, which was a modest success but a failure later in Munich. His conducting career developed; he directed many major operas, including Wagner at Bayreuth, and returned to Munich in 1896 as chief conductor at the opera. To the late 1890s belong the witty and colourful Till Eulenspiegel, a portrait of a disrespectful rogue with whom Strauss clearly had a good deal of sympathy, the graphic yet also poetic and psychologically subtle Don Quixote (cast respectively in rondo and variation forms) and Ein Heldenleben, 'a hero's life', where Strauss himself is the hero and his adversaries the music critics. There is more autobiography in the Symphonia domestica of 1903; he conducted its première during his first visit to the USA, in 1904.

Strauss was now moving towards opera. His Feuersnot was given in 1901; in 1904 Salome was begun, after Wilde's play. It was given at Dresden in 1905. Regarded as blasphemous and salacious, it ran into censorship trouble but was given at 50 opera houses in the next two years. This and Elektra (given in 1909) follow up the tone poems in their evocation of atmosphere and their thematic structure; both deal with female obsessions of a disordered, macabre kind, with violent climaxes involving gruesome deaths and impassioned dancing, with elements of abnormal sexuality and corruption, exploiting the female voice pressed to dramatic extremes.

Strauss did not pursue that path. After the violence and dissonance of the previous operas, and their harsh psychological realism, Strauss and his librettist Hofmannsthal turned to period comedy, set in the Vienna of Maria Theresa, for Der Rosenkavalier; the score is no less rich in inner detail, but it is applied to the evocation of tenderness, nostalgia and humour, helped by sentimental Viennese waltzes. Again the female voice – but this time its radiance and warmth – is exploited, in the three great roles of the Marschallin, Octavian and Sophie. It was given at Dresden in 1911 with huge success and was soon produced in numerous other opera houses. Strauss followed it with Ariadne auf Naxos, at first linked with a Molière play, later revised as prologue (behind the scenes at a private theatre) and opera, mixing commedia dell'arte and classical tragedy to a delicate, chamber orchestral accompaniment. The two versions were given in 1912 and (in Vienna) 1916. Strauss had been conducting in Berlin, the court and opera orchestras, since 1908; in 1919 he took up a post as joint director of the Vienna Staatsoper, where his latest collaboration with Hofmannsthal, Die Frau ohne Schatten, was given that year: a work embodying much symbolism and psychology, opulently but finely scored, and regarded by some as one of Strauss's noblest achievements. His busy, international conducting career continued in the inter-war years; there were visits to North and South America as well as to most parts of Europe in the 1920s, which also saw the premières of two more operas, both at Dresden, the autobiographical, domestic comedy Intermezzo and Die ägyptische Helena. His last Hofmannsthal opera, Arabella, an appealing re-creation of some of the atmosphere of Rosenkavalier, followed in 1933. Of his remaining operas, Capriccio (1942), a 'conversation-piece' in a single act set in the 18th century and dealing with the amorous and artistic rivalries of a poet and a musician, is the most successful, with its witty, graceful, serene score.

During the 1930s Strauss, seeking a smooth and quiet life, had allowed himself to accept – without facing up to their full import – the circumstances created in Germany by the Nazis. For a time he was head of the State Music Bureau and he once obligingly conducted at Bayreuth when Toscanini had withdrawn. But he was frustrated at being unable to work with his Jewish librettist, Stefan Zweig (Hofmannsthal had been part-Jewish), and he protected his Jewish daughter-in-law; during the war years, when he mainly lived in Vienna, he and the Nazi authorities lived in no more than mutual toleration. When Germany was defeated, and her opera houses destroyed, Strauss wrote an intense lament, Metamorphosen, for 23 solo strings; this is one of several products of a golden 'Indian summer', which include an oboe concerto and the Four Last Songs, works in a ripe, mellow idiom, executed with a grace worthy of his beloved Mozart.

Concertos

Awards 1996

Horn Concertos Nos 1 and 2.
DuettConcertino, AV147. Serenade, Op 7
David Pyatt hn Joy Farrall cl Julie Andrews bn Britten Sinfonia / Nicholas Cleobury
Classics for Pleasure 573 513-2 Ⓑ
(66 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994 ●●●

David Pyatt won the BBC's 'Young Musician of the Year' Competition back in 1988. Since then the fledgling has well and truly flown. This is sensationally good horn playing. Primarily, there's his noble legato: the heart of the matter, a beautiful sound, full, even and unclouded. He is sparing with the brassy timbres, holding them in reserve for dramatic effect, for such times as the instrument's well-rounded jocularity must take on a brazen, huntsmen-like air, or rise to shining heroics – like the challenging motto theme of the First Concerto. His shaping of the big phrases rolls off the page with ease and authority, but equally, so much of his personality is conveyed in the rhythmic articulation: a dashing, Jack-be-nimble mischievousness (even a touch of impudence?) in Strauss's athletic allegros. Most of all, though – and this is rare – he loves to play quietly, really quietly. He is a master of those dreamy, far-away departures – twilit forest-murmurings: mysterious, unreal.

The recording helps here, with a beautifully integrated balance. The sound of the early Serenade, Op 7, is particularly fine with ripe, euphonious tuttis and room enough for individual personalities to open up. And that is the most remarkable aspect of the piece, the utterly natural way it blends and contrasts across the whole spectrum of wind voices. Two of them take centre-stage in the delightful Duett-Concertino. Joy Farrall's clarinet and Julie Andrews's bassoon are like Octavian and the Baron Ochs in this gentle but spirited opus. This is a spendid disc, then, and sympathetically directed, too.

Horn Concertos Nos 1 and 2. Oboe Concerto, AV144. Duet Concertino. Burleske in D minor, AV85. Parergon, Op 73. Panathenäenzug: Symphonic Study in the form of a Passacaglia, Op 74.
Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche, Op 28.
Don Juan, Op 20. Ein Heldenleben, Op 40
Peter Damm hn Manfred Clement ob Manfred Weise cl Wolfgang Liebscher bn Malcolm Frager, Peter Rösel pfs Dresden Staatskapelle / Kempe
EMI ③ 764342-2 (224 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1970-75 ●

Violin Concerto in D minor, Op 8. Symphonia domestica, Op 53. Also sprach Zarathustra, Op 30. Tod und Verklärung, Op 24. Der Rosenkavalier – Waltzes. Salome – Dance of the Seven Veils. Le bourgeois gentilhomme – Suite, Op 60. Schlagobers – Waltz. Josephslegende – Suite
Ulf Hoelscher vn Dresden Staatskapelle / Kempe
EMI ③ 764346-2 (222 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1970-75 ●

Metamorphosen for 23 Solo Strings, AV142. Eine Alpensinfonie, Op 64. Aus Italien, Op 16. Macbeth, Op 23. Don Quixote, Op 35. Dance Suite on Keyboard Pieces by François Couperin, AV107
Paul Tortelier vc Max Rostal va Dresden Staatskapelle / Rudolf Kempe
EMI ③ 764350-2 (208 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1970-75 ●●
Also available as 9CD boxed set on EMI
⑨ Ⓢ 573614-2

'From the store of glorious memories of my artistic career, the tones of this master orchestra ever evoke feelings of deepest gratitude and admiration' (thus spoke Strauss when greeting the Dresden orchestra in 1948 on its 400th Anniversary). You get the feeling that this orchestra is justifiably proud of its Straussian associations. Kempe, it seems, was the man to draw that pride out, and give it purpose. Some may find him an occasionally circumspect Straussian, one who preferred decorum to decibels in the protracted cacophony that concludes the Symphonia domestica, and who ensures that the famous '2001' opening to Also sprach Zarathustra isn't so awesome that the rest of the piece is an anti-climax.

It is difficult, though, to think of many other Straussians with the imagination and understanding to bring these scores to life from within. For Kempe, like Reiner, clarity of texture and a natural flexibility of pacing were prerequisites for the characterful animation and interaction of orchestral soloists or instrumental groups, but never at the expense of the long-term direction of the music. His technique, too, ensured the kind of feats of ensemble and precision that you might have expected from the Chicago Symphony Orchestra under Reiner, but Kempe's orchestra, of course, retains its warmer and cherishably Old World tones.

There are many self-evidently great Strauss performances here, including perhaps the most vital and communicative Don Quixote ever recorded. The recordings vary in perspective from an ideally distanced, natural layout to the closer and slightly 'contained' and the vividly present. Clear, light-toned timpani with very little bass resonance further enhance Kempe's precise rhythmic control, and soloists are invariably up-front, but rarely at the expense of orchestral detail. The recordings benefit from the warm acoustics of Dresden's Lukaskirche.

Additional recommendation
Horn Concertos^{a} Ⓗ
Couplings: Hindemith Horn Concerto^{b}. Concert Music for Brass and Strings^{c}
Brain hn Philharmonia Orchestra / ^{a}Sawallisch, ^{bc}Hindemith

EMI Great Recordings of the Century [b]mono
567782-2 (65 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1957-59 ●●

Brain relishes the Straussian bravura in the First Concerto, and the coda is stunning – wonderfully nimble. The frocklicking Rondo finale of the Second is another highlight, played with a deliciously light spiccato by Brain. Sawallisch proves himself a natural Straussian, and his account of the Concert Music for Brass is marvellously played – an outstanding bonus.

Also sprach Zarathustra

Also sprach Zarathustra. Ein Heldenleben 🄷
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Fritz Reiner
RCA Living Stereo 09026 61494-2
(76 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1954 ●●

It is astonishing to reflect that this recording of Also sprach Zarathustra was made on March 8, 1954, in stereo when Toscanini was still (just) recording in low-fi in New York's Carnegie Hall. The sound may be tonally fierce by current standards (less so than many oft-praised Mercury reissues) but the balance is fully acceptable, with the first and second violins set close to the listener on either side of the podium, and the basses hard left.

Reiner's Also sprach is intense and extrovert. In his second year with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the conductor was already getting a thrilling response from the strings, although woodwind intonation could be a problem. Confident and well played as it is, the spectacular opening sunrise inevitably lacks the impact of modern recordings. What we have instead is a measure of raw passion and forward thrust unequalled on disc. In the reflective passages, conductor and/or engineers display some reluctance to achieve a real pianissimo, but as the tempo builds Reiner invariably creates great excitement and the orchestral playing is marvellous. Reiner's reading of Ein Heldenleben has humanity as well as virtuosity – the touching closing section is memorable.

Also sprach Zarathustra, Op 30. Don Juan, Op 20
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG 439 016-2GHS (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1983 ●

Also sprach Zarathustra, Op 30. Don Juan, Op 20. Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche. Salome – Dance of the Seven Veils
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG The Originals 447 441-2GOR Ⓜ
(79 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1973 ●●●

The playing of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra on both sets is as glorious as ever; its virtuosity can be taken for granted along with its sumptuous tonal refinement, and in Strauss, of course, Karajan has no peer. As a recording the 1983 disc is very good indeed, though it does not offer the spectacular definition and transparency of detail of the Dorati, but the playing, it goes without saying, is in a totally different league.

The famous opening has greater intensity in his 1973 version and it is possible to prefer the marginally greater warmth and glow of the strings in the earlier account – the DG engineers adopt a slightly closer balance on this newcomer – while recognising the greater range and impressive detail, particularly in the bass, of the 1983 recording. Both Don Juans are fine performances, too. To sum up, Karajan's classic 1973 account – reissued at mid price on DG Originals – holds sway.

Additional recommendation

Also sprach Zarathustra

Coupling: Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche, Op 28. Tod und Verklärung, Op 24. Salome – Dance of the Seven Veils
Dresden Staatskapelle / Kempe 🏵
EMI Encore 574590-2 (ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1970-75 ●

Quite apart from the superb Also sprach, this is an excellent budget-price compilaton. Kempe is a Straussian par excellence.

Don Juan and Ein Heldenleben

Don Juan[a]. Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche[a] 🄷
Ein Heldenleben[b]
[a]Cleveland Orchestra / George Szell;
[b]Philadelphia Orchestra / Eugene Ormandy
Sony Classical Essential Classics SBK48272 Ⓑ
(75 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1957-60 ●

In Heldenleben Ormandy's hero is a transatlantic with a fat cigar in his mouth, and that he's out to impress is obvious from the start. He employs glamorous representatives, too: slick brass and percussion, smartly ordered winds and a plush, generous army of strings. Yet, he is not without soul, as his 'Works of Peace' and 'Retirement from the World and the Fulfilment of his Life' ably illustrate. In fact, his having been fulfilled earlier on in the score only goes to underline his profound change of heart. And with solo violinist Ansel Brusilow an eloquent commentator, and truthful if rather opaque sound, the hero's 'Indian summer' is most eloquently portrayed. Turn then to Szell, and the contrast is quite startling. Szell used to play his own piano-solo arrangement of Till Eulenspiegel to Strauss, and his recording of the work reveals the depth of his perception. No hint of brashness here, just wit, myriad detail and astonishing orchestral virtuosity. There can't be many better Don Juans on CD. The transfers from fair-to-middling originals are absolutely first-rate.

Ein Heldenleben. Tod und Verklärung. Salome – Dance of the Seven Veils

Staatskapelle Dresden / Rudolf Kempe
EMI Great Recordings of the Century 567891-2 Ⓜ
(75 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1972 ●●●

Kempe gives a superb reading of Ein Heldenleben, marginally lighter in tone than familiar modern rivals'. As ever, Kempe's music-making is unfailingly civilised, but for those accustomed to Karajan's sensational power and opulence, it may seem that he lets the hero's critics off rather lightly and disdains to raise the roof for the hero's deeds of war. But Kempe shows such sympathy that wonder and delight are really the only justifiable reactions. These performances have a deftness of touch and never sound heavy or over-blown. Recommended.

Ein Heldenleben^{a}. Tod und Verklärung^{b}
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips 50 Great Recordings 464 743-2PM Ⓜ
(74 minutes: ^{a}ADD/ ^{b}DDD)
Recorded ^{a}1970 and ^{b}1983

There are plenty of performances of both these works where the first thing that strikes you is the orchestra's or the conductor's virtuosity. Not here, where eloquent characterisation seems foremost in everyone's minds. Another characteristic, audible especially in Heldenleben, is Haitink's recognition that the orchestral players are his partners in character portrayal. This is most noticeable of course in the Concertgebouw leader Herman Krebbers' delicious sketch of the Hero's companion: one senses the Hero (Strauss himself, of course) responding almost with wonder as well as ardour to the companion's (Pauline Strauss's) demure but capricious seductiveness.

The stages of dissolution in Tod und Verklärung are also vividly pictured, with real urgency to the sufferer's despair and a most touching innocence to his memories of childhood. Virtuosity, of course, is abundantly present, but you hear it in the clarity of even the fullest climaxes, not in showy speed or exaggerated dynamics. Exceptional performances, in short, cleanly but spaciously recorded.

Ein Heldenleben, Op 40. Metamorphosen
West German Radio Symphony Orchestra, Cologne / Semyon Bychkov
Avie AV0017 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

Semyon Bychkov's Op 40 'Hero' is the sort you could happily live with: he knows his worth but doesn't thrust his exploits in your face. The opening self-portrait more or less says it all, a confident exposition (warm strings, strong brass, crystal-clear timps), well paced, sonorous but never over-forceful. Strauss's cackling adversaries are more chuckled over than caricatured, and violinist Kyoko Shikata makes for an affectionately playful companion, thankfully not the manic cadenza that's sometimes visited on us.

Above all, this is a musical Heldenleben, and much the same goes for Metamorphosen where the line remains fluid but constant, urged on (though never hampered) by genuine warmth of feeling. You sense that the notes and their emotional subtext are being granted an equal footing. Avie's recording has impressive amplitude and, in Heldenleben, credible presence. This is a unusual little coupling – any rival would need to 'go some', as they say, to upstage this sympathetic production. Recommended.

R Strauss Ein Heldenleben, Op 40
Mozart Symphony No 36 in C, 'Linz', K425
London Symphony Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
BBC Legends/IMG Artists BBCL4055-2 Ⓜ
(73 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1969 ●

Because Sir John Barbirolli's studio recording of Ein Heldenleben appeared posthumously, as Sir Thomas Beecham's stereo remake had done, it seemed to sum up a lifetime's achievement – 'a hero's life' for the conductor as much as the composer. It can be argued that this live performance is even more remarkable than the familiar studio version. It is a degree faster certainly and a shade tougher, too, although this impression has something to do with the vivid but shrill acoustics of the venue. There is more electricity in the playing, less subtlety and richness in the sound. No doubt the actual remastering has been carefully done, and the accompanying documentation is excellent.

Like Bernstein in his last years, Barbirolli could be an uninhibited re-shaper of the music he loved. The opening passage is grand to be sure, even a bit loose in places, but then the interpretation doesn't offer too much too soon. Things are tauter in the Royal Festival Hall. The leader, John Georgiadis, copes heroically with the beloved's (and the conductor's) demands. Michael Kennedy's authoritative note explains that they looked through the part together in exhaustive detail. The battle scene has breadth and dignity, by no means slower than Karajan was wont to take it in his last days. For once there is no sense of disappointment when the ringing climax gives way to the hero's works of peace. As in the studio, so here, the pot-pourri of motifs from the composer's back-catalogue has a particularly emotive quality: Barbirolli, painfully aware of his mortality, lavishes every ounce of affection and sensibility on these allusions to music he would not live to conduct again. The Elgarian nobility of the closing stages is again striking.

How to sum up? Sir John's is a Heldenleben like no other, deeply moving, albeit less 'authentic' than the wonderfully lithe accounts we have from Willem Mengelberg (1928, see below) and Arturo Toscanini (1941). Strauss himself was yet more restrained and aristocratic. The bugbear of 'authenticity' is more threatening in the Linz. Such big-hearted music-making remains enjoyable, but real elegance signifies something different these days. Certainly, the finale has all the vigour that one could wish for, and we are told that the conductor was particularly happy with the rendition as a whole. This release is warmly recommended.

Additional recommendation
Don Juan[a]. Ein Heldenleben[b] 🄷
Coupling: Wagenaar Cyrano de Bergerac, Op 23[a]
[a]Concertgebouw Orchestra; [b]New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra / Mengelberg
Pearl mono GEM0008 (71 minutes: ADD: recorded 1928-42) Ⓜ ●

This is the perfect set for anyone remotely interested in Strauss or in the history of recording. By the time this disc was made Mengelberg had nearly three decades of the piece under his belt – this is the definitive Heldenleben. The transfer is little short of miraculous given its age.

Eine Alpensinfonie

Eine Alpensinfonie, Op 64.
Der Rosenkavalier – Suite for Orchestra
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Christian Thielemann
DG 469 519-2GH (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 2000 ●●

'I will call my Alpine Symphony the Anti-Christian, because in it there is moral purification by means of one's own strength, liberation through work, worship of glorious, eternal nature.' In the end, of course, Strauss shied away from the inflammatory subtitle, yet the quotation is instructive. With more on his mind than a day's hike, Strauss had originally intended the work to convey a Nietzschean vitalism (is it coincidence that the trombones announce the summit in grandiloquent Zarathustrian fifths?).

Thielemann's is, by a considerable margin, the finest account we have had since Karajan's (and is rather better played): the performers' emotional commitment is stamped on every bar. Having the VPO on top form is a decided advantage: the brass-playing throughout is electrifying, no mean achievement since this disc was recorded live. It becomes clear very early on that we're in for something special, but anyone wishing to sample the performance at its formidable best might start 'on the glacier' (track 9) – the perilously high trumpet writing more confidently negotiated than for Karajan – and continue until they are 'on the summit'. On the way up, 'Dangerous moments' (track 10) is simply superb, Thielemann and the orchestra alive to every flickering nuance of accent and dynamic. And I've never heard the oboe's awe-struck contemplation of the surrounding vistas better done, the rubato exactly conveying the climber's physical breathlessness and spiritual exaltation. Thereafter, Strauss's ecstatic tumult is given full rein. This is a real performance: no-one holding back, no-one playing safe.

Which isn't to imply anything unsubtle: you really hear the close kinship between 'Rising mists' (track 13) and the passage in which the Captain and Doctor contemplate the lake in which Berg's Wozzeck has just drowned himself, so clearly does Thielemann articulate the disparate strands. In principle, one might object to some of Thielemann's bizarrely slow tempos and his tendency to linger over phrase endings (especially noticeable as night falls again), but here at least is someone who believes in the music and has something to say about it.

The various Rosenkavalier 'suites' usually seem insubstantial, but this one, at nearly 25 minutes, is both a generous filler and an effective wind-down after the main work.

Captured in a recording at once lushly upholstered and thrillingly visceral, this is unquestionably Thielemann's finest release to date. Occasional audience noises in both works never amount to a serious distraction. Ozawa and even Previn with the same orchestra are effectively superseded, though Karajan's narrower range of tempos and absolute sense of where the music is going will still be preferred by some.

Eine Alpensinfonie, Op 64
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG Karajan Gold 439 017-2GHS Ⓕ
(51 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1980 ●●

The Alpensinfonie is no longer a rarity on disc, but there are still grounds for preferring the famous Karajan version to subsequent digital rivals, especially in this successful remastering. Karajan's sureness of line is always impressive in Strauss and, while the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra is not at its immaculate best, there is some magnificent playing here. The sound remains rather fierce, but a number of passages have been substantially remixed and the effect is certainly less constricted overall. Perhaps it doesn't matter that the horn theme which floats in with the (still blinding) 'Sonnenaufgang' is not quite aligned with the strings. More worrying is the subtle transformation of the opening phrase of 'Der Ansteig': whereas we used to experience it 'from the bottom up' with the balance favouring the basses, we hear more cellos now—and most of them fluff the B flat! That said, the breadth and majesty of Karajan's conception is indisputable.

Eine Alpensinfonie. Don Juan
San Francisco Symphony Orchestra / Herbert Blomstedt
Decca Ovation 466 423-2DM (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1988 ●●

The Alpine Symphony is the last of Richard Strauss's great tone-poems and is in many ways the most spectacular. The score is an evocation of the changing moods of an alpine landscape and the huge orchestral apparatus of over 150 players encompasses quadruple wind, 20 horns, organ, wind machine, cowbells, thunder machine, two harps and enhanced string forces.

Its pictorialism may be all too graphic, but what virtuosity and inspiration Strauss commands. Herbert Blomstedt's reading penetrates beyond the pictorialism into the work's deeper elements. It emerges as a gigantic hymn to nature on a Mahlerian scale.

Tempos are slower, but these are justified by the noble expansiveness of the final pages, towards which the whole performance moves with impressive inevitability. The playing of the San Francisco Symphony is magnificent, with subtle use of vibrato by the strings and superb performances, individual and corporate, by the wind sections. The Don Juan performance is fine too. The recording is excellent, the big climaxes thrilling and the whole well balanced.

Till Eulenspiegels lustige streiche[a]. Also sprach Zarathustra[a]. Don Juan[a]. Ein Heldenleben[b]. Eine Alpensinfonie[c]

[a]Chicago Symphony Orchestra, [b]Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra;[c]Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Sir Georg Solti

Decca Double ② 440 618-2DF2 (152 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Recorded 1970s ●

This set is remarkable value. The formidable power of Sir Georg Solti's personality dominates all these brilliantly played performances. The intensity is never in doubt; one cannot but be continually gripped by this kind of music-making, for Solti is never daunted by the recording studio. Eine Alpensinfonie, with the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, has the most glorious tone (especially the brass). Such is the amplitude of the sound – and the warm commitment of the playing – that it counteracts the conductor's tendency to press forward, almost as if driven by some remorseless spirit.

Till Eulenspiegel, Also sprach Zarathustra, Ein Heldenleben and Don Juan were recorded at the peak of Solti's reign as Music Director of the Chicago Symphony in the early and mid-1970s. The playing is magnificently opulent, even Germanic in feeling, and the bravura is tremendously assured. Till Eulenspiegel brings a particularly vivid start with the sound most clearly placed in its natural setting and atmosphere. Solti's version is excellent on very count. It is simply impossible to resist the sweep and intoxicating power of this great orchestra unleashed, yet at the same time held by the conductor in an absolutely firm grip.

Even if other performances of Strauss's music have more subtlety of feeling, Solti's admirers will count this anthology a great bargain. The CD transfers of these brilliant Decca analogue recordings of 1975 are certainly impressive.

Don Quixote

Don Quixote. Lieder – Morgen, Op 27 No 4; Der Rosenband, Op 36 No 1; Wiegenlied, Op 41 No 1; Freundliche Vision, Op 48 No 1; Waldseligkeit, Op 49 No 1; Die heiligen drei Könige, Op 56 No 6

Dame Felicity Lott sop André Vauquet va François Guye vc Suisse Romande Orchestra / Armin Jordan

Mediaphon MED72 165 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Recorded 1996 ●

Above all, this disc is notable for taking advantage of the superlative acoustic of the Victoria Hall in Geneva, home of the Suisse Romande Orchestra, thus giving us the most impressively recorded Don Quixote yet, in sound terms. The detail of the brilliant scoring is clearly delineated while at the same time the whole picture is one of amazing warmth and resplendence. The spread of sound and its wonderful luminosity are things to marvel at and, of course, they are ideal for this inspired score.

Happily Jordan and his orchestra offer a performance worthy of both the place and the production – no aspect of the score missed. Guye brings out all Quixote's endearing and aggravating qualities without a hint of exaggeration, his tone always full and poised.

The songs are more than a makeweight. Lott, the leading Straussian soprano of the day, knows just how to make the most of six of the composer's best-loved songs with ethereal, fine-grained tone and line. As with the tone-poem, Jordan presents the music without any excess of sentiment. So what a great pity, then, that texts and translations are not provided, the only blot on a disc that is certain to give much pleasure and satisfaction.

Additional recommendation

Don Quixote

Coupling: Cello Sonata in F. Romanze in F

Isserlis vc Hough pf Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Maazel

RCA Red Seal 74321 75398-2 (76 minutes: DDD: 9/01) Ⓕ

Isserlis has all the imagination and variety of tone colour the work needs, plus a sense of humour missing from many accounts. He is especially good at the score's more eloquent pages – helped along by Maazel's affectionate moulding of detail.

Symphonia domestica

Symphonia domestica. Josephslegende – Suite

Seattle Symphony Orchestra / Gerard Schwarz

Delos DE3082 (777 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1988

Schwarz and his orchestra give an extremely fine account of the Symphonia domestica, far finer in fact than Zubin Mehta and the Berlin Philharmonic on Sony (nla). The Berliners may be superior players but the Seattle Symphony sound to be enjoying themselves much more and to be appreciating the wit, fun and sentiment of the music. Schwarz's achievement is that the work becomes a real symphony under his baton. The playing is relaxed and warm and often very tender. At strenuous moments, though, the sound inclines to be a little unflattering to the strings but otherwise it is clear and spacious.

Why don't more orchestras include Josephslegende – such a tuneful, colourful score – in their repertoires? Schwarz clearly believes in it, and his excellent orchestra, with a pliant string section and lively woodwind, respond enthusiastically to his lead. Recommended.

Metamorphosen

Tod und Verklärung. Metamorphosen
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG 410 892-2GH (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1982 ●●●

Awards 1982/83

These are a clear first-choice in both works. Karajan's Metamorphosen has almost unbearable intensity and great emotional urgency – it is a very gripping and involving account. The sound is marginally more forward and cleaner than is ideal, though the rich ambience is very appealing. Tod und Verklärung is not so spectacularly recorded as some more modern versions, but it is a greater performance that just about any other, and finer than any of Karajan's earlier versions. Indeed, it is quite electrifying, with superb playing and a life-and-death intensity to the climaxes. It is more vividly recorded than his most recent previous version, and the performance is tauter and more powerful.

In both works, it would be difficult to improve on these performances by the greatest Richard Strauss conductor of his day and the glorious BPO, and the quality of the recording gives no cause for reproach.

Violin Sonata in E flat, Op 18

R Strauss Violin Sonata in E flat, Op 18
Bartók (arr Székely) Six Romanian Folkdances, Sz56
Stravinsky (arr Stravinsky/Dushkin) Divertimento
Vadim Repin vn Boris Berezovsky pf
Erato 8573-85769-2 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

Stylistically, Strauss's lyrical Op 18 (1887) sits poised somewhere between Brahms's chivalrous song-cycle Die schöne Magelone and Strauss's own Don Juan of the following year. The finale is rich in heroics though not before a seductive 'Improvisation' and the appearance of one of Strauss's loveliest melodies. Anyone familiar with Heifetz's three recordings – his second, the first of two with the late Brooks Smith, is probably the most comprehensively expressive – will have a job adapting to anyone else. No one draws a sweeter, more tender opening phrase, though Vadim Repin, like Gidon Kremer, more or less matches Heifetz in terms of repose.

Repin's feline violin faces leonine support from Boris Berezovsky, almost to excess at around 5'20" into the first movement and for the stormy centre of the second (2'39"), where the piano threatens to take over. Berezovsky's outsize musical personality draws maximum mileage from Strauss's virtuoso piano writing, though he too is capable of relaxing, as in the tranquil passage from 3'40" into the first movement. Berezovsky's elegant fingerwork is nicely demonstrated in the decorative figurations that dominate the third section of the second movement (from around 3'44"). Kremer and Oleg Maisenberg are also excellent, but Repin's engagement with the music's lyrical element just about gives him the edge . Heifetz is more 'accompanied' by Brooks Smith than partnered by him.

Echoes of Strauss return for the Adagio from Stravinsky's Fairy's Kiss re-run, a witty Divertimento prepared in collaboration with violinist Samuel Dushkin. Repin's strongest current rival is Perlman, though his reading is perhaps less subtly characterised and, again, Berezovsky's strong-arm pianism strengthens the frame. Bartók's ubiquitous Romanian Folkdances are rather less spicy here than you would expect from someone who has fiddled in gypsy style with Lakatos, but Repin's harmonics in the 'Pe loc' third movement are admirably clean and the final dances are suitably dashing. The sound is very well balanced.

Choral Works

Deutsche Motette, Op 62[a]. Gesänge, Op 34. An den Baum Daphne (epilogue to 'Daphne'), AV137[b].
Die Göttin im Putzzimmer, AV120
[a]Tina Kiberg, [b]Marianne Lund sops [b]Christian Lisdorf treb [a]Randi Stene contr [a]Gert Henning-Jensen ten [a]Ulrik Cold bass; [b]Copenhagen Boys' Choir; Danish National Radio Choir / Stefan Parkman
Chandos CHAN9223 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1993 ●

Under Stefan Parkman the Danish National Radio Choir has established a reputation second to none. Parkman handles his singers as if they were a fully fledged symphony orchestra; which is not at all inappropriate in this programme by the supreme master of orchestral colour. From the heart of the 16 chorus parts of the Deutsche Motette a further seven are projected by solo voices emerging imperceptibly from the midst of a dense, luxuriant texture. The depth of colour and range of emotions are every bit as extensive in these works as in the great orchestral tone-poems; indeed few orchestral tone-poems evoke dusk and sunset so vividly as 'Der Abend', the first of the 1897 Zwei Gesänge. There is a wonderfully luminous soundscape here; a combination of superb compositional skill, sensitive musical direction, superlative choral singing and a warm, full-bodied recording.

Four Last Songs, AV150 (Op posth)

Awards 2002

Four Last Songs. Das Rosenband, Op 36 No 1. Lieder, Op 68 – Ich wollt ein Sträusslein binden; Säusle, liebe Myrte; Als mir dein Lied erklang. Befreit, Op 39 No 4. Lieder, Op 27 – Ruhe, meine Seele!; Morgen. Wiegenlied, Op 41 No 1. Meinem Kinde, Op 37 No 3. Zueignung, Op 10 No 1. Die heiligen drei Könige aus Morgenland, Op 56 No 6
Soile Isokoski sop Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra / Marek Janowski
Ondine ODE982-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded 2001 ●●●

Strauss singing doesn't come much better than this. No doubt the composer himself, with his love of the soprano voice, would have been enthralled by Isokoski's glorious singing. He might also have approved of Janowski's straightforward, quite brisk conducting as he was never one to sentimentalise his own music. With a combination of free, unfettered tone, not a hint of strain in high-lying passages, a fine legato and an amazingly long breath, Isokoski fulfils every demand of her chosen songs. To those attributes she adds just a hint of quick vibrato, which she uses unerringly to expressive purpose throughout. Add the depth of feeling she brings to inwardly emotional pieces such as Befreit, Ruhe meine Seele! and, above all, Morgen!, a perfect realisation of this oft-recorded piece, and you have performances to rival any of the greats of the past.

She reminds one most of Lisa della Casa, the first soprano to record the Four Last Songs, and Sena Jurinac. She has the same smiling timbre, the same natural style, the same avoidance of wallowing in music that contains its own proportion of sentiment. Try the ecstatic execution of the final verse of 'Beim Schlafengehen' and you will understand. If, on the other hand, you prefer a more leisurely approach, there are always Janowitz and Karajan.

Janowski is obviously at one with his soprano, not only here but also in Zueignung. Refined playing from the Berlin Radio Symphony and an open recording complete the pleasure.

Four Last Songs[a]. Capriccio – Morgen mittag um elf! ... Kein andres[b]. Tod und Verklärung[c]
[ab]Gundula Janowitz sop [a]Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan; [b]Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, [c]Staatskapelle Dresden / Karl Böhm
DG Classikon 439 467-2GCL (65 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1971-72 ●●

Here is a feast of glorious Strauss at bargain price, though the performances are anything but bargain in quality. In spite of strong challenges from far and wide, the singing of them by Gundula Janowitz has, arguably, still not been surpassed for Straussian opulence and tenderness – we emphasise 'arguably', for people feel passionately about interpretations of this work! – and Karajan conducts a near-ideal account of the orchestral score. Janowitz, in glorious voice, sings the Four Last Songs flowingly. The recording is more hazy than on the other two exemplary performances. The fashion of the moment to denigrate Böhm is incomprehensible when you encounter readings as splendid as his two contributions here, in which he again proves himself an ideal Straussian.

The live account of Tod und Verklärung caught at the 1972 Salzburg Festival but not released until 1988 (in memoriam) builds naturally to its various incandescent climaxes, and the music is never allowed to drag or descend into sentimentality. The playing of the Dresden orchestra is lithe and warm. The final scene of Capriccio comes from the complete set recorded in Munich in 1971. Once more Böhm judges tempos and texture to a nicety, the music always moving forward in perfect balance to its end.

R Strauss Four Last Songs Wagner Wesendonk Lieder. Tristan und Isolde – Prelude and Liebestod
Cheryl Studer sop Dresden Staatskapelle / Giuseppe Sinopoli
DG 439 865-2GH (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included ●

In the Strauss, Cheryl Studer's voice, lyrical yet with dramatic overtones, seems near-ideal for Strauss and for this work in particular, quite apart from the sheer beauty and technical accomplishment of her singing. In the first two songs there is the necessary ecstasy and longing in her singing as Strauss reviews, elegiacally, his musical credo. For example, one could cite the loving treatment in 'September' of the phrases beginning 'Langsam tut er', the singer's tone poised, the shading of the line perfectly natural. It is the seamless legato and lovely voice that again make 'Beim Schlafengehen' so rewarding, while in the final song Studer is suitably hushed and reflective. Sinopoli and the Staatskapelle Dresden provide ideal support for their singer with the playing in all these works as lyrically expressive as the singing above it.

Similar praise can be given to the reading of the Wesendonk Lieder. Here, once again, one notes Studer's amazing combination of vocal mastery and interpretative insight. Every dynamic and expressive mark is scrupulously followed (listen to the piano at 'Luft' and 'Duft' in the second song) in the pursuit of seamless phrasing and a due attention to the text. The richness of her singing, the thorough mastery of German diction and phraseology, make this another special performance. Sinopoli's reading of the Prelude to Tristan is flowing, intense and spontaneous and the playing is predictably superb, all adding to the disc's worth. The recordings are for the most part happily spacious and well focused.

Additional recommendation

Four Last Songs, Op posth

Coupling: Wagner Wesendonk Lieder

Norman sop Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra / Masur

Philips 50 Great Recordings 464 742-2PM Ⓜ (48 minutes: DDD)

Norman's glorious performance of Strauss's poignant swansong gained her 1984's Gramophone solo vocal award. If you're a Janowitz or Schwarzkopf advocate you'll find it too languorous. For anyone else it's unmissable, despite the short running time.

Songs

Lieder aus Letzte Blätter, Op 10 – No 1, Zueignung; No 8, Allerseelen. Ständchen, Op 17 No 2. Lieder, Op 27 – No 1, Ruhe meine Seele; No 3, Heimliche Aufforderung; No 4, Morgen. Traum durch die Dämmerung, Op 29 No 1. Lieder, Op 32– No 1, Ich trage meine Minne; No 3, Liebeshymnus. Verführung, Op 33 No 1. Das Rosenband, Op 36 No 1. Befreit, Op 39 No 4. Wiegenlied, Op 41 No 1. Waldseligkeit, Op 49 No 1. Die heiligen drei Könige aus Morgenland Op 56 No 6. Capriccio, Op 85 – Interlude, 'Moonlight Music'. Der Rosenkavalier, Op 59 – Second Waltz Suite

Steve Davislim ten State Orchestra of Victoria / Simone Young

Melba Recordings 301081 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Notes, texts and translations included

Ignore this disc's vulgar title – 'Seduction' – here's a solo recital to warm the hearts of all lovers of attractive, well-contoured singing and engaging interpretation. Steve Davislim, a Zurich-based Australian tenor, who has already pleased Covent Garden audiences with his Fenton and Zurich ones with his Tamino, is worth being spoken of in the same breath as his notable predecessors of similar voice – Peter Anders and Fritz Wunderlich – and praise can hardly be higher than that. Possessor of a well-produced, sappy, lyrical tenor, he has the ideal instrument with which to sing Strauss.

There is little or nothing to criticise in these youthfully ardent, finely phrased performances. Like all the best Strauss tenors of the past he knows just when to sing full out, when to reduce his tone to a refined piano, also how to employ rubato. Add to that German that sounds wholly idiomatic and you have the ingredients for a winner. Simone Young and her orchestra provide sensitive support to this outstanding talent.

Opera Arias

Renée Fleming

Der Rosenkavalier[a] – Da geht er hin; Ach, du bist wieder da!; Die Zeit, die ist ein sonderbar Ding; Ich hab ihn nicht einmal geküsst; Marie Theres!…Hab' mir's gelobt; Ist ein Traum. Arabella[b] – Ich danke, Fräulein. Capriccio[c] – Interlude; Wo ist mein Bruder?

Renée Fleming sop with [ab]Barbara Bonney sop [a]Susan Graham mez [a]Johannes Chum ten [ac]Walter Berry bass-bar Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Christoph Eschenbach

Decca 466 314-2DH (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 OO

This is a happily chosen Strauss showcase for Fleming. Her creamy, full-toned, vibrant voice is about the ideal instrument not only for the Marschallin but also for the other parts she attempts here. She has mastered the phraseology and verbal inflexions needed for all three roles, and imparts to them a quick intelligence to second the vocal glories. Sometimes her performance as the Marschallin or Countess Madeleine recalls, almost uncannily, those of Schwarzkopf, leaving one in no doubt that she has studied the readings of her distinguished predecessor. If Schwarzkopf with a slightly slimmer tone has the finer line and quicker responses, her successor provides the richer tone. Fleming need fear no comparisons with more recent interpreters such as Te Kanawa, Tomowa-Sintow and, as Madeleine only, Janowitz. Indeed, Fleming's account of the closing scene of Capriccio is just about ideal. Her deluxe team of co-stars includes Susan Graham, who makes an ardent suitor in Rosenkavalier's Act 1 duets; her timbre is so similar to Fleming's that it's hard to tell them apart, though she is not as verbally acute as her partner. And Barbara Bonney finally commits an extract of her enchanting Sophie, the best since Lucia Popp's; she also joins Fleming in the Arabella-Zdenka duet. Even the cameo appearances of a lackey at the close of Act 1 of Der Rosenkavalier, of Faninal after the Act 3 trio, and the major-domo in the closing scene from Capriccio, are filled by the veteran Walter Berry. Under Eschenbach, the VPO plays immaculately – the horn solo in the Moonlight music is pure magic – and the sound quality is outstandingly life-like. A treat for Straussians.

Elisabeth Meyer-Topsøe

Ariadne auf Naxos – Ein schönes war; Es gibt ein Reich. Arabella – Mein Elemer! Wagner Die Walküre – Der Männer Sippe; Du bist der Lenz. Lohengrin – Einsam in trüben Tagen. Tannhäuser – Dich teure Halle; Allmächt'ge Jungfrau. Der fliegende Holländer – Joho hoe!…Traft ihr das Schiff. Tristan und Isolde – Mild und leise

Elisabeth Meyer-Topsøe sop Copenhagen Philharmonic Orchestra / Hans Norbert Bihlmaier

Kontrapunkt 32249 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts included. Recorded 1996 OO

There are few, if any, sopranos today who can sing this repertory more securely than Meyer-Topsøe. A pupil of Nilsson, she sings with her teacher's ringing confidence, tone and technique solid and unblemished. It is heartening to hear once more a Scandinavian interpreter of Wagner with such a thrilling sound, one for whom the challenge of Senta, Elsa, Elisabeth and Isolde are as nothing. All that said, there is as yet room in some items for more dramatic involvement. Studio restrictions and/or a somewhat careful conductor may not be a help in that respect. An exception to this stricture is the Liebestod, where Meyer-Topsøe sounds a Nilsson-like touch of transfiguration.

Her Straussian credentials have already been revealed in the Four Last Songs. They are amply confirmed here in her Ariadne and Arabella. Here's evidence, most of all in a gloriously outgoing 'Es gibt ein Reich', of identification with a given role. Her Arabella is hardly less engrossing as she ponders on her 'Fremde Mann', the soprano's even, youthful timbre exactly right for the eager yet thoughtful girl.

The recording rightly has the singer centre-stage, the exciting voice caught in a natural acoustic. Only German texts are provided, no translations, and it's slight pity that the tracks have not been arranged in chronological order. But, that shouldn't deter connoisseurs of the voice heroic from acquiring this CD.

Julia Varady

Salome – Ach! du wolltest mich nicht deinen Mund küssen lassen. Ariadne auf Naxos – Overture; Ein Schönes war; Es gibt ein Reich. Die Liebe der Danae – Wie umgibst du mich mit Frieden; Interlude, Act 3. Capriccio – Interlude; Wo ist mein Bruder?; Kein andres, das mir so im Herzen loht[a]

Julia Varady sop Bamberg Symphony Orchestra / Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau [a]bar

Orfeo C511991A (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1999 ●

After giving choice recitals of Verdi and Wagner, Varady turned her attention to Strauss, and once again the results are for the most part rewarding. The final scene of Salome, under the watchful eye of Varady's husband, Fischer-Dieskau, has the perfection of pitch and phrase one expects of this singer, as well as an expected acuity for the meaning of the text. Perhaps, away from the theatre in a part she never undertook on stage, the absolute conviction of such great interpreters as Cebotari, Welitsch and Rysanek is absent, but not by much. The two almost consecutive solos of Ariadne benefit from shapely, poised singing, ever obedient to the score, although occasionally one misses the creamier tones that Lisa della Casa (DG) and Gundula Janowitz (DG video, and EMI) brought to the part. As Danae, Varady seems a shade tentative and vocally out of sorts. There need be no reservations about the final scene of Capriccio, in which she catches ideally Countess Madeleine's emotional perplexity as she tries (unsuccessfully) to choose between her poet and musician admirers. Both her identification with the role and her execution of Strauss's operatic farewell to his beloved soprano voice are near-ideal. Fischer-Dieskau, endearingly, sings the short part of the Haushofmeister. However, his conducting, although sensibly paced, sometimes errs on the side of caution. As a whole, this CD nicely complements Fleming's Strauss concert on Decca, the two discs offering a compendium of the composer's writing for the soprano voice he loved so much.

Various Artists

Der Rosenkavalier – Wie du warst! Wie du bist; Da geht er hin ... Ach, du bist wieder da! ... Die Zeit, die ist ein sonderbar Ding; Mir ist die Ehre; Mein Gott, es war nicht mehr ... Heut oder morgen ... Marie Theres'... Hab' mir's gelobt ... Ist ein Traum

Régine Crespin, Elisabeth Söderström, Hilde Gueden sops Heinz Holecek bar Vienna State Opera Concert Choir; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Silvio Varviso 🏵

Decca 452 730-2DC (62 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ

Recorded 1964 ●●

This, one of the most desirable discs in the whole recorded history of the opera, has led a Cinderella existence since it first appeared 33 years ago. Now invited to the ball, it ought to be accorded status as a princess. Crespin, quite heart-rending as the Marschallin, is in pristine voice. She fills her music with silvery, sensuous tone and at the same time judges every note, every phrase to perfection, whether in the monologue, or the final scenes of Acts 1 and 3. These extracts benefit from having, as Strauss intended, a soprano Octavian – and what a soprano! Söderström's vibrant, impassioned singing is just what the role calls for. Together she and Crespin make the close of Act 1 a thing to savour. Then in the Silver Rose Presentation she is joined by Gueden still able in her late-forties to float Sophie's high-lying phrases as to the manner born, while in the last act Gueden finds just the right sense of embarrassment in the presence of the Marschallin. It is a thousand pities the opera was not recorded complete, not least because Varviso, as at those Covent Garden performances, is in his absolute element, elegant and ardent, finding an idiomatic Straussian ebb and flow with the VPO on rapturous form, all recorded with Decca's 1960s skill. Christopher Raeburn provides the notes, filling in the plot as best he can in the absence of texts and translations. This is a must.

Arabella

Julia Varady sop Arabella; Helen Donath sop Zdenka; Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Mandryka; Walter Berry bass Waldner; Helga Schmidt mez Adelaide; Elfriede Höbarth sop Fiakermilli; Adolf Dallapozza ten Matteo; Hermann Winkler ten Elemer; Klaus-Jürgen Küper bar Dominik; Hermann Becht bar Lamoral; Doris Soffel mez Fortune Teller; Arno Lemberg spkr Welko; Bavarian State Opera Chorus; Bavarian State Orchestra / Wolfgang Sawallisch

Orfeo ② C169882H (144 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Notes, text and translation included

Recorded 1981 ●

Complete except for a brief cut in Matteo's part in Act 3, Sawallisch's 1981 Orfeo recording of Arabella has been easily fitted on to two CDs. Sawallisch is the most experienced conductor of Strauss's operas alive today and at his best in this one, his tempos exactly right, his appreciation of its flavour (sometimes sentimental, at others gently ironic and detached) unequalled. Helen Donath's delightful Zdenka is a perfect foil for Varady's Arabella. Varady's singing of the title-role is characterful and intelligent. One should be left with ambivalent feelings about this heroine; is she lovable or a chilling opportunist? Or both? And while Fischer-Dieskau's singing of Mandryka has not the total security of his earlier DG recording of the role with Keilberth, he remains the best Mandryka heard since the war.

Ariadne auf Naxos

Dame Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Ariadne; Irmgard Seefried sop Composer; Rita Streich sop Zerbinetta; Rudolf Schock ten Bacchus; Karl Dönch bar Music-Master; Hermann Prey bar Harlequin; Fritz Ollendorff bass Truffaldino; Helmut Krebs ten Brighella; Gerhard Unger ten Scaramuccio; Lisa Otto sop Naiad; Grace Hoffman mez Dryad; Anny Felbermayer sop Echo; Hugues Cuénod ten Dancing Master; Alfred Neugebauer spkr Major-Domo; Philharmonia Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan H

EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono ② 567077-2 (128 minutes: ADD/mono) Ⓜ

Recorded 1954 ●●●

Karajan's Ariadne is perfectly cast, magnificently performed, and very well recorded. The scoring, for a small orchestra, demands virtuoso playing from what, in effect, is a group of soloists: and the members of the Philharmonia Orchestra rise brilliantly to the occasion. There is a warmth and beauty of tone, a sweep of phrase, that gives lively promise of the wonderful playing we hear throughout the opera. Karajan's genius has never been more apparent than in his treatment of the Bacchus-Ariadne scene, in which he makes the score glow with a Dionysiac ardour and in which, at the tremendous climax when Bacchus enters and is greeted by Ariadne as the herald of Death, he gets an ample volume of tone from his players.

Every character is vividly brought to life – Karl Dönch's harassed music master is offset by the cynical dancing master of Hugues Cuénod, and Alfred Neugebauer, in his speaking role, conveys with a superbly calm pomposity his contempt for both sets of artists. The way he enunciates his words is superb. The other small parts, all sung by experienced artists, are wholly in the picture. Rita Streich sings the lyrical phrases of Zerbinetta beautifully. Technical difficulties do not appear to exist for her and all she does is musical. Irmgard Seefried, as the Composer, has less beauty of tone but more variety. The ineffably lovely trio for the Naiad, Dryad and Echo is exquisitely sung by Lisa Otto, Grace Hoffman and Anny Felbermayer, paralleled by the equally beautiful singing of the other trios. They are simply ravishing and, like all the concerted music, have a perfect ensemble. The commedia dell'arte characters are all very good, especially Hermann Prey: and their ensembles between themselves and with Zerbinetta are a great delight. After an awkward start, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, as Ariadne, brings the dark tone that is needed, to Ariadne's sorrows, and gives us much lovely singing thereafter, and also all the rapture called for at the end of her great address to the herald of Death and in her greeting to Bacchus. Rudolf Schock sings the latter with heroic tone and sufficient nuance to make one believe in the youthful god.

The general impression is of a truly magnificent performance and recording in which all concerned have, under Karajan's superb direction, been inspired to give of their best.

Ariadne auf Naxos

Gundula Janowitz sop Ariadne; Teresa Zylis-Gara sop Composer; Sylvia Geszty sop Zerbinetta; James King ten Bacchus; Theo Adam bass-bar Music Master; Hermann Prey bar Harlequin; Siegfried Vogel bass Truffaldino; Hans Joachim Rotzsch ten Brighella; Peter Schreier ten Scaramuccio, Dancing Master; Erika Wustmann sop Naiad; Annelies Burmeister mez Dryad; Adele Stolte sop Echo; Erich-Alexander Winds spkr Major-Domo; Staatskapelle Dresden / Rudolf Kempe

EMI Opera ② 764159-2 (118 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Notes, text and translation included

Recorded 1968 ●●

At mid-price this classic set cannot be recommended too highly. Nobody knew more about how to pace Strauss's operas than Kempe, and he was at his best when working with the Staatskapelle Dresden, a group of players who have Strauss in their veins. This reading brings out all the sentiment and high spirits of this delightful work, and the results are beautifully recorded. Janowitz's golden tones were ideal for the title-role, which she sings with poise and inner feeling, though she makes little of the text. Zylis-Gara is a suitably impetuous Composer in the engaging Prologue where 'he' meets and has a gently erotic encounter with the charming but flighty Zerbinetta, a role here taken with brilliant accomplishment by Sylvia Geszty, who made it her own in the 1960s. James King is a forthright though none too flexible Bacchus. The smaller parts are also well taken.

Capriccio

Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop The Countess; Eberhard Waechter bar The Count; Nicolai Gedda ten Flamand; Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Olivier;

Hans Hotter bass-bar La Roche; Christa Ludwig mez Clairon; Ruldolf Christ ten Monsieur Taupe; Anna Moffo sop Italian Soprano; Dermot Troy ten Italian Tenor; Karl Schmitt-Walter bar Major-domo
Philharmonia Orchestra / Wolfgang Sawallisch
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono
② 567394-2 (135 minutes: ADD). Notes, Ⓜ
text and translation included. Recorded 1957 ○○○

Not only is Capriccio a source of constant and none-too-demanding delight but its performance and recording, especially in this CD reincarnation, are well-nigh faultless. Walter Legge assembled for the recording in 1957 what was almost his house cast, each singer virtually ideal for his or her part. Some might say that no role she recorded suited Schwarzkopf's particular talents more snugly than Countess Madeleine. Her ability to mould words and music into one can be heard here to absolute advantage. Then the charming, flirtatious, sophisticated, slightly artificial character, with the surface attraction hiding deeper feelings revealed in the closing scene (quite beautifully sung), suit her to the life. She, like her colleagues, is superbly adept at the quick repartee so important an element in this work.

As her brother, the light-hearted, libidinous Count, the young Eberhard Waechter is in his element. So are the equally young Nicolai Gedda as the composer Flamand, the Sonnet so gently yet ardently delivered, and Fischer-Dieskau as the more fiery poet Olivier. Christa Ludwig is nicely intimate, conversational and cynical as the actress Clairon, handling her affairs, waning with Olivier, waxing with the Count, expertly. Above all towers the dominating presence of Hotter as the theatre director La Roche, impassioned in his defence of the theatre's conventions, dismissive of new and untried methods, yet himself not above a trivial flirtation – and how delicately Hotter manages his remarks about his latest protegee as she dances for the assembled company.

Even with so many distinguished singers gathered together, it is the closeness of the ensemble, the sense of a real as distinct from a manufactured performance that is so strongly conveyed. And Legge did not neglect the smaller roles: Rudolf Christ makes an endearingly eccentric Monsieur Taupe, the veteran Schmitt-Walter a concerned Major-domo. Anna Moffo and Dermot Troy sing the music of the Italian soprano and tenor with almost too much sensitivity.

Crowning the performance is the musical direction of Wolfgang Sawallisch, always keeping the score on the move, yet fully aware of its sensuous and its witty qualities: Krauss's amusing libretto has much to do with the work's fascination. Both the extended Prelude and the interludes are gloriously played by the vintage Philharmonia Orchestra, who are throughout alert to the old wizard's deft scoring, as refined here as in any of his earlier operas. The recording might possibly have given a little more prominence to the instruments; in every other respect, although it is in mono, it hardly shows its age. This is a jewel in the industry's crown and it will be a source of enduring pleasure to those familiar or unfamiliar with Strauss's inspired swansong. Bravo!

Additional recommendation
Capriccio
Janowitz The Countess; Fischer-Dieskau The Count; Schreier Flamand; Prey Olivier
Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Bohm
DG ② 445 347-2GX2 (142 minutes: ADD: 11/94) Ⓜ

Karl Böhm's 1971 Capriccio stands on a par with Sawallisch's, but is better recorded. It captures the glorious Janowitz voice in its prime. Her lovely Countess Madeleine is admirably supported by a fine cast.

Elektra

Astrid Varnay sop Elektra; Res Fischer contr 🄷 Klytemnestra; Leonie Rysanek sop Chrysothemis; Helmut Melchert ten Aegisthus; Hans Hotter bass-bar Orestes; Heiner Horn bass Tutor; Gertie Charlent sop Confidante; Helene Petrich sop Trainbearer; Hasso Eschert ten Young Servant; Arno Reinhardt bass Old Servant; Käthe Retzmann sop Overseer; Ilsa Ihme-Sabisch contr First Maidservant; Trude Roesler mez Second Maidservant; Marianne Schröder mez Third Maidservant; Marlies Siemling sop Fourth Maidservant; Käthe Möller-Siepermann sop Fifth Maidservant; Cologne Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Richard Kraus
Koch Schwann mono ② 31643-2 Ⓕ
(100 minutes: ADD). Notes included
Recorded live in 1953 ●

Hard to realise that in 1953, when this Elektra was broadcast from Cologne, no recording of the work existed, probably because it was considered too daring for the public to buy in the required numbers. This version, appearing officially for the first time, would have caused quite a stir had it been issued at the time. Obviously rehearsed with care, it fulfils all the work's exigent demands. It features Varnay at the peak of her career in an annus mirabilis for her, when she had been acclaimed at Bayreuth for her Brünnhilde and Isolde. As with those roles, she brings to her interpretation a response perfectly suited to it, adapting her tone to its special needs in terms of nuance and phrase. Her voice, in far better fettle than when she sang the part at the 1964 Salzburg Festival under Karajan, is fully equal to Strauss's inordinate demands: she is a true Hochdramatische of a kind hard to find today, even if her tone hardens a little under pressure at the top.

Rysanek, who sang Chrysothemis in London in the early 1950s to arresting effect, was the leading interpreter of the part over many years. Here, in her early prime, her truly Straussian voice soars easily over the orchestra, seeming to take on further sheen the higher she goes. As in all her parts, she gives her whole self to projecting the emotions of the moment. Res

Fischer's Klytemnestra is a securely sung, clearly declaimed reading which eschews the histrionics often heard in the part. In a radio studio, she and Varnay turn the mother-daughter confrontation into an intimate conversation with all sorts of undertones. Then there's Hotter, as Orestes, in a heroic role that might have been written for him: his noble utterance and (on this occasion) wholly steady voice impart true stature to this small but important part, his enunciation of the text, as ever, having a Lieder-singer's acuity. Melchert brings variety and an appropriately sharp-edged tone to Aegisthus.

Kraus, who did much sterling work for Cologne Opera and Radio, conducts a precise, finely shaped and well-timed reading, avoiding all excess except that which is implicit in the score. Of course, in this of all operas one misses a more sumptuous recording of the score, but by and large this is a performance that affords the listener with real satisfaction.

Elektra

Birgit Nilsson sop Elektra; Regina Resnik mez Klytemnestra; Marie Collier sop Chrysothemis; Gerhard Stolze ten Aegisthus; Tom Krause bar Orestes; Pauline Tinsley sop Overseer; Helen Watts contr Maureen Lehane, Yvonne Minton mezzos Jane Cook, Felicia Weathers sops First, Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth Maidservants; Tugomir Franc bass Tutor; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Georg Solti

Decca ② 417 345-2DH2 (108 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ

Notes, text and translation included

Recorded 1966-67 ●●●

Elektra is the most consistently inspired of all Strauss's operas and derives from Greek mythology, with the ghost of Agamemnon, so unerringly delineated in the opening bars, hovering over the whole work. The invention and the intensity of mood are sustained throughout the opera's one-act length, and the characterisation is both subtle and pointed. It is a work peculiarly well suited to Solti's gifts and it is his best recording in the studios. He successfully maintains the nervous tension throughout the unbroken drama and conveys all the power and tension in Strauss's enormously complex score which is, for once, given complete. The recording captures the excellent singers and the Vienna Philharmonic in a warm, spacious acoustic marred only by some questionable electronic effects. Notwithstanding the latter, this is undoubtedly one of the greatest performances on record and sounds even more terrifyingly realistic on this magnificent transfer.

Elektra Ⓗ

Inge Borkh sop Elektra; Jean Madeira mez Klytemnestra; Lisa della Casa sop Chrysothemis; Max Lorenz ten Aegisthus; Kurt Böhme bass Orestes; Alois Pernerstorfer bass-bar Tutor; Anny Felbermayer sop Confidante; Karol Loraine mez Trainbearer; Erich Majkut ten Young Servant; György Littasy bass Old Servant; Audrey Gerber sop Overseer; Kerstin Meyer, Sonja Draksler, Sieglinde Wagner, Marilyn Horne mezzos Lisa Otto sop First, Second, Third, Fourth and Fifth Maidservants; Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Dimitri Mitropoulos

Orfeo mono ② C456972I (107 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Recorded live in 1957 ●●

This is an enthralling performance. Mitropoulos made a speciality of the score, his most important contribution to opera interpretation. Souvenirs exist of his performances at the Met in 1949 and at the Maggio Musicale in Florence in 1950, but his Salzburg reading is the one to have. No other conductor, not even Böhm or Solti in the studio, quite matches the frisson of this literally overwhelming account. And it confirms that Inge Borkh is indeed the most comprehensively equipped soprano for the title-role, vocally secure – high C apart – and emotionally capable of fulfilling every demand of the strenuous part. In the great scene with Orestes she first expresses ineffably the sorrow at his supposed death, the 'tausendmal' and 'nie wiederkommt' passage done with such a searing sense of loss; then comes the great release of recognition – sung with immense warmth – followed by another almost silvery voice as Elektra recalls her lost beauty. It is a passage of singing to return to repeatedly for its many insights. Chrysothemis finds in della Casa an unusual interpreter, wonderfully ecstatic and pure of voice if not as emotionally involving as some. Madeira is a formidable Klytemnestra, her nightmarish thoughts expressed in a firm voice, accurately deployed.

Böhme, a real bass, presents an implacable, angry Orestes, not as subtle or as sympathetic as Krause for Solti. Lorenz's fading Heldentenor is ideal to express Aegisthus's fatuity. And the maids have never, surely, been cast with such secure voices.

Inevitably, cuts are made as is almost always the case in the theatre where, otherwise, Elektra might be left voiceless by the end. If you want the complete score, the famous Solti set will do very nicely. If you want Borkh, you must choose between the Böhm in stereo (DG) or this unique experience.

Die Frau ohne Schatten

Awards 1992

Julia Varady sop Empress; Plácido Domingo ten Emperor; Hildegard Behrens sop Dyer's Wife; José van Dam bar Barak the Dyer; Reinhild Runkel contr Nurse; Albert Dohmen bar Spirit-Messenger; Sumi Jo sop Voice of the Falcon; Robert Gambill ten Apparition of a Young Man; Elzbieta Ardam mez Voice from above; Eva Lind sop Guardian of the Threshold; Gottfried Hornik bar One-eyed Brother; Hans Franzen bass One-armed Brother; Wilfried Gahmlich ten Hunchback Brother; Vienna Boys' Choir; Vienna State Opera Chorus;

Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Georg Solti
Decca ③ 436 243-2DHO3 (195 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1989-91 ○○○

This was the most ambitious project on which Strauss and his librettist Hugo von Hofmannsthal collaborated. It is both fairy tale and allegory with a score that is Wagnerian in its scale and breadth. This Solti version presents the score absolutely complete in an opulent recording that encompasses every detail of the work's multi-faceted orchestration. Nothing escapes his keen eye and ear or that of the Decca engineers. The cast boasts splendid exponents of the two soprano roles. Behrens's vocal acting suggests complete identification with the unsatisfied plight of the Dyer's Wife and her singing has a depth of character to compensate for some tonal wear. Varady gives an intense, poignant account of the Empress's taxing music. The others, though never less than adequate, leave something to be desired. Domingo sings the Emperor with vigour and strength but evinces little sense of the music's idiom. José van Dam is likewise a vocally impeccable Barak but never penetrates the Dyer's soul. Runkel is a mean, malign Nurse as she should be, though she could be a little more interesting in this part. It benefits from glorious, dedicated playing by the VPO.

Guntram

Alan Woodrow ten Guntram; Andrea Martin bar The Old Duke; Elisabeth Wachutka sop Freihild; Ivan Konsulov bar Robert; Hans-Peter Scheidegger bar Freihold; Enrico Facini ten The Duke's Fool; Thomas Kaluzny bar Messenger, Young Man, Minnesinger; Jin-Ho Choi bar Old Man, Minnesinger; Ute Trekel-Burkhardt mez Old Woman; Manfred Bittner ten Young Man, Minnesinger; Matthias Heubusch voc Minnesinger; Werdenfelser Male Chorus; Marchigiana Philharmonic Orchestra / Gustav Kuhn
Arte Nova Classics ② 74321 61339-2 Ⓢ
(100 minutes: DDD). Text included
Recorded live in 1998

However much influenced by Wagner this, Strauss's first opera, may have been, it already shows Strauss moving off strikingly in his own melodic and harmonic direction. The work contains much attractive, well-crafted music, but from the start it was lamed by the composer's own prolix libretto and by his (at this stage) hesitant dramaturgy. The story of the brave, libertarian knight Guntram's adventures in 13th-century Germany and his love for the heroine Freihild, daughter of the local ruler, whose husband Duke Robert is a sort of villain and opponent of peace, is really one about individual responsibility being more important than religious orthodoxy, something that offended Strauss's strict Catholic mentor, Alexander Ritter. This performance, a live one under the experienced Straussian Gustav Kuhn, gives a very fair idea of its virtues and defects. His direction is vigorous, forward moving, strongly limned with a proper advocacy of the score's more original features, with resplendent playing from his orchestra. Even so, it remains unlikely the piece will be regularly staged when there are so many of Strauss's mature operas waiting to be revived.

The performance is well served by its two principals. In the title-role, the ENO tenor Alan Woodrow, under-used at home, here makes a more-than-passable Heldentenor in the first of many roles for that voice calling for strong, virile, penetrative tone. Woodrow produces just that, plus much of the romantic fervour Guntram's role calls for. Elisabeth Wachutka is reasonably successful as the object of Guntram's desires. Though her tone can be edgy, she rises finely to the challenge of her extended monologue in Act 2. The rest, who don't have much to do, are no more than so-so. The recording is clear and well balanced. At the price, this is worth sampling to hear Strauss's apprentice effort in the operatic field he was so soon to grace with many masterpieces.

Der Rosenkavalier

Awards 1988

Der Rosenkavalier 🄷
Dame Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Die Feldmarschallin; Christa Ludwig mez Octavian; Otto Edelmann bass Baron Ochs; Teresa Stich-Randall sop Sophie; Eberhard Waechter bar Faninal; Nicolai Gedda ten Italian Tenor; Kerstin Meyer contr Annina; Paul Kuen ten Valzacchi; Ljuba Welitsch sop Duenna; Anny Felbermayer sop Milliner; Harald Pröghlöf bar Notary; Franz Bierbach bass Police Commissioner; Erich Majkut ten Feldmarschallin's Major-domo; Gerhard Unger ten Faninal's Major-domo, Animal Seller; Karl Friedrich ten Landlord Loughton High School for Girls and Bancroft's School Choirs; Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono ③
567605-2 (191 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1956 ○○○

Der Rosenkavalier concerns the transferring of love of the young headstrong aristocrat Octavian from the older Marschallin (with whom he is having an affair) to the young Sophie, a girl of nouveau riche origins who is of his generation. The portrayal of the different levels of passion is masterly and the Marschallin's resigned surrender of her ardent young lover gives opera one of its most cherishable scenes. The comic side of the plot concerns the vulgar machinations of the rustic Baron Ochs and his attempts to seduce the disguised Octavian (girl playing boy playing girl!). The musical richness of the score is almost indescribable with stream after stream of endless melody, and the final trio which brings the three soprano roles together is the crowning glory of a masterpiece of the 20th century.

This magnificent recording, conducted with genius by Karajan and with a cast such as dreams are made of, has a status unparalleled and is unlikely to be challenged for many a year. The Philharmonia play like angels and Schwarzkopf as the Marschallin gives one of her greatest performances. The recording, lovingly remastered, is outstanding. In 1956 stereo was new to the commercial recording world and, unwilling to gamble everything on the new medium, producer Water Legge arranged for the sessions to be captured in both mono and stereo, using separate microphone layouts and separate balance engineers. This is the mono recording's first issue on CD and one is immediately struck by the mono recording's warmer, closer balance: Schwarzkopf, for example, a significantly more rounded, fuller and essentially dominant presence, never in danger of being overwhelmed by the orchestra. The detail and transparency of the overall canvas on the stereo recording is more naturally convincing, but the mono will make a special appeal to those who prefer intimate access to these great singers. The dilemma is that each recording is impressive in its way and yet so very different. Students of the voice will almost certainly favour the mono set; devotees of the opera itself may well prefer the stereo.

Der Rosenkavalier H

Maria Reining sop Die Feldmarschallin; Sena Jurinac sop Octavian; Ludwig Weber bass Baron Ochs; Hilde Gueden sop Sophie; Alfred Poell bar Faninal; Anton Dermota ten Italian Tenor; Hilde Rössl-Majdan mez Annina; Peter Klein ten Valzacchi; Judith Hellweg sop Leitmetzerin; Berta Seidl sop Milliner; Walter Berry bass Police Commissioner; Harald Pröglhöf bass Feldmarschallin's Major-domo; August Jaresch ten Faninal's Major-domo; Erich Majkut ten Animal Seller, Landlord; Franz Bierbach bass Notary; Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Erich Kleiber

Decca Legends ③ 467 111-2DMO3 Ⓜ

(197 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1954 ●●

Decca has done wonders in cleaning the sound on this reissued classic recording. It seems warmer and more spacious than in any of its LP guises. The bloom on the playing of the Vienna Philharmonic is grateful to the ear, and the voices stand ideally in relation to the instruments. That is doubly heartening given the fact that Kleiber's interpretation still stands above that of any of his successors. His innate and deep understanding of the score and his instinctive feeling for this area of the Viennese idiom remain unsurpassed; so does his convincing treatment of the score's weaker pages (it is here given complete). Above all, Kleiber never makes the mistake of lingering too long over the work's purple passage, nor does he overheat its more active ones: the key to his reading is a combination of lightness, line and incandescence – try the opening of Act 2.

The vocal glory of the set remains Sena Jurinac's Octavian. Here in more refulgent voice perhaps than anywhere else on disc, she gives the performance of one's dreams. How gleaming yet how warm is her voice, how naturally impetuous and intense her colloquies with her elders. Jurinac carefully denotes Octavian's growing fascination with Sophie. Then, as the maudlin Mariandl of Act 3, she changes her tone subtly, never exaggerating. Finally, her voice soars gloriously in the trio and duet that crown the work. It is without question a definitive interpretation, and will surely remain so.

Maria Reining's Marschallin has been badly underrated. Her approach is natural, stylish and very moving in its simplicity – and its obedience to the score. Not a trace of self-consciousness or arch phrasing spoils the patent honesty of her portrayal. The voice itself sounds a little tremulous at the start, and it never quite gains the warmth other Marschallins achieve, but the unmannered yet absolutely idiomatic enunciation of the text is compensation enough, and her partnership with Jurinac's Octavian is often memorable. Hilde Gueden's singing may be a shade sophisticated for Sophie (and she shouldn't show dislike for Ochs before she has met him), but the accuracy and firm focus of her singing count for much. Ludwig Weber's Ochs is a ripe, assured assumption sung with total command of the text and in an authentic Viennese accent. All the singers are versed in that essential command of Strauss's parlando style, so that Hofmannsthal's racy, keenly fashioned libretto is given wit and point. Although the admiration for Karajan remains undiminished, Kleiber is the performance to take to your desert island.

Der Rosenkavalier (sung in English) – Prelude; Wie du warst! Wie du bist; Da geht er hin…Ach, du bist wieder da!…Die Zeit, die ist ein sonderbar Ding; Ein ernster Tag, ein grosser Tag!; In dieser feierlichen Stunde der Prüfung; Mir ist die Ehre; Da lieg' ich!; Herr Kavalier!; Ist halt vorbei; Mein Gott, es war nicht mehr; Heut oder morgen oder den übernächsten Tag; Marie Theres'…Hab' mir's gelobt; Ist ein Traum

Yvonne Kenny sop Marschallin; Diana Montague mez Octavian; John Tomlinson bass Baron Ochs; Rosemary Joshua sop Sophie; Andrew Shore bar Faninal; Jennifer Rhys-Davies sop Marianne; Elizabeth Vaughan mez Annina Peter Kay Children's Choir; Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; London Philharmonic Orchestra / David Parry

Chandos Opera in English CHAN3022 Ⓕ

(80 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998 ●

This is a delightful disc, with a cast of principals that need fear little from comparison with international singers on original-language recordings. One can only regret that Chandos and the Peter Moores Foundation, which so faithfully underwrites this admirable venture, haven't been bold enough to record the whole work. In particular one would like much more of Tomlinson's Ochs, well known from the ENO production. In the close of Act 2 he shows us just how much can be made of the text, using a translation he has sensibly tailored to his own needs, and projects with enormous relish in a role that suits his vocal acting to perfection.

Yvonne Kenny sings of the joys and sorrows of love with beautiful tone and shapely phrasing, her voice of an ideal weight for the part. Like Tomlinson she is keen with her words. By her side is Diana Montague's eager, ardent Octavian, the two singers matching each other in evincing strong emotions. With Rosemary Joshua – another singer repeating her ENO role – as a mettlesome Sophie, easing naturally into her high lines, the trio is the climax of Act 3 that it should be. Andrew Shore makes much of little as Faninal. Only Elizabeth Vaughan's harsh, overdone Annina is a drawback. David Parry nicely catches both the serious and comic sides of things, and his pacing of everything but the final scene, which is a shade too hesitant, is admirable. He persuades the LPO to play at the top of its bent for him, so that the score sounds as warm and rich-hued as it should in a typically spacious Chandos recording.

Additional recommendation
Der Rosenkavalier
Crespin Marschallin Minton Octavian Jungwirth Ochs Donath Sophie Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Solti
Decca 417 493-2DH3 (200 minutes: DDD: 3/87) Ⓕ

For those craving good sound and a reading of great charm – Crespin's rather Gallic Marschallin is wondrously sung – Solti's 1968 set is worth considering. Many collectors rate this even more highly than the classic Karajan.

Salome

Birgit Nilsson sop Salome; Eberhard Waechter bar Jokanaan; Gerhard Stolze ten Herod; Grace Hoffman mez Herodias; Waldemar Kmentt ten Narraboth; Josephine Veasey mez Page; Tom Krause bar First Nazarene; Nigel Douglas ten Second Nazarene; Zenon Koznowski bass First Soldier; Heinz Holecek bass Second Soldier; Theodore Kirschbichler bass Cappadocian; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Georg Solti
Decca ② 414 414-2DH2 (99 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1961 Ⓕ OOO

Solti's Salome was one of Decca's notable Sonic-stage successes and still beats most of its competitors in terms of sound alone. There is a real sense here of a theatrical performance, as produced by John Culshaw, with an imaginative use of movement. Of course, the vivid, nervous energy of Strauss has always been Solti's territory, and this is an overwhelming account of Strauss's sensual piece, sometimes a little too hard-hitting for its or our good: there are places where the tension might be relaxed just a shade, but throughout, the VPO answers Solti's extreme demands with its most aristocratic playing. With only a single break, the sense of mounting fever is felt all the more. Birgit Nilsson's account of the title-role is another towering monument to her tireless singing. Here, more even than as Brünnhilde, one notices just how she could fine away her tone to a sweet and fully supported pianissimo, and her whole interpretation wants nothing of the erotic suggestiveness of sopranos more familiar with the role on stage.

Gerhard Stolze's Herod is properly wheedling, worried and, in the final resort, crazed, but there are times, particularly towards the end of his contribution, when exaggeration takes over from characterisation. Other interpretations show how effects can be created without distortion of the vocal line. Eberhard Waechter is an aggressive rather than a visionary Jokanaan. Grace Hoffman is a suitably gloating Herodias. Much better than any of these, Nilsson apart, is Waldemar Kmentt's wonderfully ardent Narraboth. Hardly any of the rivals since 1961 has managed a true challenge to this simply outstanding recording.

Salome
Cheryl Studer sop Salome; Bryn Terfel bar Jokanaan; Horst Hiestermann ten Herod; Leonie Rysanek sop Herodias; Clemens Bieber ten Narraboth; Marianne Rørholm contr Page; Friedrich Molsberger bass First Nazarene; Ralf Lukas bass Second Nazarene; William Murray bass First Soldier; Bengt Rundgren bass Second Soldier; Klaus Lang bar Cappadocian; Orchestra of the Deutsche Oper, Berlin / Giuseppe Sinopoli
DG ② 431 810-2GH2 (102 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1990 OO

Strauss's setting of a German translation of Oscar Wilde's play is original and erotically explicit. It caused a sensation in its day and even now stimulates controversy. Sinopoli's recording is a magnificent achievement, mainly because of Cheryl Studer's representation of the spoilt Princess who demands and eventually gets the head of Jokanaan (John the Baptist) on a platter as a reward for her striptease ('Dance of the Seven Veils'). Studer, her voice fresh, vibrant and sensuous, conveys exactly Salome's growing fascination, infatuation and eventual obsession with Jokanaan, which ends in the arresting necrophilia of the final scene. She expresses Salome's wheedling, spoilt nature, strong will and ecstasy in tones that are apt for every aspect of the strenuous role.

She is supported to the hilt by Sinopoli's incandescent conducting and by Bryn Terfel's convincing Jokanaan, unflaggingly delivered, by Hiestermann's neurotic Herod, who makes a suitably fevered, unhinged sound as the near-crazed Herod, and Rysanek's wilful Herodias. The playing is excellent and the recording has breadth and warmth. This is eminently recommendable. For a newcomer to the work, Studer's superb portrayal may just tip the balance in favour of Sinopoli, though Solti's famous version is in a class of its own, with a gloriously sung Salome and the ravishingly beautiful playing of the Vienna Phil.

Salome
Inga Nielsen sop Salome; Robert Hale bass-bar Jokanaan; Reiner Goldberg ten Herod; Anja Silja sop Herodias; Deon van der Walt ten Narraboth; Marianne Rørholm contr Page; Bent Norup bar First Nazarene; Morten Frank Larsen bar Second Nazarene; Per Høyer bar First Soldier; Stephen Milling bass Second Soldier; Anders Jokobsson bass Cappadocian; Henriette Bonde Hansen sop Slave; Danish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Michael Schønwandt
Chandos ② CHAN9611 (99 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1998 ●

Inga Nielsen is a Salome of quite exceptional talent, even inspiration. Better than any of her predecessors she creates a princess who sounds credibly teenaged with surely just the pearl-like yet needle-sharp tone Strauss intended. Nobody has so convincingly conveyed the impression of a spoilt, petulant innocent with the will and determination to get her way – and then exploited her manipulative character to frightening effect as, sexually awakened, Salome becomes obsessed with the body of Jokanaan. In a performance that is vocally stunning from Salome's first entrance, Nielsen fashions her reading with supreme intelligence in her response to words and notes. Throughout she sings keenly, even maliciously off the text. While still having nothing but praise for Studer's beautifully sung portrayal on the Sinopoli set – her tone is more refulgent, less narrow than Nielsen's but she is not so much inside the role – or for Nilsson's vocally overwhelming portrayal for Solti, Nielsen simply seems a Salome by nature, made for the part.

Happily Nielsen's riveting interpretation receives suitable support. Schønwandt yields to none of his illustrious predecessors in impressing on us the still-extraordinary originality, fascination and tense horror of Strauss's score. From start to finish, including an electrifying account of the Dance, his is a fierily direct, highly charged yet never vulgar reading. Hale, who has partnered Nielsen in this work at the Brussels Opera, is a noble-sounding, resolute Jokanaan of long experience. Although he doesn't attempt the larger-than-life, tremendous performance of Terfel for Sinopoli, and his tone is not as steady, his reading is surely more of a piece with the opera as a whole. Goldberg is just right as the degraded, superstitious, lecherous Herod, vocally astute and characterful. Silja is a well-routined, if sometimes over-the-top Herodias.

Chandos provides a recording of extraordinary range and breadth, yet one that makes sure that the singers take stage front. Anyone who already has the highly regarded Sinopoli version will probably not feel the need to invest in this new set, but we would urge newcomers to hear it. Even though other elements are well taken care of on earlier versions, Nielsen is really unmissable.

Die schweigsame Frau

Kurt Böhme bass Sir Morosus; Martha Mödl mez Housekeeper; Barry McDaniel bar Barber; Donald Grobe ten Henry Morosus; Reri Grist sop Aminta; Lotte Schädle sop Isotta; Glenys Loulis mez Carlotta; Albrecht Peter bar Morbio; Benno Kusche bar Vanuzzi; Max Proebstl bass Farfallo; Bavarian State Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Wolfgang Sawallisch
Orfeo d'or ② C516992I (126 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded at a broadcast performance in 1971

That ardent and devoted Straussian, William Mann, slated this production (in Opera) when he saw it at its première in Munich in 1971 because the score was 'cut to ribbons', declaring that it was therefore, in Strauss's home city, 'a national disgrace'. Notwithstanding this objection, all the liveliness and spirit of the Munich event is conveyed in this recording from the archives of Bavarian Radio to the extent that you hear a lot of stage noises. Sawallisch wholly enters into the spirit of the Ben Jonson comedy as adapted for his libretto by Stefan Zweig. The cast, excellent all round, easily get their collective tongues around the profusion of words. Kurt Böhme, near the end of his long career, is, as he was in the flesh, a magnificently rotund Morosus, with real 'face' in his singing and possessing all the bass notes that Hotter (DG) and Adam (on the absolutely complete EMI version) don't quite possess, being bass-baritones. The then-young American singers, all of whom spent most of their careers in Germany, cast as Aminta, Henry and the Barber, all possess good German. Grist is a delightfully fresh and pleasing Aminta and Barry McDaniel an inventive Barber, though his rivals on the other sets are even better. As Henry, Grobe isn't quite the equal of Wunderlich – who can be? Mödl enjoys herself hugely as the Housekeeper.

Sawallisch, in 1971 newly appointed Music Director in Munich and destined to do so much there for the cause of Strauss, manages to keep clear all the many strands in Strauss's score; so do Böhm and Janowski. This version, in stereo, has that advantage over the DG, but the singing on the latter is, by a small margin, superior. If you want every note you must have Janowski – three CDs, but at mid-price.

Further listening
Daphne
Gueden Daphne King Apollo Schoeffler Peneios Wunderlich Leukippos
Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Symphony Orchestra / Bohm

DG ② 445 322-2GX2 (94 minutes: ADD: 11/94) Ⓜ
Live recording

Daphne is not perhaps as involving as Strauss's later operas, but it contains some typically beautiful writing for the soprano voice in the title-role. A fine performance.

Die Liebe der Danae
Kupper Danae Schöffler Jupiter. Traxel Mercury 🄷
Vienna State Opera Chorus, Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Krauss
Orfeo mono ③ C292923D
(164 minutes: ADD: 5/00). Ⓕ
Live recording from the Salzburg Festival

Despite a number of pages in Strauss's most appealing, late autumnal vein, this is a deeply flawed work, not least because of the wordy and rather empty libretto. For Strauss completists, though, this 1952 recording is the one to have.

Friedenstag
Weikl Commandant Hass Maria Ryhänen Sergeant
Bavarian State Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Sawallisch
EMI 556850-2 (77 minutes: DDD: 9/99) Ⓕ

Friedenstag may not be one of Strauss's most inspired creations but this splendidly committed performance – recorded live in 1988 – offers excellent advocacy for it.

Igor Stravinsky

Russian/French/American 1882-1971

GROVE Stravinsky was the son of a leading bass at the Mariinsky Theatre in St Petersburg, he studied with Rimsky-Korsakov (1902-8), who was an influence on his early music, though so were Tchaikovsky, Borodin, Glazunov and (from 1907-8) Debussy and Dukas. This colourful mixture of sources lies behind The Firebird (1910), commissioned by Dyagilev for his Ballets Russes. Stravinsky went with the company to Paris in 1910 and spent much of his time in France from then onwards, continuing his association with Dyagilev in Petrushka (1911) and The Rite of Spring (1913).

These scores show an extraordinary development. Both use folktunes, but not in any symphonic manner: Stravinsky's forms are additive rather than symphonic, created from placing blocks of material together without disguising the joins. The binding energy is much more rhythmic than harmonic, and the driving pulsations of The Rite marked a crucial change in the nature of Western music. Stravinsky, however, left it to others to use that change in the most obvious manner. He himself, after completing his Chinese opera The Nightingale, turned aside from large resources to concentrate on chamber forces and the piano.

Partly this was a result of World War I, which disrupted the activities of the Ballets Russes and caused Stravinsky to seek refuge in Switzerland. He was not to return to Russia until 1962, though his works of 1914-18 are almost exclusively concerned with Russian folk tales and songs: they include the choral ballet Les noces ('The Wedding'), the smaller sung and danced fable Renard, a short play doubly formalized with spoken narration and instrumental music (The Soldier's Tale) and several groups of songs. In The Wedding, where block form is geared to highly mechanical rhythm to give an objective ceremonial effect, it took him some while to find an appropriately objective instrumentation; he eventually set it with pianos and percussion. Meanwhile, for the revived Ballets Russes, he produced a startling transformation of 18th-century Italian music (ascribed to Pergolesi) in Pulcinella (1920), which opened the way to a long period of 'neo-classicism', or re-exploring past forms, styles and gestures with the irony of non-developmental material being placed in developmental moulds. The Symphonies of Wind Instruments, an apotheosis of the wartime 'Russian' style, was thus followed by the short number-opera Mavra, the Octet for wind, and three works he wrote to help him earn his living as a pianist: the Piano Concerto, the Sonata and the Serenade in A.

During this period of the early 1920s he avoided string instruments because of their expressive nuances, preferring the clear articulation of wind, percussion, piano and even pianola. But he returned to the full orchestra to achieve the starkly presented Handel-Verdi imagery of the opera-oratorio Oedipus rex, and then wrote for strings alone in Apollon musagète (1928), the last of his works to be presented by Dyagilev. All this while he was living in France, and Apollon, with its Lullian echoes, suggests an identification with French classicism which also marks the Duo concertant for violin and piano and the stage work on which he collaborated with Gide: Perséphone, a classical rite of spring. However, his Russianness remained deep. He orchestrated pieces by Tchaikovsky, now established as his chosen ancestor, to make the ballet Le baiser de la fée, and in 1926 he rejoined the Orthodox Church. The Symphony of Psalms was the first major work in which his ritual music engaged with the Christian tradition.

The other important works of the 1930s, apart from Perséphone, are all instrumental, and include the Violin Concerto, the Concerto for two pianos, the post-Brandenburg 'Dumbarton Oaks' Concerto and the Symphony in C, which disrupts diatonic normality on its home ground. It was during the composition of this work, in 1939, that Stravinsky moved to the USA, followed by Vera Sudeikina, whom he had loved since 1921 and who was to be his second wife (his first wife and his mother had both died earlier the same year). In 1940 they settled in Hollywood, which was henceforth their home. Various film projects ensued, though all foundered, perhaps inevitably: the Hollywood cinema of the period demanded grand continuity; Stravinsky's patterned discontinuities were much better suited to dancing. He had a more suitable collaborator in Balanchine, with whom he had worked since Apollon, and for whom in America he composed Orpheus and Agon. Meanwhile music intended for films went into orchestral pieces, including the Symphony in Three Movements (1945).

The later 1940s were devoted to The Rake's Progress, a parable using the conventions of Mozart's mature comedies and composed to a libretto by Auden and Kallman. Early in its composition, in 1948, Stravinsky met Robert Craft, who soon became a member of his household and whose enthusiasm for Schoenberg and Webern (as well as Stravinsky) probably helped make possible the gradual achievement of a highly personal serial style after The Rake. The process was completed in 1953 during the composition of the brilliant, tightly patterned Agon, though most of the serial works are religious or commemorative, being sacred cantatas (Canticum sacrum, Threni, Requiem Canticles) or elegies (In memoriam Dylan Thomas, Elegy for J. F. K.). All these were written after Stravinsky's 70th birthday, and he continued to compose into his mid-80s, also conducting concerts and making many gramophone records of his music. During this period, too, he and Craft published several volumes of conversations.

The Complete Stravinsky Edition

The Complete Edition, Volume 1 H
The Firebird^{a}. Scherzo à la russe^{a}. Scherzo fantastique^{b}. Fireworks^{a}. Petrushka^{a}. The Rite of Spring^{a}. Renard^{c}. L'histoire du soldat – Suite^{c}. Les noces^{d}
Mildred Allen sop Regina Sarfaty mez Loren Driscoll, George Shirley tens William Murphy bar Richard Oliver, Donald Gramm basses Toni Koves cimbalom Samuel Barber, Aaron Copland, Lukas Foss, Roger Sessions pfs ^{d}American Concert Choir; ^{d}Columbia Percussion Ensemble; ^{a}Columbia Symphony Orchestra; ^{b}CBC Symphony Orchestra; ^{c}Columbia Chamber Ensemble / Igor Stravinsky
Sony Classical ③ SM3K46291 (194 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1959-63 ●

This set contains virtually all the music from Stravinsky's 'Russian' period, including the three great ballets. It is fascinating to chart his development from the 1908 Scherzo fantastique with its orchestral colours scintillating in the best Rimsky-Korsakovian manner, to the wholly original language of Les noces with its almost exclusively metrical patterns and monochrome scoring (soloists, chorus, pianos and percussion) begun only six years later. The links are there: witness the Rimskian bumble-bee that flies through the Scherzo to find its winged counterpart two years on in The Firebird; and the primitive rhythmic force of Kastchei's 'Infernal dance' in The Firebird finding its fullest expression, another three years later, in The Rite of Spring; and so on. Each work is a logical, if time-lapse progression from the previous one. Like Les noces, the animal rites of the farmyard opera-cum-burlesque Renard (1916) and L'histoire du soldat (1918), a morality play designed for a small touring theatre company (the Suite included here omits the speaking roles) leave behind the lavish orchestra of The Rite for small and unusual instrumental and vocal combinations.

To have the composer at the helm, and a consistent approach to the way the music is recorded, ensures that those links are clearly established. The orchestra that takes the lion's share of the task, the Columbia Symphony, was assembled by CBS to include many of the finest players in America. One could criticise the recordings for close balances and spotlighting, but many modern contenders will more often than not deprive you of adequate articulation of the music's linear and rhythmic ingenuity. On the whole these recordings reproduce with good tone, range, openness and presence. As to Stravinsky the conductor, only Les noces finds him at less than his usual rhythmically incisive self. This Petrushka is more representative: it pulsates with inner life and vitality – incidentally, he uses his leaner, clearer 1947 revision, not the original 1911 score as the booklet claims.

The Complete Edition, Volume 2
Apollo^{a}. Agon^{b}. Jeu de cartes^{c}. Scènes de ballet^{d}. Bluebird – Pas de deux^{a}. Le baiser de la fée^{a}. Pulcinella^{a}. Orpheus^{e}
Irene Jordan sop George Shirley ten Donald Gramm bass ^{a}Columbia Symphony Orchestra; ^{b}Los Angeles Festival Symphony Orchestra; ^{c}Cleveland Orchestra; ^{d}CBC Symphony Orchestra; ^{e}Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Igor Stravinsky
Sony Classical ③ SM3K46292 (210 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1963-65

Volume 2 comprises ballets written between 1919 and 1957. Pulcinella was based on music originally thought to have been written by Pergolesi, but now known to be the work of various 18th-century composers. In 1919 Stravinsky had not long embraced neo-classical style, but here was a brilliant example of old wine in new bottles, with the melodies sounding as if they come from the pen of Stravinsky himself. The composer conducts a lively, sharply-accented account of the score. 1928 saw the production of two Stravinsky ballets. Apollo, a mainly quiet, contemplative score, written for string orchestra, has many passages of great beauty. Stravinsky the conductor does not linger over these but allows the work's cool classical elegance to speak for itself. In Le baiser de la fée Stravinsky used themes by Tchaikovsky as the basis for his score. Once again, the music seems quite transformed, and the result is a most captivating work. Stravinsky's watchful, affectionate performance is perfectly proportioned. His arrangement of the 'Pas de deux' from Tchaikovsky's Sleeping Beauty is no more than a reduction for small pit orchestra, however, and a mere curiosity. In Jeu de cartes, which dates from 1936, Stravinsky used music by Rossini and others, but here the references are only fleeting and merely enhance the humour of this robust, outgoing score. His performance brings out all the work's vigour and personality very effectively, but here and there rhythms become slightly unstuck, and a slightly hectic quality manifests itself.

Scènes de ballet was written in 1944 and possesses a slightly terse quality in the main, though there are some more lyrical passages. Stravinsky does nothing to soften the work's edges in his performance, and it emerges as a strong, highly impressive piece. Orpheus was completed in 1947 and shows Stravinsky's neo-classical style at its most highly developed. Much of the music is quiet, after the manner of Apollo, but then the orchestra suddenly erupts into a passage of quite savage violence. Stravinsky conducts this passage with amazing energy for a man in his eighties, and elsewhere his performance has characteristic clarity and a very direct means of expression typical of a composer performance.

Finally Agon, written in 1957, attracts the listener with its colourful opening fanfares and then pursues an increasingly complex serial path in such a brilliant and highly rhythmical fashion that one is hardly aware that the technique is being used. This work, brilliantly conducted by Stravinsky, is an ideal introduction to his late style and to the serial technique itself. Remastering has been carried out with the greatest skill, and all the recordings in this set sound very well indeed for their age.

The Complete Edition, Volume 4
Symphonies – No 1 in E flat[a]. Stravinsky in rehearsal.
Stravinsky in his own words. Symphony in Three Movements[b]. Symphony in C[c].
Symphony of Psalms[d]
Toronto Festival Singers; [ad]Columbia Symphony Orchestra; [b]Columbia Symphony Orchestra; [c]CBC Symphony Orchestra / Igor Stravinsky
Sony Classical ② SM2K46294 (143 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1961-66

The word 'symphony' appears in the title of each work on these two discs, but this term covers some very diverse material. Stravinsky was in his mid-twenties when he wrote his Symphony in E flat, and the score is very much in the style of his teacher Rimsky-Korsakov. It has genuine colour and flair, however, and the octogenarian conductor brings paternalistic affection and a good deal of vigour to his performance. The Symphony in C dates from 1940, when Stravinsky was in his neo-classical phase. The work has many beautiful pages, as well as much pungent wit. In this performance Stravinsky drives the music much harder than he did in his 1952 mono recording with the Cleveland Orchestra, and although there are some exciting moments the music does tend to lose its elements of grace and charm.

The performance of the Symphony in Three Movements is also characterised by the use of fastish tempos. But this violent work, written in 1945, and inspired by events in the Second World War, responds more readily to a strongly driven interpretation. Stravinsky wrote his Symphony of Psalms in 1930, and this composition reflects his deep religious convictions in varied settings from the Book of Psalms. His use of a chorus is interestingly combined with an orchestra which lacks upper strings. Stravinsky conducts a fervent, serious, beautifully balanced performance.

All the 1960s recordings in this set sound very well in their CD transfers. In some quarters the elderly Stravinsky has been wrongly portrayed as a frail, inadequate figure who only took over performances when works had been thoroughly rehearsed for him. Nothing could prove more clearly that this was not true than the rehearsal excerpts in this set, which show a vigorous, alert octogenarian very much in control, and rehearsing passages in some detail.

Violin Concerto

Stravinsky Violin Concerto in D
Bartók Violin Concerto No 2, Sz112
Viktoria Mullova vn
Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra / Esa-Pekka Salonen
Philips 456 542-2PH (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
(56 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997 ●

Mullova's Stravinsky concerto is a winner, with pert outer movements (the LAPO brass are alert but refreshingly unaggressive) and a ravishing account of the second 'Aria'. Tempos are well chosen, the sound is first-rate and this performance can be ranked higher than any digital rival.

As for the Bartók, this is also as strong a contender as any for a top rating. Mullova's playing, as for the Stravinsky, is committed and intense, with a ripe tone and some filagree passagework in the second-movement variations, where Salonen is careful to clarify every bejewelled strand in Bartók's scoring. The finale is also clearly focused, but the big surprise comes with the inclusion – or rather, the substitution – of Bartók's rarely heard original ending, where the soloist retires and the orchestra alone shoulders the coda.

Instrumental staging is startlingly immediate, the sound stage is very well defined and the bottom end of the spectrum has enormous power, the bass drum especially. The disc comes thoroughly recommended.

Agon

Stravinsky Circus Polka. Ode. Scherzo à la Russe.
Scènes de ballet. Concertino. Agon.
Greeting Prelude 'Happy Birthday to You'.
Canon on a Russian Popular Tune.
Variations 'Aldous Huxley in memoriam'
Stafford Smith/Key (arr Stravinsky)
The Star-Spangled Banner
London Symphony Orchestra / Michael Tilson Thomas
RCA Red Seal 09026 68865-2 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●

This CD has been absorbingly programmed to chart the progress from Stravinsky's early years in America, awkwardly coming to terms with a new language, a new and rather harsh economic climate and a musical public that welcomed him warmly enough but was at the same time welcoming scores of other refugee musicians. Acutely conscious of money and the absence of it, he attempted in vain to obtain film music commissions from Hollywood and tried to write pop songs and to make money in the relatively prosperous world of jazz. But the Scherzo à la Russe, originally for jazz band (played here in its orchestral version), sounds like a rejected movement from Petrushka. Rather more shrewdly he wrote the Scènes de ballet for a Broadway revue and was rewarded with a respectable run of performances. The Concertino, written for string quartet long before Stravinsky's arrival in America, arranged there for a chamber orchestra of 12 instruments, is a neat demonstration of how much of his late style was already present in his earlier work. The proto-serial Agon and the super-serial Variations both represent Stravinsky's relief and sheer exuberance, not so much at finding serialism as at realising that he had been writing quasi-serially all his life and that he could exploit its techniques while remaining himself.

What makes this hugely entertaining as well as instructive is the infectious zest of the performances. The enjoyable racket of the Circus Polka, the gorgeous trumpet tune in Scènes de ballet, the delight in inventing entrancing new sonorities that is central to Agon, the more arcane but none the less obvious pleasure in the Aldous Huxley Variations of constructing perfect, crystalline mechanisms – all these are conveyed with exemplary precision. The recordings are brilliant.

Apollon musagète

Apollon musagète (1947 version). [a]The Rite of Spring. The Firebird – Suite. Jeu de cartes. Petrushka.
Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra, [a]Cleveland Orchestra / Riccardo Chailly
Double Decca ② 473 731-2DF2 Ⓜ
(149 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993-2002 ●●

This is a great little set, coupling a ravishing Apollon musagète with a truly stunning Rite of Spring. The Petrushka is equally fine – see reviews of both included below.

The fact that Stravinsky's revision of Apollon dispensed with 'half the woodwind, two of the three harps, glockenspiel and celesta from the original scoring' (to quote the excellent insert-note) hardly constitutes the bleaching process that a less colour-sensitive performance might have allowed. Part of the effect is due to a remarkably fine recording where clarity and tonal bloom are complementary, but Chailly must take the credit for laying all Stravinsky's cards on the table rather than holding this or that detail to his chest.

Everything tells, much as it does in the Scherzo fantastique – whether the euphonious winds and brass at 3'52", the motorised repeated notes later on or the ornamental swirlings that, in stylistic terms, dance us all the way from Rimsky's Arabian Nights to the unmistakably Russian world of The Firebird.

Apollon musagète is of course something else again, and Chailly takes the lyrical line, pointing without punching and allowing his excellent strings their head. The coda is jaunty, the 'Apothéose' suitably mysterious, and 'Variation d'Apollon' features fine solo work from the orchestra's leader, Jaap van Zweden. Viable alternatives include leaner, more ascetic readings, but Chailly balances gracefulness with tonal substance and the sound is glorious.

Le baiser de la fée

Le baiser de la fée.
Faun and Shepherdess, Op 2. Ode
Lucy Shelton sop Cleveland Orchestra / Oliver Knussen
DG 449 205-2GH (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1995-96 ●●

Oliver Knussen offers us the best-played, best-recorded and most sensitively interpreted account of Le baiser de la fée that we have had so far on CD, with meticulous attention to Stravinsky's dynamic markings and delicate instrumental pointing. Stravinsky's subtle Tchaikovsky orchestrations (the musical 'grid' of Le baiser) inspire a reading that exhibits delicate sensibilities and quick reflexes, and Knussen's fill-ups respond equally well to those same qualities. The mildly erotic Faun and Shepherdess is seductively played, with soprano Lucy Shelton sounding agile and vocally appealing. The tripartite Ode is a quietly eventful memorial for Natalie Koussevitzky. Even Stravinsky's own 1965 Columbia Symphony Orchestra recording, although full of lovely things and of great historical interest, is outclassed here.

Le baiser de la fée[a]. Symphony in C[b]. Pulcinella[c]. H
L'histoire du soldat – Suite[d]. Octet[e]
[c]Mary Simmons mez [c]Glenn Schnittke ten [c]Philip MacGregor bass [abc]Cleveland Orchestra, [de]Chamber Ensemble / Igor Stravinsky
Sony Classical Masterworks Heritage mono ②
MH2K63325 (155 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1952-55 ●

This two-CD set calls itself 'The Mono Years 1952-55' to distinguish the recordings from those Stravinsky made in the following decade, of the same repertoire – in stereo – gathered together by Sony Classical for its 22-disc Stravinsky Edition and subsequent reissues. The four orchestral works here benefit from a refinement of tone and elegance of manner not equalled by the Columbia and CBC Symphony Orchestras in the stereo remakes. To be fair, the more closely miked strings and woodwinds of the stereo recordings, though undeniably vivid, and occasionally better at profiling leading thematic lines, could be unkind to string tone. And given the effortlessness with which many orchestras nowadays handle the difficulties of a Stravinsky score, it must be said that not everything in these Cleveland sessions speaks with the poetry of precision. Here or there in Cleveland, you will find slightly faster or slower tempos, some of the slower ones allowing more expressive shaping of song (Le baiser de la fée) or clearer exposition of intricate ingenuity (the first movement of the Symphony in C). There is a graceless (even grotesque) plod for the fiancée's short solo variation in the Baiser de la fée 'Pas de deux' (track 6), but the more flowing tempo for the ballet's haunting final 'Berceuse' is a definite plus; as are the chamber items, recorded with the cream of New York's players, and sounding like Stravinsky's happiest studio sessions. Quite apart from the expertise of the playing, the pleasure these musicians took in two of Stravinsky's wittiest scores is communicated so vividly that one completely forgets the source is mono.

Le chant du rossignol

Le chant du rossignol. Scherzo fantastique, Op 3. L'histoire du soldat – Suite. King of the Stars[a].
Cleveland Orchestra and [a]Chorus / Pierre Boulez
DG 471 197-2GH (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included
Recorded 1994 and 1996 ●

It is Le chant du rossignol which is this disc's finest achievement. This work has long been a Boulez favourite and the performance has all Boulez's intellectual discernment when it comes to balancing textures and juxtaposing tone colours, but it also provides an enthralling journey through the weird rituals of an exotic expressive world that Boulez himself reinvented as a composer in the decade after 1945. Here, as throughout, the DG sound has ideal transparency and a natural depth of perspective.

The Soldier's Tale suite shuns the easy, nudging underlining of sardonic wit and garish instrumental colour. There is usually more than a hint of poker-faced underplaying in any Boulez interpretation, given his wholehearted commitment to the modernist project. Is the 'Petit concert' dangerously smooth, the 'Grand choral' disconcertingly sober? Such qualities make perfect sense in a reading which has plenty of character, as well as an instrumental virtuosity that avoids vulgarity yet is never excessively smooth.

Le chant du rossignol puts the two earlier pieces into the shade. Scherzo fantastique is an accomplished apprentice effort, played with a winning blend of buoyant rhythm and shapely melody. King of the Stars now sounds like an uneasy cross between old and new, aspiring to a radicalism for which Stravinsky had yet to find a convincing voice. It would fit better into a programme of his later religious and choral works, but its presence here does not seriously dilute the impact of a disc that shows Boulez – along with the Cleveland musicians and the DG engineers – at their formidable best.

Danses concertantes

Danses concertantes. Orpheus
Orpheus Chamber Orchestra
DG 459 644-2GH (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995-96 ●

As recorded 'blueprints' of these neo-classical ballet scores, the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra's conductorless performances are more accomplished than the composer's own. Stravinsky the conductor rarely enjoyed this degree of evenly matched and 'finished' instrumental tone and apparently effortless accuracy of pitch and ensemble – qualities which, along with a compact sonic presentation respecting the different intensities of each instrument, expose a hitherto unattained degree of detail. There is poetry in all this precision too; a precision of character that emerges as a result of so much properly achieved and from an abundance of imaginative phrasing and nuances of rhythm from players at one with each other and at one with the idiom; for example, the delicacy, tenderness and 'controlled freedom' of the exchanges in the opening 'Theme' of the central movement of Danses concertantes, or the wonderfully skittish flute incursions in its succeeding 'Pas de deux'.

The acoustic of the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra's regular recording haunt, the Recital Hall at New York State University's Performing Arts Center in Purchase, is ideally matched to the scale and intention of these performances and presumably allows these conductorless players to interact as the most subtly responsive of chamber groups. Perhaps the acoustic's compactness does bring a little 'tightening' of tone above mezzo-forte in the Danses concertantes, but this is not troublesome. Strongly recommended.

The Firebird

The Firebird – Suite (1945). Jeu de cartes
Granada City Orchestra / Josep Pons
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1728 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

Stravinsky does not specify the number of strings to be used for the 1945 Firebird suite, but the wind forces are exactly the same as in Jeu de cartes, where he asks for strings in the proportion 12, 10, 8, 6, 6. The Granada City Orchestra provide 11, 10, 7, 6, 4, which seems a better balance. In Firebird, Pons and his players quite convince you that we are missing something when it is played by a full-size symphony orchestra. Real quiet and delicacy of detail are easier for a 'large chamber' group, especially when the conductor seems to be urging them to play like chamber musicians, listening intently to each other and giving real character to solo passages. Solo strings are allowed portamento from time to time, and one reason why Pons chose a magically slow speed for the outset of the finale was surely that he knew his first horn would sound wonderful at that tempo. Speeds are often a touch on the slow side, not to make life easier for the players but because they and their conductor have obviously enjoyed working on subtle phrasings and rubato. Yet they can play fast too and with a big tone without congestion. But above all one is reminded how full this score is of quiet, delicate colour.

There are some slowish tempos in Jeu de cartes too, but not at the expense of crispness of detail and lightness of touch. No, this is not a coupling in which you marvel that the Granada City Orchestra can put up a respectable showing, but one in which you salute with respect an ensemble of pronounced character and a conductor who understands that moderately small can be very beautiful.

Stravinsky The Firebird (Original version 1910). Symphonies of Wind Instruments
London Symphony Orchestra / Kent Nagano
Virgin Classics The Classics 561848-2 Ⓑ
(59 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1991-92 ●●

The reissue of Kent Nagano's vividly detailed new LSO recording of the original Stravinsky Firebird score must go right to the top of the recommended list. From the very opening the clearly delineated kaleidoscope of orchestral colour reminds one of Dorati's famous Mercury recording, but the new Virgin sound balance produced by Andrew Keener is even finer, slightly softer-grained, richer, but with hardly less impact. At the opening, the playing generates slightly less tension than with Dorati, but the concentration steadily increases, the orchestral colour glows radiantly, and the big set pieces – the spectacular 'Danse infernale' of Kashchei, the lovely 'Princesses' Round Dance' and the 'Berceuse' – are all superbly played. The final climax expands gloriously. Nagano also uses the original 1920 score of the Symphonies of Wind Instruments and the result is ear-tickling in the best sense, with sonorities juxtaposed most skilfully, textures keenly balanced, and a well-maintained onward flow.

The Firebird. The Rite of Spring. Perséphone
Stephanie Cosserat narr Stuart Neill ten Ragazzi, The Peninsula Boys Chorus; San Francisco Girl's Chorus; San Francisco Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Michael Tilson Thomas
RCA Red Seal (special price) ③ 09026 68898-2 Ⓕ
(119 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included
Recorded live in 1996-98 ●

On the face of it, an odd compilation. Why issue one of Stravinsky's least-known ballets in harness with two of his most popular? The answer lies partly in Perséphone's revisiting, 20 years on, of the theme of The Rite (earth and rebirth) with Homer's Greece replacing pagan Russia in a neo-classical piece described by Elliott Carter as 'a humanist Rite of Spring'. Rather more difficult to explain is the presence of The Firebird (the complete 1910 score plus a piano), but a performance as good as this is its own justification. And if three discs – avoiding a mid-ballet disc change – appears extravagant, RCA obligingly prices them as two. We have no idea how much post-concert 'patching' there was after the two live recordings (The Firebird and The Rite), but the playing is superbly 'finished'. Possibly, the ballet's ending was better on that particular night than any of the others; certainly, Tilson Thomas's timing and shading of the last minutes' darkness-to-light is spellbinding, the management of the crescendo on the final chord, even more so. Perfumes are distinctly French, with the Firebird's 'supplication' as seductive as any on disc. The general exuberance of the playing in The Rite might also be thought French, though the virtuoso delivery and flamboyance are recognisably American. It isn't a Rite that investigates the score's radicalism; rather it is one to send you home from the concert hall exhilarated.

You would be lucky to catch Perséphone in the concert hall. Rather baffling given the quality of a piece which shares with Oedipus Rex an inspired blend of distancing and direct appeal, and with Apollo and Orpheus, an archaic beauty and limpidity. The singers rise to that challenge (and others) with superb choral work. Stravinsky called Perséphone a 'melodrama', referring to the spoken title-role. And as Persephone is Spring, RCA has cast an aptly youthful-sounding actress in the part, very good at eagerness, passion and compassion. It may be that the voice is too young for gravitas; it may equally be that, as recorded there was no need to project in the same way, and stage projection might have helped create an element of gravitas. It is a small point, and her relative immediacy is always appealing. In all other respects, RCA's balance can't be criticised.

L'histoire du soldat

L'histoire du soldat (in English)ᵃ. Concerto in E flat, 'Dumbarton Oaks' ᵃDavid Timson, ᵃBenjamin Soames, ᵃJonathan Keeble spkrs Northern Chamber Orchestra / Nicholas Ward
Naxos 8 553662 (76 minutes: DDD). Ⓢ
Recorded 1995-96

In this full-length The Soldier's Tale (the English translation by Michael Flanders and Kitty Black), the actors have the full measure of their parts, and the musicians, taken as a group, about two-thirds the measure of theirs. The notes are there, but not always the will to make something of them. Perhaps one shouldn't expect violin- and trumpet-playing of the flair and feature of Manoug Parikian and Maurice André in the classic 1962 Markevitch recording (now part of a two-disc set on Philips, and spoken in the original French). On the other hand Nicholas Cox's always fully responsive clarinet-playing on the Naxos recording is a vast improvement on Markevitch's narrow-toned and quavery clarinettist. If Nicholas Cox seems to do a little better out of the Naxos balance than some of his musical colleagues, it is probably because of his more consistent projection of character.

In general, it is a very natural balance that welds the years and miles between the separately recorded actors and musicians into a reasonably convincing illusion of a single-stage whole (with the actors placed in front of the musicians), though it is less convincing than the Markevitch, where the same acoustic was used by both actors and musicians (and where Jean Cocteau's narrator can become almost submerged). The generous bonus here is Stravinsky's modernised 'Brandenburg Concerto', Dumbarton Oaks, marginally more presently recorded than the musical contributions to the main work, but with the same mixture of determination to put it across (a wonderful strutting marcato at the start of the finale) and lapses into a competent neutral. So, should you be interested at the price? If you only know The Soldier's Tale through the Concert Suite (most of the music; none of the words), and can sample before purchasing this complete recording, try two 'low points' – the very opening ('The soldier's march'), and the close ('The devil's triumphal dance') – and if the proceedings don't strike you as tame and lacking vitality, this could be a very rewarding use of a fiver.

Petrushka

Petrushka. The Firebird – Suite.
Scherzo à la Russe
Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra / Paavo Järvi
Telarc CD80587 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ⦿

Paavo Järvi's Telarc coupling of Petrushka and The Firebird Suite is outstanding in every way, and Petrushka is so arresting that this reviewer immediately turned for a comparison to the famous pioneering Ansermet account. It should be noted that Ansermet uses the original 1911 score, and Järvi the 1947 version (which, some suggest, Stravinsky wrote not because he was dissatisfied with the original, but because he wanted to secure the performance royalties!).

Switching between the two accounts, the surprise is the closeness of the two interpretations, with Ansermet pressing forward at one moment, Järvi the next, each relishing every detail of Stravinsky's sparkling orchestral palette, yet each completely individual. The more natural concert hall-balance in the superb acoustics of Cincinnati's Music Hall, adds ambient warmth and atmosphere, giving a translucent glow to the woodwind (yet still achieving wonderful detail), a rich patina to the strings, and filling out the brass sonorities without loss of bite. The important piano roulades, too, brilliantly played by Michael Chertock, glitter irridescently. Järvi's reading certainly does not lack histrionic qualities, yet it has added pathos, particularly the scene in the Moor's Room, and at the very end of the ballet. With Ansermet, Petrushka's ghost reappears fiercely, even demonically; Järvi chooses a distanced effect and creates a haunting atmosphere of desolate melancholy.

The Firebird Suite is equally memorable. Again the wonderful Rimskyan colouring is conveyed in lusciously translucent detail, but the spectacular entry of Kashchei will surely make you jump, and the finale expands gloriously. Jack Renner, Telarc's outstanding chief recording engineer, produces the best bass drum in the business, and those thwacks as Järvi builds his final climax are riveting, as is the amplitude of the overall sound.

So this CD not only offers truly memorable performances, splendidly played, but demonstration sound that audiophiles will surely relish.

Petrushka (1947 version). Pulcinella
Peter Donohoe pf City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle 💰
HMV Classics HMV5 73551-2 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1986 ⦿

Rattle's performance of Petrushka is most notable for its fresh look at details of scoring and balance, with pianist Peter Donohoe making a strong impression. The results are robust and persuasive, though one sometimes has the impression that the characters are being left to fend for themselves. The atmospheric sound with its generous middle and bass is certainly very natural. The symphony, too, is eminently recommendable, sounding more high-spirited than it sometimes has, with Rattle particularly relishing the jazzy bits.

Petrushka. Apollon musagète (1947 version). ^{a}The Rite of Spring. The Firebird – Suite. Jeu de cartes
Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra, ^{a}Cleveland Orchestra / Riccardo Chailly
Double Decca ② 473 731-2DF2 Ⓜ
(149 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993-2002 ⦿⦿

In Petrushka Chailly has his players characterise even the smallest detail. Note the tongue-in-cheek lead-in to the 'Russian Dance' and the carefree 'squeeze-box' character of the dance itself (with dynamic crossfire between wind and brass and some excellent piano playing). 'Petrushka' (second tableau) is played con amore, with much humanity and not entirely without malice: perhaps the anger and frustration aren't as blatant as they might be; but the pain and humiliation certainly are. It's a performance that breathes, that sings and neither rushes its fences nor loses sight of the score's very specific rhythmic profile. As for the recording, given top-ranking engineers – who could rightly expect anything less than exceptional?

The couplings, too, are equally fine (see Apollon musagète entry above).

Pulcinella

Pulcinella[c]. Danses concertantes[a]. Petrushka[b]. The Rite of Spring[d]. Two Suites[e]
[c]Yvonne Kenny sop [c]Robert Tear ten
[c]Robert Lloyd bass [ce]Academy of St Martin in the Fields; [a]Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra / Sir Neville Marriner; [bd]Philadelphia Orchestra / Riccardo Muti
EMI Double Forte ② 574305-2 Ⓜ
(136 minutes: DDD/ADD). Recorded 1968-1982

A very reliable coupling for anyone wanting these six pieces. Marriner's Pulcinella is a joy from first bar to last; how the players enjoy the quirkiness of Stravinsky's scoring, and you can almost see jaws dropping as Robert Tear, in the second movement, does precisely what the score asks and sustains a held B flat for 13 seconds. The wit of the two Suites has a deliciously light touch and the good humour as well as the balletic grace of Danses concertantes are finely caught. Muti's Rite of Spring provokes one or two slight reservations (he over-marks dynamics quite often and his 'Sacrificial Dance' is impressively efficient rather than terrifying or exciting), but the playing is superb – an extraordinarily virtuosic 'Games of the Rival Tribes' – and detail is crystal-clear.

No quibbles about the slightly later Petrushka, which is vividly coloured and characterised. All the remasterings sound very well indeed.

The Rite of Spring

Stravinsky The Rite of Spring
Scriabin Le poème de l'extase
Kirov Orchestra / Valery Gergiev Ⓕ
Philips Classics 468 035-2PH (55 minutes: DDD) ●●

Probably the most extraordinary Rite of Spring to have been dreamt up since Stravinsky's own final (and finest) 1960 recording. Stravinsky himself said, in so many words, that The Rite was born from his unconscious. And although now is not the time or place to ponder to what extent his – and our – unconscious minds are capable (if at all) of harbouring any memories of pre-Christian ritual, suffice it so say that an exceptional performance of The Rite should at least have us thinking about it as a possibility…and about why we respond to The Rite in the way that we do.

Among modern interpreters, there isn't anyone better than Gergiev at the important dual roles of showman and shaman. So many of the score's darker workings have a striking profile here – tubas bellowing strange moans, the bass drum sending shock waves around the performance space, the lower strings in 'Spring Rounds' almost 'exhaling' their notes, and, for once, giving a proper foundation to that most significant of quiet chords – the one where the Sage kisses the earth. Indeed, 'Earth' and the 'elemental' seem not so much cultivated in this performance, as an inherent part of it.

Either Gergiev has really pondered the 'sound stuff' of the Rite, or it just comes naturally to him and his players. Though whether nature or nurture, the end results make for a marginally more compelling overall listen than all the finest recorded *Rite*s of the last four decades. More controversial is some of the timing of 'events', especially the delay of the ascent to the final chord, though when it arrives, you wonder if its shocking make-up has ever been as effectively exposed. The delaying tactics – theatrical pauses and suspensions – proved a little more problematic in the second half of Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy – along with Gergiev's extremes of tempo in the piece. But should one even be thinking these thoughts when offered a Poem which openly embraces the extravagant wonders of the piece as this one does?Better to marvel at all the mysterious curves, the fabulous dark rushes of sound, the celebratory splendours, and the final resolution (dissolution?) into an uncomplicated glory of C major. Here, as in The Rite, the recording is superb.

The Rite of Spring (two versions) 🄷
Philharmonia Orchestra / Igor Markevitch
Testament mono/stereo SBT1076 (67 minutes: ADD)
Mono version recorded 1951, stereo 1959 Ⓕ ●●

Markevitch's 1959 stereo Rite is in a league of its own. This is a model of how to balance the score (and of how to create the illusion of a wide dynamic range within more restricted parameters). Markevitch would have been totally familiar with every note of the piece (in 1949 he sent Stravinsky a list of mistakes he had noticed in the recently revised edition), and by 1959 he clearly knew what it needed in performance, including how to keep its shock-value alive. There are 'improprieties' here, such as the slowing for the 'Evocation of the Ancestors' (making the most of those timpani volleys), but nothing serious. As it happens, Markevitch's 'Introduction' to Part 2 is unusually fast, but he is able to take in the following small marked variations of tempo, providing valuable contrasts. And in any case, the playing is so alive, alert and reactive, whatever the dynamic levels: listen to the incisive clarinets' entry in the 'Mystic Circles' and the frisson imparted to the following pianissimo tremolando from the strings (track 4 after 4'06").

We could fill the rest of the page with similar highlights and other features unique to the performance, but that would be to spoil the fun of discovery (or rediscovery – and what a transfer of the original!). This is a great Rite for lots of reasons, not the least of which is that the sessions were obviously electric. As a fascinating bonus, Testament also offers a 1951 mono recording of a great Rite in the making. The differences are not radical, but enough to justify the idea.

The Rite of Spring[a]. Apollon musagète[b]
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 749636-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded [a]1987 and [b]1988 ●●

Recordings of The Rite of Spring are legion, but it is rare to find Stravinsky's most explosive ballet score coupled with Apollon musagète, his most serene. The result is a lesson in creative versatility, confirming that Stravinsky could be equally convincing as expressionist and neoclassicist. Yet talk of lessons might suggest that sheer enjoyment is of lesser importance, and it is perfectly possible to relish this disc simply for that personal blend of the authoritative and the enlivening that Simon Rattle's CBSO recordings for EMI so consistently achieve. Rattle never rushes things, and the apparent deliberation of The Rite's concluding 'Sacrificial Dance' may initially surprise, but in this context it proves an entirely appropriate, absolutely convincing conclusion. Rattle sees the work as a whole, without striving for a spurious symphonic integration, and there is never for a moment any hint of a routine reading of what is by now a classic of the modern orchestral repertoire.

The account of Apollon has comparable depth, with elegance transformed into eloquence and the CBSO strings confirming that they have nothing to fear from comparison with the best in Europe or America. The recordings are faithful to the intensity and expressiveness of Rattle's Stravinsky, interpretations fit to set beside those of the composer himself.

Additional recommendation
Rite of Spring
Couplings: Debussy La mer Boulez Notations VII
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Barenboim
Teldec 8573-81702-2 (69 minutes: DDD: recorded 2001) Ⓕ ●

> Gergiev's reading may be too theatrical for some, while Barenboim's is a formidable but never mechanical Rite. Coupled with a truly superb La mer – the emotional force and intellectual grasp of his reading puts it on a par with Karajan's.

Les noces

Les noces[a]. Mass[b]
Anny Mory sop Patricia Parker mez John Mitchinson ten Paul Hudson bass English Bach Festival Chorus; Trinity Boys' Choir; Martha Argerich, Krystian Zimerman, Cyprien Katsaris, Homero Francesch pfs [a]English Bach Festival Percussion Ensemble; [b]members of the English Bach Festival Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG 20th Century Classics 423 251-2GC Ⓜ
(44 minutes: ADD). Texts and translations included ●

Les noces
Traditional Russian Village Wedding Songs Play, Skomoroshek. River. Trumpet. Cosmas and Demian. The Drinker. Green Forest. God bless, Jesus. My White Peas. Steambath. Berry. Black Beaver. In the House. Bunny with Short Legs. The Bed. Birch Tree
Pokrovsky Ensemble / Dmitri Pokrovsky
Nonesuch 7559-79335-2 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
English texts included

Many readers will probably look askance at the short timing here? However, never mind the width, feel the quality – these are top-drawer Bernstein performances, excellently recorded. Les noces sports an impressive array of pianists; but that need not be a decisive factor, since rhythmic precision and good balance are far more at a premium than individual flair or power – fortunately these individuals are equally fine ensemble players. It is even more important that the choir should be meticulously prepared (which they are), that the vocal soloists should be precise and full-blooded (which they are) and that the conductor should impart a sense of the profundity of the whole conception (which Bernstein emphatically does). The Mass is an ideal coupling for Les noces, not just because of the shared importance of the chorus, but because it, too, displays a fundamental ritual experience, in this case the sacrament of worship rather than marriage, with archetypal clarity. Bernstein's reading has all the calm devotion of the composer's own, even if the soloists are rather variable. Highly recommended.

For the Nonesuch recording Dmitri Pokrovsky and the singers in his ensemble travelled to southern and western Russia in search of melodies and texts related to Les noces; and they found rich pickings. True, the melodic similarities are not as tangible as the folk sources for Petrushka but the 15 songs, here recorded with immense flair and enjoyment to a variety of instrumental accompaniments, will be a revelation to all listeners. Be prepared for some acerbic sounds. Authentic Russian folk polyphony is an extraordinarily modern-sounding experience, as is authentic open-throated singing. The value of the disc is multiplied by the fact that the singers have carried over the style and expressive content of the folksongs into their performance of Les noces itself, bringing it to life in a way that must surely be unprecedented and uniquely illuminating. Not only that, but Pokrovsky had the inspired idea of recreating the instrumental parts on an Apple Macintosh computer, thus continuing Stravinsky's search for the ideal mechanical realisation.

Oedipus Rex

Oedipus Rex. Symphony of Psalms 🄷
Ivo Zídek ten Oedipus; Věra Soukupová mez

Jocasta; Karel Berman bass Créon; Eduard Haken bass Tiresias; Antonin Zlesák ten Shepherd; Zdeněk Kroupa bar Messenger; Jean Desailly narr Czech Philharmonic Chorus and Orchestra / Karel Ančerl
Supraphon Historical SU3674-2 (73 minutes: AAD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1964-66 ●●

Oedipus Rex is one of Stravinsky's most compelling theatre pieces, a powerful drama that re-enacts the full force of a glorious highspot in ancient culture. The text is by Jean Cocteau, who once said, pertaining to his work on Oedipus, that 'any serious work, be it of poetry or music, of theatre or of film, demands a ceremonial, lengthy calculation, an architecture in which the slightest mistake would unbalance the pyramid' (quoted from Diary of an Unknown, pub. Paragon House). The fusion of words and music in Oedipus, indeed its very 'architecture', is masterly and arrests the attention consistently, from the animated severity of the opening narration, through the calculated tension of its musical argument, to the tragic restraint of its closing pages.

Karel Ančerl was one of Stravinsky's most committed exponents. This particular recording of Oedipus Rex was taped in the Dvořák Hall of the House of Artists, Prague, and earned itself at least three major awards. Ančerl traces and intensifies salient points in the tragedy yet maintains a precise, sensitive touch; his vocal collaborators include the noble Karel Berman (Créon) who, like Ančerl himself, suffered considerably during the Nazi occupation of Czechoslovakia; then there's a fine Jocasta in Věra Soukupová and the convincing but occasionally unsteady Ivo Zídek singing the part of Oedipus. Both here and in the Symphony of Psalms – one of the most serenely perceptive recorded performances of the work – the Czech Philharmonic Chorus excel, while Supraphon's 1960s engineering (not the DDD suggested on the box) has an appealing brightness.

Symphony of Psalms

Symphony of Psalms[a]. Les noces[b].
Threni: The Lamentations of Jeremiah[c]
[b]Alison Wells, [c]Julie Moffat sops [b]Susan Bickley, [c]Jennifer Lane mezs [bc]Martyn Hill, [c]Joseph Cornwell tens [b]Alan Ewing, [c]David Wilson-Johnson, [c]Martin Robson basses [a]Simon Joly Chorale; [b]International Piano Quartet (Elizabeth Bergmann, Marcel Bergmann, Jeroen Van Veen, Maarten Van Veen pfs); [b]Tristan Fry Percussion Ensemble; [a]Philharmonia Orchestra / [abc]Robert Craft
Koch International Classics Ⓕ KICCD7514 (75 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included.
Recorded c2001 ●

Craft meticulously observes the markings in the Symphony of Psalms, and invariably makes sense of them. On a spot check of six or seven performances he gets closer than any other conductor (closer than Stravinsky himself) to what the score specifies for those abrupt rappings from horns and bassoons that begin the fast section of the finale: staccato but piano, only the first of each group carrying an accent and a sforzato. There are more fervent accounts of this score – in particular Bernstein's (Sony, though alas nla) – but few that demonstrate how precise Stravinsky's ear was. And Craft's own is ideally alert.

In this hugely enjoyable account of Les noces the singers are all British but they have obviously worked very hard on sounding as authentically, full-voicedly Russian as possible. It is hard to believe that Alan Ewing is not dressed in priestly robes (with a flask of vodka concealed beneath his cassock) and that Alison Wells is not a Russian bride in a ceremonial costume rigid with embroidery. This remarkably Slavonic sound points up both the joyful exuberance of the piece and its sense of ancient ritual; its rhythmic life never for one moment sags, and the ending is magical and moving.

Threni is no less welcome; as Robert Craft says in his notes it is 'little known after almost 50 years' though it is 'among Stravinsky's greatest works'. With its leaping, atonal vocal lines, however, it is also one of his most difficult, and yet no allowances need be made here: it is beautifully sung. The choral singing is very fine, the soloists sound absolutely secure, and Martyn Hill in particular makes his awkward intervals sound perfectly idiomatic.

In short, a superbly authentic set.

The Nightingale

The Nightingale. Renard[a]
Natalie Dessay sop Nightingale; [a]Vsevolod Grivnov ten Fisherman; Marie McLaughlin sop Cook; [a]Laurent Naouri bass Chamberlain; Albert Schagidullin bar Emperor; [a]Maxim Mikhailov bass Bonze; Violeta Urmana mez Death; Olivier Berg ten Wassyl Slipak ten Grzegorz Staskiewicz bass Japanese Envoys; [a]Ian Caley ten
Paris National Opera Chorus and Orchestra / James Conlon
EMI 556874-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translations included
Recorded 1999 ●

The Nightingale is an awkward piece, begun before The Firebird but finished, unwillingly, only after Stravinsky had decisively changed his own direction and that of Western music with The Rite of Spring. He tried to hide the join, he said, but it sticks out like a sore thumb, and one great quality of Conlon's performance is that if anything he emphasises the miniature opera's straddling of two expressive worlds. In the beautiful Prelude he makes it quite clear that even pre-Firebird Stravinsky already owed almost as much to Debussy as to Rimsky-Korsakov, and with the arrival of the exceptionally beautiful tenor voice of Vsevolod Grivnov as the Fisherman you strongly suspect that this is the recording The Nightingale has been waiting for.

Natalie Dessay is lovely in the title-role: no mere twittering air-head coloratura but touchingly expressive in her two songs (a pity, though, that she is placed so close to the microphone: the score says she should be in the orchestra pit, not on stage). But then Act 2 arrives, at its outset sounding, as Stravinsky said, like the newly installed St Petersburg telephones shrilling, and Conlon is no less responsive to the dissonances and the abrupt motif-juggling of Stravinsky's post-Rite manner. In the music of the Japanese envoys, even, a link between Orthodox chant and the austere rituals of Stravinsky's very late works is obvious. The rest of the cast is fully up to Dessay's and Grivnov's standard; Marie McLaughlin's Russian diction being particularly commendable.

Though entertaining, Renard is, alas, not quite so successful. Grivnov is part of the problem: he just sings beautifully, seemingly unaware of the music's low humour and peasant pungency, but even Conlon doesn't match the composer's own robust vividness. Renard, however, is the fill-up, 17 minutes out of 63, and The Nightingale is pleasure unalloyed.

The Rake's Progress

Jerry Hadley ten Tom Rakewell; Dawn Upshaw sop Anne; Samuel Ramey bass Nick Shadow; Grace Bumbry mez Baba the Turk; Steven Cole ten Sellem; Anne Collins contr Mother Goose; Robert Lloyd bass Trulove; Roderick Earle bass Keeper; Chorus and Orchestra of Opéra de Lyon / Kent Nagano

Erato ② 0630-12715-2 (138 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Recorded 1995 ●

Any number of the world's opera houses would have given their eye teeth for the privilege of presenting the première of Stravinsky's only true opera, but he, intensely money-conscious though he was (and he had worked on the piece for three years without a commission fee), insisted on La Fenice in Venice – because he was fond of the city, of course, but also because The Rake's Progress is a chamber opera. And this is a chamber performance of it, with a fairly small orchestra, much singing of almost parlando quality and crystal-clear words. It is also intimate, with a strong sense of the stage, of characters reacting to each other. With Nagano's on the whole brisk tempos, it gives the impression of a real performance, and a gripping one. Upshaw's is not the purest soprano voice to have attempted the role of Anne, and there have been more spectacular high Cs than hers, but she is movingly vulnerable, totally believable.

So is Hadley, acting at times almost too vividly for the music's line: as he occasionally demonstrates he has a wonderfully beautiful head voice. He is not, therefore, quite the touchingly likeable 'shuttle-headed lad' that Alexander Young portrayed so unforgettably in the composer's own recording, but no other Tom Rakewell surpasses him. Ramey's is a bigger voice than most of the others here – firm and superbly produced. Collins and Lloyd are both first-class as Mother Goose and Trulove, Cole an unusually light-voiced, confidingly conspiratorial Sellem. If any, Bumbry is the disappointment of the cast, somewhat overloud and baritonal almost throughout, but the French chorus sing nimbly and in admirable English. Stravinsky's own recording is still to be cherished, but of modern recordings of The Rake's Progress this is a hugely, if not the most, enjoyable one.

The Rake's Progress

Ian Bostridge ten Tom Rakewell; Deborah York sop Anne; Bryn Terfel bass-bar Nick Shadow; Anne Sofie von Otter mez Baba the Turk; Peter Bronder ten Sellem; Anne Howells mez Mother Goose; Martin Robson bass Trulove; Julian Clarkson bass Keeper of the Madhouse; Monteverdi Choir; London Symphony Orchestra / Sir John Eliot Gardiner

DG ② 459 648-2GH2 (134 minutes: DDD Ⓕ

Notes, text and translation included

Recorded 1997 ●●

Gardiner's Rake's Progress, in all but one respect, easily withstands comparison with its five rivals, and in several it surpasses them; if you are happy with Terfel's Nick Shadow, it can be set alongside Stravinsky's own 1964 recording as the finest available. Gardiner is conscious throughout that this is a chamber opera, and the orchestral textures are outstandingly clean and transparent, the rhythmic pointing crisp but airy. This enables his cast to give a fast-moving, conversational account of the text, with every word crystal-clear (including those from the chorus) and no need for any voice to force.

This benefits the soprano and tenor especially. Deborah York, sounds a very young and touchingly vulnerable Anne; her voice may seem a little pale, but there is pathos as well as brilliance in her Act 1 aria, and the desolation of her reaction to Tom's marriage to Baba the Turk ('I see, then: it was I who was unworthy') is moving. Ian Bostridge is the best Tom Rakewell since Alexander Young in Stravinsky's recording: he too sounds likeably youthful, sings with intelligence and sweetness of tone and acts very well.

Howells is an unexaggerated Mother Goose, and von Otter's economy of comic gesture is a marvel. 'Finish, if you please, whatever business is detaining you with this person' receives the full Lady Bracknell treatment from most mezzos; von Otter gives it the vocal equivalent of a nose wrinkled in well-bred disdain. Terfel often demonstrates that he can fine his big voice down to the subtlety of the other principals, and when he does he is a formidably dangerous, insinuating Shadow. But almost as often he not only lets the voice rip but indulges in histrionics quite uncharacteristic of the performance as a whole. You may not mind: why after all should the Devil restrainedly under-act? At times, though, he sounds bigger than the orchestra. The recording is close but theatrically atmospheric. There are a few sound effects, though some may find the raucous owl in the graveyard scene distracting.

Josef Suk

Bohemian 1874-1935

GROVE Suk studied at the Prague Conservatory, 1885-92, where he was Dvořák's favourite pupil, and in 1898 married his daughter. Dvorák was, too, the dominant influence on his early music, as in the Serenade for strings (1892) and the Fairy Tale suite (1900); later, most notably in the vast symphony Asrael (1906) – written under the impact of the deaths of his wife and his father-in-law – he developed a more personal style comparable with Mahler's in structural mastery and emotional force. He drew little on folk music. Other works include two published quartets (he was second violinist in the Czech Quartet for most of his life and played in over 4000 concerts), piano pieces (Things lived and Dreamed, 1909) and a group of symphonic poems, A Summer's Tale (1909), The Ripening (1917) and the choral-orchestral Epilog (1929). From 1922 he directed a master class in composition at the Prague Conservatory.

Asrael, Op 27

Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Rafael Kubelík
Panton 81 1101-2 (64 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1981 ●●

To use large-scale symphonic form for the purging of deep personal grief carries the danger that the result will seriously lack discipline. In 1904-05 Suk's world was shattered by two visits from Asrael (the Angel of Death in Muslim mythology): he lost his father-in-law (and revered teacher) Dvořák, and his beloved wife, Otylka. Forgivably, Suk does perhaps linger a little too long in the fourth movement's gentle, mainly lyrical portrait of Otylka, but elsewhere the progress is as satisfying psychologically as it is symphonically. Much of the music has a concentrated dream-like quality; at the extremes, spectral nightmare visions merge with compensatory surges of lyrical ardour. Set Kubelík's reading alongside any of the other modern versions and one is immediately aware of a wholly compelling imaginative intensity and interpretative flair that betoken a true poet of the rostrum. Kubelík's control throughout is awesome and he conjures up playing of enormous expressive subtlety from his fine Munich orchestra. No other recorded performance – not even Václav Talich's legendary 1952 Supraphon account – succeeds in conveying the intensely personal nature of this music with such devastating emotional candour. Technically, too, one need have no qualms about this Panton disc – the Bavarian Radio engineers secure most truthful results.

Epilogue, Op 37

Epilogue, Op 37. A Fairy Tale, Op 16
Luba Orgonasova sop Iván Kusnjer bar Peter Mikuláš bass Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Libor Pešek
Virgin Classics 545245-2 (70 minutes: DDD Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1997

Scored for soprano, baritone, bass, large and small mixed choruses and orchestra, and running for 40 minutes without a break, Epilogue was described by its creator as 'the last part of a cycle, the spirit of which manifested itself for the first time in Asrael: it goes through the whole of human life, into reflection on death and the dread of it, before the appearance of the song of earthly love – all this leading up to the exhilarating song of liberated mankind.' Pešek's massed forces bring genuine enthusiasm, vigour and dedication to Suk's extraordinarily ambitious, subtly clothed creation, the music's kaleidoscopic range of colour and mood conveyed with commendable sensitivity and unerring perception. Pešek's ever-involving conception is extremely satisfying in its clear-headed rigour and cumulative thrust. The lucidly balanced, spectacularly full and wide-ranging engineering handles those positively seismic tuttis in the last section with some aplomb. John Tyrell's notes carry the requisite authority, but there are, however, some irritating discrepancies in the booklet presentation.

Pešek's account of A Fairy Tale faces formidable competition from his own 1981 recording with the Czech PO (available on Supraphon). In the gorgeous opening tableau the excellent violin soloist (surprisingly uncredited, although it is in fact the RLPO Principal Malcolm Stewart) plays with a poignant restraint and unaffected purity that is extremely moving. Again, Pešek directs with considerable imagination and flair (the arresting start of the last movement certainly generates a heady sense of spectacle here). If that earlier account continues to have the edge in terms of tangy local colour and dramatic cutting edge, Suk's radiant score is imbued with an extra human warmth and wistful intimacy on Merseyside that provide ample compensation. A most welcome issue.

Ripening, Op 34

Ripening, Op 34. Praga, Op 26
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Libor Pešek
Virgin Classics 759318-2 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●

Completed in 1917, Ripening shows Suk at his peak. This vast yet tightly organised tone-poem shares many of the autobiographical concerns of its large-scale orchestral predecessors (Asrael and A Summer's Tale). Throughout, Suk handles his outsize forces with a truly Straussian confidence and virtuosity, nowhere more strikingly than in the extended Fugue which attains a climax of truly devastating proportions; the profound serenity of the ensuing coda (where a wordless female chorus is used to magical effect) could not have been harder won. The coupling, Praga, is an affectionate, enjoyably grandiloquent portrait-in-sound of that fair city dating from 1904. Pešek and the RLPO are accomplished and communicative. The engineering, too, is first-class.

A Summer's Tale, Op 29

A Summer's Tale, Op 29. Fantastic Scherzo, Op 25
Czech Philharmonic Orchestra /
Sir Charles Mackerras
Decca 466 443-2DH (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

A Summer's Tale contains some of Suk's most entrancingly original inspiration, not least the shimmering, heat-haze evocation that is 'Noon' and the succeeding Intermezzo entitled 'Blind musicians' (featuring a doleful, spare-textured dialogue between first a pair of cors anglais and then solo violin and viola). Certain commentators have criticised the piece's lack of cohesion, yet, in a towering performance its slumbering organic power, sense of spectacle and visionary beauty can take the breath away. The dramatic fervour of Mackerras's performance is tremendously compelling, and his magnificent Czech orchestra responds with commitment and poise throughout. A direct comparison with Libor Pešek's RLPO version perhaps reveals an added humanity and emotional clout. But it's doubtful whether the Czech Phil has ever been captured by the microphones with greater richness and depth (bass-drum fanciers are in for a field day) – a sonic feast is guaranteed. Mackerras offers a delectable bonus in the shape of the Fantastic Scherzo, with its indelible, lilting second subject – once heard, forever etched in the memory. Truth to tell, Mackerras conducts with greater fire and temperament here than in the main offering (the music's danse macabre, at times positively Mahlerian, characteristics brought out most perceptively). Despite minor qualms, then, this remains a classy, thrillingly accomplished set.

Chamber Works

Chamber works, Volumes 1-3
Supraphon ③ 11 1874-2 Ⓜ
(aas: 208 minutes: ADD/DDD)
Recorded 1966-92

String Quartets – No 1 in B flat, Op 11[a]; No 2, Op 31[b]. Tempo di menuetto[b]. Meditation on an Old Czech Hymn, Op 35a[b]. Quartet movement in B flat[a]
Suk Quartet ([a]Antonín Novák, [b]Ivan Straus, Vojtěch Jouza vns Karel Rehák va Jan Stros vc)
Supraphon 11 1531-2 (71 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1966-92 ●

Piano Trio in C minor, Op 2. Elégie, Op 23. Piano Quartet in A minor, Op 1. Piano Quintet in G minor, Op 8
Josef Suk vn Jan Talich va Michaela Fukačová vc Pavel Stěpán pf Suk Trio (Josef Suk vn Josef Chuchro vc Josef Hála, Jan Panenka pfs); Suk Quartet (Antonín Novák, Vojtěch Jouza vns Karel Rehák va Jan Stros vc)
Supraphon 11 1532-2 (74 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1966-92

Mélodie. Minuet. Balada in D minor. Four Pieces, Op 17. Ballade in D minor, Op 3 No 1. Serenade in A, Op 3 No 2. Bagatelle, 'Carrying a Bouquet'. Barcarolle in B flat. Balada in D minor. Elégie, Op 23. Sousedská
Jiří Válek fl Josef Suk, Jitka Nováková, Ludmila Vybíralová, Miroslav Kosina, Jaroslav Krištůfek, Zdeněk Mann vns Marek Jerie, František Host, Ivo Laniar vcs Tomáš Josífko db Renata Kodadová hp Josef Hála pf/harm Jan Panenka, Iván Klánský pfs Josef Fousek, Libor Kubánek perc Suk Quartet
Supraphon 11 1533-2 (63 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1966-92

A treasure-trove of heartfelt music performed with refinement and flair. Volume 1 concentrates on Suk's string quartet output (Suk himself was the second violinist in the great Czech Quartet for 40 years). If the First Quartet (1896) doesn't quite show the same freshness or entrancing melodic vein of the String Serenade of four years earlier, it remains a delightfully unassuming creation with the genial presence of Suk's teacher Dvořák looming large over the proceedings. It is followed by a rare hearing for the alternative finale Suk composed some 19 years later in 1915. By this time, of course, the composer had already found his own strongly personal voice. Both the resourceful Second Quartet of 1911 (an ambitious one-movement essay of nearly 28 minutes' duration and considerable emotional variety) and the deeply-felt Meditation on an Old Czech Hymn (1914) are works of some substance well worth exploring, and these passionate accounts enjoy excellent sound. The remaining two volumes perhaps contain more to interest Suk aficionados than newcomers, though the adorable Four Pieces for violin and piano, Op 17, have always remained great favourites.

Volume 2 features youthful offerings: the Piano Trio, the Piano Quartet, the likeable, if rather garrulous, Piano Quintet of 1893 and the touching Elégie for piano, violin and cello from 1902, written to celebrate the anniversary of the death of the poet and dramatist, Julius Zeyer. Apart from the Four Pieces already mentioned, the third and final volume also contains, amongst much else, the Elégie in its original guise for violin, cello, string quartet, harmonium and harp, no fewer than three different Ballades in D minor conceived for various instrumental combinations during Suk's days at the Conservatory, the 'Barcarolle' slow movement of a very early String Quartet from 1888, as well as the composer's last completed piece from 1935, the engaging Sousedská. Recording dates range from 1966 to 1992 (most of the material is designated as AAD), but the quality is consistently praiseworthy and the volumes are available either separately or gathered together within an attractive slipcase.

Sir Arthur Sullivan British 1842-1900

GROVE Sullivan, a Chapel Royal chorister, became a pupil of Sterndale Bennett at the Royal Academy of Music (1856) and studied at the Leipzig Conservatory (1858-61). The promise shown by his incidental music for The Tempest (1861) and other early concert works led to festival commissions and conducting posts, which he complemented with work as organist, teacher and song and hymn tune writer; from 1866, he also dabbled in comic opera. His increasing success in this last field – with CF Burnand in Cox and Box and then WS Gilbert in Trial by Jury – culminated in the formation by Richard D'Oyly Carte of a company expressly for the performance of Gilbert and Sullivan works. With HMS Pinafore the collaborators became an institution. Their works, produced at the Savoy Theatre from 1881 (the most popular 'Savoy Operas' were The Mikado and The Gondoliers), won a favour with English-speaking audiences that has never waned. Sullivan was knighted in 1883 and continued to conduct, notably the Leeds Festival and the Philharmonic Society concerts, but his serious ouput dwindled. A breach with Gilbert (1890), recurring ill-health and the relative failure of his last works clouded his final years.

Sullivan was essentially an eclectic, drawing on elements from opera, ballads, choral and church music, by composers from Hander to Bizet. Some lack of emotional depth and an unsure grasp of large-scale structure have limited the success of his more serious music (Golden Legend, Ivanhoe). It was in Gilbert's satirical subjects and witty verses that his talents found their happiest, most consistent inspiration, underpinned as they are by a highly professional compositional technique. Here his inventive melodies fit perfectly the sense and accentuation of the words, while lively choruses underscore traits of particular groups and deft instrumentation points up character. His clever parodies of serious music and use of 'tune combination' increase the fun.

Symphony in E, 'Irish'

Symphony in E, 'Irish'. The Tempest – Suite. Overture in C, 'In Memoriam'
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9859 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

Plaudits all round to Richard Hickox and his excellent Manchester band (and the Chandos production team) for at last granting Sullivan's Irish symphony the first wholly recommendable digital recording it so richly deserves. And what a charmer of a work it is! Mendelssohn (and his Reformation Symphony above all) provides the dominant stylistic template, but the work is soundly constructed, effectively scored, and the scherzo's irresistibly perky oboe tune, in particular, already reveals a very real melodic gift. Like Owain Arwell Hughes (CPO – nla) before him, Hickox observes the first-movement repeat, but his direction is infinitely more imaginative (at the hushed heart of the development section, sample the tingling atmosphere he conjures during those magical bars beginning at 9'13") and he never allows tensions to sag. What's more, the playing of the BBC Philharmonic ideally combines bright-eyed affection, keen vigour and nimble polish.

Following the symphony's successful March 1866 première under August Manns, Sullivan was asked to provide a work for that same year's Norwich Festival. The sudden death of his father just a few weeks before the festival proper jolted Sullivan into penning the likeable overture, In Memoriam. Written within 10 days and first given in Norwich on October 30 under Julius Benedict, the work soon won great popularity, though in terms of inventive freshness and orchestral scope it is rather trumped by the astonishingly confident incidental music for Shakespeare's The Tempest that Sullivan had written nearly six years earlier while still a student at the Leipzig Conservatory. Indeed, it comes as no surprise to learn that the British première of The Tempest in April 1862 made the 19-year-old a celebrity overnight, and the present suite draws upon seven of the original 12 numbers. Again, Hickox and company do plentiful justice to Sullivan's precocious inspiration, not least the powerfully moody 'Introduction', delectable 'Overture to Act IV' and the exquisite skip of the 'Dance of Nymphs and Reapers' (appealing echoes in the last-named of Schumann's Spring Symphony). A thoroughly enjoyable collection, then, accorded sound of glowing realism in the finest Chandos tradition.

Sullivan Cello Concerto in D^{a} (reconstr Mackerras and Mackie). Symphony in E, 'Irish'^{b}. Overture di ballo^{b} Elgar Romance, Op 62^{a} (arr vc)
^{a}Julian Lloyd Webber vc ^{a}London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras; ^{b}Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Groves
EMI British Composers 764726-2 (71 minutes: ADD/DDD). Recorded ^{a}1986 and ^{b}1968 Ⓑ ●

Sir Charles Groves's sturdy yet affectionate reading of Arthur Sullivan's wholly charming Irish Symphony was always one of the best of his EMI offerings with the RLPO, and the 1968 recording remains vivid. In the sparkling Overture di ballo, again, Groves conducts with plenty of character. There are also first-rate performances of Sullivan's undemanding Cello Concerto from 1866 (in a fine reconstruction by Sir Charles Mackerras – the manuscript was destroyed in Chappell's fire of 1964) as well as Elgar's wistful little Romance (originally for bassoon). This is a thoroughly attractive and rewarding mid-price reissue.

Overtures

Overtures – Cox and Box; The Sorcerer; HMS Pinafore; The Pirates of Penzance; Patience; Iolanthe; Princess Ida; The Mikado; Ruddigore (arr Toye); The Yeomen of the Guard; The Gondoliers; The Grand Duke
Royal Ballet Sinfonia / Andrew Penny 🏅
Naxos 8 554165 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1997 ●

The first thing that sets this apart from other collections of Sullivan overtures is that – for the first time – it covers the entire Gilbert and Sullivan output. The only works that are missing are Thespis, Trial by Jury and Utopia Limited, none of which had overtures as such. The sensible addition of the overture to Cox and Box means that all the Sullivan comic operas likely to be of interest to the general collector are here. An even more intelligent feature is that they are presented in chronological order, so that one can chart the progression of Sullivan's comic opera style from the very French-sounding ending of Cox and Box and the equally French-sounding opening of The Sorcerer through to more distinctively Sullivanesque sounds of the later pieces.

Of course, none of this would count for much if the performances were not up to scratch. Happily they are models of their kind. Andrew Penny has an agreeably light touch, alternatively reflective and sparkling, and gets graceful phrasing from the Royal Ballet Sinfonia – ideal performers of light music. Nobody wanting a collection of Sullivan's comic opera overtures should need to look elsewhere.

Victoria and Merrie England

RTE Sinfonietta / Andrew Penny
Marco Polo 8 223677 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

Five years before Edward German's comic opera Merrie England, this Sullivan ballet score was staged at the Alhambra Theatre as part of the celebrations of Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee. The original full score appears not to have survived. However, a complete piano reduction was published, along with an orchestral suite, and in addition Sullivan reused earlier material such as his Imperial March and music from his early ballet L'île enchantée. From all these sources Roderick Spencer has made this very convincing re-creation of the full score. And very worthwhile it proves too. As the notes explain, British ballet in those days was not classical ballet as we know it today but mime-drama. Spectacle was what it was all about, and Sullivan rose to the occasion admirably. There are some most attractive passages – not only in the recycled material but also, for instance, the Solo Variation for the May Queen and perhaps above all the Waltz of Wood Nymphs, which would well repay taking over into the light music repertory. In addition Sullivan skilfully weaves in various patriotic British melodies as well as traditional dances such as a morris dance and a sailors' hornpipe. Such pastiche is the sort of thing that Sullivan did particularly well, and Penny and the RTE Sinfonietta do the score proud. This is as rewarding as any of the CDs of Sullivan without Gilbert that Marco Polo have issued.

The Gondoliers

The Gondoliers. Overture di ballo (1870 version)
Richard Suart bar Duke of Plaza-Toro; Philip Creasey ten Luiz; John Rath bass Don Alhambra; David Fieldsend ten Marco; Alan Oke bar Giuseppe; Tim Morgan bar Antonio; David Cavendish ten Francesco; Toby Barrett bass Giorgio; Jill Pert contr Duchess of Plaza-Toro; Elizabeth Woollett sop Casilda; Lesley Echo Ross sop Gianetta; Regina Hanley mez Tessa; Yvonne Patrick sop Fiametta; Pamela Baxter mez Vittoria; Elizabeth Elliott sop Giulia; Claire Kelly contr Inez; D'Oyly Carte Opera Chorus and Orchestra / John Pryce-Jones
TER ② CDTER2 1187 (109 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991

This is one of a series of recordings by the new D'Oyly Carte Opera Company that offers a vastly better quality of sound than any of its ageing competitors. Orchestral detail is the most immediate beneficiary, and the overture serves to demonstrate John Pryce-Jones's lively tempos and lightness of touch. Outstanding among the singers are perhaps John Rath, who gives Don Alhambra's 'I stole the prince' and 'There lived a king' real presence, and Jill Pert, a formidable Duchess of Plaza-Toro. Richard Suart not only provides the leading comedy roles with exceptionally clear articulation and musicality, but also adds considerable character to his portrayals. David Fieldsend and Alan Oke provide attractive portrayals of the two gondoliers, and Lesley Echo Ross and Regina Hanley are also most agreeable.

Seasoned listeners may note numerous changes of detail as a result of the purging of the performance material of changes made to the parts around the time of the 1920s Savoy Theatre revivals. There is no dialogue, but added value is provided by Sullivan's sunniest comic opera score being accompanied by the sparkling Overture di ballo, played in its original version with some traditional cuts opened up.

Additional recommendation
The Gondoliers
Coupling: Cello Concerto in D^{a}
Evans Duke of Plaza-Toro Young Luiz Brannigan Don Alhambra Lewis Marco Cameron Giuseppe Glyndebourne Festival Chorus; Pro Arte Orchestra / Sargent; ^{a}Lloyd Webber vc ^{a}London Symphony Orchestra / ^{a}Mackerras
HMV Classics ② HMVD5 73672-2
(114 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓑ
A really beautiful 'Pair of sparkling eyes' from Lewis.

HMS Pinafore

Richard Suart bass Sir Joseph Porter; Felicity Palmer mez Little Buttercup; Rebecca Evans sop Josephine; Thomas Allen bar Captain Corcoran; Michael Schade ten Ralph Rackstraw; Donald Adams bass Dick Deadeye; Valerie Seymour sop Hebe; Richard Van Allan bass Bill Bobstay; John King, Philip Lloyd-Evans bars Bob Becket; Welsh National Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Telarc CD80374 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1994 ●●

As always, Mackerras keeps the livelier numbers moving along comfortably without ever a hint of rushing, while giving full weight to the tender moments and, above all, caressing all the details of Sullivan's delicious orchestration.

Right from the overture, with its beautifully shaped Andante section, this is music-making to perfection. Of the singers, Felicity Palmer's Buttercup truly oozes plumpness and pleasure, while Thomas Allen's Captain does not just the crew of the Pinafore, but all of us, proud. If Rebecca Evans's Josephine is a shade lacking in colour, Mackerras has found in Michael Schade's Ralph Rackstraw a most elegant addition to his G&S team. As for Richard Suart's Sir Joseph Porter, this is surely as stylish a demonstration of patter singing as one can find anywhere on disc, while Donald Adams's Dick Deadeye is no worse for his 40-odd years singing the role.

Add orchestral playing of refinement, choral work whose perfection extends from the formal numbers to the varied inflexions of 'What nevers?', plus a recording that brings out the instrumental detail to perfection, and one has a Pinafore that is unadulterated delight from first note to last.

Additional recommendation
HMS Pinafore
Coupling: Trial by Jury
Baker Sir Joseph Porter Cameron Captain Corcoran Lewis Ralph Rackstraw Brannigan Dick Deadeye Sinclair Little Buttercup Milligan Bill Bobstay Glyndebourne Festival Chorus; Pro Arte Orchestra / Sargent
HMV Classics ② HMVD5 73056-2
(101 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
A sensitive reading of HMS Pinafore and a super coupling: George Baker is superb as the judge in Trial by Jury.

The Mikado

John Holmes bass The Mikado; John Wakefield ten Nanki-Poo; Clive Revill bar Ko-Ko; Denis Dowling bar Pooh-Bah; John Heddle Nash bar Pish-Tush; Marion Studholme sop Yum-Yum; Patricia Kern mez Pitti-Sing; Dorothy Nash sop Peep-Bo; Jean Allister mez Katisha. Iolanthe – excerpts Elizabeth Harwood, Elizabeth Robson, Cynthia Morey sops Heather Begg, Patricia Kern mezzos Stanley Bevan ten Eric Shilling, Denis Dowling, Julian Moyle bars Leon Greene bass Sadler's Wells Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Alexander Faris
Classics for Pleasure ② CD-CFPD4730 Ⓑ
(135 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1962 ●●

At the core of these performances are some of the finest British singers of 30 years ago, all of whom were chosen not just for their singing but for their sense of the theatricality and humour of Gilbert and Sullivan. Just listen, for instance, to how John Heddle Nash gives full expression to every word of Pish-Tush's 'Our great Mikado'. Here, too, is Marion Studholme's delicious Yum-Yum and Elizabeth Harwood's joyous Phyllis. If one singles out Clive Revill for special mention, it is because his Ko-Ko is uniquely well judged and imaginative, combining superb comic timing, verbal clarity and vocal dexterity. His 'little list' is hilarious, and one can almost feel one's hand gripped at the words 'shake hands with you like that'. At the helm in both works is Alexander Faris who knew supremely well how to capture the lightness and sparkle of operetta. The new Overture put together for The Mikado may come as a surprise, but it is apt and cleverly done. The sound is inevitably dated when compared with more recent recordings, but it scarcely mars the enjoyment.

Additional recommendation
The Mikado
Adams The Mikado Rolfe Johnson Nanki-Poo Suart Ko-Ko Van Allen Pooh-Bah McLaughlin Yum-Yum Howells Pitti-Sing Palmer Katisha Welsh National Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Mackerras
Telarc CD80284 (79 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
A delicious Nanki-Poo and a magnificent Katisha.

The Pirates of Penzance

Eric Roberts bar Major-General Stanley; Malcolm Rivers bar Pirate King; Gareth Jones bar Samuel; Philip Creasy ten Frederic; Simon Masterton-Smith bass Sargeant of Police; Marilyn Hill Smith sop Mabel; Patricia Cameron sop Edith; Pauline Birchall mez Kate; Susan Gorton contr Ruth; D'Oyly Carte Opera Chorus and

Orchestra / John Pryce-Jones
TER ② CDTER2 1177 (85 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990

The revival of the D'Oyly Carte Opera Company produced the first digital recordings of complete Gilbert and Sullivan scores, and this TER set is a very happy example. Philip Creasy is an engaging and vocally secure Frederic, and Marilyn Hill Smith trips through 'Poor wandering one' with a delectable display of vocal ability and agility. The couple's interplay with the chorus in 'How beautifully blue the sky' is quite enchanting, and their exchanges in 'Stay, Frederic, stay' splendidly convincing. Eric Roberts makes the Major-General a thoroughly engaging personality, and the dotty exchanges between Simon Masterson-Smith's Sargeant of Police and his police force are sheer joy. Even such details as the girls' screams at the appearance of the pirates in Act 1 have a rare effectiveness. John Pryce-Jones keeps the score dancing along. Those who want the dialogue as well as the music must look elsewhere, but this is certainly to be recommended.

Additional recommendation
Pirates of Penzance
Couplings: Overture In C, 'In Memoriam'. The Sorcerer. Cox & Box. Princess Ida
Baker Major-General Stanley Milligan Pirate King
Lewis Frederic Brannigan Sergeant of Police
Morison Mabel
Glyndebourne Festival Chorus; Pro Arte Orchestra / Sargent
HMV Classics ② HMVD5 730622
(113 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ

A glorious 'Paradox' trio, and the lovely duet for Mabel and Frederic beautifully sung by Morison and Lewis.

The Yeomen of the Guard

Peter Savidge bar Sir Richard Cholmondeley; Neill Archer ten Colonel Fairfax; Donald Adams bass Sergeant Meryll; Peter Hoare ten Leonard; Richard Suart bar Jack Point; Donald Maxwell bar Shadbolt; Alwyn Mellor sop Elsie; Pamela Helen Stephen mez Phoebe; Felicity Palmer mez Dame Carruthers; Clare O'Neill sop Kate; Ralph Mason ten First Yeoman Peter Lloyd Evans bar Second Yeoman

Trial by Jury
Rebecca Evans sop Plaintiff; Barry Banks ten Defendant; Richard Suart bar Judge; Peter Savidge bar Counsel; Donald Adams bass Usher; Gareth Rhys-Davies bar Foreman; Welsh National Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Telarc ② CD80404 (121 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and texts included. Recorded 1995 ●

Between them, The Yeomen of the Guard and Trial by Jury contain all that is best in Sullivan's music for the theatre. In the former there is some of his more serious and ambitious writing, in the latter some of his most consistently light-hearted and engaging. All of this is brought out in Telarc's series of recordings with Welsh National Opera. As always, Sir Charles Mackerras paces the music impeccably, and he has assured contributions from such stalwarts as Donald Adams, Felicity Palmer and Richard Suart. The last-named may be a shade light-voiced compared with some of the more comic performers of Jack Point and the Learned Judge; but in The Yeomen it is surely his performance that stands out. His handling of the dialogue after 'Here's a man of jollity' is masterly, and his 'Oh, a private buffoon' is as winning as any, with impeccable clarity of diction and a perfectly judged French accent for 'jests ... imported from France'. Neill Archer and Alwyn Mellor are admirable as Fairfax and Elsie; but Pamela Helen Stephen could have displayed more of the minx in Phoebe Meryll's personality, while in Trial by Jury Barry Banks has too small a voice to convince as the Defendant. Recommended, especially if you want both works on the same set.

Further listening
Iolanthe
Coupling: Overture di Ballo^a
Baker The Lord Chancellor Wallace Earl of Mountararat Young Earl Tolloller
Brannigan Private Willis
Glyndebourne Festival Chorus; Pro Arte Orchestra; ^{a}BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sargent
HMV Classics ② HMVD5 73675-2 (
106 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ

Sargent's affectionate handling of the score contributes to the great success of this issue.

Ruddigore
Coupling: The Merchant of Venice – Suite^a
Baker Sir Ruthven Murgatroyd Lewis Dauntless
Brannigan Sir Despard Murgatroyd
Glyndebourne Festival Chorus; Pro Arte Orchestra / Sargent; ^{a}City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / ^{a}Dunn
HMV Classics ② HMVD5 73681-2
(97 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ

Lacking nothing in the way of humour and drama, this is a hugely musical performance.

Franz von Suppé

Austrian 1819-1895

GROVE In Vienna Suppé became Kapellmeister at the Theater in der Josefstadt (1840), Theater an der Wien (1845), Kaitheater (1862) and Carltheater (1865). He wrote a string of effective stage scores, from overtures (Poet and Peasant, Light Cavalry) and incidental music to genuine Viennese operettas, opera parodies and even operas, some of which survive as viable theatre works. Among the most popular were the farce Gervinus (1849) and the operettas Flotte Bursche (1863), Fatinitza (1876) and above all Boccaccio (1879). At its best his music is light and fluent, elegant and immediately appealing.

Overtures

Overtures – Leichte Kavallerie; Tricoche und Cacolet; Boccaccio. Afrikareise – Titania Waltz. Fatinitza. Humorous Variations on the Popular Song, 'What comes there from on high?' Die Heimkehr von der Hochzeit. Herzenseintracht – Polka. Franz Schubert. Triumph Overture
Slovak State Philharmonic Orchestra, Košice / Alfred Walter
Marco Polo 8 223683 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

This is another fascinating insight from Marco Polo into the wider output of a composer unjustly typecast through the brilliance of his rousing overtures. Here the familiar Leichte Kavallerie and Fatinitza overtures serve to demonstrate the thoroughly reliable conducting and playing of Alfred Walter and the Košice orchestra, without quite offering a challenge to the most rousing interpretations available elsewhere. What are of interest are the rarities. Of the unfamiliar overtures, that to Tricoche und Cacolet, a Viennese adaptation of a Meilhac and Halévy play, is perceptibly in the French style of Offenbach, with some attractive themes and a marvellous passage for bassoon, while the Triumph Overture has a typically exciting ending. The overture to Die Heimkehr von der Hochzeit is perhaps less striking, while that to Franz Schubert (a one-act operetta portraying the composer on stage) is mainly notable for its use of Schubertian themes – Der Erlkönig, Der Wanderer, the German Dance No 7 (also used later in Lilac Time), Der Schäfer und der Reiter and Die Taubenpost.

Among the other pieces, the Afrikareise waltz finds Suppé very much in Straussian territory, while Herzens-eintracht proves that he could also produce a polka with the best. Perhaps the most intriguing item is Suppé's set of humorous variations on the*Fuchslied*, a popular Viennese student song which we would recognise as A-hunting we will go.

It all provides further proof that Suppé's entertaining writing extended way beyond his overtures.

Jan Pieterszoon Sweelinck

Dutch 1562-1621

GROVE Sweelinck studied with his father, organist of the Oude Kerk, Amsterdam, succeeding him in or before 1580. He remained in this post all his life, with a few excursions to inspect new organs in other cities. Among the most influential and sought-after teachers of his time, he included Germans among his pupils, notably Scheidt, Jacob Praetorius and Scheidemann. He wrote over 250 vocal works, including a complete French psalter (1604-21), motets (1619), chansons (1594, 1612) and Italian madrigals (1612). But he is best known for his c70 keyboard works, which include monumental fugal fantasias, concise toccatas and well-ordered variation sets. He perfected forms derived from, among others, the English virginalists and greatly influenced 17th-century north German keyboard music, becoming one of the leading composers of his day. His son Dirck (1591-1652), who succeeded him at the Oude Kerk in 1621, edited a popular song collection (1644) and also composed songs and keyboard music.

Complete Keyboard Works

Complete Keyboard Works
Freddy Eichelberger, Liuwe Tamminga, Leo van Doeselaar, Pieter van Dijk, Bernard Winsemius, Reinhard Jaud, Stef Tuinstra, Bert Matter, Vincent van de Laar orgs Glen Wilson, Siebe Henstra, Menno van Delft, Pieter Dirksen, Bob van Asperen, Pieter-Jan Belder hpds
NM Classics ⑨ 92119 Ⓑ
(10 hours, 29 minutes: DDD)

The fact that no fewer than 15 musicians (nearly all of them Sweelinck's countrymen) have contributed to this complete keyboard project in no way lessens the impressiveness of what has been achieved here. Led by Pieter Dirksen and Pieter van Dijk, they get through nearly 90 pieces (some of which are heard more than once on organ and on harpsichord). This complete edition rests on sound and fresh scholarship, and is laid out in an engaging and informative manner. Each artist contributes a recital intended to stand on its own, usually on the same instrument.

Fourteen organs from the 16th and 17th centuries, and three harpsichords, are heard over the course of 10-and-a-half hours. The harpsichords are an original by Johannes Ruckers, and two recent copies of other instruments also by him. But it is the organs that steal the show: spread across three countries, several still close to original condition, their individual characteristics and the acoustics of their respective churches make for endlessly absorbing listening. As an anthology of great early organs this set would be worth recommending. The fact that they are here pressed into serving music of such sustained quality only increases their impact. For there is no doubting Sweelinck's variety, charm and infinite resource. He touched all the significant genres of the keyboard repertory of his day (toccatas, fantasias, dance movements, variation sets, ricercars).

Of all these genres, the fantasia furnishes Sweelinck with perhaps his most congenial medium: simple subjects serve as the basis for wide-ranging explorations, stretching out over many minutes without ever losing the thread – indeed, frequently his conclusions have an awe-inspiring power. Sweelinck needs no advocacy beyond the performances themselves; rather, it is the consistency of these performances that concerns us here. That consistency would be impressive had it originated with a single interpreter, but given the number of participants it is equally remarkable. It is all very impressive. What more could one want?

Organ Works

Toccata in C. Ballo del granduca. Ricercar.Malle Sijmen. Mein junges Leben hat ein End'. Aeolian Echo Fantasia. Onder een linde groen. Toccata in A minor I. Erbarm dich mein, o Herre Gott. Poolsche dans James David Christie org
Naxos 8 550904 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Played on the C B Fisk Organ, Houghton Chapel, Wellesley College, USA. Recorded 1993 ●

The Houghton Chapel is nowhere near as resonantly spacious as the Oude Kerk in Amsterdam, but its relative intimacy does not rob the organ of its natural resonance and tonal beauty. James David Christie presents what is, in effect, a most satisfactory re-creation of one of Sweelinck's organ recitals, given daily between 1580 and 1621, for the burghers of Amsterdam. One hopes they were appreciative of the most consistently witty and generous-spirited keyboard music before the era of Buxtehude, Couperin and Bach.

While Christie may not possess the lyricism of a Leonhardt, the humane warmth of a Piet Kee or the mercurial whimsy of a Koopman, he is, in his own right, a bold, stylish, unhasty player, clearly thoroughly versed in early performance practice, with an incisive technique disclosing musical intelligence and common sense. He is particularly successful in the five major variation sets here, relishing the variety of decorative motifs but still conveying an impression of structural coherence and unity. Just occasionally his articulation might have worked better in a somewhat larger acoustic: at times a more obviously singing touch might have suggested greater tenderness in quieter moments and more ample majesty in louder ones.

Nevertheless, with appealing registrations, an almost ideal choice of programme and undistractingly natural recording this is recommended.

Choral Works

Ab Oriente. Angelus ad pastores ait. Beati omnes. Beati pauperes. Cantate Domino. De profundis. Diligam te Domine. Domine Deus meus. Ecce nunc benedicite. Ecce prandium. Ecce virgo concipiet. Euge serve bone. Gaudeate omnes. Gaude et laetare. Hodie beata Virgo Mariae. Hodie Christus natus est. In illo tempore. In te Domine speravi. Iusti autem. Laudate Dominum. Magnificat. Non omnis. O Domine Jesu Christe. O quam beata lancea. O sacrum convivium. Paraclectus autem. Petite et accipietis. Qui vult venire post me. Regina coeli. Tanto tempore. Te Deum laudamus. Timor Domini. Ubi duo vel tres. Venite, exultemus Domino. Vide homo. Videte manus meas. Viri Galilaei
Clare College Choir, Cambridge / Timothy Brown with James Grossmith, Andrew Henderson org
Etcetera ② KTC2025 (141 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Notes,texts and translations included
Recorded 1998 ●

Lurking suspicion that Sweelinck is a true doyen of sacred vocal music is emphatically confirmed in an important and invigorating world première recording of the complete 1619 Cantiones sacrae. This collection of 37 motets in five-voices demonstrates, above all, the quality of his aesthetic, one in which textual representation and pure contrapuntal pleasure converge with effortless mastery; you only have to hear the first minute of the first track, a quasi-introit, 'Gaudete', of infectious energy, to dance to its buoyant rhythms and bask in the clarity of the harmonic conception. Cantiones sacrae projects a distinctive containment, both in scale and emotional judgement, which should appeal to choirs of all shapes and sizes – and listeners too.

These performances by the young voices of Clare College Choir are impressive. Brown expertly circumnavigates his disciplined larger forces of about 26 voices around an oeuvre which is both introspective and ecstatic. The smaller-scale consort is perhaps less polished, the tuning of the sopranos has a tendency to 'dip' intermittently, and there is an occasional 'piping kettle' quality to the timbre.

Generally, too, the lack of colorific range and resonance betrays the youthful membership of the choir; this can be telling in some of the slower music. These are small gripes in a project which stands out for a pioneering place in the catalogue and its fine advocacy of Sweelinck's seemingly unlimited resource.

Karol Szymanowski

Polish 1882-1937

GROVE Szymanowski was born into an artistic family of the Polish landed gentry and began his musical education with his father. At 13, in Vienna, he was powerfully impressed by hearing Wagner for the first time. He then had formal tuition from Zawirski and Noskowski in Warsaw (1901-4), and during the next decade began to make an international reputation for music in the German tradition, relating to Wagner, Strauss and Reger: the main works of this period include the Symphony No 2 (1910), Piano Sonata No 2 (1911) and the opera Hagith (1913).

During these years he visited Italy, Sicily and north Africa he also encountered Pelléas, The Firebird and Petrushka, and all these enriching influences were remembered in his abundant output of 1914-17, when he was confined by the war to Russia. Works of this period are typically classical or oriental in inspiration, and ornately figured in a manner relating to Skryabin or Debussy. They include the choral Symphony No 3 (1916), Violin Concerto No 1 (1916), Myths for violin and piano (1915) and the piano triptychs Metopes (1915) and Masques (1916). He then used this new, highly sensuous language to tackle the theme of The Bacchae in his opera King Roger (1926), set in the orientalized Norman kingdom of Sicily. In 1919 he settled in Warsaw, now the capital of an independent Poland; and he began while completing King Roger to compose in a nationalist style, drawing on folk music in his choral orchestral Stabat mater (1926), ballet Harnasie (1935) and other works. He accepted the directorship of the Warsaw Conservatory (1927-32), but his last years were dogged by ill health, and he wrote nothing after his Violin Concerto No 2 (1933) and a pair of piano mazurkas, adding to a set of 20 dating from 1924-5. Other works include two quartets, songs, folksong arrangements and cantatas.

Violin Concertos

Awards 1997

Violin Concertos – No 1, Op 35; No 2, Op 61. Three Paganini Caprices, Op 40. Romance in D, Op 23
Thomas Zehetmair vn Silke Avenhaus pf
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 555607-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●●

They make an admirable coupling, the two Szymanowski violin concertos, but a demanding one for the soloist. They are both so beautiful that it must be tempting to embellish both with a similarly glowing tone. They inhabit quite different worlds (they were written 16 years apart) and Zehetmair shows how well they respond to quite different approaches.

In the First, after a rapt solo entry, he uses for the most part a lovely but delicate tone, expanding to athletic incisiveness but not often to lushness. It all fits very well with Rattle's handling of the orchestra: occasionally full and rich but mostly a sequence of exquisitely balanced chamber ensembles. Generous but finely controlled rubato from both soloist and conductor allows the concerto's improvisatory fantasy to flower; and the quiet close even has a touch of wit to it.

Zehetmair's sound is immediately less ethereal, more robust, for the opening melody of the Second Concerto. This is the sort of tone, you suspect, that he would use in Bartók's Second Concerto, and it points up a vein of Bartókian strength to this work's longer and firmer lines. Rattle, too, seeks out bolder and more dense colours.

The Paganini Caprices were equipped by Szymanowski not with deferential accompaniments but with independent and quite freely composed piano parts. They change Paganini, even where the violin part is unmodified, into a late Romantic virtuoso, with a hint of Lisztian poetry alongside the expertly pointed-up fireworks of the Twenty-Fourth Caprice; even here Zehetmair is a listening violinist, not one to upstage his excellent pianist. The Romance, the warmest and most luscious piece here, is beautifully done but with a touch of restraint to prevent it cloying. A first-class coupling, and a recording that makes the most of the superb acoustic of Symphony Hall in Birmingham.

Additional recommendation
Violin Concertos[a]
Couplings: Demeter. Mandragora. Stabat mater. Litany to the Virgin Mary. Górecki Three Pieces in the Old Style Baird Colas Breugnon Suite
Kulka vn Polish Radio Chorus of Krakow; Polish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Maksymiuk, Wit
EMI Double Forte ② 575670-2 (142 minutes: ADD/DDD). Recorded [a]1979 Ⓜ

A fine introduction to Szymanowski's sound world; great performances, all authentically Polish. Kulka's recordings of the concertos are particularly appealing – rich-timbred and committed. Both conductors have the measure of the composer's lush, heavily scented world. Recommended.

Symphony No 2

Symphony No 2 in B flat, Op 19. Concert Overture in E, Op 12. Wordsong, Op 46[a]. Songs of the Infatuated Muezzin, Op 42[a]
[a]Zofia Kilanowicz sop London Philharmonic Orchestra / Leon Botstein
Telarc CD80567 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

The Concert Overture is a hugely gifted young composer's homage to Richard Strauss, and fully worthy of its model in impetuousness, rich sonority and close-woven polyphony. The Second Symphony is no less rich but more disciplined, with Reger's influence added to (and modifying) that of Strauss, and with Szymanowski's own high colouring, sinuous melody and tonal adventurousness now in their first maturity. The Infatuated Muezzin songs are a high point of his middle period, Debussian harmony and florid orientalising arabesques fusing to an aching voluptuousness, colour now applied with the refinement of a miniaturist. Leon Botstein is fully aware of the quite different palettes these pieces use, and the orchestra play splendidly.

Wordsong (Telarc's translation for Słopiewnie) is the key to Szymanowski's final phase, a setting of five poems in an artificial language, using Slavonic roots to suggest a sort of 'pre-Polish'. Szymanowski responded to the poems' assonances, rhythms and alliterations (he couldn't resist 'słodzik słowi słowisienkie'), finding for them a fusion of folk elements, archaisms and melodies that retain something of the discarded middle period's exoticism.

You sense the influence of Stravinsky (Les noces in particular) and hear already both the folk vigour and the ritual purity of Szymanowski's late style (in the third song, too, there is a startling pre-echo of the slow movement of Górecki's Third). There is a slight, attractive tremor to Kilanowicz's voice, but she has both the almost white purity and the flexible coloratura the songs need. It is very hard to make a single adverse comment about this important addition to the discography.

Piano Works

Piano Sonata No 1 in C minor, Op 8. Mazurkas, Op 50 – No 13, Moderato; No 14, Animato; No 15, Allegretto dolce; No 16, Allegramente – vigoroso. Etudes, Op 33. Four Polish Dances, Op 47. Prelude and Fugue in C sharp minor
Martin Roscoe pf
Naxos 8 553867 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996

This volume three concludes Martin Roscoe's cycle of Szymanowski's piano music (a pity, then, that we will not get to hear his account of the Third Sonata and the remaining six Mazurkas). It offers a cross-section of Szymanowski's styles as a composer for the keyboard, from the early First Sonata (always described as post-Chopin and post-Scriabin but, Roscoe convincingly demonstrates, no less importantly post-Liszt as well) to the pungent Mazurkas, with their flavour of Bartók as well as of late Grieg.

The Prelude and Fugue is an interesting link between that early Sonata and the Op 33 Etudes which are usually referred to as representing Szymanowski's 'impressionist' phase. Again, Roscoe makes you question this conventional description: yes, the harmonies look rather Debussian but they don't often sound that way. These very brief pieces (just over a minute on average) are studies in the conventional sense, written by one fine pianist for another, Alfred Cortot, but they are also exercises in harmonic subtlety and rich in Szymanowski's personal fantasy. The Four Polish Dances inhabit the same world as the Mazurkas, and it's obvious that Roscoe enjoys open fifths and flat sevenths as much as Szymanowski did.

A warm recommendation, then, although one tinged with regret. Given the omission of the Third Sonata and the remaining Mazurkas one could supplement Roscoe's three volumes with Pavel Kamasa's superb recording of the complete Mazurkas (Koch Schwann) and Raymond Clarke's of the Third Sonata (Athene). Naxos's piano sound is excellent.

Stabat mater, Op 53

Awards 1995

Stabat mater, Op 53. Litany to the Virgin Mary, Op 59. Symphony No 3, Op 27, 'The song of the night'
Elzbieta Szmytka sop Florence Quivar contr Jon Garrison ten John Connell bass City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra and Chorus / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 555121-2 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 ○○○

The first impression here is that Rattle is relatively new to Szymanowski. There's a huge enthusiasm here, a missionary quality that bespeaks the recent convert. On the other hand the care over matters of balance, the knowledge of just those points where Szymanowski's complexity needs very careful handling if it's not simply to blur into opacity, suggest a conductor who has been there before and knows the dangers. You get the feeling that a conscious decision was made to delay recording this music until the circumstances were right.

The CBSO Chorus sound thoroughly at home not only in the music but in the language too. In Elzbieta Szmytka, Rattle has a soprano who might have been born to sing Szymanowski's pure, floated and very high-lying soprano lines. The result is very fine: one of the most beautiful Szymanowski recordings ever made. And yet 'beautiful Szymanowski' isn't all that hard if the orchestra's good enough and the conductor capable. Rattle's insistence that all of the music be heard, its urgency and passion as well as its deliquescent loveliness, makes for uncommonly gripping Szymanowski as well. He reminds one of how much more there is to the Third Symphony than voluptuous yearning.

The choice of soloists for the Stabat mater is interesting: alongside Szmytka's radiant purity are Quivar's throaty vibrancy and Connell's weighty darkness. Not a matching trio, but the contrast is appealing. Garrison in the symphony is a touch hard and strenuous, less enraptured than one or two of the Polish tenors (and sopranos) who've recorded it, but he's a musicianly and likeable singer. The recording is outstanding: lucid, rich and spacious.

King Roger

Awards 2000

Thomas Hampson bar Roger II; Elzbieta Szmytka sop Roxana; Ryszard Minkiewicz ten Shepherd; Robert Gierlach bar Archbishop; Jadwiga Rappé contr Deaconess; Philip Langridge ten Edrisi City of Birmingham Symphony Youth Chorus; City of Birmingham Symphony Chorus
Symphony No 4, 'Symphonie concertante', Op 60
Leif Ove Andsnes pf City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI ② 556823-2 (112 minutes: DDD). Notes Ⓕ
text and translation included. Recorded 1996-98 ○○○

King Roger is a ravishingly beautiful opera, but a very fragile one. With a shrill soprano or a less than ideally cast tenor it would be fatally flawed. Minkiewicz's Dionysiac Shepherd betrays a slight hardness and a touch of stress in full voice, but he has both the allure and the mystery that the role imperatively demands. Almost his first words are 'My God is as beautiful as I', and he should vocally suggest that he is indeed radiantly beautiful. His voice shades to a croon at times, but he never sounds epicene.

Szmytka is a wonderful Roxana, with beautifully pure high notes and bell-like coloratura. At the end of Act 2 her florid aria is repeated (in Szymanowski's concert version), at just the point where you might well have replayed the earlier track for the pleasure of listening to her again. The use of distinguished singers in the smaller roles is no extravagance: Langridge evokes the exotic strangeness of the Arab sage Edrisi, while Rappé and Gierlach add to the hieratic gravity of the opening scene. Hampson in the central role is in fine voice, easily conveying Roger's authority, his angry but bewildered rejection of the Shepherd's new religion. He is even finer, however, in Act 5, where the King is painfully torn between Dionysus and Apollo. The ambiguity of the final scene remains, as it must. Is Roger accepting the Shepherd in place of Roxana? Or, since Roxana herself immediately succumbs to the Shepherd's glamour, is Roger achieving wholeness by at last acknowledging feminine intuitions within himself?

That these questions remain resonant and provoking at the end of the performance is a tribute both to the work itself, and also to Rattle's handling of it. The orchestral textures are voluptuously rich and subtly coloured, aided by a spacious recording (the vast Byzantine basilica of the opening scene is magnificently evoked) and orchestral playing of a very high order indeed. This is the finest recording of King Roger that has so far appeared.

The Fourth Symphony, in Szymanowski's later, folk-derived and harder-edged style, is a huge contrast: quite a shock after the opera's radiant conclusion. Andsnes's powerfully athletic playing points up the music's affinities with Prokofiev, and both he and Rattle emphasise the new vigour that Szymanowski was drawing from the fiddle music of the Tatra region.

Toru Takemitsu Japanese 1930-1996

GROVE Takemitsu was a pupil of Kiyose from 1948. Influenced by Webern, Debussy and Messiaen, he has reflected what is most oriental in these composers: a concern with timbre and elegant sound and with the precision of the moment rather than with pattern and development. His music often gives the impression of spatial experience and of materials evolving freely of their own accord; silence is fully organized. Some of his works use Japanese instruments, but most are for Western orchestral and chamber media. Among the best known are Requiem for strings (1957), November Steps for biwa, shakuhachi and orchestra (1967), A Flock Descends into the Pentagonal Garden (1977) and From me flows what you call Time (1990) for percussion quintet and orchestra.

'Quotation of Dream'

Day Signal. From Heaven. Quotation of Dream[a]. How Slow the Wind. Twill by Twilight. Archipelago S. Dream/Window. Night Signal
[a]Paul Crossley, [a]Peter Serkin pfs
London Sinfonietta / Oliver Knussen
DG 20/21 453 495-2GH Ⓕ
(71 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●●●

Awards 1999

'Dream', 'Slow', 'Twilight': these are the kind of words that give the key to Takemitsu's later style, and all the works on this disc were written between 1985 and 1993. The Debussy connection is easy to hear, but, simply because of that, Takemitsu's own personal blend of the flowing and the disjunctive, against a harmonic background consistently more dense than Debussy's, stands out as one of the most significant late 20th-century responses to an early 20th century master. Second-hand impressionism it is not.

Oliver Knussen's performances are models of balance and clarity, with the music's purely colouristic qualities not excessively indulged. Also crucial here is the excellent quality of the DG recording, extremely well-designed for the way most of these pieces alternate so subtly between soloistic writing and fuller yet no less richly imagined textures. Dream/Window sets the tone for the kind of restrained yet eloquent ceremonies that can also be heard in the tribute to Feldman, Twill by Twilight and the two beautifully constructed works, How Slow the Wind, and Quotation of Dream. It is extremely tempting to say that this is the best single CD of Takemitsu's music so far issued.

To the Edge of Dream

To the Edge of Dream. Folios – I, II and III. Toward the Sea III. Here, There and Everywhere. What a Friend. Amours perdues. Summertime. Vers, l'Arc-en-ciel, Palma
John Williams gtr Sebastian Bell alto fl
Gareth Hulse ob d'amore London Sinfonietta / Esa-Pekka Salonen
Sony Classical SK46720 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989

Toru Takemitsu is an original, refined composer and something of a latter-day impressionist, as titles like To the Edge of Dream suggest. It may therefore come as a surprise to find him arranging songs by Lennon and McCartney, Gershwin and others for solo guitar. Yet these prove to have attractive touches of the subtlety found in Takemitsu's own compositions, and they also provide useful contrast to the more substantial works on this beguiling disc. Folios, the earliest composition included, already reveals Takemitsu's musical catholicity in its reference to a Bach chorale. Toward the Sea and Vers, l'Arc-en-ciel, Palma are both more expansive mood pieces, the former (for guitar and alto flute) almost too reticent and hesitant beside the richer textures of the latter, which is enhanced by the additional solo role given to the oboe d'amore as well as its beautifully laid out orchestral accompaniment. To the Edge of Dream is in effect a guitar concerto, with a wider range of mood and an even more developed role for the orchestra than Vers, l'Arc-en-ciel, Palma. It provides a particularly satisfying focus for a sensitively performed and well recorded disc. Even if we hear rather more of the guitar relative to the orchestra than we would in the concert hall, this is not unreasonably artificial.

I Hear the Water Dreaming

I Hear the Water Dreaming[d]. Toward the Sea I[a]. Le fils des étoiles[b]. Toward the Sea II[bd]. And then I knew 'twas Wind[bc]. Toward the Sea III[b]. Air
Patrick Gallois fl [a]Göran Söllscher gtr [b]Fabrice Pierre hp [c]Pierre-Henri Xuereb va
[d]BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
DG 20/21 453 459-2GH (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●

This disc is a follow-up to Oliver Knussen's selection of orchestral works on the Gramophone Award-winning 'Quotation of Dream', and is in one sense at least a far bolder concept, risking the inclusion of three different versions of the same work, Toward the Sea, which in duration amount to about half of the total playing time.

Yet the risk is justified. The three short but beautifully fashioned movements of Toward the Sea, inspired by Melville's great novel Moby Dick, are vintage Takemitsu in their spellbinding evocativeness and economy, and throughout these performances Patrick Gallois' range of tone colour and sensitivity to line are of exceptional quality. Even if you finally conclude that the original version with guitar is, after all, the best, the variations of texture and atmosphere which the different instrumentations provide make for absorbing listening.

The rest of the programme easily sustains this level, although And then I knew 'twas Wind (citing a poem by Emily Dickinson) is rather more loosely constructed than its companions, underlining just how rarely the pejorative term 'improvisatory' can be applied to Takemitsu's refined and understated art. Gallois and his colleagues don't have the field to themselves in this repertory, and some listeners will rightly value Aurèle Nicolet's accounts for Philips of And then I knew 'twas Wind, Toward the Sea III (nla) and Air. But the superb technical quality of the recording and the subtle yet alert responsiveness of the interpretations make this an outstanding release. It's a dream of a disc.

I Hear the Water Dreaming[a]. riverrun[b]. A String around Autumn[c]. A Way A Lone II
[a]Sharon Bezaly fl [c]Philip Dukes va
[b]Noriko Ogawa pf BBC National Orchestra of Wales / Tadaaki Otaka
BIS BIS-CD1300 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●●

Since Takemitsu's evolution into self-confessed Romantic, virtually every major label has released something by him, so Otaka has stiff competition, notably a fine reading of Water Dreaming by Patrick Gallois (reviewed above). A Way A Lone II is included on Rudolf Werthen's admirable survey of Takemitsu's film and concert music. Aided effectively by the soloists, Otaka's interpretations compare well.

In riverrun Takemitsu approached closer to the conventional soloist-ensemble than usual. Noriko Ogawa, who has recorded the complete piano solos for BIS, judges the balance sensitively, preparing the ground for that moment when the orchestra leaves the piano to decorate the silence with a few farewell notes.

riverrun and A Way A Lone draw inspiration from Finnegans Wake. Leif Hasselgren notes a parallel between the circular structure of Joyce's novel and the way Takemitsu's music seems to 'start from nowhere and disappear into the same nowhere'. For all his acknowledged debt to French Impressionism, and to Japanese traditions, his early interest in electronic music – where sounds appear and fade like headlights on the horizon or plants flowering in a time-lapse film – has undoubtedly had a strong influence.

Sharon Bezaly's flute playing intensifies the feeling that Water Dreaming is a perfect crash-course in later Takemitsu, full of references to his influences yet identifiable at any moment as pure, individual and personal Takemitsu, and always bewitching.

Thomas Tallis British c1505-1585

GROVE Tallis was organist of the Benedictine Priory of Dover in 1532, then probably organist at St Mary-at-Hill, London (1537-38). About 1538 he moved to Waltham Abbey where, at the dissolution (1540), he was a senior lay clerk. In 1541-2 he was a lay clerk at Canterbury Cathedral, and in 1543 became a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal; he remained in the royal household until his death acting as organist, though he was not so designated until after 1570. In 1575 Elizabeth I granted him a licence, with Byrd, to print and publish music, as a result of which the Cantiones sacrae, an anthology of Latin motets by both composers, appeared later that year.

His earliest surviving works are probably three votive antiphons (Salve intemerata virgo, Ave rosa sine spinis and Ave Dei patris filia) in the traditional structure common up to c1530: division into two halves, with sections in reduced and full textures. Other early works include the Magnificat and another votive antiphon, Sancte Deus, both for men's voices. Two of his most sumptuous works, the six-voice antiphon Gaude gloriosa Dei mater and the seven-voice Mass ' Puer natus est nobis ', date from Mary Tudor's brief reign (1553-8), the former featuring musical imagery and melismatic writing, the latter expert handling of current techniques of structural imitation and choral antiphony. He also composed six Latin responsories and seven Office hymns for the Sarum rite and large-scale Latin psalm motets early in Elizabeth's reign. The 40-voice motet, Spem in alium, an astonishing technical achievement, may have been composed in 1573.

Tallis was one of the first to write for the new Anglican liturgy of 1547-53. Much of this music, including If ye love me and Hear the voice and prayer, is in four parts with clear syllabic word-setting and represents the prototype of the early English anthem. His Dorian Service is in a similar style. Among his Elizabethan vernacular music are nine four-voice psalm tunes (1567) and various English adaptations of Latin motets (e.g. Absterge Domine); the Latin Lamentations and the paired five-voice Magnificat and Nunc dimittis also date from this period. His instrumental works include keyboard arrangements of four partsongs and many cantus firmus settings and a small but distinguished contribution to the repertory of consort music which includes two fine In Nomines. Tallis's early music is relatively undistinguished, with neither Taverner's mastery of the festal style nor Tye's modernisms. But much of his later work is among the finest in Europe, ranging from the artless perfection of his short anthems to the restrained pathos of the Lamentations.

Beati immaculati

Beati immaculati. Puer natus est nobis. Mass 'Puer natus est nobis'. Viderunt omnes. Dies sanctificatus. Celeste organum. Viderunt omnes. Suscipe quaeso Dominus. Gaude gloriosa Dei mater
Chapelle du Roi / Alistair Dixon
Signum Records SIGCD003 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997

The illuminating insert-notes place Mary's short reign within the bewilderingly stormy context of the 16th century with a calm understanding that enables the listener to see how this Latin music came to be written. Incidentally, the first piece was originally an English setting of Beatus vir. Sandon says it falls naturally into place with its Latin text. But the verses in the booklet don't exactly correspond to what is being sung, which raises an unnecessary question mark. Sandon's edition of the Proper Salisbury chants for the Third Mass of Christmas are performed between the polyphonic items. Meticulously researched, they serve as a foil to the sumptuous settings of the Ordinary.

If only they had been sung with more solemnity and gusto, omitting those irritating little bursts of volume on the high notes! All these chants would have sounded more authentic at a slower tempo with the occasional semi-metrical dactyl: as it is, they comes across rather as a poor relation beside the magnificence of Tallis's seven-part polyphony. The polyphonic singing is exemplary, the clarity of the individual parts and the rhythmic interplay well under control. The singers enter into the spirit of the liturgical texts, in particular in the third section of the Agnus Dei. Their interpretation of the final motet, Gaude gloriosa, at times almost touches the visionary.

Lamentations of Jeremiah

Lamentations of Jeremiah. Motets – Absterge Domine; Derelinquat impius; Mihi autem nimis; O sacrum convivium; In jejunio et fletu; O salutaris hostia; In manus tuas; O nata lux de lumine. Salve intemerata virgo
The Tallis Scholars / Peter Phillips
Gimell CDGIM025 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●

This, the third volume of the survey by The Tallis Scholars of the music of the Tudor composer, Thomas Tallis, contains the well-known Lamentations, eight motets, and the extended motet Salve intemerata virgo. The Lamentations and motets are typical of the style of late Renaissance English composers. The overall mood is one of considerable austerity and their simplicity is indicative of the probability of their having been written for the private use of loyal Catholics rather than for formal ritual. Salve intemerata virgo, on the other hand, looks back to the glories of the late 15th century. In particular, Tallis's use of the phrygian mode gives the work as a whole a strong sense of the medieval. Despite this disparity of styles the Tallis Scholars acquit themselves, as always, with great distinction. In the Lamentations and motets they achieve an appropriate sense of intimacy, while in Salve intermerata virgo they rise fully to the challenges of one of the more extended and demanding examples of Tudor choral composition. In addition the formidable challenges which this latter work sets for the conductor, such as the sense of pace, variation of dynamics, and overall architecture of the work, are all extremely well handled by Peter Phillips. The recording is very fine.

Lamentations of Jeremiah[a]. Absterge Domine[b]. In jejunio et fletu[a]. If ye love me[a]. O sacrum convivium[b]. Audivi vocem de caelo[a]. Derelinquat impius[a]. Salvator mundi, salva nos I[a]. Solfa-ing Song a 5[b]. In Nomine a 4 No 1[b]. Benedictus[a]. Fond youth is a bubble[b]. Psalm Tunes for Archbishop Parker's Psalter[a] – No 3, Why fum'th in sight; No 8, Tallis's Canon. Like as the doleful dove[b]. When shall my sorrowful sighing slake[b]. Te lucis ante terminum I[a]
[a]Theatre of Voices / Paul Hillier;
[b]The King's Noyse / David Douglass
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7154 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

This is imaginative programme planning – atmospheric renaissance music performed by choral and instrumental forces in amiable juxtaposition rather than combination. The 16-strong Theatre of Voices, who are based at the University of California at Davis, sing throughout with a dark-browed gravitas and warmth of feeling that are thoroughly appropriate and give considerable pleasure. The secular music plus (surprisingly perhaps, but interestingly) Absterge Domine and O sacrum convivium are done by The King's Noyse, an expert renaissance violin consort, though they realise the sombre harmonic undertow so characteristic of Tallis less successfully than the singers. It ends with the tranquil evening office hymn, Te lucis ante terminum (complete with its alternating plainchant). Unlike most English groups in this repertoire, the Theatre of Voices do not use falsettists (authenticity may be on their side). Compared with The Tallis Scholars, the high-lying tenor parts here – often assigned by other groups to male altos – are perhaps not always impeccably blended, and the female voices sometimes have a slight flatward colouring. But, in compensation, this American group certainly taps a rich vein of pathos in this affecting music while remaining stylistically convincing, and Tallis's two most famous psalm-tunes are done with much relish. A distinctive, and on the whole, commendable issue, warmly recorded.

Additional recommendation

Lamentations of Jeremiah

'Lamenta': Brumel Lamentations A Ferrabosco I De lamentatione Ieremiae prophetae Palestrina Lamentations for Holy Saturday Tallis Lamentations of Jeremiah R White Lamentations of Jeremiah
The Tallis Scholars / Peter Phillips
Gimell CDGIM996 (73 minutes: DDD: 6/98). Ⓕ
Texts and translations included

A compilation of 16th-century Tenebrae music for Holy Week. The Lamentations texts set are quite different, but all show an intensity and a devotional power that work cumulatively to produce a remarkably satisfying disc.

Spem in alium

Te lucis ante terminum. Salvator mundi. Spem in alium. In jejunio et fletu. O salutaris hostia. Lamentations I and II. Miserere. Mass for four voices
Magnificat / Philip Cave
Linn Records CKD075 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1999 ●●●

This is quite simply the best performance of Tallis's 40-part Spem in alium to date. Sung by a constellation of singers, many of them familiar names from other well-established choral groups, it is a gripping realisation. The effect of the slowly moving harmonies is enhanced by a well-conceived and very positive use of dynamics. Precise entries, gently undulating rhythms that are wonderfully supple, and then those firm antiphonal phrases – one group of choirs answered by another at 'Creator coeli et terra' – raise the tension, until we twice almost miss a heart-beat at the well-placed rest before 'Respice ...'.

That great motet, so central to the whole programme, is well supported by the four-part Mass and the delightful group of other pieces for various combinations of voices. The hymn Te lucis with its alternating chant strophes sounding so very English (almost too perfect for what was, after all, just run-of-the-mill everyday chant!) has the tempo relationship of the chant to the polyphony just right, which is a tremendous plus, rarely achieved.

Spem in alium. Salvator mundi (I, II). Sancte Deus, sancte fortis. Gaude gloriosa Dei mater. Miserere nostri. Loquebantur variis linguis
The Tallis Scholars / Peter Phillips
Gimell CDGIM006 (43 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1984 ●●

For the 1985 quatercentenary of Tallis's death, Peter Phillips and The Tallis Scholars produced this version of Spem in alium; in many respects it is clearly the most successful ever recorded. Not only is the choir superb and the interpretation an intelligent one; this is also the only recording in which the eight choirs seem genuinely to sing from different positions in the stereo spread, a technical achievement that leads to some thrilling antiphonal exchanges. Above all, Phillips's reading is a confident and assertive one. The effect is more that of a plea than a prayer, and the overall shaping is most characterful. Inevitably there are problems of balance, both at the top of the texture (several of the trebles are given rather too much prominence) and in the middle, where in full sections the music of the inner voices sometimes blends too readily into rich chords rather than emerging as a complex web of counterpoint. But these are relatively small complaints to be made against what is frankly an outstanding achievement. This is a Spem in alium to be cherished.

No one who cares for Tudor choral music should be without this disc.

Tan Dun

Chinese/America 1957

Growing up during the Cutural Revolution, Tan Dun received no early musical training. After working as a violinist, at the age of 19 he entered the composition department of Beijing's reopened Central Conservatory of Music. There he encountered Western music and was stimulated by visits of guest composers Goehr, Crumb and Takemitsu. He moved to New York in 1986.

Yi^2

Tan Dun Yi^2 Rouse Concert de Gaudí
Sharon Isbin gtr Gulbenkian Orchestra / Mu Hai Tang
Teldec 8573-81830-2 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●●

These two concertos will come as a shock to anyone who believes that guitar music is about Spanishry and tunes to carry away in memory's pocket, but if approached with open ears the shock should benefit both them and the guitar. Chrisopher Rouse's tribute to Gaudí is as spectacular and unconventional as its eponym's cathedral in Barcelona – and it is at least finished! The strummed opening seems to herald another Concierto de Aranjuez but it is utterly deceptive; any connection with traditional Spanish music is soon submerged in a polychromatic succession of episodes.

Tan Dun's *Yi*² recalls the shamanistic rituals that accompanied burials near his childhood home, but 'does not relate to the death of any one person'. Intense orchestral passages represent 'the weeping and wailing by everyone present – a part of the ritual'. The Chinese lute, the pipa, was in the composer's mind but here he fuses Chinese traditions with elements of flamenco. The music has been described as 'flamenco meets Stravinsky in the Hard Rock Café', which leaves out only the Chinese element that pervades the whole of this astonishing fabric of strange sounds and fluctuating emotions. It is perhaps the most remarkable work yet written for guitar and orchestra. No superlative would be excessive in describing Sharon Isbin's performances in this vivid recording. Her work on behalf of the guitar's present and future remains unparalleled, a continuation of that of Segovia and Julian Bream, supported by skill, musicality and seemingly boundless energy.

Symphony 1997

Yo-Yo Ma vc Imperial Bells Ensemble of China; Yip's Children's Choir; Hong Kong Philharmonic Orchestra / Tan Dun
Sony Classical SK63368 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1997 ●

Writing history into music is nothing new. The reunification of Hong Kong with China has inspired numerous commissions of one sort or another, Dun's Symphony 1997 being among them. However, few will have utilised musical instruments that date back 2,400 years. The bianzhong is a family of tuned bells that, collectively, spans a five-octave range. They were discovered in an ancient tomb that was excavated as recently as 1978, and Dun's symphony gives them pride of place. In 'Heaven' (the symphony's first main episode), the bianzhong's grandeur 'rises from the earth's grave', though its presence is scarcely less imposing elsewhere. Symphony 1997 opens and closes with a simple, touching 'Song of Peace'. It is cast in three sections ('Heaven', 'Earth' and 'Mankind'), the solo cello taking the role of commentator through wordless song. 'Water' (track 8) is a sub-division of 'Earth' and includes a demonstrative solo cadenza reminiscent of the finale from Kodály's Op 8 Solo Sonata, whereas the following track has the orchestra slowly re-enter like some huge, sonorous community.

Needless to say, Yo-Yo Ma's playing has great panache and intensity. 'Earth' represents Dun at his most characteristically inventive, but elsewhere dominant influences include Chinese popular music, various European late-romantics, Hindemith, Stravinsky and Varèse. There are also reminiscences of Beethoven and Puccini. Symphony 1997 is a highly theatrical, lavishly scored montage, which is frequently rhythmic, richly atmospheric and with merging styles that reflect both China and the neighbour that has once again become family.

Sergey Taneyev

Russian 1856-1915

At the Moscow Conservatory Taneyev studied with Nikolay Rubinstein (piano) and Tchaikovsky (composition), whose friend he became, giving the Moscow première of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto no.1 (1875) and succeeding him as teacher at the conservatory (1878). He eventually became director (1885-9) though it was as a teacher that he had the greater influence (his pupils included Skryabin, Rakhmaninov and Glier). An eclectic and conservative at heart, he was early drawn to the music of Bach and the Renaissance contrapuntists; these studies, allied to his diligence in formal planning, gave him a compositional skill unsurpassed by his Russian contemporaries. His most successful works are the large-scale instrumental pieces, particularly the fluent sonata structures, as in the C minor Symphony (1898) and the First String Quintet (1901), where his craftsmanship and contrapuntalism lend uncommon precision and polish to the musical argument. But his unoriginality and rejection of the indigenous Russian tradition resulted in conventional melodies and wooden musical characterization, for example in his ambitious opera The Oresteia (1887-94). Apart from the important chamber works (11 string quartets, three quintets), Taneyev wrote choruses and many songs (some in Esperanto); his last work, the cantata At the Reading of a Psalm (1915), was acclaimed and considered by some his masterpiece. He wrote books on counterpoint and on canon.

Symphonies Nos 2 and 4

Symphonies – No 2 in B flat minor;
No 4 in C minor, Op 12
Russian State Symphony Orchestra / Valeri Polyansky
Chandos CHAN9998 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

Polyansky provides a splendidly passionate and invigorating introduction to music that we really should know better in the West. The Fourth Symphony has always been the most popular of Taneyev's symphonies, and with good reason. He writes a powerful opening Allegro and a well-built finale, but for all his symphonic skills here, it is in the middle two movements that the most personal music is to be found. The scherzo dances along with the vitality that many a Russian composer has brought to comparable movements, and with the rhythmic quirks that he liked so much; but it is in the Adagio that something more is discovered. Taneyev has routinely been reproached for lacking melodic distinction, sometimes with reason, but this superb movement comes close to the manner of Bruckner, or sometimes Mahler. For English ears, the sense of 'stately sorrow' serves as a reminder that the phrase was coined of his own music by Elgar.

Conductor and players make of this fine music a tragic statement, and it is here that they are at their most intense. Polyansky also produces a strong case for the Second Symphony, his sense of structure holding the rather oddly organised opening movement together, as a powerful chorale passage has to be integrated with a sonata Allegro. He does not play down the suggestions of Dvořák, whom Taneyev clearly found sympathetic. This is a striking, and very well-recorded, pair of performances, well worth the attention of lovers of Russian music.

Giuseppe Tartini

Italian 1692-1770

GROVE After abandoning plans for a monastic career Tartini studied in Assisi (probably with Cernohorsk‡) and by 1714 had joined the orchestra at Ancona. He later spent time in Venice and Padua, where he settled in 1721 as principal violinist at the basilica of S Antonio. He worked there until 1765 except for a period in Prague (1723-6). Besides performing with success, he founded in 1727-8 a 'school' of violin instruction; his many pupils included JG Graun, Nardini and Naumann.

Tartini was one of the foremost Italian instrumental composers, writing over 400 works: these include violin concertos and sonatas (many with virtuoso solo parts), trio sonatas and sonatas for string ensemble. Most have three movements, ordered slow-fast-fast (sonatas) or fast-slow-fast (concertos). His later works in particular approach Classical structures and display galant features, including regular four-bar melodic phrases. Elaborate cadence formulae are especially characteristic. He also composed some sacred music. Noteworthy among his writings are a work on violin playing and ornamentation, Traité des agréments de la musique – published only in1771 but thought to have been written earlier (L Mozart, in 1756, is thought to have borrowed from it, but it may be the other way round) – and two treatises on the acoustical foundations of harmony (1754, 1767), in which his discovery of the Difference tone phenomenon is discussed.

Violin Concertos

Violin Concertos – D, D15; G, D78;
B flat, D123; G, D80; A minor, D115
Gordan Nikolitch vn Auvergne Orchestra / Arie van Beek
Olympia OCD475 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1996

The Auvergne Orchestra is not a period instrument ensemble but it demonstrates a lively and playful rapport with late Baroque music. The performances are full of vitality and caprice. Nikolitch is a sensitive player who is constantly aware of the underlying poetry in Tartini's music, above all in slow movements. In these Tartini sometimes appended poetic mottoes, often in secret code, mainly drawn from Tasso and Metastasio. These established the mood of the movement in question and, more and more, became the focal point of the work. Sometimes, too, Tartini would provide a concerto with an alternative slow movement, one of which he might regard as definitive. One such instance is included in this programme (in the G major Concerto, D80) where, happily, Nikolitch gives us both slow movements. The dance-like character of many of the outer movements is an attractive feature of Tartini's concertos. Bright and clear recorded sound.

Violin Concertos – C, D4[a]; E minor, D56[b]; F, D63[c]; G, D75[d] 🅿
[ad]Federico Guglielmo, [c]Carlo Lazari vns L'Arte dell'Arco / [b]Giovanni Guglielmo vn
Dynamic CDS220 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

The works in this fourth volume of Tartini's violin concertos all supposedly belong to the composer's earliest period, that is to say the years between *c*1720 and 1735. One of them, in E minor, has long been popular with soloists and has often been recorded. The remaining three, however, are less familiar and, it is claimed, here make their first appearance on disc. The C major piece sounds as if it might be the earliest concerto here, though many of the distinctive hallmarks of Tartini's style are firmly in place – little chromaticisms and short-lived, playful melodic patterns in the outer movements, and wistfully lyrical solo cantilenas in the tenderly expressive slow one. The author of the accompanying note erroneously claims the tonal plan is more imaginative than in Vivaldi's concertos. Tartini simply avails himself of a more advanced pool of stylistic knowledge, in no sense improving on the art of his forebears – especially Vivaldi.

An enjoyable programme with engaging solo contributions from Guglielmo. Listeners will notice the acid quality of the tutti playing, and a recorded sound that does little to ameliorate it, though they will quickly adjust to both.

Violin Sonatas

Tartini Violin Sonata in G minor, 'Devil's Trill' (arr Kreisler) Corelli Violin Sonata in D minor, 'La Folia', Op 5 No 12 (arr Kreisler) Nardini Sonata (arr Flesch) Vitali Chaconne (arr David)
Ida Haendel vn Geoffrey Parsons pf
Testament SBT1258 (59 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
From HMV ASD3352. Recorded 1970s ●

This is a genuinely great fiddle record, one to place alongside those in which Heifetz, Szigeti or Elman (to name but three) tackle similar repertoire. Indeed, if it's possible to make this music sound so beautiful, why does the 'historic performing' lobby kick up so much noisy opposition? Okay, one understands all the counter-arguments; and, yes, these are arrangements – which is different. But to take just one small example, at around 2'02" into the opening Adagio of Nardini's Sonata, Haendel suddenly dips from mezzo-forte to piano, as if she is switching from a serene smile to a questioning glance. The effect is both subtle and dramatic. Corelli's La Folia and Tartini's The Devil's Trill Sonata are similarly expressive. As for Vitali's Chaconne, Haendel admits that she was knocked out when she heard Heifetz play the piece and in some ways her impassioned performance resembles Heifetz's interpretatively spectacular 1950 recording (of Respighi's arrangement; Haendel plays David's more comprehensive alternative). Always there's that ecstatic control of melodic line, holding fast to the harmonic thread – musically, patiently and with the inimitable touch of a true craftsman. The recording is superb, and the partnership with Geoffrey Parsons is beautifully balanced. A truly wonderful CD.

Violin Sonatas – G minor, 'Devil's Trill', B:g5; A minor, B:a3. Variations on a Gavotte by Corelli, B:F11 – excerpts. Pastorale in A, B:A16 (all arr Manze) 🅿
Andrew Manze vn
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7213 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

The romantic connotations of Tartini's Violin Sonata in G minor, the Devil's Trill, deriving from the composer's own account of an appearance by the devil in a dream, have contributed towards making it one of the great morceaux favoris of the 19th and 20th centuries. It is, furthermore, just about the only remaining piece of Baroque music where a piano accompaniment can still be countenanced without uniformly raised eyebrows. Some traditions do, indeed, die hard. But, of course, Tartini never intended anything of the kind; in fact, he probably never envisaged a keyboard continuo part at all, since none of his surviving autographs contains a figured bass for keyboard realisation. They do, however, mostly include unfigured bass parts though, as Tartini himself remarked, he provided them, often as an afterthought, and more for reasons of convention than any other.

Andrew Manze sees this as a justification for playing all the pieces in his programme without bass accompaniment. On the whole the experiment works well, since the expressive content and structural puissance of the music lies foremost in Tartini's melodic line. There are moments, however, where harmonic support from the bass is required, and at such times, above all in the Devil's Trill Sonata, Manze has had to introduce chords in the violin part to compensate for the absence of a cello. Manze's athletic technique, his musical sensibility and perhaps, too, his engaging sense of fun, ensure fascination and entertainment in equal measure. None will regret the passing of the piano in this context. A stimulating release, beautifully recorded, and rich in fantasy.

Sir John Tavener

British 1944-

GROVE Tavener studied with Berkeley and Lumsdaine at the Royal Academy of Music (1961-5). Most of his music is explicitly religious, influenced by late Stravinsky but containing strong, bold images from a variety of other sources; his biblical cantata The Whale (1966) enjoyed a vogue. An early leaning towards Catholic devotion reached a consummation in the Crucifixion meditation Ultimos ritos (1972) and the opera Thérèse (1979). In 1976 he converted to the Russian Orthodox faith, composing in a simpler, luminous style (Liturgy of St John Chrysostom for unaccompanied chorus, 1978; Protecting Veil for cello and orchestra, 1989).

The Protecting Veil

Awards 1992

Tavener The Protecting Veil. Thrinos
Britten Solo Cello Suite No 3
Steven Isserlis vc London Symphony Orchestra / Gennadi Rozhdestvensky
Virgin Classics 561849-2 Ⓜ
(74 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1991 ●●●

First impressions of The Protecting Veil are of a consonant, major-key sweetness that could portend a pastoral after the style of Samuel Barber. Yet it soon becomes evident that this is not neo-Romantic music. The religious aura of this Hymn to the Mother of God explains its style – moving between simple contemplativeness and heartfelt lament – but not the enthusiasm with which audiences have greeted it. One suspects that its most telling effect – the return of the opening idea with heightened eloquence at the end, which then dissolves into potent images of grief – is one major reason for its impact. Many listeners will also welcome Tavener's total rejection of contemporary complexity, though there is a price to pay for this in occasional passages where the musical thought grows dangerously desultory. But this performance, well recorded, is ideal in every way, with a soloist who shapes the long, simple lines effortlessly, and a conductor who is never tempted to push the music on beyond its natural pace.

Isserlis also plays Britten's Third Suite with free expression and fine control. After the Tavener this is the music of a troubled, doubting mind, and a feeling of dramatic tension replaces his meditative ritual. As with The Protecting Veil, the recording is superbly natural and immediate.

...Depart in Peace

...Depart in Peace. My Gaze Is Ever Upon You. Tears of the Angels

Patricia Rozario sop Matthew Rooke tambura
BT Scottish Ensemble / Clio Gould vn
Linn Records CKD085 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●●

The most immediately striking work on this disc is the meditative, extremely beautiful ... Depart in Peace, for soprano, violin, tambura and strings. Dedicated to the memory of Tavener's father, it is a setting of the Nunc dimittis, interspersed with Alliuatic antiphons. The work follows a hypnotic sequence of repeating segments – an ecstatic string sequence with soprano (the first Alliuatic antiphon); the Song of Simeon (soprano, solo violin, tambura and cellos); an exquisitely beautiful, hymn-like sequence (the second Alliuatic antiphon) and finally an ecstatic Middle-Eastern sounding chant (the third Alliuatic antiphon). As the work progresses the antiphons lengthen on each repetition – the effect, over 25 minutes, is spellbinding and stunning.

Tavener describes My Gaze Is Ever Upon You as 'a series of sixteen gazes, moments and ecstatic breaths, written in Trinitarian guise' for solo violin, with taped violin and string bass drone. Although less obviously immediate to the ear than ... Depart in Peace, it nevertheless weaves a magical spell, as does Tears of the Angels for solo violin and strings, which Tavener asks to be played 'at the extreme breaking point of tenderness'. All is performed with great authority, conviction and beauty, and Patricia Rozario's singing in ... Depart in Peace is extraordinarily fine. A beautiful disc.

Akathist of Thanksgiving

James Bowman, Timothy Wilson countertens
Martin Baker org Westminster Abbey Choir; BBC Singers; BBC Symphony Orchestra / Martin Neary
Arc of Light SK64446 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded live in 1994

With the success of the ecstatic Protecting Veil it has perhaps been easy to forget how rigorous and austere Tavener's music was only a few years previously. In 1986, his music had reached an extreme of 'inner silence'. Eis Thanaton was the work which broke through the barrier, moving painfully from darkness to light, but nevertheless the blaze of light of pieces such as the Akathist was hardly to be predicted. An akathistos is a long hymn used in the Orthodox rite, prescribed liturgically in the modern Russian use to be sung at Matins on the Saturday in the fifth week of Great Lent. The prototype akathist (others were written later) is addressed to the Mother of God and was written during the seventh century. The text Tavener sets was written strictly according to liturgical structure by Archpriest Gregory Petrov in a Siberian prison camp shortly before his death in the 1940s. The poetry is remarkable, for the quality and variety of its life-affirming imagery as much as for the fact that it was written at all in circumstances of such adversity.

The danger in setting such poetry of course is that the music will be correspondingly diverse and lack structure. Alhough Tavener does not entirely succeed in generating a real harmonic structure for the work, the score is a catalogue of riches. The dark-hued, quasi Bulgarian male-voice sections, the sparkling countertenor duets, the variety of the scoring and the deeply moving recurring 'Amin', and the unexpected quiet climax in the ninth kontakion sung by a solo countertenor, are all extraordinarily powerful. They are very well sung indeed on this live recording (though the tenors have trouble maintaining control when in the higher registers); in particular the trebles are beyond reproach, and the duets by Bowman and Wilson wonderfully sensitive.

Akhmatova Songs

Akhmatova Songs[a]. Diódia[b]. Many Years[c].
The World[d]
[acd]Patricia Rozario sop Vanbrugh Quartet
(Gregory Ellis, Elizabeth Charleson vns
Simon Aspell va Christopher Marwood vc)
Hyperion CDA67217 Ⓕ
(63 minutes: DDD) ●●

The centrepiece of this disc devoted to works by John Tavener is Diódia, the third and latest of his string quartets. Tavener appears to have reserved the string quartet medium almost exclusively as a vessel into which to pour the distillations of some of his largest and most important compositions. Just as Tavener's first quartet, The Hidden Treasure (1989), drew material from the large-scale choral piece The Resurrection, and the second, The Last Sleep of the Virgin (1991), from the choral work The Apocalypse, so similarly Diódia (1995) grew out of material drawn from The Toll Houses.

Based on a book by a Californian Orthodox monk, the large-scale choral work The Toll Houses deals with the concept that symbolises 'the posthumous states of being of the soul, where it is decided whether the soul spends a certain amount of time in hell and a certain time in heaven [sic]'. Tavener describes Diódia as 'liquid metaphysics', and that is an excellent description of this wonderfully meditative and haunting music. As with all of Tavener's work, it eschews traditional form and instead unfolds as a series of musical episodes that alternate with each other in almost mantric fashion. The overall atmosphere is contemplative, with passages of luminous beauty, but these are interrupted at various points by some more energetic, worldly episodes. A particularly haunting passage featuring a repeated rhythmic figure played on bandir (drum) makes several appearances throughout and also brings this extraordinary work to a close. The Vanbrugh Quartet's intense and committed performance here is of the highest calibre.

The remaining items on the disc all feature music for soprano and string quartet, beautifully performed in these recordings by Patricia Rozario, for whom Tavener has composed many pieces. The World is a movingly intense setting of an equally astonishing and moving poem by Kathleen Raine, and its inclusion, together with the austerely beautiful Akhmatova Songs, originally composed for soprano and cello but heard here in an arrangement for soprano and string quartet, make a welcome addition to the catalogue. In sum, then, an indispensable and thoroughly recommendable disc.

Eternity's Sunrise

Eternity's Sunrise[a]. Funeral Canticle[b].
Petra: A Ritual Dream[c]. Sappho: Lyrical Fragments[d].
Song of the Angel[e]
[ade]Patricia Rozario, [d]Julia Gooding sops
[bc]George Mosley bar [e]Andrew Manze vn
Academy of Ancient Music [bc]Chorus and Orchestra / Paul Goodwin
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7231 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded 1998

Once upon a time we dreamt of breaking down musical barriers, but nowadays we can happily recount how many have been broken. This particular venture reconciles genres and generations on various fronts – between father and son, religious denominations, old and new musical modes, poetry and liturgy, and old instruments newly employed. The title-piece, Eternity's Sunrise, was born in the wake of loss. Tavener's late father was its prompting inspiration, and Diana, Princess of Wales its dedicatee. The tonal structure is simple: earth is represented by the solo soprano, angels by hand bells and heaven by a modest instrumental ensemble. It is a deceptively simple work, and rendered especially appealing in this context by Harmonia Mundi's vivid recording. Tavener devotees will love it.

The brief and warmly harmonised Song of the Angel for soprano and solo violin is set at a further distance but works well. Petra: A Ritual Dream calls on the Greek poet Giorgios Seferis to help reinvent the transcendent (represented, in terms of music, by violin harmonics). George Mosley intones the text, backed by a small chorus. Some of Tavener's word setting is fairly dramatic, and there is a folkloric slant to selected melodic lines.

Tavener's Sappho: Lyrical Fragments (1981), the earliest work on the programme, is set for two sopranos with brief instrumental interludes between sections. Mysterious yet gripping, the Fragments owe something to Stravinsky (of, say, Apollo) whereas the last and longest piece on the disc – the Funeral Canticle for Tavener's father – cradles its texts between disparate styles, from plainchant to a reassuring variation on the Bach-style chorale. Could this be the son holding the father's hand, or vice versa? Whatever the unconscious subtext, Funeral Canticle is probably the most durable piece here.

Innocence

Innocence. The Lamb. The Tiger. The Annunciation. Hymn to the Mother of God. Hymn for the Dormition of the Mother of God. Little Requiem for Father Malachy Lynch. Song for Athene
Patricia Rozario sop Leigh Nixon ten Graham Titus bass Alice Neary vc Charles Fullbrook bells
Martin Baker org Westminster Abbey Choir; English Chamber Orchestra / Martin Neary
Sony Classical SK66613 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1994-95 ●

This is recommended as a single disc to convince anyone of the mastery of John Tavener. As well as the superb new work, Innocence, specially written for Westminster Abbey – encapsulating in 25 minutes what many of his more expansive pieces have told us – we have a rich and rewarding selection of other shorter choral pieces. They include not just the established favourites like the two intense Blake settings, The Lamb and The Tiger, and the two hymns for the Mother of God – here more openly passionate than in previous recordings – but the bald and direct Little Requiem for Father Malachy Lynch, the sharply terraced Annunciation and the Song for Athene, all among Tavener's most beautiful and touching inspirations. The theme of Innocents is Innocent Victims, which prompted Tavener to compose a ritual built on texts from varied sources, Christian, Jewish, Islamic and Hindu. The result is both moving and atmospheric, with the climax introducing one element after another in rich crescendo, to provide a resolution very comparable to Britten's in the War Requiem.

Neary draws intensely committed singing from his choir, with the principal soloists, Patricia Rozario and Graham Titus, both excellent, as well as the tenor, Leigh Nixon All the performances have a warmth of expressiveness which defies any idea of ecclesiastical detach-ment. The discs of shorter Tavener works from both The Sixteen (Collins – nla) and St George's Chapel Choir (Hyperion) offer excellent performances of the four shortest and best-known works, but they seem relatively cool next to Neary's, whose reading of the Hymn to the Mother of God is overwhelmingly powerful within its three-minute span.

The recording vividly captures Westminster Abbey's acoustic with extreme dynamics used impressively to convey space and distance.

Lamentations and Praises

Chanticleer; Handel and Haydn Society of Boston Ensemble / Joseph Jennings
Teldec 0927-41342-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and texts included ●

At a first listening, this work would seem to defy analysis. Is it a masterpiece? Or might it be a self-indulgent extravaganza? It has been labelled a 'liturgical drama'. We are led through a series of powerful scenes depicting the death and resurrection of Christ. The few quiet notes of the opening theme, which reappear, transformed, at the close are a pointer to what follows, much of which is of great beauty, tenderness and drama.

The listener will notice at once, with some amazement, the almost constant incongruous use of an English text, sung with voices carefully groomed by a Greek psalmista to produce the ornaments and microtones of a non-Western tradition, normally reserved for Greek or Church Slavonic. Further unusual borrowings include the moving threefold Greek threnody with its lamenting descending scalic passages for solo voices, the bass at one point reaching a softly fading, incredibly low C sharp. In direct contrast, the chorus sings a slow rhythmic hymn of praise. The procession into Hades is dramatic and tragic. Christ's trampling down by death is portrayed by the crashing percussion with heavenly and earthly choirs uniting to proclaim 'Risen! Risen! Risen!'.

Drama, tragedy, final victory – but don't be misled: this is poles apart from the ethos of the holy Orthodox liturgy. With all its Eastern trappings, it remains one man's personal insight and interpretation. A masterpiece, or a very personal extravaganza? It is for you, the listener, to decide.

Svyati

God is With Us. Song for Athene. The Lamb. 💰
The Tiger. Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. Funeral Ikos.
Two Hymns to the Mother of God. Love Bade Me
Welcome. As One Who Has Slept.
The Lord's Prayer. Svyati[a]
[a]Tim Hugh vc St John's College Choir, Cambridge / Christopher Robinson
Naxos 8 555256 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 2000 ●●

If John Tavener's reputation were to rest solely on his unaccompanied choral music and nothing else, then his stature as one of the most striking and original composers working today would be just as high. Much of Tavener's creativity is founded on the traditions of his Orthodox faith and of Orthodox chant, and yet curiously, intentionally or unintentionally, he has also, through works such as those presented here, extended the tradition of English choral music. Through their popularity The Lamb, The Tiger and Song for Athene have become immovably imbedded in our choral tradition, but one need only listen to the splendid Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, for instance, to find a unique symbiosis of Eastern and Western traditions at work.

Many of the works presented on this CD have enjoyed wide circulation on numerous Tavener-only and compilation discs, but the performances here from the Choir of St John's College, Cambridge, under the direction of Christopher Robinson, have much to recommend them and, of course, Naxos's super-budget price makes this issue all the more desirable, especially for those seeking a survey of Tavener's choral music for the first time.

The inclusion of Svyati for solo cello and choir, with its echoes of The Protecting Veil, enhances the disc's desirability even more, and opens a window on to Tavener's more overtly Eastern/ Orthodox-inspired music. Tim Hugh's serenely beautiful account of the solo cello part is worth the price of the disc alone, but it's a winner from beginning to end. The recording, made in St John's College Chapel, is resplendently atmospheric.

Total Eclipse

Agraphon[a]. Total Eclipse[b]
[a]Patricia Rozario sop [b]Max Jones treb [b]Christopher Robson counterten [b]James Gilchrist ten [b]John Harle sax [b]New College Choir, Oxford; Academy of Ancient Music / Paul Goodwin
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7271 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000 ●●

Tavener's ability to arrest the listener's ear is nowhere more apparent than in the extraordinary opening pages of Total Eclipse. The work, Tavener tells us, is an esoteric contemplation on the word metanoia – meaning 'change of mind' or 'conversion' – and Tavener uses the conversion of St Paul on the road to Damascus to give the work structure and meaning. Ideally, Total Eclipse, premièred in 2000, needs to be experienced in situ: the spatial separation of instrumental groups and the space in which the work should be performed are essential components combined to create a transcendental, metaphysical experience. A high, sustained ison (drone) on strings, the rolling of multiple antiphonal timpani and the anarchic, terrifying 'alarm' calls of the solo soprano saxophone (a symbolic representation of St Paul) create a visceral effect on the listener, and the subsequent descending choral sequences on the word Stavroménos (Crucified) and Christ's calling of Saul are equally striking.

The recording can only hint at the spatial effects that Tavener envisaged, but it has nevertheless been exceptionally well committed to disc. Paul Goodwin and his team have no problems coping with Tavener's demands, and John Harle's stunning account of the solo saxophone part, together with Christopher Robson's and James Gilchrist's vocal contributions, make this extraordinary work a must for all Tavener fans.

Agraphon, for soprano, timpani and strings (1995), is no less extraordinary. Here Tavener chooses as his text a powerful set of verses by the Greek poet Angelos Sikelianos that were penned during the German occupation of Athens in 1941. The work places extraordinary intonational and stylistic demands upon the soprano: indeed Patricia Rozario, whose voice the work is specifically written for, spent several months in India studying and perfecting the techniques that Tavener calls for. The effort must have been worthwhile, for Rozario produces a compelling performance of exceptional intensity.

John Taverner

British c1490-1545

GROVE The earliest unequivocal references to Taverner occur in 1524-25, when he was a lay clerk at the collegiate church of Tatershall. In 1526 he accepted the post of instructor of the choristers at Cardinal College (now Christ Church), Oxford, and c1530 became a lay clerk (and probably instructor of the choristers) at the parish church of St Botolph, Boston. By 1537 he had retired from full-time employment as a church musician. Although he was embroiled in an outbreak of Lutheran heresy at Cardinal College (in 1528) there is no evidence, contrary to popular opinion, that his views were seriously in conflict with Catholicism or that he ceased composing on leaving Oxford.

Most of his extant works, which include eight masses, three Magnificats, numerous motets and votive antiphons and a few consort pieces and fragmentary secular partsongs, probably date from the 1520s. The three six-voice masses use cantus firmi, sectional structure, huge spans of melisma and skilful counterpoint; of the smaller-scale masses ‘ Western Wynde ‘ is based on a secular tune and in a less expansive, more Lutheran style. Characteristic of his writing is the development of a melodic or rhythmic fragment in imitation or canon or as an ostinato figure. The Magnificats are large-scale, florid works in the English tradition, also using cantus firmi. Two of his antiphons, however, Mater Christi sanctissima and Christe Jesu, pastor bone, clearly show Josquin's influence. His four-voice In Nomine, the prototype of this English genre, is simply a transcription of the ‘In nomine Domine’ section of his Missa ‘Gloria tibi Trinitas’.

Taverner was pre-eminent among English musicians of his day: he enriched and transformed the English florid style by drawing on its best qualities, as well as on some continental techniques, and produced simpler works of great poise and refinement.

Missa Corona spinea

Taverner Missa Corona spinea. Audivi vocem
Byrd Laetentur coeli. Tristitia et anxietas
London King's College Choir / David Trendell
Proudsound PROUCD149 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

These 28 singers from King's College London have successfully tackled an ambitious polyphonic programme: Taverner's monumental six-part Missa Corona spinea and a handful of motets by Byrd and Taverner, none of which is without its stern individual demands. The Mass was possibly intended for Wolsey's Cardinal College in Oxford, to which Taverner was appointed Informator choristarum in 1526. This may explain the abundance of exuberant writing for the high voices, sopranos here though intended for trebles by Taverner. The youthful first entry of the London students steadies itself as the music proceeds, settling into determinedly purposeful strength and flow in the abundance of almost unending melismata of the early Tudor style.

The choir have done us a service in bringing this marvellously varied music to our ears, varied through its ever-changing use of differing timbres and combinations of voices, which move imperceptibly from texture to texture.

Missa Mater Christi sanctissima

Hodie nobis caelorum Rex. Mater Christi sanctissima. Magnificat sexti toni. Nesciens mater. Quemadmodum a 6. Missa Mater Christi sanctissima. In nomine a 4 🅿
Fretwork (Wendy Gillespie, Richard Campbell treble viols Susanna Pell, Julia Hodgson, Richard Boothby bass viols William Hunt great bass viol)
The Sixteen / Harry Christophers
Hyperion Helios CDH55053 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1992 ●

The Sixteen offer an impressive account of the composer's five-part Missa Mater Christi sanctissima, based on his votive anthem of the same name. It is a lively and vigorous work, beautifully crafted, and this performance amply matches that craftsmanship. Harry Christophers attempts no liturgical reconstruction, concentrating instead upon sheer musical quality. Three female sopranos replace the boy trebles. The music is pitched up a tone, which has the effect of adding brilliance to every climax. He demonstrates the good acoustic of St Jude's in Hampstead – an acoustic of space and definition, ideal for the interweaving of the strands of early Tudor polyphony; indeed, clarity and a sense of space are hallmarks of the recording. The supporting programme of the Christmas responsory, Hodie, the votive anthem Mater Christi and a four-part Magnificat is completed – unexpectedly but most delightfully – by two pieces for viols.

Missa Sancti Wilhelmi

Missa Sancti Wilhelmi. Motets – O Wilhelme, pastor bone; Dum transisset Sabbatum; Ex eius tumba
The Sixteen / Harry Christophers
Hyperion Helios CDH55055 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1990

The Missa Sancti Wilhelmi is not one of Taverner's best known works, but there is no reason why this should be the case. Though it does not have the sometimes rather wild melodic beauty of the six-voice Masses, it is nevertheless an impressive work in a more modern imitative style, in keeping with its model O Wilhelme, pastor bone. The Sixteen perform with their customary clarity and precision, and convey enthusiasm even in the somewhat syllabic Gloria and Credo movements of the Mass, something which is not always easy to do. While both the 'Wilhelm' works and Dum transisset Sabbatum are among Taverner's later works, there is no doubt at all that Ex eius tumba is one of the earliest. It is firmly late medieval in style, and the intricate tracery of its construction makes a thought-provoking contrast to the pieces in a more 'continental' imitative style. At 15 minutes this is a substantial composition, and one can only be surprised that it is so little-known. Dum transisset Sabbatum is, however, the high point of the disc, and if The Sixteen do not quite attain the ecstatic heights achieved in the recording by The Tallis Scholars, neither do they fail to rise to Taverner's inspiration.

Pyotr Ill'yich Tchaikovsky

Russian 1840-1893

GROVE Tchaikovsky began piano studies at five and soon showed remarkable gifts; his childhood was also affected by an abnormal sensitivity. At 10 he was sent to the School of Jurisprudence at St Petersburg, where the family lived for some time. His parting from his mother was painful; further, she died when he was 14 – an event that may have stimulated him to compose. At 19 he took a post at the Ministry of Justice, where he remained for four years despite a long journey to western Europe and increasing involvement in music. In 1863 he entered the Conservatory, also undertaking private teaching. Three years later he moved to Moscow with a professorship of harmony at the new conservatory. Little of his music so far had pleased the conservative musical establishment or the more nationalist group, but his First Symphony had a good public reception when heard in Moscow in 1868.

Rather less successful was his first opera, The Voyevoda, given at the Bol'shoy in Moscow in1869; Tchaikovsky later abandoned it and re-used material from it in his next, The Oprichnik. A severe critic was Balakirev, who suggested that he wrote a work on Romeo and Juliet: this was the Fantasy-Overture, several times rewritten to meet Balakirev's criticisms; Tchaikovsky's tendency to juxtapose blocks of material rather than provide organic transitions serves better in this programmatic piece than in a symphony as each theme stands for a character in the drama. Its expressive, well-defined themes and their vigorous treatment produced the first of his works in the regular repertory.

The Oprichnik won some success at St Petersburg in 1874, by when Tchaikovsky had won acclaim with his Second Symphony (which incorporates Ukrainian folktunes); he had also composed two string quartets (the first the source of the famous Andante cantabile), most of his next opera, Vakula the Smith, and of his First Piano Concerto, where contrasts of the heroic and the lyrical, between soloist and orchestra, clearly fired him. Originally intended for Nikolay Rubinstein, the head of Moscow Conservatory, who had much encouraged Tchaikovsky, it was dedicated to Hans von Bülow (who gave its première, in Boston) when Rubinstein rejected it as ill-composed and unplayable (he later recanted and became a distinguished interpreter of it). In 1875 came the carefully written Third Symphony and Swan Lake, commissioned by Moscow Opera. The next year a journey west took in Carmen in Paris, a cure at Vichy and the first complete Ring at Bayreuth; although deeply depressed when he reached home – he could not accept his homosexuality – he wrote the fantasia Francesca da Rimini and (an escape into the 18th century) the Rococo Variations for cello and orchestra. Vakula, which had won a competition, had its première that autumn. At the end of the year he was contacted by a wealthy widow, Nadezhda von Meck, who admired his music and was eager to give him financial security; they corresponded intimately for 14 years but never met.

Tchaikovsky, however, saw marriage as a possible solution to his sexual problems; and when contacted by a young woman who admired his music he offered (after first rejecting her) immediate marriage. It was a disaster: he escaped from her almost at once, in a state of nervous collapse, attempted suicide and went abroad. This was however the time of two of his greatest works, the Fourth Symphony and Eugene Onegin. The symphony embodies a 'fate' motif that recurs at various points, clarifying the structure; the first movement is one of Tchaikovsky's most individual with its hesitant, melancholy waltz-like main theme and its ingenious and appealing combination of this with the secondary ideas; there is a lyrical, intermezzo-like second movement and an ingenious third in which pizzicato strings play a main role, while the finale is impassioned if loose and melodramatic, with a folk theme pressed into service as second subject. Eugene Onegin, after Pushkin, tells of a girl's rejected approach to a man who fascinates her (the parallel with Tchaikovsky's situation is obvious) and his later remorse: the heroine Tatyana is warmly and appealingly drawn, and Onegin's hauteur is deftly conveyed too, all against a rural Russian setting which incorporates spectacular ball scenes, an ironic background to the private tragedies. The brilliant Violin Concerto also comes from the late 1870s.

The period 1878-84, however, represents a creative trough. He resigned from the conservatory and, tortured by his sexuality, could produce no music of real emotional force (the Piano Trio, written on Rubinstein's death, is a single exception). He spent some time abroad. But in 1884, stimulated by Balakirev, he produced his Manfred symphony, after Byron. He continued to travel widely, and conduct; and he was much honoured. In 1888 the Fifth Symphony, similar in plan to the Fourth (though the motto theme is heard in each movement), was finished; a note of hysteria in the finale was recognized by Tchaikovsky himself. The next three years saw the composition of two ballets, the finely characterized Sleeping Beauty and the more decorative Nutcracker, and the opera The Queen of Spades, with its ingenious atmospheric use of Rococo music (it is set in Catherine the Great's Russia) within a work of high emotional tension. Its theatrical qualities ensured its success when given at St Petersburg in late 1890. The next year Tchaikovsky visited the USA; in 1892 he heard Mahler conduct Eugene Onegin at Hamburg. In 1893 he worked on his Sixth Symphony, to a plan – the first movement was to be concerned with activity and passion; the second, love; the third, disappointment; and the finale, death. It is a profoundly pessimistic work, formally unorthodox, with the finale haunted by descending melodic ideas clothed in anguished harmonies. It was performed on October 28. He died nine days later: traditionally, and officially, of cholera, but recently verbal evidence has been put forward that he underwent a 'trial' from a court of honour from his old school regarding his sexual behaviour and it was decreed that he commit suicide. Which is true must remain uncertain.

Violin Concerto in D, Op 35

Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D, Op 35
Sibelius Violin Concerto
Kyung-Wha Chung vn London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn
Decca The Classic Sound 425 080-2DCS Ⓜ
(66 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1970 ●

If the vital test for a recording is that a performance should establish itself as a genuine one, not a mere studio run-through, Chung's remains a disc where both works leap out at you for their concentration and vitality, not just through the soloist's weight and gravity, expressed as though spontaneously, but through the playing of the LSO under Previn at a vintage period.

Chung's 1982 Montreal version of the Tchaikovsky (also Decca – reviewed above under Piano Concertos) is rather fuller-toned with the tiny statutory cuts restored in the finale. Yet the very hint of vulnerability amid daring, a key element in Chung's magnetic, volatile personality, here adds an extra sense of spontaneity. This remains breathtaking playing, and the central slow movement, made to flow without a hint of sentimentality, has an extra poignancy.

The great melodies of the first two movements of the Sibelius are given an inner heartfelt intensity rarely matched, and with the finale skirting danger with thrilling abandon. The Kingsway Hall sound, full and sharply focused, gives a sense of presence to match or outshine today's digital recordings.

Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto Brahms (arr Joachim) Hungarian Dances – No 1 in G minor; No 2 in D minor; No 4 in B minor; No 7 in A
Sarah Chang vn Jonathan Feldman pf London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
EMI 754753-2 (49 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992-93 ●

The range of dynamic truthfulness conveyed in Sarah Chang's performance, helped by a clear, full, naturally-balanced recording, brings not just momentary delight in individual phrases but cumulative gain, in this reading which so strongly hangs together. Not only does Chang play with exceptionally pure tone, avoiding heavy coloration, but her individual artistry does not demand the wayward pulling-about often found in this work. In that she is enormously helped by the fresh, bright and dramatic accompaniment provided by the LSO under Sir Colin Davis. In the outer movements Chang conveys wit along with the power and poetry, and the intonation is immaculate. Brahms's Hungarian Dances are delectable, marked by the sort of naughty pointing of phrase and rhythm that tickles one's musical funny-bone just as the playing of Kreisler always did. Here is a young artist who really does live up to the claims of the publicists. (See also the review in the Collections section – 'Sir Georg Solti – A Celebration' which includes Maxim Vengerov's stunning live performance of the Violin Concerto, with the LPO under Mstislav Rostropovich.)

Piano Concertos

No 1 in B flat minor; No 2 in G, Op 44;
No 3 in E flat, Op 75

Piano Concerto No 1[a].
The Nutcracker – Suite, Op 71*a* (arr Economou)[b]
Martha Argerich, [b]Nicolas Economou pfs
[a]Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG 449 816-2GH (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded [b]1983 live in [a]1994 ●

Tchaikovsky's First Concerto has already appeared twice on disc from Martha Argerich in complementary performances: live and helter-skelter on Philips with Kondrashin (reviewed under Rachmaninov), studio and magisterial with Dutoit on DG. Now, finely recorded, here is a third, live recording with the BPO and Claudio Abbado surpassing even those earlier and legendary performances. Argerich has never sounded on better terms with the piano, more virtuoso yet engagingly human. Lyrical and insinuating, to a degree her performance seems to be made of the tumultuous elements themselves, of fire and ice, rain and sunshine. The Russians may claim this concerto for themselves, but even they will surely listen in disbelief, awed and – dare one say it – a trifle piqued. Listen to Argerich's Allegro con spirito, as the concerto gets under way, where her darting crescendos and diminuendos make the triplet rhythm speak with the rarest vitality and caprice. Her nervous reaching out towards further pianistic frays in the heart-easing second subject is pure Argerich and so are the octave storms in both the first and third movements that will have everyone, particularly her partners, tightening their seat belts. The cadenza is spun off with a hypnotic brilliance, the central Prestissimo from the Andantino becomes a true 'scherzo of fireflies', and the finale seems to dance off the page; a far cry from more emphatic Ukranian point-making and brutality.

For encores DG has reissued Argerich's 1983 performance of The Nutcracker where she is partnered by Nicolas Economou in his own arrangement, a marvel of scintillating pianistic prowess, imagination and finesse.

Piano Concertos[a] Nos 1-3. Violin Concerto[b]
Victoria Postnikova pf Kyung-Wha Chung vn
[a]Vienna Symphony Orchestra / Gennadi Rozhdestvensky; [b]Montreal Symphony Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Double Decca ② 448 107-2DF2 Ⓜ
(142 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1981-82

Victoria Postnikova commands a handsome tone and there is no lack here of pianistic thunder. The First Concerto is revealing in the sense that dialogue between soloist and orchestra is particularly sensitive; listen, for example, to the delicately voiced woodwinds at 6'38" (in the first movement), to Postnikova's subsequent response and, most especially, to the pianist's free yet nimble handling of the second movement's treacherous valse-prestissimo (4'05"). As Tchaikovsky Firsts go, this is among the most searching, personal and individual available, though one can already hear a loud opposition: 'too slow, too mannered, too indulgent, too soft-grained, orchestrally'.

Again, in the Second and Third Concertos Postnikova plumbs the depths. Her handling of Tchaikovsky's epic cadenzas is second to none – starting at 1'55" into the Second Concerto's first movement, then between 13'26" and 19'13", where the solo writing is so massive in scale that you temporarily forget the mute presence of an orchestra. Rozhdestvensky views Tchaikovsky's orchestral architecture with a fine sense of perspective. This is real interpretation and presents a powerful case for a much maligned work (torso though it is). True, there is still room for critical controversy (the Second Concerto's first movement is hardly Allegro brillante), but Postnikova and Rozhdestvensky have so much to say about the music.

Decca also offers a poised and elegantly phrased account of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, where a rather edgy-sounding Kyung-Wha Chung is offered blandly 'regular' support by the Montreal Symphony Orchestra under Dutoit. Not a world-beater by any means, but a sensible makeweight, very well recorded. As indeed is the rest of the set, although the Vienna Symphony strings will strike some as rather thin in tone. An altogether riveting reissue and a genuine bargain as well.

1812 Overture, Op 49

Tchaikovsky 1812 Overture, Op 49[a]. Capriccio italien, Op 45[b] Beethoven Wellingtons Sieg, 'Die Schlacht bei Vittoria', Op 91[c] Ⓗ
[a]University of Minnesota Brass Band; [ab]Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra; [c]London Symphony Orchestra / Antál Dorati
Mercury Living Presence 434 360-2MM Ⓜ
(66 minutes: ADD). Also includes commentary by Deems Taylor on the making of the recordings
Recorded 1955-60 ●●

Both battle pieces incorporate cannon fire recorded at West Point, with Wellington's Victory adding antiphonal muskets and 1812, the University of Minnesota Brass Band and the bells of the Laura Spelman Rockefeller carillon. In a recorded commentary on the 1812 sessions, Deems Taylor explains how, prior to 'battle', roads were blocked and an ambulance crew put on standby. The actual weapons used were chosen both for their historical authenticity (period instruments of destruction) and their sonic impact, the latter proving formidable even today. In fact, the crackle and thunder of Wellington's Victory could easily carry a DDD endorsement; perhaps we should, for the occasion, invent a legend of Daring, Deafening and potentially Deadly. Dorati's conducting is brisk, incisive and dramatic. 1812 in particular suggests a rare spontaneity, with a fiery account of the main 'conflict' and a tub-thumping peroration where bells, band, guns and orchestra conspire to produce one of the most riotous key-clashes in gramophone history.

Capriccio italien was recorded some three years earlier (1955, would you believe) and sounds virtually as impressive. Again, the approach is crisp and balletic, whereas the 1960 LSO Beethoven recording triumphs by dint of its energy and orchestral discipline. As 'fun' CDs go, this must be one of the best – provided you can divorce Mercury's aural militia from the terrifying spectre of real conflict. Wilma Cozart Fine has masterminded an astonishingly effective refurbishment, while the documentation – both written and recorded – is very comprehensive.

1812 Overture, Op 49[a]. Francesca da Rimini, Op 32[a]. Marche slave, Op 31[a]. Romeo and Juliet[a]. Eugene Onegin – Tatyana's Letter Scene[b]
[b]Eilene Hannan sop [a]Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra; [b]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Sian Edwards 🏵
Classics for Pleasure 575567-2 ⓑ
(79 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1989/91 ●●

The 1812 Overture closes this wonderful disc (the remainder is reviewed below under 'Francesca da Rimini') in a spirit of festive joy, with the Russian folksongs lilting and the climax as sensational as any on record. And the fusillade of canon and carillon cannot drown the sheer orchestral exuberance.

Credit must be given to Andrew Keener and Mike Clements for achieving some of the most spectacular and wide-ranging Tchaikovsky sonorities on CD – this is truly a demonstration disc, with a specially rich bass response.

Fantasy Overtures

Hamlet, Op 67. The Tempest, Op 18.
Romeo and Juliet.
Bamberg Symphony Orchestra /
José Serebrier
BIS BIS-CD1073 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●●

What a good idea to couple Tchaikovsky's three fantasy overtures inspired by Shakespeare. José Serebrier writes an illuminating note on the genesis of each of the three, together with an analysis of their structure. He notes that once Tchaikovsky had established his concept of the fantasy overture in the first version of Romeo and Juliet in 1869 – slow introduction leading to alternating fast and slow sections, with slow coda – he used it again both in the 1812 Overture and Hamlet. The Tempest (1873) has similarly contrasting sections, but begins and ends with a gently evocative seascape, with shimmering arpeggios from strings divided in 13 parts.

It is typical of Serebrier's performance that he makes that effect sound so fresh and original, and for the first time this reviewer is left wondering whether it gave Sibelius the idea for the opening of En Saga. In many ways, early as it is, this is stylistically the most radical of the three overtures here, with sharp echoes of Berlioz in some of the woodwind effects. The clarity of Serebrier's performance, both in texture and in structure, helps to bring that out, as does a warm and analytical BIS recording.

Hamlet, dating from much later, is treated to a similarly fresh and dramatic reading, with Serebrier bringing out the yearningly Russian flavour of the lovely oboe theme representing Ophelia. He may not quite match the thrusting power of his mentor, Stokowski, but he is not far short, and brings out far more detail.

Serebrier is also meticulous in seeking to observe the dynamic markings in each score. Those in The Tempest are nothing if not extravagant – up to a fortissimo of five *f*s in the final statement of the love theme – yet Serebrier graduates the extremes with great care. Highly recommended.

Hamlet – Fantasy Overture, Op 67 Ⓗ
Francesca da Rimini, Op 32.
New York Stadium Orchestra / Leopold Stokowski
dell'Arte CDDA9006 (43 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1958 ●

Stokowski's inspired performance of Hamlet is still far, far superior to any other recorded version. Francesca is nearly as fine and generates enormous tension at the sequence just before the lovers are discovered where their passion is encompassed in polyphonic string textures of the greatest intensity. Then, after the dramatic moment of their death, they are consigned to the whirlwinds of Dante's Inferno, which rage frenziedly until the riveting final climax, where the gong is not allowed to drown the nemesis of bold orchestral dissonances at the last few bars. Stokowski's reading is equally memorable for the beguiling wind solos in the romantic middle section – depicting the idyll of the lovers – shaped with characteristic magic.

Hamlet is sensational. It is also even better recorded than Francesca, and the sonority of the lower strings is particularly telling at the electrifying opening, while at the big climax the weight of the trombones and tuba is splendidly caught. But perhaps the most spectacular moment is the foreboding march-like sequence, dominated by the side-drum, which is sinisterly dramatic each time it appears: this device anticipates Shostakovich at the climax of the first movement of the Fifth Symphony, and the emotional character of the playing is very Russian in its fervour. The desolation of mood of the coda is intensely moving, with a power of melancholy to equal that at the close of the Pathétique Symphony.

If you are wondering about the identity of the New York Stadium Orchestra, Bert Whyte, the brilliant engineer of this recording and also one of the founders of the Everest label, has affirmed that it is the New York Philharmonic under a pseudonym. This was the pre-Bernstein era and the ensemble isn't always immaculate, but the tremendous commitment of the playing more than compensates. It is unclear whether Bryan Crimp's remastered version is used for the CD, but certainly the sound is cleaner than originally. During the closing years of his life Stokowski said, 'When I get to Heaven I shall shake Tchaikovsky by the hand and thank him for all the wonderful music he has given us'.

Francesca da Rimini

Francesca da Rimini, Op 32[a]. 1812 Overture, Op 49[a]. Marche slave, Op 31[a]. Romeo and Juliet[a]. Eugene Onegin – Tatyana's Letter Scene[b]
[b]Eilene Hannan sop [a]Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra; [b]London Philharmonic Orchestra /
Sian Edwards 🏅
Classics for Pleasure 575567-2 Ⓑ
(79 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1989/91 ●●

This is surely one of the finest Tchaikovsky collections in the catalogue, irrespective of price.

The orchestral introduction to the Letter Scene brings a rich surge of ardour in the orchestra, revealing Sian Edwards to be a natural Tchaikovskian, while in Romeo and Juliet the very different introduction of the sombre Friar Lawrence theme on the woodwind against pizzicato strings has admirable simplicity, yet the underlying tension is unmistakable. The love theme arrives naturally and the delicacy of the 'moonlight' sequence is touchingly tender. In the thrilling development, the vibrant clash of swords is matched by the passion of the lovers, while the coda has a genuine sense of tragedy.

By contrast, Marche slave is joyously high spirited – no doleful Russian melancholy here – with a piquantly coloured middle section and a fast, exhilarating coda. But it is in Francesca da Rimini that Sian Edwards most tellingly displays her Tchaikovskian credentials. After the resonating doom-laden warning of the opening, she moves forward swiftly and fierily into the inferno whirlwinds, but Francesca's entry is portrayed with a most delectably gentle clarinet solo, and Tchaikovsky's richly scored variants on her lovely melody are beautifully played by woodwind and strings. One thinks of Beecham here, and of Stokowski in the gathering intensity of the mutual passion of Francesca and Paolo, and their discovery and murder, which are thrillingly evoked; the frantic desperation of the coda leads to a tumultuous finale cadence.

The 1812 Overture is sheer joy and the climax as sensational as any on record. And the fusillade of canon and carillon cannot drown the sheer orchestral exuberance.

Credit must be given to Andrew Keener and Mike Clements for achieving some of the most spectacular and wide-ranging Tchaikovsky sonorities on CD – this is truly a demonstration disc, with a specially rich bass response.

The Nutcracker, Op 71

The Nutcracker
Kirov Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips 462 114-2PH (81 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

This is The Nutcracker as a short ride in a fast machine. You may find that your most positive responses to this Nutcracker will come after a higher than usual intake of caffeine. Obviously, a fair measure of Tchaikovsky's score is meant to be continuous, but the Kirov's animated action never lets up for a moment.

It may have something to do with squeezing it on to a single disc (no pauses for breath, even between the First and Second Acts); and under the circum-stances, it is not surprising that Gergiev doesn't want to relax the momentum with the usual repeat of the leisurely 'Grandfather Dance'. But this is probably how he conducts The Nutcracker at the Kirov, and the elegance with which he moves from loud or fast sections of the score to quieter or slower ones – for example, the Arabian dance starting with a diminuendo – speak of ease gained from experience.

What we don't have here is a Nutcracker to enhance the ambience of a room lit by Christmas tree lights and a log fire. What we do have, however, is a realisation that makes it clear why Stravinsky so loved the Tchaikovsky ballets. If there is an ostinato working away in the accompaniment, Gergiev gives it prominence and energy (the swift tempos help, of course). And credit for the very high yield of unusual features of this most inventively scored of all the ballets should probably be evenly divided between Gergiev, the specific timbres of the orchestra and the very immediate sound.

When not caught up in the colourful exuberance of it all, one may notice that the image lacks depth, the violins are a little thin in upper regions, and the brass occasionally play-out with the familiar Russian welly, wobble and weather. Equally, the ear may be briefly diverted by minor imprecisions and the odd extraneous noise. But has there ever been a Nutcracker so captured apparently 'on the wing', or, for that matter, so exciting?

Serenade in C, Op 48

Serenade in C. Souvenir de Florence, Op 70
Vienna Chamber Orchestra / Philippe Entremont
Naxos 8 550404 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1990 ●●

This is one of the many CDs now on the market that dispel the myth once and for all that only full-price recordings contain really outstanding performances. The Naxos label is just about as 'bargain' as you can get, and here they have given us superlative performances of two of Tchaikovsky's most endearing works. The Serenade in C contains a wealth of memorable and haunting music, beautifully and inventively scored and guaranteed to bring immense pleasure and delight to those dipping their toes in to the world of classical music for the first time. Philippe Entremont and the Vienna Chamber Orchestra give a marvellously polished and finely poised performance full of warmth, affection and high spirits, and the famous second movement Waltz in particular is played with much elegance and grace. The Souvenir de Florence, originally written for string sextet, makes a welcome appearance here in Tchaikovsky's own arrangement for string orchestra. This is a delightfully sunny performance, full of suavity, exuberance and romantic dash, but always alert to the subtleties of Tchaikovsky's skilful, intricate part-writing. The Adagio cantabile is particularly notable for some extremely fine and poetic solo playing from the violin and cello principals of the VPO. The beautifully spacious recording does ample justice to the performances.

The Sleeping Beauty, Op 66

Czecho-Slovak State Philharmonic Orchestra / Andrew Mongrelia
Naxos ③ 8 550490/92 (174 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1991 ●

Andrew Mongrelia is clearly a ballet conductor to his fingertips. His account of The Sleeping Beauty is not only dramatic, when called for, but graceful and full of that affectionate warmth and detail which readily conjure up the stage imagery. Moreover, the House of Arts in Košice seems to have just the right acoustics for this work. If the sound is too brilliant the louder passages of Tchaikovsky's score can easily hector the ear; if the effect is too mellow, the result can become bland. Neither happens here – the ear is seduced throughout and Mongrelia leads the listener on from number to number with an easy spontaneity. The woodwind playing is delightful (try track 9 with its 'singing canaries' – so like Delibes in its scoring). At the end of Act 1 the Lilac Fairy's tune is given a spacious, frisson-creating apotheosis. The alert Introduction to Acts 2 and 3 brings crisp brass and busy strings on the one hand, arresting hunting horns on the other, and what sparkling zest there is in the strings for the following 'Blind-man's buff' sequence, while the famous Act 2 Waltz has splendid rhythmic lift. Act 3 is essentially a great extended Divertissement, with Tchaikovsky's imagination at full stretch through some two dozen characterful dance numbers of every balletic flavour, are all played here with fine style. Irrespective of price, this vies with Gergiev as a first choice among current recordings of the score, and you get two-and-a-half hours of music. The value is even more remarkable when the excellent notes clearly relate the ballet's action to each of the 65 separate cues.

The Sleeping Beauty
BBC Symphony Orchestra /
Gennadi Rozhdestvensky
BBC Legends/IMG Artists ② BBCL4091-2 Ⓜ
(141 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1979 ●●

David Brown, Tchaikovsky's eminent biographer, thought that on balance The Sleeping Beauty was the finest of the three great ballet scores. But as Diaghilev found to his cost when he mounted it in London in 1921, it is a very extended work and suffers from a storyline in which not a great deal happens. Performing it is as a complete orchestral work in the concert hall is probably not the best way to approach the work but, if it is to be performed in this way, Rozhdestvensky is just the man for it. In this recording he shows just how to hold Tchaikovsky's remarkably diverse score together as a symphonic entity by creating a consistent narrative momentum without ever over-driving.

The very opening is enormously dramatic and arresting, and then the petite Lilac Fairy appears in her delectably delicate orchestral apparel. Rozhdestvensky is a master of this kind of contrast. Sample the daintiness of string texture at the opening of the 'Pas de six' (track 3), the delicious piccolo and pizzicatos for the 'Singing canary' (track 8), so reminiscent of Delibes, followed by the sheer energy of track 9 ('Violente').

The ballet ends grandiloquently, but with great majesty, and one is left in wonder: there is not a single number in which Tchaikovsky's imagination fails him.

Several other versions of this ballet are available on CD, including a superb set by the Russian National Orchestra under Pletnev. But Rozhdestvensky is even finer, and the BBC recording is remarkably good, with plenty of amplitude, a warm string patina, glowing woodwind and a natural concert-hall balance. Highly recommended.

The Sleeping Beauty
Russian National Orchestra / Mikhail Pletnev
DG ② 457 634-2GH2 (159 minutes: DDD Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

That Pletnev knows and loves this score was already obvious from his own piano arrangements of parts of it, and their recordings. And if ever proof was needed of the pianist's ability to transfer completely intact to the orchestra his own special brand of fantasy and superfine articulacy, this is it. Hardly a minute passes without one's ear being enchanted by an affective gesture of the utmost precision, poise and sensitivity (all the various solos are superbly done); and significantly, the now-familiar Pletnev ideal of the tactfully and revealingly balanced tutti does not result in anticlimax, as it did in some of the symphonies.

If you need convincing, try the last 10 minutes of Act 2 – a symphonic impression of the 100-year sleep, owing not a little to Wagner in its methods and to something of the magical workings of Tchaikovsky's own sea music for The Tempest – and ask yourself if you have ever heard it as atmospherically shaded, the subtle glints of Tchaikovsky's wonderful orchestration as well caught, or the transition from static contemplation, through the kiss, to genuinely joyful activity as well gauged.

A very special combination of all the right choices is made as regards dynamics, tempo and differentiation of mood and, like so much else in this performance, a scene whose potential is rarely as fully realised as it is here. The DG sound is as vibrant as you could wish, with deeper perspectives and a superbly managed ambience, with the 'magical' scenes bathed in the appropriate enchanted halo, yet the textures kept clear in the active, louder sections of the score. It is a fractionally more brilliant sound than DG supplied in the symphonies (at last, the timpani are fully in focus!) and if the cellos are occasionally obviously spotlit and the violins inclined to a very slight steeliness in their upper reaches, there is no denying the expert matching of tone and body of these divided fiddles. Good to hear the formidable partnership once again firing on all cylinders.

Suite No 2, Op 53

Suite No 2, Op 53. The Tempest
Detroit Symphony Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Chandos CHAN9454 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994-95

Tchaikovsky's elusive blend of instrumental precision and free-flowing thematic fantasy in the Second Suite meets its match in the Detroit/Järvi partnership: the conductor's imagination works alongside the lean, clean Detroit sound with interesting results. The strings are not always the ideal: the lush chordings and central fugal energy of the opening movement, 'Jeu de sons', cry out for a richer, Russian tone. But the semiquaver patter is beautifully done, the lower lines clear and personable. Keen articulation and driving force go hand-in-glove as Järvi prepares for the entry of the four accordions in the virile 'Rondo-Burlesque', sweeping on to the folk-song of the central section with characteristic aplomb. It is in the Schumannesque phrases and the subtly shifting moods of the most poetic movement, 'Rêves d'enfant', that Järvi really comes into his own; the short-lived, other-worldly radiance at the heart of the movement seems more than ever like a preliminary study for the transformation scenes of The Nutcracker, just as the woodwind choruses look forward to that and Sleeping Beauty.

The magical haze surrounding Prospero's island in The Tempest doesn't quite come off; here it's Pletnev (reviewed above) who surprises us with the true magician's touch, but then his Russian horns, and later his trumpeter, cast their incantations more impressively. Järvi is no more successful than any other conductor in stitching together Tchaikovsky's strong impressions of the play, though a little more forward movement in the love-music might have helped.

Swan Lake, Op 20

Montreal Symphony Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca ② 436 212-2DH2 (154 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ●

No one wrote more beautiful and danceable ballet music than Tchaikovsky, and this account of Swan Lake is a delight throughout. This is not only because of the quality of the music, which is here played including additions the composer made after the première, but also thanks to the richly idiomatic playing of Charles Dutoit and his Montreal orchestra in the superb and celebrated location of St Eustache's Church in that city. Maybe some conductors have made the music even more earthily Russian, but the Russian ballet tradition in Tchaikovsky's time was chiefly French and the most influential early production of this ballet, in 1895, was choreographed by the Frenchman Marius Petipa. Indeed, the symbiosis of French and Russian elements in this music (and story) is one of its great strengths, the refinement of the one being superbly allied to the vigour of the other, notably in such music as the 'Russian Dance' with its expressive violin solo. This is a profoundly romantic reading of the score, and the great set pieces such as the Waltz in Act 1 and the marvellous scene of the swans on a moonlit lake that opens Act 2 are wonderfully evocative; yet they do not overshadow the other music, which supports them as gentler hills and valleys might surround and enhance magnificent, awe-inspiring peaks, the one being indispensable to the other. You do not have to be a ballet aficionado to fall under the spell of this wonderful music, which here receives a performance that blends passion with an aristocratic refinement and is glowingly recorded.

Additional recommendation
Swan Lake
Russian State Symphony Orchestra / Yablonsky
Naxos ② 8 555873/4 (148 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded c2002

This complete Swan Lake is thoroughly recommendable and most enjoyable, both as a performance and as a recording. The Orchestra is obviously utterly at home, as is their excellent conductor, whose tempi can hardly be faulted. This is an obligatory bargain buy.

Manfred Symphony, Op 58

Manfred Symphony, Op 58. The Tempest, Op 18
Russian National Orchestra / Mikhail Pletnev
DG 439 891-2GH (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

There are no cheap thrills in Pletnev's Manfred. Percussion and brass are very carefully modulated, their brilliance and power reserved quite noticeably for what Pletnev sees as the few crucial climactic passages in the outer movements. Timpani in particular provide support rather than make a show – it is the lower strings that course through Manfred's outburst in the second movement (from 5'50"), not the almost standard spurious timpani swells. It is the strong, dark woodwind, not the more usual stuttering horns, that you initially hear in the first movement's concluding Andante con duolo (from 13'09"). The deep satisfaction to be had from this account comes from the superlative strings, and from Pletnev's pacing which, more often than any of the listed additional recommendations, takes notice of Tchaikovsky's tempo indications, most obviously in the properly flowing third movement's pastoral, and in the successful bonding of the finale's episodic structure (the magniloquent Muti's Achilles' heel).

More eccentric is Pletnev's drop in tempo for those rising unison scales on strings at the start of the bacchanale, but it is less troubling than Toscanini's and Jansons's speeding up for those hammering chords before Astarte returns; and, mercifully, there are none of the cuts made by Toscanini. The Tempest, a generous coupling, brings much the same priorities and equal rewards – no more need be said, except to observe that the horns receive a better deal from the balance than in the symphony. As to the recording generally, the timpani are probably less focused than Pletnev would have wanted; in other respects, the sound does justice to the riches of his orchestra and seriousness of his intent.

Additional recommendation

Manfred Symphony[a]

Coupling: Chabrier España Debussy La mer Glinka A Life for the Tsar – Sinfonia; Polonaise; Krakowiak; Waltz Ravel Daphnis et Chloé – Suite No 2 R Strauss Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche Verdi La forza del destino – Overture

[a]London Symphony Orchestra; plus various other orchestras / Markevitch

EMI/IMG Artists ② 575124-2 (153 minutes: ADD; recorded 1959-1967) Ⓜ ●●

Markevitch's Manfred simply has to be experienced. With the LSO on peak form, this is a reading that will grip you from first to last bar in its unsentimental thrust and fresh-faced ardour. The 1963 sound is remarkably vivid. The couplings are a mixed bag – the La mer lacking a little magic, but the España has real fire in its belly.

Complete Symphonies

No 1 in G minor, 'Winter Daydreams', Op 13; No 2 in C minor, 'Little Russian', Op 17; No 3 in D, 'Polish', Op 29; No 4 in F minor, Op 36; No 5 in E minor, Op 64; No 6 in B minor, 'Pathétique', Op 74

Symphonies Nos 1-6. Violin Concerto in D, Op 35[a]. Piano Concerto No 1 in B flat minor, Op 23[de]. 1812 Overture, Op 49. Capriccio italien, Op 45. Eugene Onegin – Polonaise; Waltz. Marche slave, Op 31. The Nutcracker – Suite, Op 71[a]. Romeo and Juliet Fantasy Overture. Serenade in C, Op 48. The Sleeping Beauty – Suite. Swan Lake – Suite. Variations on a Rococo Theme, Op 33[c]

[a]Christian Ferras, [b]Michel Schwalbé vns [c]Mstislav Rostropovich vc [d]Sviatoslav Richter pf Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, [e]Vienna Symphony Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan

DG ⑧ 463 774-2GB8 (531 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓑ

Recorded 1962-80 ●●

Karajan was unquestionably a great Tchaikovsky conductor. Yet although he recorded the last three symphonies many times, he did not turn to the first three until the end of the 1970s and then proved an outstanding advocate. In the Mendelssohnian opening movement of the First, the tempo may be brisk, but the music's full charm is displayed and the melancholy of the Andante is touchingly caught. Again at the opening of the Little Russian (No 2), horn and bassoon capture that special Russian colouring, as they do in the engaging Andantino marziale, and the crisp articulation in the first movement allegro is bracing. The sheer refinement of the orchestral playing in the scherzos of all three symphonies is a delight, and finales have great zest with splendid bite and precision in the fugato passages and a convincing closing peroration.

The so-called Polish Symphony (No 3) is the least tractable of the canon, but again Karajan's apt tempos and the precision of ensemble makes the first movement a resounding success. The Alla tedesca brings a hint of Brahms, but the Slavic dolour of the Andante elegiaco is unmistakeable and its climax blooms rapturously. No doubt the reason these early symphonies sound so fresh is because the Berlin orchestra was not over-familiar with them, and clearly enjoyed playing them. The sound throughout is excellent. It gets noticeably fiercer in the Fourth Symphony, recorded a decade earlier, but is still well balanced. The first movement has a compulsive forward thrust, and the breakneck finale is viscerally thrilling. The slow movement is beautifully played but just a trifle bland. Overall, though, this is impressive and satisfying, especially the riveting close.

DG has chosen the 1965 recording of the Fifth, rather than the mid-'70s version, and they were right to do so. It is marvellously recorded (in the Jesus-Christus Kirche): the sound has all the richness and depth one could ask and the performance too is one of Karajan's very finest. There is some indulgence of the second- subject string melody of the first movement. But the slow movement is gloriously played from the horn solo onwards, and the second re-entry of the Fate theme is so dramatic that it almost makes one jump. The delightful Waltz brings the kind of elegant warmth and detail from the violins that is a BPO speciality, and the finale, while not rushed Mravinsky fashion, still carries all before it and has power and dignity at the close.

The Pathétique was a very special work for Karajan (as it was for the Berlin Philharmonic) and his 1964 performance is one of his greatest recordings. The reading as a whole avoids hysteria, yet the resolution of the passionate climax of the first movement sends shivers down the spine, while the finale has a comparable eloquence, and the March/Scherzo, with ensemble wonderfully crisp and biting, brings an almost demonic power to the coda. Again the sound is excellent, full-bodied in the strings and with plenty of sonority for the trombones.

The String Serenade is digital, brightly recorded in the Philharmonie in 1980, but naturally balanced. Marvellous playing, of course. The Waltz, with a most felicitous control of rubato, is the highlight, and the Elégie is certainly ardent; and if the first movement could have been more neatly articulated, the finale has tremendous bustle and energy. As for the concertante works, the account of the glorious Rococo Variations with Rostropovich is another classic of the gramophone, even though it uses the truncated score. The First Piano Concerto is a disappointment, with Richter and Karajan failing to strike sparks as a partnership. In spite of brilliant solo playing, the first movement lacks supporting tension in the orchestra, and in the finale one can sense Richter wanting to press forward, while Karajan seems to hold back: the coda itself hangs fire in the orchestra.

Similarly Ferras was not an ideal choice for the Violin Concerto. Not all will take to his somewhat febrile timbre, with its touches of near-schmaltz. But the performance as a whole works better than the Piano Concerto.

Romeo and Juliet is finely done, passionate and dramatic, if not quite so spontaneously inspired as Karajan's early VPO version for Decca, especially at the opening. But Marche slave, ideally paced, is very successful, sombre and exciting by turns. Capriccio italien and 1812 are both brilliantly played, and the triptych of ballet suites can be recommended almost without reservation, with the Sleeping Beauty suite memorable for some very exciting climaxes.

Even with the reservations about the two concertos, this bargain box is a fine investment, and certainly value for money. The documentation is excellent.

Symphonies Nos 1-6
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG Symphony Edition ④ 429 675-2GSE4 Ⓜ
(264 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1975-79 ●

Symphonies Nos 1-3 also available on
DG ② 459 518-2GTA2 (plus Marche slave and Capriccio italien) Ⓜ
Symphonies Nos 4-6 also available on
DG ② 453 088-2GTA2 Ⓜ

Those who are looking for an outstanding bargain, need go no further than this Karajan set (one of the most enticing we can think of). All six numbered symphonies are squeezed on to only four CDs, selling at mid-price. The minor snag is that Nos 2 and 5 are broken between discs, but even there one is no worse off than with an ordinary LP. Karajan's discography reveals no fewer than seven versions of the Pathétique and six each of Nos 4 and 5, but the ones here, dating from 1975 and 1976, are in almost every way, both for sound and as interpretations, the finest he has done, and far preferable to his more recent DG series made with the Vienna Philharmonic.

Symphonies Nos 1, 2 and 3, dating from 1979 are Karajan's only recordings of those earlier works, but ones which saw him at his very finest, combining high polish with freshness and lyrical spontaneity. There are points where he is clearly preferable even to Jansons, as in the superb building of the final climax on the horn theme in the slow movement of No 1. Many will also prefer Karajan's faster speed in the first movement of No 2, where for once Jansons takes an unusually measured, if finely pointed, view.

Though in the opening of No 4 with Karajan, the digital transfer makes the brassy motto theme a little too fierce, generally these are among the best of his 1970s recordings from Berlin, fuller and more detailed than the digital sound on his Vienna versions of Nos 4-6.

Symphonies – Nos 1-6. Manfred Symphony, Op 58. Capriccio Italien, Op 45. Serenade in C, Op 48. The Tempest, Op 18. Romeo and Juliet. Eugene Onegin – Polonaise
Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / Andrew Litton 🏅
Virgin Classics ⑥ 561893-2 Ⓢ
(420 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1989-93 ●●

Here is another of those extraordinary Virgin bargain boxes, offered at an astonishingly low price (six well-filled CDs for well under £20) and, as with the previous collection of Mozart concertos, serenades and symphonies, these Tchaikovsky performances would be highly recommendable if they cost twice as much, while the recordings – realistically set back in a concert hall acoustic – are superb, full-bodied, and wide ranging and brilliant.

The playing of the Bournemouth Orchestra may not always be quite as polished as say, the Berlin Philharmonic for Karajan, but it is still very, very good indeed: ensemble is as keen as it is passionately responsive. Moreover Litton has a natural ear for Tchaikovskian detail – time and again he draws the listener to revel in those delightful orchestral touches with which Tchaikovsky decorates and embroiders his melodies (witness the close of the slow movements of both the Second and Fourth Symphonies).

Litton gets off to an outstanding start with Nos 1 and 2 where the atmosphere is imbued with bonhomie and high spirits. The Mendelssohnian opening of Winter Daydreams is full of charm, the scherzos sparkle, slow movements are touching; and the finale of the Little Russian is winningly zestful, with a contrasting catchy lilt for the second subject.

Litton readily disguises the structural flaws of the Polish Symphony with his geniality and a clever ebb and flow of tempos: the changing lyrical atmosphere of the inner movements is caught with evocative colouring and subtle rubato. 'Superbly articulated playing', commented Edward Greenfield in his original review of the outer movements, and this especially applies to the fugatos, never more so than in the finale, where the grandiose coda is also played for all its worth, and more.

In No 4 one is more aware of the slight distancing of the sound, and Litton matches it by his spacious tempo in the first movement and the slow but steady build up of tension which reaches its zenith at the end of the development. The woodwind of the second subject is full of balletic charm, and that rocking string figure is seductively silky.

That same broad approach to No 5 – the one comparative disappointment – works less well: one needs more impetus in the outer movements, yet there is massive weight in the coda. But Litton is back on form in No 6, and Edward Greefield thought it 'arguably the finest of the cycle... full of temperament, not just fiery but tender too' (5/93). The phrasing of the first movement's secondary theme is ravishing, and the climax is as powerful as the cumulative peak of the scherzo/march, where the steady tempo does not detract from the scherzo element. The Finale is most eloquent and beautifully played. In Manfred Litton's emphasis is on its programmatic basis. He depicts Astarte exquisitely, the 'Alpine Fairy' scherzo is equally delightful, as is the tenderly delicate oboe solo which opens the pastoral scene of the Andante; yet the thrilling close of the first movement (with powerful, thrusting horns) and the organ entry at the close of the finale are both splendidly dramatic.

The extra items are all enjoyably spontaneous, the Capriccio italien has visceral thrills and panache, the String Serenade is warmly romantic; and both Romeo and Juliet, matching romantic pathos with passion, and the underrated but masterly Shakespearean Tempest are among the highlights. Even if you have much of this repertoire already, this set remains very enticing.

Symphonies Nos 1-6. Manfred Symphony, Op 58. Romeo and Juliet – Fantasy Overture. Capriccio italien, Op 45. 1812 Overture, Op 49. Marche slave, Op 31. Francesca da Rimini, Op 32.
The Storm, Op 76
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips Bernard Haitink Symphony Edition ⑥
442 061-2PB6 (423 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1961-79

It is clear that Haitink is more at home with symphonic substance than with the shorter colourful showpieces. This set documents his development as a conductor (and a Tchaikovskian) – the shorter pieces being recorded between 1961 and 1972, the symphonies between 1974 and 1979. The exception is the student Tchaikovsky's over-ture, The Storm, recorded with the symphonies, and the performance of which is so masterful, colourful and exciting that you might think it a more mature work (though exactly whose 'more mature' work it might be isn't always easy to say). As the symphonies comprise eighty per cent of the contents of this package, let us deal briefly with the rest. You might wonder if Haitink had ever heard an Italian singing an Italian song, as anything less capricious or Italian would be hard to imagine. There are moments in the feud music of Romeo and Juliet that suggest Haitink's resolve, and his communication of that resolve, was not what it was shortly to become. From eight years later, we have the brilliantly realised (and recorded) letter of the score in Francesca, the 1812 Overture and Marche slave.

On to the symphonies: as a symphonic cycle, it remains temperate, considered and patient, living mostly at a fair distance from the edge, with rarely a hint of exaggeration or overemphasis – sterling qualities indeed. Haitink's grand and dignified manner is immensely stirring and satisfying. Throughout the symphonies, tempos and dynamics are chosen to guarantee impeccable articulation, beauty of tone production, flawless instrumental balances and a typical awareness of the important climactic moment. These recordings of the symphonies have all been available on CD before, with the exception of Manfred which was long overdue for reissue. Its pastoral and orgy (third and fourth movements) encapsulate what is both most frustrating and most formidable in Haitink's Tchaikovsky. Philips's Concertgebouw engineering broke new ground with the symphonies. The tuttis here reproduce with a clarity and epic splendour that have rarely, if ever, been bettered.

Symphonies Nos 1-6
Russian National Orchestra / Mikhail Pletnev
DG ⑤ 449 967-2GH5 (263 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

First things first, and the very opening of the First Symphony's first movement, subtitled 'Daydreams on a Wintry Road', is initially very dreamy at a tempo a lot slower than you might be used to. One wonders, though, if the shape of the first theme is best served by a tempo this slow (and even if subsequent developments are impressively grand, do the proceedings have sufficient momentum?). The spirit of the dance also seems loath to visit the finale: very impressive indeed is the holding back of the heavies so that tutti force is more evenly balanced than usual with ensuing fugal vigour, but might not the wind band have been persuaded to kick a little higher in the second subject (or the coda be sent on its way with a touch more forward motion and flamboyance)?

It may be that one has to try and forget the various familiar Russian ways with these symphonies (say, of Svetlanov, Markevitch or Temirkanov), as Pletnev seems keener to focus attention on Tchaikovsky's other cosmopolitan, Classical self. It is surely significant that he avoids the time-honoured unmarked dynamic and tempo adjustments felt to be essential props (for varying repetitions and building climaxes) by virtually all other interpreters. And his orchestra's cultured tones seem ever more fitted for the job: there is a choir-like blend and evenness of tone from the top to the bottom of the orchestra (brass contributions, in particular, are rounded and sonorous); and it's a very Russian-sounding 'choir' in that, time after time, your attention is caught by the colour, richness and definition of the orchestra's basses, whether bass trombone, tuba, bassoon or string basses. All of this is heard to great effect in the Second Symphony's finale, lightly dispatched with (wicked?) relish as outsize Haydn (turn to, say, Maazel or even Markevitch to hear how blatancy and over- emphasis cheapen this movement).

In the Second Symphony's finale, ideals and actual performance come together (a point confirmed by the final uproarious cannon-fire crescendo from the timpani). On other occasions though, the seriousness of intention can preclude real performance tensions. One listens with a certain detached fascination to the Fourth's first movement, admiring such things as the steady continuity rather than contrast between the two subject groups and the tamed 'fate' fanfares in the brass. But will it ever deliver? Perhaps it does in the coda, where these magnificent strings give out the last statement of the first moderato theme – but only perhaps. A refusal to overstate the case again ennobles much of the Fifth Symphony, but for Pletnev, the Pathétique, one suspects, stands apart from the other symphonies, as this account remains an interpretation that throws moderation to the winds. Compared with his 1991 début recording on Virgin Classics, the first movement Allegro is a degree more moderate, but the Scherzo/March is not a whit less immoderate (a warning to those who don't like death-defying speed in this movement). Here the finale is broader tragedy with darker colourings; the strings sing with greater intensity and there is no stinting on blistering trumpet tone at the top of the climactic scale. The trumpets' fff outburst in the first movement's development is equally powerful, though you can now hear more of the surrounding activity. And that is a tribute to the DG recording; more open, clearer and more present than the Virgin recording, and one that perhaps conveys a greater sense of occasion.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 2

Symphony No 1
Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra / Mariss Jansons Ⓕ
Chandos CHAN8402 (44 minutes: DDD) ●

Symphony No 2. Capriccio italien, Op 45
Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra / Mariss Jansons
Chandos CHAN8460 (48 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1985 ●

The composer gave the work the title Winter Daydreams, and also gave descriptive titles to the first two movements. The opening Allegro tranquillo he subtitled 'Dreams of a winter journey', while the Adagio bears the inscription 'Land of desolation, land of mists'. A Scherzo and finale round off a conventional four-movement symphonic structure. In the slow movement Jansons inspires a performance of expressive warmth and tenderness, while the Scherzo is managed with great delicacy and sensitivity. Both the opening movement and finale are invested with vigour and passion, and everywhere the orchestral playing is marvellously confident and disciplined.

Jansons also has the full measure of the Second Symphony. It is a direct performance – the first movement allegro is relatively steady, but never sounds too slow, because of crisp rhythmic pointing – and the second movement goes for charm and felicity of colour. The finale is properly exuberant, with the secondary theme full of character, and there is a fine surge of adrenalin at the end. The Capriccio italien, a holiday piece in which the composer set out to be entertaining, is also played with great flair and the hint of vulgarity in the Neapolitan tune is not shirked. Again the closing pages produce a sudden spurt of excitement which is particularly satisfying. The recording here is just short of Chandos's finest – the massed violins could be sweeter on top, but the hall resonance is right for this music and there is a proper feeling of spectacle.

Symphonies Nos 4-6

Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra /
Evgeny Mravinsky
DG ② 419 745-2GH2 (129 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1960 ●●●

These recordings are landmarks not just of Tchaikovsky interpretation but of recorded orchestral performances in general. The Leningrad Philharmonic plays like a wild stallion, only just held in check by the willpower of its master. Every smallest movement is placed with fierce pride; at any moment it may break into such a frenzied gallop that you hardly know whether to feel exhilarated or terrified.

The whipping up of excitement towards the fateful outbursts in Symphony No 4 is astonishing – not just for the discipline of the stringendos themselves, but for the pull of psychological forces within them. Symphony No 5 is also mercilessly driven, and pre-echoes of Shostakovichian hysteria are particularly strong in the coda's knife-edge of triumph and despair. No less powerfully evoked is the stricken tragedy of the Pathétique. Rarely, if ever, can the prodigious rhythmical inventiveness of these scores have been so brilliantly demonstrated.

The fanatical discipline is not something one would want to see casually emulated but it is applied in a way which sees far into the soul of the music and never violates its spirit. Strictly speaking there is no real comparison with Mariss Jansons's Chandos issues, despite the fact that Jansons had for long been Mravinsky's assistant in Leningrad. His approach is warmer, less detailed, more classical, and in its way very satisfying. Not surprisingly there are deeper perspectives in the Chandos recordings, but DG's refurbishing has been most successful, enhancing the immediacy of sound so appropriate to the lacerating intensity of the interpretations.

Symphony No 4

Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra / Mariss Jansons
Chandos CHAN8361 Ⓕ
(42 minutes: DDD) ●

A high emotional charge runs through Jansons's performance of the Fourth, yet this rarely seems to be an end in itself. There is always a balancing concern for the superb craftsmanship of Tchaikovsky's writing: the shapeliness of the phrasing; the superb orchestration, scintillating and subtle by turns; and most of all Tchaikovsky's marvellous sense of dramatic pace. Rarely has the first movement possessed such a strong sense of tragic inevitability, or the return of the 'fate' theme in the finale sounded so logical. The playing of the Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra is first rate: there are some gorgeous woodwind solos and the brass achieve a truly Tchaikovskian intensity. Recordings are excellent.

Symphony No 5

Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra / Mariss Jansons
Chandos CHAN8351 (43 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1984 ◉

With speeds which are fast but never breathless and with the most vivid recording imaginable, this is as exciting an account as we have had of this symphony. In no way does this performance suggest anything but a metropolitan orchestra, and Jansons keeps reminding one of his background in Leningrad in the great years of Mravinsky and the Philharmonic. Nowhere does the link with Mravinsky emerge more clearly than in the finale, where he adopts a tempo very nearly as hectic as Mravinsky's on his classic DG recording. In the first movement he resists any temptation to linger, prefering to press the music on, and the result sounds totally idiomatic. In the slow movement Jansons again prefers a steady tempo, but treats the second theme with delicate rubato and builds the climaxes steadily, not rushing his fences, building the final one even bigger than the first. In the finale it is striking that he follows Tchaikovsky's notated slowings rather than allowing extra rallentandos – the bravura of the performance finds its natural culmination.

The Oslo string ensemble is fresh, bright and superbly disciplined, while the wind soloists are generally excellent. The Chandos sound is very specific and well focused despite a warm reverberation, real-sounding and three-dimensional with more clarity in tuttis than the rivals provide.

Symphony No 5
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips 462 905-2PH (46 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1998

This is the genuine article – live and alive – an unpatched one-off performance bursting at the seams with passion, presence, theatre and vitality. But make no mistake, this is not lofty Tchaikovsky. Only you can decide, however, whether Gergiev's very physical bursts of tone and tempo manoeuvres, particularly in the first two movements, are what you want in a recording of this symphony. Reactions may differ from one hearing to the next, always admiring such things as the dramatic effectiveness of the strong bass pedal link between the end of the finale's opening Andante and the start of its ensuing Allegro vivace, but occasionally being left uneasy by some of the tempo contrasts.

'Love at first sight', as Gergiev's collaboration with the orchestra has been described, translates here into body-and-soul compliance with the conductor's expressive intentions. For its own part the orchestra does what it does best: strings lacing the lyricism with their famed vibrato-rich playing, and bouncing the outer sections of the third movement Waltz as only they know how. The slight compression of the Austrian Radio recording for Gergiev is not troublesome; on the contrary, it enables a higher than usual transfer level, and thus greater immediacy for the feel and the features of what was clearly an 'event'.

Symphony No 6

Symphony No 6[b]. Marche slave, Op 31. The Seasons, Op 37*b*[a]. Six morceaux composés sur un seul thème, Op 21[c]. The Sleeping Beauty (arr Pletnev) – excerpts ✪
Russian National Orchestra / Mikhail Pletnev pf
Virgin Classics ② 561636-2 (138 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded [a]1989, [b]1991 and [c]1994 ○○○

There's no denying that Russian orchestras bring a special intensity to Tchaikovsky, and to this Symphony in particular. But, in the past, we have had to contend with lethal, vibrato-laden brass and variable Soviet engineering. Not any more. Pianist Mikhail Pletnev formed this orchestra in 1990 from the front ranks of the major Soviet orchestras, and the result here is now regarded as a classic. The brass still retain their penetrating power, and an extraordinary richness and solemnity before the Symphony's coda; the woodwind make a very melancholy choir; and the strings possess not only the agility to cope with Pletnev's aptly death-defying speed for the third movement march, but beauty of tone for Tchaikovsky's yearning cantabiles. Pletnev exerts the same control over his players as he does over his fingers, to superb effect. The dynamic range is huge and comfortably reproduced with clarity, natural perspectives, a sense of instruments playing in a believable acoustic space, and a necessarily higher volume setting than usual. Marche slave's final blaze of triumph, in the circumstances, seems apt.

Pletnev finds colours and depths in The Seasons that few others have found even intermittently. Schumann is revealed as a major influence, not only on the outward features of the style but on the whole expressive mood and manner. And as a display of pianism the whole set is outstanding, all the more so because Pletnev's brilliance isn't purely egoistic. Even when he does something unmarked – like attaching the hunting fanfares of 'September' to the final unison of 'August' – he's so persuasive that you could believe that this is somehow inherent in the material. This is all exceptional playing, and the recording is ideally attuned to all its moods and colours.

Symphony No 6 H
Piano Concerto No 1 in B flat minor, Op 23
Vladimir Horowitz pf
NBC Symphony Orchestra / Arturo Toscanini
Naxos Historical mono 8 110807 Ⓢ
(71 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1941

Every home should probably have one. After all, Horowitz, that ultimate wizard of the keyboard, was preserved for posterity in the concerto on five different occasions. This performance from Carnegie Hall was taped the month before Horowitz and his father-in-law Toscanini made their better-known studio recording for RCA. Both performances marshal an old war-horse into a thoroughbred racer (past the finishing-post, minutes before most of the competition), and the differences between them owe as much to the sound as the performances. RCA's bursts more vibrantly into the living-room, but the orchestral bass booms, throwing into unfortunate relief a comparatively narrow-range, shallow piano sound with an unhelpful 'ring' in the instrument's middle register. In the end, despite its dazzle, the impression the performance leaves is one of antics, aggression and impatience.

The live performance has a less uniform presence and body, but there is a parity of sound between orchestra and piano, and a less confused picture of Horowitz's playing, which allows you to register a greater variety of touch, colour, maybe even timing. Toscanini's Pathétique always was 'the real thing', in the sense of expression being honestly and directly communicated. But here, there is no mistaking Toscanini pushing the boundaries in, say, a more brilliant Scherzo/March; and a broader finale where the extra playing-out in the finale's second theme contrasts effectively with the quiet sobbing from high cellos with the same theme just before the end. The latter might seem a cliché, but it convinces in the context of a reading that holds all the elements of this symphony in perfect poise.

Variations on a Rococo Theme

Variations on a Rococo Theme, Op 33. Nocturne No 4, Op 19. (arr Tchaikovsky). Pezzo capriccioso, Op 62. When Jesus Christ was but a child No 5, Op 54. Was I not a little blade of grass? No 7, Op 47 (both orch Tchaikovsky). Andante cantabile, Op 11 (arr Tchaikovsky)
Raphael Wallfisch vc
English Chamber Orchestra / Geoffrey Simon 🏵
Chandos CHAN8347 (48 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1984 ●

This account of the Rococo Variations is the one to have: it presents Tchaikovsky's variations as he wrote them, in the order that he devised and including the allegretto moderato con anima that the work's first interpreter, 'loathsome Fitzenhagen', so high-handedly jettisoned. (See also the review under Dvořák where Rostropovich uses the published score rather than the original version.) The first advantage is as great as the second: how necessary the brief cadenza and the andante that it introduces now seem, as an up-beat to the central sequence of quick variations (Fitzenhagen moved both cadenza and andante to the end). And the other, shorter cadenza now makes a satisfying transition from that sequence to the balancing andante sostenuto, from which the long-suppressed eighth variation is an obvious build-up to the coda – why, the piece has a form, after all! Raphael Wallfisch's fine performance keeps the qualifying adjective 'rococo' in mind – it is not indulgently over-romantic – but it has warmth and beauty of tone in abundance. The shorter pieces are well worth having: the baritone voice of the cello suits the Andante cantabile and the Tatyana-like melody of the Nocturne surprisingly aptly. The sound is first-class.

Souvenir de Florence

Tchaikovsky Souvenir de Florence, Op 70
Dvořák String Sextet in A, B80
Sarah Chang, Bernhard Hartog vns
Wolfram Christ, Tanjia Christ vas
Georg Faust, Olaf Maninger vcs
EMI 557243-2 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001 ●●

Two of the finest string sextets ever written by Slavonic composers make an excellent coupling, particularly with such a starry line-up of musicians. Sarah Chang's warmly individual artistry is superbly matched by players drawn from the Berlin Philharmonic, past and present. These are players who not only respond to each other's artistry, but do so with the most polished ensemble and a rare clarity of inner texture, not easy with a sextet.

Souvenir de Florence is given the most exuberantly joyful performance. Written just after he had left Florence, having completed his opera, The Queen of Spades, Tchaikovsky was prompted to compose one of his happiest works, one which for once gave him enormous pleasure. The opening movement's bouncy rhythms in compound time set the pattern, with the second subject hauntingly seductive in its winning relaxation, a magic moment here (track 1, 1'28").

The Adagio cantabile second movement is tenderly beautiful, with the central section sharply contrasted, while the folk-dance rhythms of the last two movements are sprung with sparkling lightness. There are now dozens of versions of this winning work in the catalogue, both for sextet and string orchestra, but none is more delectable than this.

Equally, the subtlety as well as the energy of Dvořák's Sextet is consistently brought out by Chang and her partners, with the players using a huge dynamic range down to the gentlest pianissimo. Here, too, it just outshines the competition.

String Quartets

Awards 1994

String Quartets – No 1 in D, Op 11; No 2 in F, Op 22; No 3 in E flat minor, Op 30. Quartet Movement in B flat. Souvenir de Florence, Op 70
Yuri Yurov va Mikhail Milman vc
Borodin Quartet (Mikhail Kopelman, Andrei Abramenkov vns Dmitri Shebalin va Valentin Berlinsky vc)
Teldec ② 4509-90422-2 (151 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●●●

Who could fail to recognise the highly characteristic urgency and thematic strength of the F major Quartet's first movement development section, or miss premonitions of later masterpieces in the Third Quartet's Andante funèbre. None of these works is 'late' (the last of them pre-dates the Fourth Symphony by a couple of years), yet their rigorous arguments and sweeping melodies anticipate the orchestral masterpieces of Tchaikovsky's full maturity. So why the neglect – that is, of all but the First Quartet? The most likely reason is our habitual expectation of orchestral colour in Tchaikovsky, a situation that doesn't really affect our appreciation of the early, almost Schubertian D major Quartet (the one with the Andante cantabile that moved Tolstoy to tears). The Second and Third Quartets are noticeably more symphonic and particularly rich in the kinds of harmonic clashes and sequences that Tchaikovsky normally dressed for the orchestral arena. Even minor details, like the quick-fire exchanges near the beginning of No 3's Allegretto, instantly suggest 'woodwinds' (you can almost hear oboes, flutes and clarinets jostle in play), while both finales could quite easily have been transposed among the pages of the early symphonies. But if these and other parallels are to register with any conviction, then performers need to locate them, and that's a challenge the Borodins meet with the ease of seasoned Tchaikovskians.

They are natural and spontaneous, most noticeably in the first movement of the exuberant Souvenir de Florence sextet, and in that wonderful passage from the Second Quartet's first movement where the lead violin calms from agitated virtuosity to a magical recapitulation of the principal theme – an unforgettable moment, superbly paced here. Additionally we get a 15-minute B flat Quartet movement – an appealing torso imbued with the spirit of Russian folksong.

Piano Trio

Tchaikovsky Piano Trio in A minor, Op 50
Rachmaninov Trio élégiaque in G minor (1892)
Kempf Trio (Pierre Bensaid vn Alexander Chaushian vc Freddy Kempf pf)
BIS BIS-CD1302 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●

Understandably, remembering its dedicatee, Nikolai Rubinstein, Tchaikovsky's Trio is dominated by the piano part, which has moments of intrepid (sometimes repetitive) rhetoric, which must ring out triumphantly yet not be allowed to usurp the work's underlying elegiac feeling. In many respects this performance carries all before it. Freddy Kempf leads with great conviction, yet can pull back whenever his colleagues are in the ascendant. The very opening is lyrically seductive, and the closing pages, with a moving reprise of the opening theme at the Lugubre finale, are most sensitively managed. But before that the kaleidoscopic variations of the second movement, which begins so serenely, have been presented with sparkling panache: the delightful pianistic roulades of Variation 3 and the exquisite music-box effect of Var 5 both show Kempf as delectably light-fingered, yet he finds real swagger for Var 7, and a Chopinesque rhythmic delicacy for the Tempo di mazurka of Var 10. And in the lovely Andante flebile (Var 9) violinist Pierre Bensaid and cellist Alexander Chaushian share a ravishing delicate duet.

While Tchaikovsky's Piano Trio is ambitiously epic in scale; Rachmaninov's, although obviously drawing on the inspiration of the Tchaikovsky model, with the piano still taking a leading role, is in a single movement. Its mood is tinged with melancholy throughout, surging to moments of passion less extrovert than with Tchaikovsky, but with that characteristic ebb and flow of expressive feeling captured most naturally by these players; they find a touching gentleness for the wistfully sad closing bars. The performance comes into competition with that by the superb Borodin Trio on Chandos, whose coupling is more logical (the first Trio élégiaque, Op 8); but on performance grounds Kempf and his colleagues are by no means second best.

The recording is very well balanced, and the acoustic seems equally suitable for both works. Altogether this is a splendid disc.

Solo Piano Works

Morceaux – Op 10; Op 19 – No 1, Rêverie du soir, No 5, Capriccioso; Op 40 – No 2, Chanson triste, No 8, Valse; Op 51 – No 1, Valse de salon, No 3, Menuetto scherzoso, No 5, Romance; Op 72 – No 5, Méditation, No 12, L'espiègle, No 15, Un poco di Chopin. Romance in F minor, Op 5. Valse-scherzo in A, Op 7. The Seasons, Op 37*b* – No 1, January; No 5, May; No 6, June; No 11, November
Sviatoslav Richter pf
Olympia OCD334 (80 minutes: DDD/ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1983 ●

Richter elevates Tchaikovsky's miniatures far beyond the salon. No interpretative frills, just trenchant fingerwork and perfectly sculpted sound, so that slight unbendings become immensely touching. The effect is to convey not so much the surface melancholy of these pieces as their underlying strength of character. A curious sense of permanence comes through, as if the music is being contemplated rather than felt. Not for imitation, perhaps (who could imitate such perfect harmonic and structural weighting?), but this is breathtaking, inspiring artistry, and it sets its own terms. Sound quality is on the dry side. But Richter's is the sort of playing which positively benefits from close analytical scrutiny, and serious collectors of piano recordings should not hesitate.

Liturgy of St John Chrysostom

Liturgy of St John Chrysostom, Op 41. Nine Sacred Pieces. An Angel Crying
Corydon Singers / Matthew Best
Hyperion CDA66948 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●

Tchaikovsky's liturgical settings have never quite caught the popular imagination which has followed Rachmaninov's (his All-Night Vigil, at any rate). They are generally more inward, less concerned with the drama that marks Orthodox celebration than with the reflective centre which is another aspect. Rachmaninov can invite worship with a blaze of delight, setting 'Pridite'; Tchaikovsky approaches the mystery more quietly. Yet there is a range of emotion which emerges vividly in this admirable record of the Liturgy together with a group of the minor liturgical settings which he made at various times in his life. His ear for timbre never fails him. It is at its most appealing, perhaps, in the lovely 'Da ispravitsya' for female trio and answering choir, beautifully sung here; he can also respond to the Orthodox tradition of rapid vocalisation, as in the Liturgy's Creed and in the final 'Blagosloven grady' (in the West, the Benedictus). Anyone who still supposes that irregular, rapidly shifting rhythms were invented by Stravinsky should give an ear to his Russian sources, in folk poetry and music but also in the music of the Church.

Matthew Best's Corydon Singers are old hands at Orthodox music and present these beautiful settings with a keen ear for their texture and their 'orchestration'. The recording was made in an (unnamed) ecclesiastical acoustic of suitable resonance, and sounds well.

The Snow Maiden

Irina Mishura-Lekhtman mez Vladimir Grishko ten
Michigan University Musical Society Choral Union; Detroit Symphony Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Chandos CHAN9324 (79 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1994

Tchaikovsky wrote his incidental music for Ostrovsky's Snow Maiden in 1873, and though he accepted it was not his best, he retained an affection for it and was upset when Rimsky-Korsakov came along with his full-length opera on the subject. The tale of love frustrated had its appeal for Tchaikovsky, even though he was not to make as much as Rimsky did of the failed marriage between Man and Nature. But though he did not normally interest himself much in descriptions of the natural world, there are charming pieces that any lover of Tchaikovsky's music will surely be delighted to encounter. A strong sense of a Russian folk celebration, and of the interaction of the natural and supernatural worlds, also comes through, especially in the earlier part of the work. There is a delightful dance and chorus for the birds, and a powerful monologue for Winter; Vladimir Grishko, placed further back, sounds magical.

Natalia Erassova (for Chistiakov's recording on CdM) gets round the rapid enunciation of Lel's second song without much difficulty, but does not quite bring the character to life; Mishura-Lekhtman has a brighter sparkle. Chistiakov's Shrove Tuesday procession goes at a much steadier pace than Järvi's, and is thus the more celebratory and ritual where the other is a straightforward piece of merriment. Both performances have much to recommend them, and it is not by a great deal that Järvi's is preferable. Chandos provides transliteration and an English translation.

Opera Arias

Tchaikovsky Eugene Onegin – Let me perish, but first let me summon. The Queen of Spades – What am I crying for, what is it?. The Enchantress – Where are you, beloved?...Hurry to my side. Oprichnik – I heard voices and footsteps Verdi La forza del destino – Son giunta!...Madre, pietosa Vergine; Pace, pace, mio Dio. Otello – Mia madre aveva ... Piangea cantando...Ave Maria. Aida – Qui Radames verrà?... O patria mia. Il trovatore – Tacea la notte placida...Di tale amor
Galina Gorchakova sop Chorus and Orchestra of the Kirov Opera / Valery Gergiev
Philips 446 405-2PH (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995

Gorchakova promises to be one of the vocal giants of her generation. As an interpreter of Tchaikovsky, Gorchakova has already won her laurels on the stage. Despite the size and dark colour of the voice, her soprano is still youthful enough for her to play a plausible Tatyana and the Letter scene will be one of the major reasons for acquiring this disc. The heart of the scene is sung with the kind of pianissimo that one would use to carry to the back of the theatre, rather than an inward pianissimo intended for the microphone. The Queen of Spades aria (Lisa's short solo from Act 1, that is) is so full of beautiful, soaring tone that one resents being cut off just at the point where Herman enters for their duet. The brief aria from The Enchantress includes an exciting high B. Elsewhere there is one worrying sign to be mentioned. That is a tendency to go flat when the music is soft and slow (both the Otello and the Aida suffer from passages of sinking pitch) and one has to hope that difficulties like this are not allowed to defeat her. Gorchakova is no highly polished automaton as a singer. Her artistry is about letting this voice out of its cage and harnessing its formidable energy. The Philips recording team has done well to capture it so truthfully in the studio.

Additional recommendation

Opera arias

Arias from The Enchantress, Eugene Onegin, The Maid of Orleans, Mazeppa and Queen of Spades

Varady sop Evangelatos mez

Munich Radio Orchestra / Kofman

Orfeo C540011A (78 minutes: DDD: 2/02) Ⓕ

Varady is truly a phenomenon; recording in her 59th year she shows no signs of age and brings to these arias her innate gift for going to the heart of the matter. A wholly absorbing recital for all Tchaikovsky lovers.

Eugene Onegin

Dmitri Hvorostovsky bar Eugene Onegin; Nuccia Focile sop Tatyana; Neil Shicoff ten Lensky; Olga Borodina mez Olga; Alexander Anisimov bass Prince Gremin; Sarah Walker mez Larina; Irina Arkhipova mez Filipievna; Francis Egerton ten Triquet; Hervé Hennequin bass-bar Captain; Sergei Zadvorny bass Zaretsky; St Petersburg Chamber Choir; Orchestre de Paris / Semyon Bychkov

Philips ② 438 235-2PH2 (141 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Notes, text and translation included

Recorded 1992 ●

Entirely at the service of Tchaikovsky's marvellous invention, Semyon Bychkov illuminates every detail of the composer's wondrous scoring with pointed delicacy and draws playing of the utmost acuity and beauty from his own Paris orchestra – enhanced by the clear, open recording – and the St Petersburg Choir are superbly disciplined and alert with their words. Focile offers keen-edged yet warm tone and total immersion in Tatyana's character. Aware of the part's dynamic demands, she phrases with complete confidence, eagerly catching the girl's dreamy vulnerability and heightened imagination in the Letter scene, which has that sense of awakened love so essential to it. Hvorostovsky is in his element. His singing has at once the warmth, elegance and refinement Tchaikovsky demands from his anti-hero. Together he, Focile and Bychkov make the finale the tragic climax it should be; indeed the reading of this passage is almost unbearably moving. Shicoff has refined and expanded his Lensky since he recorded it for Levine, and Anisimov is a model Gremin, singing his aria with generous tone and phrasing while not making a meal of it. Olga Borodina is a perfect Olga, spirited, a touch sensual, wholly idiomatic with the text – as, of course, is the revered Russian mezzo Arkhipova as Filipyevna, an inspired piece of casting.

Additional recommendation

Eugene Onegin Ⓗ

Nortsov Eugene Onegin; Kruglikova Tatyana; Kozlovsky Lensky; Antonova Olga; Mikhailov Prince Gremin;Bolshoi Theatre Chorus and Orchestra / Melik-Pashayev, Orlov 🏵

Naxos Historical mono ② 8 110216/7 Ⓢ

(136 minutes: ADD). Notes and synopsis included

Recorded 1937 ●

This is the first recording of many by the Bolshoi of Eugene Onegin, and one not surpassed by its successors. Kruglikova as Tatyana is about as good as they come, better even than the young Vishnevskaya. Her Letter scene is among the most beautifully sung of all. This is a riveting version, and the set to have among historic sets. The sound is reasonable for its day.

Iolanta

Galina Gorchakova sop Iolanta; Gegam Grigorian ten Vaudémont; Dmitri Hvorostovsky bar Robert; Sergei Alexashkin bass King René; Nikolai Putilin bar Ibn-Hakia; Larissa Diadkova mez Martha; Nikolai Gassiev ten Alméric; Tatiana Kravtsova sop Brigitta; Olga Korzhenskaya mez Laura; Gennadi Bezzubenkov bar Bertrand; Chorus and Orchestra of the Kirov Opera, St Petersburg / Valery Gergiev

Philips ② 442 796-2PH2 (96 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1994

Iolanta, the touching little princess, blind and virginal, into whose darkness and isolation there eventually shines the 'bright angel' of Duke Robert, is delightfully sung by Galina Gorchakova. There is a freshness and sense of vulnerability here, especially in the opening scenes with Martha in the garden as she sings wistfully of something that appears to be lacking in her life: the Arioso is done charmingly and without sentimentality. Gegam Grigorian sometimes sounds pinched and under strain, even in the Romance. He is also overshadowed by Hvorostovsky who is here at his best: warm and with a somewhat dusky tone. The King, Provence's 'bon roi René', is benignly if a little throatily sung by Sergei Alexashkin, and he has at hand a sturdy-voiced Ibn-Hakia in Nikolai Putilin. Valery Gergiev conducts a sensitive performance, responding constructively to the unusual scoring, and not overplaying the more demonstrative elements in a score that gains most through some understatement.

Mazeppa

Nikolai Putilin bar Mazeppa; Irina Loskutova sop Maria; Sergei Alexashkin bass Kochubey; Larissa Dyadkova mez Lyubov; Viktor Lutsiuk ten Andrei; Viacheslav Luhanin bass Orlik; Vladimir Zhivopistsev ten Iskra; Nikolai Gassiev ten Drunken Cossack; Kirov Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev

Philips ③ 462 206-2PH3 (170 minutes: DDD)

Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1996

This Kirov recording is extremely telling at all the crucial moments, without emerging as consistently superior to Järvi on DG. Nikolai Putilin's Mazeppa has a heavier voice than his DG counterpart, and he shows more strain (Tchaikovsky takes his baritone to a high A flat at one point). But his dramatic range is greater and he is more believable both as ruthless tyrant and love-struck old man. So honours are fairly even here. Similarly Irina Loskutova's Maria cannot compete with DG's Galina Gorchakova for beauty of tone and purity of line, and in anything above a mezzo piano her voice spreads quite alarmingly. Yet it is Loskutova who is the more moving at the opera's quiet conclusion. It's the same story but in reverse with the two Kochubeys. For Philips Sergei Alexashkin is heftier of voice in Act 1, but it's DG's Anatoly Kocherga, initially rather dry and underpowered, who grows in dramatic stature in the Prison and Execution scenes, darkening the timbre and timing his delivery to perfection.

Scientific measurement would probably show little difference between the Kirov Orchestra's instinctive sostenuto and the plausible copy of it manufactured by the Gothenburgers, or between the full-throated Russian of a native chorus and the Stockholm Royal Opera's more than passable imitation. However, the extra sense of dramatic immediacy here is unmistakable. Järvi was swift in the 'Gopak', stomach-churning in the Prison and Execution scenes, and vivid in the 'Battle of Poltava'; Gergiev is even more so.

The orchestra-pit sound is dryish, with little or no bloom on the strings and indifferently balanced woodwind. The frisson of curtain going up, audience presence, applause between scenes, and movement of voices on stage, offers some compensation, and you soon adapt. But the results of editing together more than one live performance are not entirely satisfactory. There are some bumpy edits on held vocal notes and voices sometimes jump to different positions on stage. Musically both sets are distinguished, but if forced to choose we would take the Gergiev, for an extra sense of the drama being lived out.

The Queen of Spades

Gegam Grigorian ten Herman; Maria Gulegina sop Lisa; Irina Arkhipova mez Countess; Nikolai Putilin bar Count Tomsky; Vladimir Chernov bar Prince Yeletsky; Olga Borodina mez Pauline; Vladimir Solodovnikov ten Chekalinsky; Sergei Alexashkin bass Surin; Evgeni Boitsov ten Chaplitsky; Nikolai Gassiev ten Major-domo; Gennadi Bezzubenkov bass Narumov; Ludmila Filatova mez Governess; Tatiana Filimonova sop Masha; Kirov Theatre Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips ③ 438 141-2PH3 (166 minutes: DDD). Notes, Ⓕ
text and translation included. Recorded 1992 ●

There are major problems with all the current sets of The Queen of Spades, but Valery Gergiev, one of the outstanding Tchaikovskians of the day, here coaxes from a thoroughly Western-sounding Kirov Theatre Orchestra what is surely the most refined account of the score yet recorded, and one that is never lacking energy or full-blooded attack. His is not so much a compromise approach as one which stresses fatalism and underlying sadness. The recording was made in the Kirov Theatre itself, and there is admittedly some constriction to the orchestral sound picture; but for many the atmosphere of a real stage-venue will be a plus, and the all-important balance between voices and orchestra is just right. If the spine still fails to tingle as often as it should, that is mainly a reflection of the respectable but unexciting singing, though it would be folly to expect greater thrills from any of the three rival sets, and in many ways Gergiev's conducting elevates his above them all.

Alexander Tcherepnin

USSR/French/American 1899-1977

GROVE An American composer of Russian origin, Tcherepnin's father Nikolay Nikolayevich (1873-1945) was a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov who wrote ballets for Dyagilev (Le pavillon d'Armide, 1908) and settled in Paris in 1921. Alexander completed his studies there and became associated with Martinu and Beck, experimenting with new scales in a Franco-Russian neo-classical style (including one sometimes known by his name: C-D flat-E flat-E-F-G-A flat-A-B-C). In 1934-7 he travelled in the Far East, which brought about additions to his range of materials. In 1950 he settled in the USA. His large output, spirited in style and cosmopolitan in manner, includes ballets, four symphonies (1927-57), six piano concertos (1919-65), chamber and keyboard music.

Piano Concertos

Piano Concertos – No 1, Op 12; No 4, 'Fantaisie', Op 78; No 5, Op 96
Murray McLachlan pf Chetham's Symphony Orchestra / Julian Clayton
Olympia OCD440 (71 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

The Tcherepnin piano concertos are in their various ways cast in the same exuberant, heartfelt romantic manner. However, there is real variety within this general approach. The First, written in Paris in 1920, takes not the slightest interest in what was beginning to occupy French musicians and most other Parisian expatriates at the beginning of that exciting decade: it looks east, to a Georgia which Tcherepnin had known before exile, and north to an influence from, of all composers, Sibelius. The result is inventive but, predictably, less original than the later concertos. The Fourth, written in 1947, looks further east to China, a country which Tcherepnin had toured in the 1930s and where he met his future wife. It is more a set of three tone-poems, lightly accommodating Chinese musical gestures into the familiar romantic language, than a symphonic concerto.

The Fifth belongs to 1963, and is a much more enigmatic work, and also by some way the most original of the entire set of six. Murray McLachlan is a fine advocate of this music, which is technically demanding and, in the Fifth Concerto, also demanding of a subtle understanding if the most is to be made of its laconic gestures and rather greyer lyricism.

The Chetham's Symphony Orchestra reaffirms its ability to cope with technically testing scores and, guided by Julian Clayton, to make musical sense of them with the command of more experienced musicians.

Narcisse et Echo, Op 40

The Hague Chamber Choir; The Hague Residentie Orchestra / Gennadi Rozhdestvensky
Chandos CHAN9670 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ◉

Tcherepnin's Narcisse et Echo was one of the first of Diaghilev's Paris ballets, produced in 1911 and hence anticipating Ravel's Daphnis et Chloé by a year. Tcherepnin's ear is a match for Ravel's in orchestral subtlety, and his skill in scoring for his large orchestra decorates the ballet with some ravishing sounds. The work was reproached at the time for being static, which it could hardly help being when Narcissus spends the last quarter of an hour gazing adoringly at his reflection in a pool. Not even Nijinsky could do much with that, even with Tcherepnin's most sensuous music twining itself lovingly around him. There is also a dance for Narcissus with the hapless Echo, and some set pieces for a group of Boeotians. Neither of these generates much musical exhilaration, nor, despite a flurry of rhythmic complexity, does the arrival of a troop of depressingly sober Bacchantes. Tcherepnin gives them all lovely sounds, but there is nothing of Ravel's intoxicating energy, let alone his exquisite melodic invention. But as aural sensation it is captivating, especially when played as beautifully as it is here.

Georg Philipp Telemann

German 1681-1767

GROVE Telemann was one of the most prolific composers ever. At 10 he could play four instruments and had written arias, motets and instrumental works. His parents discouraged musical studies, but he gravitated back to them. At Leipzig University he founded a collegium musicum; at 21 he became musical director of the Leipzig Opera at 23 he took on a post as church organist. The next year he moved to Zˇary, as court Kapellmeister, where he wrote French-style dance suites, sometimes tinged by local Polish and Moravian folk music, and cantatas. In 1708 he went in the same capacity to the Eisenach court and in 1712 to Frankfurt as city music director. As Kapellmeister of a church there, he wrote at least five cantata cycles and works for civic occasions, while his duties as director of a collegium musicum drew from him instrumental works and oratorios.

He was offered various other positions, but moved only in 1721, when he was invited to Hamburg as director of music at the five main churches and Kantor at the Johanneum. Here he had to write two cantatas each Sunday, with extra ones for special church and civic occasions, as well as an annual Passion, oratorio and serenata. In his spare time he directed a collegium musicum and wrote for the opera house; the city councillors waived their objections to the latter when he indicated that he would otherwise accept an invitation to Leipzig. He directed the Hamburg Opera from 1722 until its closure in 1738. In 1737 he paid a visit to Paris, appearing at court and the Concert Spirituel. From 1740 he devoted more time to musical theory, but from 1755 he turned to the oratorio. He published much of his music, notably a set of 72 cantatas and the three sets of Musique de table (1733), his best-known works, each including a concerto, a suite and several chamber pieces. He was eager to foster the spread of music and active in publishing several didactic works, for example on figured bass and ornamentation. He was by far the most famous composer in Germany; in a contemporary dictionary he is assigned four times as much space as J. S. Bach.

Telemann composed in all the forms and styles current in his day; he wrote Italian-style concertos and sonatas, French-style overture-suites and quartets, German fugues, cantatas, Passions and songs. Some of his chamber works, for example the quartets in the Musique de table, are in a conversational, dialogue-like manner that is lucid in texture and elegant in diction. Whatever style he used, Telemann's music is easily recognizable as his own, with its clear periodic structure, its clarity and its ready fluency. Though four years senior to Bach and Handel, he used an idiom more forward-looking than theirs and in several genres can be seen as a forerunner of the Classical style.

Flute Concertos

Concerto for Flute, Strings and Continuo in D, TWV51:D2. Concerto for Flute, Strings and Continuo in G, TWV51:G2. Concerto for 2 Flutes, Violone, Strings and Continuo in A minor, TWV53:A1[a]. Concerto for Flute, Violin, Cello, Strings and Continuo in A, TWV53:A2. Concerto for Flute, Oboe d'amore, Viola d'amore, Strings and Continuo in E, TWV53:E1

Emmanuel Pahud, [a]Jacques Zoon fls Berlin Baroque Soloists (Wolfram Christ vad Georg Faust vc Klaus Stoll violone Albrecht Mayer obd) / Rainer Kussmaul vn

EMI 557397-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

You will rarely hear such personality in a Baroque-concerto soloist as the extraordinary Emmanuel Pahud exhibits here. Berlin Baroque Soloists acclimatise effortlessly to an 18th-century palette, and distinguished colleagues they make for Pahud. The flautist sets out his stall from the Andante of the succinct G major concerto (completed from a damaged source and therefore making its recording début) whose startling resemblance to the slow movement of Bach's F minor Concerto, BWV1056, seems to inspire Pahud to a lyricism of understated elegance which one often hears in the best performances of the Bach work. Indeed, it is his sensitivity to Telemann's gestural implications and ability to colour the music at every turn which makes Pahud's playing so enchanting in all five concertos.

Telemann performance on a modern flute will inevitably lead to some recoiling, but one never feels deprived of the gentle and beguiling articulation of a 'period' instrument or its capacity for soft dynamic and purity of sound. One only has to hear the lithe performance of the A major Triple Concerto, from Part 1 of Telemann's famous banquet publication of 1733, Tafelmusik, where character abounds through Pahud's concern with first principles. Joyous exchange and textural delights abound in the Triple Concerto in E major, where Wolfram Christ's viola d'amore and Albrecht Mayer's oboe d'amore combine with the flautist in a ravishingly blended montage. The Flute Concerto in D confirms everything about Pahud's exquisite taste and mesmerising sound. A real winner.

Horn Concertos

Concerto for Three Horns, Violin and Orchestra 🅿
in D major. Overture-Suites – C, TWV55:C5, 'La bouffonne'; F, TWV55:F11, 'Alster Echo'.
Concerto in G, 'Grillen-Symphonie'
Anthony Halstead, Christian Rutherford, Raul Diaz hns Collegium Musicum 90 / Simon Standage vn
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0547 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

This release shows Telemann at his most irrepressibly good-humoured and imaginative. There's a concerto for three rattling horns and a solo violin (a splendid sound, with the horns recorded at what seems like the ideal distance), and an elegant suite for strings which sounds like Handel, Bach and a few French composers all thrown in together. More striking, though, is the most substantial piece on the disc, the Alster Echo Overture-Suite, a nine-movement work for strings, oboes and horns full of tricks and surprises occasioned by a host of representative titles. Thus 'Hamburg Carillons' brings us horns imitating bells, 'Concerto of Frogs and Crows' has some mischievously scrunchy wrong notes, and in 'Alster Echo' there's a complex network of echoes between oboes and horns. But the show-stealer is the Grillen-Symphonie ('Cricket Symphony'). This is a work for the gloriously silly scoring of piccolo, alto chalumeau, oboe, violins, viola, and two double-basses, a somewhat Stravinskian combination that you're unlikely to encounter every day. But it's not just the instrumentation that's irresistibly odd. There is a slow movement with curious, melancholy woodwind interventions a little reminiscent of Harold in Italy, and a finale which is quite a hoot.

String Concertos

Concerto for 4 Violins and Strings in A, TWV54:A1. 🅿
Concertos for 4 Violins without Continuo –
in G, TWV40:201; in D, TWV40:202; in C, TWV40:203.
Violin Concerto in A, 'Die Relinge', TWV51:A4.
Sinfonia Spirituosa in D, TWV44:1. Symphony in D, TWVAnh50:1. Overture in D, TWV55:D6[a]
[a]Jaap ter Linden va da gamba
Musica Antiqua Köln / Reinhard Goebel vn
Archiv Produktion 471 492-2AH Ⓕ
(74 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2001

With works and performances of such bristling vitality and colour, no excuses need be made for Telemann. The programme begins with the emphatically dynamic Sinfonia spirituosa, more often heard with its ad lib trumpet part but arguably better off without it; the second movement (which looks a slight entity on paper) is shaped with all the poise and elegance of Goebel at his most cultivated. So, too, the Overture in D, where the opening saccadé ('jerked') rhythms receive an arrow-like precision of ensemble, although concertante cellist Jaap ter Linden – returning to his alma mater for a guest appearance – appears perhaps slightly less comfortable than one might have imagined.

Between such opulent generosity, Goebel interleaves three 'concertos' for four solo violins, sui generis pieces providing transparent delicacies of the sort Telemann offers in his 12 Fantasias for solo violin. They are life-loving vignettes, interchanging poignant twists with sparkling extroversion. Even less conventional, and just as innovative, is the Concerto in A, Die Relinge, a work which explores a testingly high tessitura for a 'violine principale' above three further violin parts, viola and continuo. The final minuet manages to keep everyone happy. This is where Telemann could not be in better hands. Goebel and his thrusting virtuoso band have the measure of almost everything that this mercurial composer throws at them. A vitally conceived new release, especially for those who think Telemann is a poor man's Bach.

Overture-Suites

Overture-Suite in A minor[a]. Concerto in E minor 🅿 for Recorder and Flute[b]. Viola Concerto No 1 in G[c].
Ouverture des nations anciennes et modernes for

Strings and Continuo, TWV55
[b]Franz Verster fl Paul Doctor va [a]South-West German Chamber Orchestra / Friedrich Tilegant; [b]Amsterdam Chamber Orchestra / André Rieu; [c]Concerto Amsterdam / Frans Brüggen rec 🏵
Apex 0927-40843-2 Ⓢ
(69 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1967-68 ●●

Four performances of the highest calibre, marvellously recorded in the 1960s and now sounding as fresh as the day they were made. Two of them feature the distinguished recorder player Frans Brüggen. He is at his inimitable finest, and this is very fine indeed, in the masterly Suite in A minor for recorder and strings (every bit as fine a work as the Bach B minor Suite for the same instrumentation) and the E minor Concerto for recorder, transverse flute and strings with its attractive interplay of solo texture. Here he is joined by Franz Verster. Brüggen then moves to the conductor's podium to direct the Concerto Amsterdam, joined by a superb viola player, Paul Doctor, in the famous G major Viola Concerto. The Ouverture des nations anciennes et modernes is another suite, full of the composer's most felicitious invention. The music is played with great character and the CD transfer is exemplary.

'La Bizarre'
Overture-Suites – in B flat, 'Les Nations', TWV55: B5; in D, TWV55: D18; in G, 'La Bizarre', TWV55: G2. Violin Concerto in A, 'Les Rainettes', TWV51: A2[a] 🅿
[a]Midori Seiler vn Akademie für Alte Musik, Berlin
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1744 Ⓕ
(71 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2001 ●

More entrancing Telemann suites. Here we have La Bizarre, rather excitedly named after some textural oddities in the overture; a trumpet suite with no title but including an amusing depiction of a postillion; and Les Nations, a whizz through the national characteristics by turns of the Turks (coarse and direct), the Swiss (calm and dignified), the Muscovites (represented by their church bells) and the Portuguese (exuberant dancing). This is music of unremitting good humour, with plenty of jokes for musicians and listeners alike, in which the ideas never stop flowing and the craftsmanship never falters. The Berlin Academy of Early Music could have been made for these works. All it takes to bring them off, after all, is to play with Tiggerish energy, virtuoso precision of ensemble and a huge smile in your heart, and this they do with a group spirit that is all the more remarkable for the fact that they operate without a director. True, they may lack some of the clarity and grace shown by Collegium Musicum 90 under Simon Standage in their account of Les Nations on Chandos, but their strength of commitment more than compensates. The result is a joy from start to finish.

Overture-Suites – G minor, TWV55:g4; A minor, TWV55:a2; C, TWV55:C6; D, TWV55:D15; D minor, TWV55:d3; F minor, TWV55:f1 🅿
Vienna Concentus Musicus / Nikolaus Harnoncourt 🏵
Warners Ultima ② 0927-41403-2 Ⓑ
(148 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1978 ●

Harnoncourt is nowhere more at home than in the aesthetic world of this music. The Overtures of the ravishing G minor Suite and the bolder C major work show him to be a master of noble gesture and purposeful articulation. There is a robust, biting energy about Harnoncourt which is infectious; often, as in the Bourée en trompette of the C major work, one imagines that the exaggerated contrasts and deliberate accentuations would appear mannered if executed by anyone other than Harnoncourt. Throughout, he conjures up subtle rhythmic deviations, each paragraph flexibly shaped but still controlled and naturally breathed. If pliancy of this kind is an answer to making sense of Baroque phrasing, then texture speaks volumes too: Telemann's oboe writing in particular, and its place within a string body, is exceptionally skilled; his scoring of three oboes is especially effective and the oboists play with irresistible esprit. The D major Suite is full of instances where their performances brim with personality, contributing greatly to that fruity and ever so musty nose which characterises Concentus Musicus on vintage form. The recorded sound is full of presence. With Harnoncourt one can imagine few exponents better suited to this colourful repertoire. This release is full of many unique delights.

Additional recommendation
Overture-Suites
F, 'Alster Echo', TWV55: F11; G, 'Burlesque de Don Quichotte', TWV55: G10. B flat, 'La Bourse' 🅿
Tafelmusik Baroque Orchestra / Lamon vn
Analekta fleurs de lys FL2 3138 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
No longer available in the UK, but try the internet

Music of sparkling invention, guaranteed to bring amusement and agreeable entertainment to listeners and performers alike. The performances from this top Baroque orchestra are exemplary. A perfect Telemann release.

Musique de Table / Tafelmusik

Tafelmusik, Part 1 – Overture: Suite in E minor; Quartet in G; Trio in E flat; Conclusion in E minor; Part 2 – Quartet in D minor
Florilegium (Ashley Solomon, Andrew Crawford fls Walter van Hauwe rec Alexandra Bellamy ob Kati Debretzeni, Rodolfo Richter vns Jane Rogers va Jennifer Morsches vc Robert Nairn db David Miller lte James Johnstone hpd)
Channel Classics CCS19198 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Also available on SACD CCSSA19002
Recorded c2001 ●

No dogma here from Florilegium. They have jettisoned authoritarian 'authenticity' and taken responsibility for considering options – which is what interpretation is about. So, no double dotting in the introduction of the French-style Overture. It is played as written, but not stolidly, because crisp attack is allied to a flowing but pliant treatment of the basic pulse. This is a pointer to how these artists recreate music that doesn't contain many pointers to how it might be recreated.

Florilegium don't put a foot wrong in their decisions about tempo, articulation, phrasing and dynamics. Nor do they ignore that elusive quality called content. Try the Loure (track 4) where, through the appropriate weighting of accents and evocative shaping of lines, the melancholia also woven into this slow jig is captured. Rhythms are shaped too, by slight changes in the stressing of note patterns. This way, a seemingly unvaried design (as in the first movement of the D minor Quartet), reveals different facets to its makeup.

Intelligent thinking also comes from another period instrument group, the Orchestra of the Golden Age (reviewed here). As yet, they lack the ultimate in technical refinement; but their recordings offer spaciousness and perspective that is only discerned on the current release if the volume is cut to curb a ridiculously high output level that coarsens tone and flattens the image. Musically, though, an outstanding disc.

Musique de Table, 'Tafelmusik', Part 3 – Concerto for Two Horns and Strings in E flat; Overture in B flat; Quartet in E minor; Sonata for Oboe and Continuo in G minor; Trio in D; Conclusion in B flat
Orchestra of the Golden Age
Naxos 8 553732 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995

The Orchestra of the Golden Age bring expressive warmth to this evergreen repertoire. The present disc contains the third of the three 'Productions' that make up Telemann's most comprehensive orchestral/instrumental publication. It's the shortest of the three and so can be accommodated comfortably on a single disc. Like its predecessors, the Third consists of an orchestral Suite, Quartet, Concerto, Trio, Sonata for melody instrument with figured bass and an orchestral 'Conclusion'. Telemann had already generously provided for transverse flute, trumpet and solo violins in the previous 'Productions' while maintaining the flute profile (Quartet and Trio) in the third anthology; he gives pride of place to oboe(s) in the Suite, Sonata and Conclusion, and a pair of horns in the Concerto.

One might feel that a slightly augmented string section would have been justified for the orchestral suites and concertos. But, in this instance the players realise the innate nobility of the French overture character with a justly 'occasional' tempo. In the Concerto, which comes over well, if perhaps a shade rigidly in its rhythm, the horn players Roger Montgomery and Gavin Edwards sustain an evenly balanced and tonally secure partnership. That also goes for the lightly articulated flute partnership of Edwina Smith and Felicity Bryson in the Trio. The lovely G minor Oboe Sonata is played with warmth and expressive intimacy by Heather Foxwell. Telemann brings all to a vigorous close with a little three-section orchestral coda, marked Furioso. This is a set which makes rather more of Telemann's inflective délicatesse than others at twice or even three times the price.

Chamber Works

Sonates Corellisantes – No 1 in F, TWV42:F2. 🅿
Paris Quartets, 'Nouveaux quatuors en Six Suites' – No 6 in E minor, TWV43:e4. Essercizii Musici – Trio No 8 in B flat, TWV42:B4. Quartets – A minor, TWV43:a3; G minor, TWV43:g4
Florilegium Ensemble
Channel Classics CCS5093 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●●

The rarity here is the Sonata Corellisante for two violins and continuo in which Telemann pays tribute to Corelli. The remaining works are the sixth and perhaps finest of the 1738 Nouveaux Quatuors or Paris Quartets as they have become known, a little Quartet (or Quadro) in G minor, a B flat Trio from the Essercizii Musici collection (*c*1739) and a fine Concerto da camera (Quartet) in A minor, very much along the lines of Vivaldi's pieces of the same kind in which each instrument other than the continuo has an obbligato role. The finest work here is the Paris Quartet, which consists of a Prelude, a sequence of dance-orientated movements and an elegiac Chaconne that lingers long in the memory. The performance is full of vitality and probes beneath the music's superficialities. There is, throughout the programme here, an intensity and a youthful spontaneity about this playing which has considerable appeal.

Kleine Cammer-Music – Partita No 2 in G, TWV41:G2. Essercizii Musici – Solo No 5 in B flat, TWV41:B6; Solo No 11 in E minor, TWV41:e6; Trio No 12 in E flat, TWV42:Es3. Der getreue Music-Meister – Sonata in A minor, TWV41:a3. Der Harmonische Gottesdienst – No 26, Am Sonntage Jubilate in C minor, TWV1:356[a]; No 31, Am ersten Pfingstfeiertage in G, TWV1:1732[a] 🅿
Paul Goodwin ob Nigel North lte/theorbo Susan Sheppard, [a]Lynden Cranham vcs John Toll hpd
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7152 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

Paul Goodwin is surely one of the finest Baroque oboists of the moment, so when he turns his mind to such a master of agreeable and skilfully composed chamber music as Telemann, it must be worth our while listening in. Every piece has its own character and charms: here is a seven-movement Partita from the Kleine Cammer-Music of 1716, then a couple of Solos and a quirky Trio involving an obbligato harpsichord from the Essercizii Musici of 1739, while a Lesson from the giant 1720s part-work, Der getreue Music-Meister, sits alongside movements with oboe obbligato from the slightly earlier sacred cantata collection Der harmonische Gottesdienst. The variety of form and nomenclature is more than matched on this disc by that of accompaniments which, as so many of the best continuo teams do these days, make an indispensable creative contribution to the success of the performance as a whole.

With the boisterous and inspired Romanesca pair of Nigel North and John Toll on board this is no surprise. A cello also takes the original vocal line in the cantata movements. As for Goodwin himself, his playing is bold and bright with solid, versatile technique and fluid phrasing, and his interpretations are detailed and intelligent while losing nothing in spontaneity. The recorded sound for all instruments is perhaps rather aggressive over the space of an hour's listening, but then these are performances which by their very refusal to be timid demand full attention from the listener.

Trio Sonatas – F, TWV42:F10; G minor, TWV42:g7. Quartets – C, TWV43:C2; B minor, TWV43:b3; G, TWV43:G12 🅿
Limoges Baroque Ensemble (Maria-Tecla Andreotti fl Sergio Azzolini bn Gilles Colliard vn Vittorio Ghielmi va da gamba Bruno Cocset vc/violone Willem Jansen hpd) / Christophe Coin va da gamba
Auvidis Astrée E8632 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

This discerningly assembled programme of chamber music with viola da gamba shows off the composer in some of his finest and most varied colours. Each piece is of sustained musical interest and expressive charm. Christophe Coin, who plays viola da gamba and directs the ensemble, is one of the most interesting minds at work in this period, and his performances are full of rhythmic energy, expressive fervour and technical expertise. Coin has always been keen to highlight Telemann's sensibility towards colour and texture, a feature that becomes strikingly apparent in the Quartet in B minor. It is scored for flute, viola da gamba, bassoon and continuo and, like its companion in C major, conforms with an Italian concerto a quattro. The two slow movements of the B minor work are enormously expressive, the one tinged with melancholy, the other more conventionally lyrical. More startling than either of these, though, is the exotic finale with its central European folk-dance rhythmic inflexions, so beloved by the composer.

The remaining pieces are all delightful, especially the Quartet in G major, scored for flute, two violas da gamba and harpsichord. Why is the companion piece always ignored? It is on a comparable inspirational level.

This is a first-rate release and one of the most invigorating discs of Telemann's chamber music available. The recorded sound is outstanding.

---

12 Fantaisies for Violin without Continuo, TWV40: 14-25. Der getreue Music-Meister – 'Gulliver' Suite in D, TWV40:108 🅿
Andrew Manze, Caroline Balding vns
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7137 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Andrew Manze brings a very distinctive angle to the 12 Fantaisies. We have learnt to take virtuosity for granted with Manze – his remarkable feats allow the most prejudiced to forget that he is playing a Baroque fiddle. But without such an instrument he could barely create such a biting astringency in the more self-effacing and tortured moments (Fantaisie No 6) or a cultivated assurance and definition in articulation to the recognisably regular sections, such as Fantaisie No 10, where Telemann is working in established forms – particularly in the latter works in the set where dance forms predominate.

If characterisation is the key, Manze is arguably more persuasive than any of his rivals. He grows through phrases in the Gigue of the Fourth Fantaisie in a fashion which gives the work a peculiarly stoical strength, purrs through the contrapuntally conceived Fantaisies with nonchalant disdain for their extreme technical demands and leaves sighs and pauses hanging with supreme eloquence. With sheer lucidity, imagination and colour, he most acutely captures the sense of a famous public figure ensconced in a private world against the backdrop of a musical world in a state of flux. To add spice to an already outstanding release, we have the short and delightful Gulliver Suite for two violins.

---

12 Sonate metodiche 🅿
Barthold Kuijken fl Wieland Kuijken va da gamba
Robert Kohnen hpd
Accent ② ACC94104/5D (140 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●●

No, the title is hardly an incentive to part with one's pocket-money. But with Telemann we should know better than to be taken in by such packaging details. These are, in fact, 12 skilfully written and entertaining sonatas, published in two sets of six and issued in 1728 and 1732. Telemann seems, right from the start, to have had two instruments in mind: flute or violin, and though Barthold Kuijken has elected to play all of them on a Baroque flute, he does so with such technical mastery that there is little cause for regret. He savours the many playful ideas contained in the faster movements and realises a touching sense of melancholy in several of the slow ones. Among the most impressive of the sonatas is that in B minor, which Kuijken plays with sensitivity and technical panache. The interpretation is on a sufficiently elevated level to warrant unqualified praise. The recorded sound is first-rate.

Die Donner-Ode, TWV6:3

Der Herr ist König, TWV8:6. Die Donner-Ode, TWV6:3 🅿

Ann Monoyios, Barbara Schlick sops Axel Köhler counterten Wilfried Jochens ten Harry van der Kamp, Hans-Georg Wimmer, Stephan Schreckenberger basses Rheinische Kantorei; Das Kleine Konzert / Hermann Max
Capriccio 10 556 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1990-92

The Donner-Ode was one of Telemann's biggest public successes during his lifetime and is a striking piece in its own right, a vivid reaction to the Lisbon earthquake of 1755. The shock caused to the international community by this dreadful event (in which some 60,000 people were killed) was enormous, and in Hamburg a special day of penitence was the occasion for this 'Thunder Ode', though it does perhaps suggest a rather smug satisfaction that such a disaster didn't befall northern Germany. 'The voice of God makes the proud mountains collapse', the text proclaims, 'Give thanks to Him in His temple!' The music, too, both in its mood and in that extraordinarily up-to-date style of Telemann's later years, frequently conjures the benign, entertainingly song-like pictorial mood of a Haydn Mass or oratorio. Entertaining is the word, though, especially in this energetic performance under Hermann Max. He is fleet-footed and buoyantly athletic, benefiting from what is becoming his customary excellent team of German soloists.

For the coupling Max chooses another German work, the cheerful cantata Der Herr ist König, written much earlier in the composer's life and more Bach-like in character and form (though it is worth pointing out that since it survives partly in Bach's hand, we ought perhaps to conclude that Telemann was the one wielding the influence here). As in the Ode, choir, soloists and orchestra are bright, tight-knit and well recorded, making this release an enjoyable one.

Die Hirten an der Krippe zu Bethlehem

Die Hirten an der Krippe zu Bethlehem, TWV1:797. Siehe, ich verkündige Euch, TWV1:1334. Der Herr hat offenbaret, TWV1:262 P
Constanze Backes sop Mechthild Georg contr Andreas Post ten Klaus Mertens bass Michaelstein Chamber Choir; Telemann Chamber Orchestra / Ludger Rémy
CPO CPO999 419-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 ●

The tenderly expressive and ingenuous character of German Protestant Christmas music of the Baroque seldom fails to exert its magic. Though the greatest achievements in this tradition greatly diminished after Bach, there were exceptions. One of them is Telemann's intimate and imaginative oratorio Die Hirten an der Krippe zu Bethlehem ('The Shepherds at the Crib in Bethlehem'). The text is by the Berlin poet, Ramler and though Ramler's taste for classical forms sometimes makes his work stiff and austere, nothing could be further removed from this than his intimate account and celebration of Christ's birth. Certainly, it touched a chord in Telemann, who responded with music of expressive warmth and irresistible charm.

This is not at all the world of Bach's Christmas Oratorio, indeed it is only approximately a sixth of the length of Bach's masterpiece. Telemann's concept is one rather of noble simplicity, a sought-after goal in post-Bach church music which, in this respect, at least, provided a perfect foil to Ramler's text. Every reader will recognise the melody of the opening number as belonging to the Latin carol In dulci jubilo. Telemann's harmonisation of the 16th-century tune sets the scene concisely and intimately. Thereafter, follows one delight after another. Of outstanding beauty are the 'Shepherd's Song' and the bass aria, 'Hirten aus den goldnen Zeiten'. This is an extremely pleasurable, well-filled, disc with a pervasive charm. The remaining two items are both Christmas cantatas, of 1761 and 1762 respectively, and contain music of enormous appeal. Performances are excellent, with outstanding singing by Klaus Mertens and Mechthild Georg. Both choir and orchestra rise to the occasion under the sensitive and stylish direction of Ludger Rémy. Three hitherto unrecorded pieces in performances of such vitality make this a very strong issue.

Cantatas

Lobet den Herrn, alle seine Heerscharen, TWV1:061. Wer nur den lieben Gott lässt walten, TWV1:593. Der Tod ist verschlungen in den Sieg, TWV1:320
Dorothee Fries sop Mechthild Georg contr Andreas Post ten Albert Pöhl bass Friedemann Immer Trumpet Consort (Friedemann Immer, Klaus Osterloh, Ute Hübner tpts Stefan Gawlik timp) Bach Collegium Vocale, Siegen; Hanover Hofkapelle / Ulrich Stötzel
Hänssler Classic CD98 179 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997

While Telemann's concertos, suites, instrumental chamber music and oratorios have been well explored by performers, his large-scale cantatas, comparatively speaking, have not. Part of the problem is that there is a truly daunting number of them. And, it need hardly be said, the quality is variable. But few are utterly devoid of inspiration and the three pieces contained in this programme rise well beyond that category. Until now they have remained very possibly unperformed, but certainly unrecorded. These are not domestic pieces of the kind which characterise his well-known Hamburg anthology, Der harmonische Gottesdienst, but generously, sometimes colourfully orchestrated works with choruses, recitatives, arias and chorales. The format, in short, is Bach-like, though with nothing remotely comparable to the great opening choral fantasies of which Bach was the master. Telemann usually treats his hymn melodies simply, this approach lending them a distinctive, ingenuous charm.

The three cantatas offer strong contrasts of colour and of mood. The New Year piece, Lobet den Herrn has glittering trumpet parts with timpani and Telemann's deployment of them is deft and effective. The Neumeister setting, on the other hand, with an orchestra confined to strings and woodwind, is quietly spoken and more reflective. Performances are stylish, and the director, Ulrich Stötzel, has a lively feeling for Telemann's frequent use of dance rhythms. The soloists are expressive, notably Mechthild Georg, who offers a lyrical account of her aria with oboe in the Easter cantata, Der Tod ist verschlungen in den Sieg. In short, this is a release which should interest and delight all readers with a taste for the music of this imaginative, prolific and seemingly indefatigable composer, whose fecundity too often prompts generalisations that are as unwelcome as they are unjustified.

Orpheus

Roman Trekel bar Orpheus; Ruth Ziesak sop Eurydice; Dorothea Röschmann sop Orasia; Werner Güra ten Eurimedes; Maria Cristina Kiehr sop Ismene; Hanno Müller-Brachmann bar Pluto; Isabelle Poulenard sop Cephisa, Priestess; Axel Köhler counterten Ascalax; RIAS Chamber Choir, Berlin; Academy for Ancient Music, Berlin / René Jacobs
Harmonia Mundi ② HMC90 1618/9
(159 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation Ⓕ
included. Recorded 1996 ●

This is the first performance on disc of an opera that was recognised as being the product of Telemann's pen only some 20 years ago. The original libretto was by a Frenchman, Michel du Boullay. Telemann seems to have adapted the text to suit Hamburg taste, but though the libretto has survived virtually complete, a small part of the score is lost. For the edition used here, Peter Huth – who has also contributed a useful essay – Jakob Peters-Messer and René Jacobs have filled the lacunae with music from other Telemann sources. Telemann's Orpheus has an additional dimension to the standard version of the legend in the person of Orasia, widowed Queen of Thrace. She occupies a key position in the drama, first as murderess of Eurydice of whose love for Orpheus she is jealous, then of Orpheus himself, since he, understandably, rejects her advances. The plot develops effectively, contributing greatly to the dramatic coherence and overall satisfaction provided by text and music alike. In common with a great many operas for the Hamburg stage, Orpheus contains arias sung in languages other than the German vernacular. Italian was the usual alternative, but here there are airs in French, too, and Telemann, on these occasions, lends emphasis to the 'mixed style' aesthetic, in which he was an ardent believer, by retaining the distinctive stylistic character of each country. But the German arias are often both the most interesting and the most varied, since it is the Lied and the arioso, as developed in the Passion-Oratorio settings, that provide those additional ingredients which vitalise, refresh and give distinction to his music.

The cast is first-rate. Dorothea Röschmann projects a passionate and temperamental Orasia for whom Telemann has provided several strongly characterised arias. Orpheus is sung by Roman Trekel, Eurydice by Ruth Ziesak. Telemann adorns both roles with an affecting blend of lyricism and pathos. Eurydice's part in the drama is, perforce, relatively small but her music is often alluring and nowhere more so, perhaps, than when she welcomes the shades, who gather to prevent an opportunity for the lovers to look upon one another during the rescue scene. There are some forward-looking harmonies here which foreshadow later developments in opera. Orpheus's music is, appropriately, captivating more often than not; and it is strikingly varied in character.

The other major beneficiary of Telemann's musical largesse is Orpheus's friend, Eurimedes, a tenor role expressively sung by Werner Güra. Pluto, a bass-baritone role sung with resonance and authority by Hanno Müller-Brachmann, appears in Act 1 only; but he has some splendid music. The remaining roles are small, but, of these, Ismene, one of Orasia's ladies-in-waiting, deserves mention for the aria, 'Bitter und süss sind Rachgier und Liebe'. This double-edged piece is ravishingly sung by Maria Cristina Kiehr. And another, for Pluto's servant Ascalax, contains moments of vivid word-painting fluently if, perhaps, tamely handled by Axel Köhler. In choosing a soprano of the calibre of Isabelle Poulenard to sing the minor role of Cephisa, a nymph, Jacobs showed shrewd judgement, since Telemann wrote a virtuoso aria for her which Poulenard sings with brilliance and technical skill. Cephisa also shares some delightful music with a chorus of nymphs.

There are several fine choruses, lightly and articulately sung by the RIAS Chamber Choir and a handful of invigorating instrumental numbers. Jacobs and his musicians deserve congratulations, and so does Harmonia Mundi for the first-rate recording. This is an important and hugely enjoyable release.

Sir Michael Tippett British 1905-1998

GROVE Tippett studied with C Wood and Kitson at the RCM (1923-8), then settled in Oxted, Surrey, where he taught, conducted a choir and began to compose. However, dissatisfaction with his technique led him to take further lessons with Morris (1930-32), and he published nothing until he was into his mid-30s. By then he was conducting at Morley College, of which he became music director in 1940; there he performed his oratorio A Child of our Time (1941), which uses a story of Nazi atrocity but draws no simple moral from it, concluding rather that we must recognize within ourselves both good and evil. Earlier works, like the String Quartet No 1 and the Concerto for double string orchestra, had married Stravinskian neo-classicism with a bounding rhythm that came from the English madrigal, but the oratorio added to these a Baroque concept of form and black spirituals to replace the chorales of a Protestant Passion. It also made clear Tippett's willingness to exert himself in the public world, which he did again as a conscientious objector in 1943 in accepting imprisonment rather than conscription.

A Child of our Time seems further to have released creative energy that went into a series of works – two more quartets, the cantata for tenor and piano Boyhood's End and the Symphony No 1 – leading to the composition of the opera The Midsummer Marriage in the years1946-52. This, at once a pastoral, a modern morality and a mystery play of psychic growth, called for a further extension of resources: luminous static harmony, orchestral brilliance, a bold command of large spans of time, and a lively variety of rhythm in the largely danced middle act. The message is again that of the oratorio: before marriage the central characters must each accept the wedding within their personalities of intellect and carnality. The theme relates to The Magic Flute, and Tippett's sources for his own libretto also include Shaw, Yeats and Eliot.

The opera's musical exuberance spilt over into succeeding works, including the Fantasia concertante on a Theme of Corelli for strings and the Piano Concerto, but then through the Symphony No 2 (1957) came a clearing and hardening of style towards the vivid block forms and declamatory vocal style of the opera King Priam, composed in 1958-61, which concerns the problem of free will. Once more an opera had its offshoots; notably in the Piano Sonata No 2 and the Concerto for Orchestra, with its distinct gestures and circular formal schemes, but followed by a new, ecstatic continuity in the cantata The Vision of St Augustine (1965). Here the baritone's central narrative is subverted by huge choral parentheses, representing the density of thought and feeling embracing the simple account of the circumstances leading up to the vision. In his opera The Knot Garden (1970) he concentrates on the emotional substance of clashes of personality and their outcome. His unusually candid if stylized presentation of raw human relationships and of the need to make a success of the seemingly incompatible ones produce a score of lapidary compression, notable for its metallic sonorities, its use of a 12-note theme (though not serial technique) to represent fractured relationships and its revival of blues and boogie-woogie in a manner analogous to his use of spirituals in A Child of our Time.

Symphony No 3 continues to explore the seemingly inexhaustible flow of invention stimulated by the 'light' and the 'shadow'; the abstract musical argument of the first part is answered by the overtly human involvement of the second, where blues again express a basic human predicament and Beethoven's music provides archetypal gestures. The range of reference is wider in the opera The Ice Break, where again the blues stand for human warmth in a time of uncertainty, but where the composer alludes to diverse strands of high and popular culture in a work that depicts and transfigures clashes of age, race and milieu. Again, the opera is composed of fragmentary scenes in which archetypal characters confront one another, but now in a context of global discord; the musical style is even more jaggedly kaleidoscopic, as it is also in Symphony No 4, which abandons the vocal solution of the Third but finds in purely musical development a metaphor of physical birth, growth and dissolution. Other late works include the oratorio The Mask of Time (1982), a grand restatement of Tippett's musical and philosophical concerns, as well as a Concerto for string trio and orchestra.

Concerto for Double String Orchestra

Concerto for Double String Orchestra. Fantasia concertante on a Theme of Corelli.
The Midsummer Marriage – Ritual Dances
BBC Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
Warner Apex 8573-89098-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Text and translation included
Recorded 1993

Sir Andrew Davis's formidable Tippettian credentials shine through in every bar of this outstanding anthology. Aided by realistic, firmly focused sound, the Concerto for Double String Orchestra sounds glorious here. What's more, Davis directs a performance of enormous humanity, intelligence and dedication – even Sir Neville Marriner's excellent EMI remake now seems a little matter-of-fact by comparison. In the slow movement Davis secures a rapt response from his BBC strings (the exquisite closing bars are drawn with ineffable tenderness), while the finale bounds along with irrepressible vigour and fine rhythmic panache. Davis's Fantasia concertante is an even more remarkable achievement. This is another inspirational display: sensitive and fervent, yet marvellously lucid and concentrated too. Once again, the BBC strings are on radiant form, and the lyrical intensity of their playing during the central climax has to be heard to be believed. Davis's identification with this sublime music is total. Much the same applies, for that matter, to the committed and incisive account of the 'Ritual Dances' from The Midsummer Marriage, a veritable tour de force to which the BBC Symphony Chorus contributes thrillingly in the final dance.

Divertimento on Sellinger's Round. Little Music for Strings. The Heart's Assurance (orch Bowen).
Concerto for Double String Orchestra
John Mark Ainsley ten City of London Sinfonia / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9409 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1995

Chandos has here secured the first recording of the orchestral version of Tippett's major song-cycle, The Heart's Assurance. The Concerto for Double String Orchestra is Tippett's first masterwork, and it's marvellous to have a recording that does justice to all those antiphonal textural subtleties. One might wish for a touch more brio in the first movement and a richer, stronger tone in places: for example, the slow movement's sublime outer sections. But this is still a very satisfying performance, not least because the finale comes across with such a winning blend of vitality and eloquence. Meirion Bowen's orchestration of The Heart's Assurance had Tippett's approval, and it is undoubtedly a resourceful piece of work. What makes the effect so different from the voice and piano original is that the all-important doublings of voice and instrument seem so much more prominent when the instrument in question can sustain the sound for as long as the voice itself. For this reason the original may be preferable, and in addition, despite John Mark Ainsley's excellent contribution to this recording, the final song doesn't build to its overwhelming climax as inexorably as it should. However, this is a valuable Tippett disc, and the recording is satisfyingly rich in detail.

The Rose Lake

The Rose Lake^{a}. The Vision of St Augustine^{b} Ⓕ
^{b}John Shirley-Quirk bar London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / ^{a}Sir Colin Davis, ^{b}Sir Michael Tippett
Conifer Classics 75605 51304-2
(68 minutes: ^{b}ADD/^{a}DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded ^{a}1997, ^{b}1971 ●●

Although Tippett let it be known that The Rose Lake would be his last orchestral work, it does not sound valedictory. It is based on the profound impression made on him, during a holiday in Senegal, of a small lake which at midday was transformed from whitish green to translucent pink. Tippett imagines the lake singing and frames the five verses of its song with glittering ostinatos and bright toccatas, with much tuned percussion including three octaves of the rototoms of which he made such effective use in Byzantium. It is a simple, rondo-like structure but a satisfying one, with the lake first awakening (calm, woodland horns), its song then echoing from the sky (woodwind and string counterpoint) and reaching 'full song' (a long, eloquent string line underpinned by drums) at the centre. The latter half of the work is not a literal mirror-image of the first, but a series of poetic and ingenious 'doubles' of what went before, ending with magical horn calls recalling those in The Midsummer Marriage, a quiet rattle of xylophone and rototoms and, as a surprising coda, an abrupt sequence of staccato wind chords.

It is a lovely and a moving piece, brimming with characteristically Tippettian melody. Almost as important, it is of just the right length to couple with the composer's own recording of one of his greatest but also one of his least often performed masterpieces. The Vision of St Augustine is hideously difficult to perform, but the choral singing here is quite heroic, and Shirley-Quirk's account of the taxing solo part nothing short of superb. On further acquaintance it reveals itself as truly visionary and profoundly moving. In short, an essential coupling. Davis's account of The Rose Lake is as urgently communicative as Tippett's own of the cantata, and the older recording is by no means put in the shade by the newer: both are excellent.

Symphony No 1

Symphony No 1. Piano Concerto
Howard Shelley pf Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9333 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

The riot of proliferating counterpoint that is Tippett's Symphony No 1 presents enough problems of orchestral balance to give recording teams nightmares. Chandos has managed highly creditable degrees of containment and clarity, without loss of realism, and the impact, when the last movement finally settles on to its long-prepared harmonic goal, is powerful and convincing. As with other Hickox performances in this Tippett series, doubts as to whether initial impetus is sufficient to keep the complex structures on course prove groundless. This is a fine account, well balanced between lively rhythmic articulation and broad melodic sweep. The performance of the Piano Concerto is no less notable for the inexorable way in which its mighty design unfolds. There may be too much decorum, too little passion, in certain episodes, yet Howard Shelley makes persuasive sense of the con bravura marking in the finale, and his shaping of the first movement's long, dreamingly decorative lines is as alert and sensitive as his control of the second movement's more dynamic discourse. This is a truly symphonic concerto, with a wealth of invention, remarkable textural ingenuity and a particularly imaginative use of the orchestra to complement the bright colours of the solo instrument. The recording is faultless.

Symphony No 2

Symphony No 2. New Year – Suite
Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9299 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

The balance Hickox achieves between attention to detail and large-scale symphonic sweep is exemplary, and especially impressive in the tricky finale, where he conveys the essential ambiguity of an ending which strives to recapture the optimistic élan of the work's opening without ever quite managing it. The Chandos recording, too, gives us much more of the symphony's contrapuntal detail. The first recording of music from Tippett's latest opera New Year, premièred in 1989, is thoroughly welcome. The music of this suite may seem over-emphatic to anyone who hasn't experienced the opera in the theatre, and the recording relishes the booming electric guitars and wailing saxophones, as well as the taped spaceship effects. Yet there are many imaginative moments, like the use of the 'paradise garden' sarabande borrowed from The Mask of Time, and the exotic arrangement of Auld Lang Syne near the end. This is Tippett firing on all cylinders, with a performance and recording to match.

Symphony No 3

Praeludium. Symphony No 3
Faye Robinson sop Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9276 (64 minutes: DDD). Text included. Recorded 1993 Ⓕ ●●

The Third Symphony is one of Tippett's most complex and highly charged attempts to create a convincing structure from the collision between strongly contrasted musical characteristics. The work evolves from a purely orchestral drama – fast first movement, slow second movement, both large-scale, followed by a shorter Scherzo – to a less extended but also tripartite sequence of blues settings, the whole capped by a huge, climactic coda in which the soprano voice finally yields the last word to the orchestra. The first two movements (Part 1, as Tippett calls it) remain a considerable technical challenge, especially to the strings, but this performance manages to sustain an appropriate level of tension without sounding merely effortful, and without skimping on the opportunities for eloquence of phrasing. It could well be that Tippett has over-indulged the percussion in the slow movement, but this vivid and well-balanced recording lets us hear ample detail without exaggerating the bright colours and hyper-resonant textures. The later stages have the advantage of a superbly characterful singer in Faye Robinson. She has the power, the edge, and also the radiance, to make Tippett's progression from idiosyncratic blues to Beethoven-quoting peroration utterly convincing. The work ends, famously, on a question-mark, dismissing the unrestrained affirmation of Beethoven's Choral finale in favour of the unresolved opposition of loud brass and soft strings. Will that 'new compassionate power/To heal, to love' which the text 'senses' actually be achieved? Nearly thirty years on, the jury is still out on Tippett's great humanist challenge. Meanwhile, there can be no questioning the achievement of this performance and recording, coupled strikingly with the highly characteristic Praeludium for brass, bells and percussion of 1962.

Additional recommendation
Symphonies Nos 1-3[a]
Coupling: Suite in D
CSO / Georg Solti; [a]LSO / Colin Davis
Decca British Music Collection ② 473 092-2 (140 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓜ

Davis and the LSO provide intensely committed performances that interrogate the increasing complexity of the music to telling effect. Essential, benchmark readings to set alongside Hickox's Chandos cycle.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 1[a]; No 2 in F[a]; No 3[a]; No 4[b]; No 5[c]
The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns [a]Roger Bigley, [bc]Robin Ireland vas Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV ② CDDCS231 (123 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1975-92 ●

Tippett coached the The Lindsays for these recordings of his first three quartets, and the other two were written for it. In a note written for the quartet's twenty-fifth anniversary in 1992 he said that in these recordings they were 'concerned to establish good precedents in matters of style, so that succeeding generations of interpreters start at an advantage'. In fact one of the most enjoyable things about these readings is that they are so very characteristic of the The Lindsays. Of course a number of the qualities that one might call 'characteristic' are uncommonly well suited to Tippett's earlier quartets: big tone, sheer vigour of attack and an infectious enjoyment of his lithe sprung rhythms. These performances are indeed excellent precedents for later interpreters. They do establish a style – big-scaled, urgently communicative – that is presumably 'authentic' and yet they challenge listeners as well as other performers to imagine how else they might be done. They also affirm the aching absence of a quartet between the Third and the Fourth (Tippett intended to write one in the late 1940s or early 1950s but got side-tracked by The Midsummer Marriage) and make one wonder what the rejected two movements of the First Quartet might be like. It is wonderful, though,, to hear the five as a sequence in such authoritative readings. The recordings sound very well, but have been transferred at an exceptionally high level.

Tippett String Quartet No 5 Brown Fanfare to welcome Sir Michael Tippett Purcell Fantasias – F, Z737; E minor, Z741; G, Z742 Morris Canzoni Ricertati – No 1, Risoluto; No 6, Lento sostenuto C Wood String Quartet in A minor
The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)

ASV CDDCA879 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ⦿

This curious mixture of a programme is a precise re-creation of the concert at which Tippett's Fifth String Quartet had its first performance. Music by two of his teachers and one of his great inspirers is preceded by a greeting prelude that quotes both Purcell and Tippett himself. Tippett's Quartet is quite typical of him, both in its exquisitely singing lyricism and in the fact that it is by no means a mere looking back towards his earlier lyrical phases. Here intensification of expression is often achieved by distillation, towards such a simplicity of utterance that at crucial moments the music thins sometimes to one, often to no more than two, of the quartet's voices. RO Morris's Canzoni Ricertati subject faintly folk-like melodies to ingenious fugal and canonic treatment. In Charles Wood's quartet, the ingenious interplay of short motives in his Scherzo is something that might have caught the young Tippett's ear, and his finale dresses up the Irish folk-song The lark in the clear air in its best Sunday clothes. The Purcell Fantasias point up Tippett's Purcell-ancestry rather touchingly as does Christopher Brown's miniature Fanfare. The Lindsays' beautiful performances are cleanly but not clinically recorded.

Piano Sonatas

Piano Sonatas Nos 1-3 Nicholas Unwin pf
Chandos CHAN9468 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ⦿

These are very big performances indeed, giving a clear and infectious impression of how satisfying these sonatas must be when you have a technique as commanding as Nicholas Unwin's. The tireless toccata vein in Tippett's piano writing, the abrupt grandeur of some of his juxtapositions, what one might call the 'Beethoven-plus' element (angular dotted figures not far from the Grosse Fuge, a buoyant humour closely related to the late Bagatelles) – all these are finely conveyed. Possibly missing is the blithely springy lightness of touch that some other pianists have found, especially in the First Sonata. Unwin is capable of light, transparent textures and of fluid lyricism, so he provides pretty well 90 per cent or more of what these sonatas require. No one has supplied more, though it might have been a different 90 per cent: these are works that can take a variety of interpretations and gain from them. The recordings match the performances well, offering a commandingly big piano sound, but there is also no lack of more sober colour.

Choral Works

The Windhover. The Source. Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, 'Collegium Sancti Johannis Cantabrigiense'. Lullaby. Four Songs from the British Isles. Dance, Clarion Air. A Child of Our Time – Five Negro Spirituals. Plebs angelica. The Weeping Babe
Finzi Singers / Paul Spicer with Andrew Lumsden org
Chandos CHAN9265 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1994 ⦿

The Finzi Singers are eloquent in the Spirituals, and polished in the British Songs (especially the beguiling 'Early One Morning'). However, it is especially good to have the works which represent early sightings of Tippett's later, less lusciously lyrical style – the Lullaby (with countertenor, reminding us that it was written for the Deller Consort) and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis: here not only are the intonation and phrasing of the tricky lines supremely confident, but the accompanying organ is recorded with exemplary naturalness. The vocal sound throughout is generally no less successful. There may be almost too full and rich a texture for the linear intricacies of Plebs angelica and The Weeping Babe to make their maximum effect, but there is no lack of exuberance in Dance, Clarion Air and the other secular pieces.

The Heart's Assurance

Tippett Music. Songs for Ariel. Songs for Achilles. Boyhood's End. The Heart's Assurance
Purcell If music be the food of love, Z379/2. The Fairy Queen – Thrice happy lovers. The Fatal hour comes on apace, Z421. Bess of Bedlam, Z370. Pausanias – Sweeter than roses
Martyn Hill ten Craig Ogden gtr Andrew Ball pf
Hyperion CDA66749 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1994 ⦿

The two longest works – the cantata Boyhood's End and song-cycle The Heart's Assurance – challenge the musicianship and sensitivity of both singer and pianist alike. Boyhood's End (1943), a setting of prose that is never prosaic, shows the ecstasy of Midsummer Marriage to be already within the system, and the profusion of notes has to be mastered so that the dance shall seem as delicate and natural as graceful improvisation. In The Heart's Assurance (1951) the spirit is similar, although the technical accomplishment of all concerned, composer and performers, is heightened.

For the singer, in addition to the quite fearsome difficulties of pitch and rhythm, there is also likely to be some problem of tessitura, particularly in the third of the songs, 'Compassion'. For the pianist, concentration has to be divided between the virtuosic writing of his own part and responsiveness to the singer, his notes, words and expression.

Martyn Hill and Andrew Ball are wonderfully at one in all this, and the balancing of voice and piano has been finely achieved. The Songs for Achilles, with guitar, also convey a real sense of ardent improvisation, and the voice rings out freely. The Songs for Ariel here work their natural magic. Tippett's affinities with Purcell are felt at one time or another in most of these compositions, starting with the opening of the programme, the setting of Shelley's Sleep. It is good also to have the Purcell 'realisations' included on this release. The disc was issued to mark the composer's 90th birthday, and it serves as a most touching and eloquent tribute.

Thomas Tomkins British 1572-1656

GROVE Tomkins, from a musical family, claimed Byrd as his teacher. He divided his time between Worcester Cathedral (organist from 1596) and London, becoming a Gentleman in Ordinary of the Chapel Royal by 1620, assistant organist from 1621 and senior organist from 1625; that year he wrote music for Charles I's coronation. He left Worcester in 1654. A prolific and respected successor of Byrd, he composed church music, including over 100 anthems (Musica Deo sacra, 1668), madrigals (1622, among them When David heard, a moving, polyphonic setting of a powerful text), over 50 keyboard pieces and a few highly original fantasias, pavans and galliards for viol consort. His half-brothers John, Giles and Robert and his son Nathaniel were also musicians.

Keyboard Works

Barafostus' Dream. Fantasia. Fancy. Fancy for two to play. Fortune my foe. A Ground. A Grounde. In Nomine, 'Gloria tibi Trinitas'. The Lady Folliott's Galliard. Miserere. Pavan. Pavan and Galliard, 'Earl Strafford'. Pavan and Galliard of Three Parts. A sad pavan for these distracted times. Toy, 'Made at Poole Court'. What if a day. Worster Braules
Carole Cerasi hpd James Johnstone virg/bhpd
Metronome METCD1049 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●

Forming a mental picture of Thomas Tomkins is not difficult. Most of the pieces here were composed in the 1640s and '50s, yet adopt the style of three or four decades earlier, when composers like Gibbons, Bull and Tomkins's own teacher Byrd were alive. A contemporary of these men, Tomkins had survived them through the execution of Charles I and the destruction during the Civil War of the organ at Worcester Cathedral, where he had presided since 1596. Now, in later life, he had retired to live with his family and quietly compose plainsong settings, variation sets, fancies, grounds and pavans 'for these distracted times'. But though about as fashionable as a 'Welcome home, Walter Raleigh' hat, these pieces have a quality to them – showing by turns something of the exuberance of Bull and the eloquence of Byrd – that is more than enough to maintain their currency today. This disillusioned early version of a Daily Telegraph reader was nothing less than the last representative of that great school of keyboard composers known as the English virginalists, and more than 350 years on, it matters not a bean to the listener which decade he was writing in.

Cerasi's selection of about a third of Tomkins's extant keyboard pieces showcases all of the genres in which he composed, as well as demonstrating the excellence and range of her own technique. Few listeners will fail to be impressed by the fearless accuracy and panache with which she throws off Tomkins's torrential passagework and finger-breaking double thirds, but she is sensitive, too, in the slower pavans and fancies. Like Leonhardt, she achieves a supreme eloquence in such pieces by the sheer precision and control with which she places each note, and it is a pleasure just to hear her playing. An outstanding disc.

Prelude. Fancy. Three In Nomines. 🅿
Voluntary. Pavan and Galliard of Three Parts.
Fancy (arr cpsr). Toy, 'Made at Poole Court'.
Pavan. Robin Hood. Two Pavans. Ground
Bernhard Klapprott hpd/virg
Dabringhaus und Grimm MDG607 0704-2 Ⓕ
(72 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995

Tomkins is perhaps best known as a later representative of the school of English madrigalists, and one of Byrd's most talented pupils; yet he composed in all the genres available to him, and left a substantial quantity of keyboard music. Tomkins is at his best when unfettered by pre-ordained conceits, and while he cannot match his great mentor's grasp of form or his knack for writing instantly memorable tunes, the best pieces here are not without charm (the little Toy, for example). Bernhard Klapprott plays mostly on a harpsichord, and more rarely on a much softer virginal, which seems the more effective instrument for conveying the music's unaffected delicacy. He strives to find the right expression for each piece; rubato is applied differently from one work to the next according to each piece's character, rather than exclusively by genre. Tempos could have been equally varied: they are uniformly on the slow side, even where greater agility would at least be warranted (as in the Galliard). The choice of instrument may have something to do with this: the virginal's softer sound encourages more rapid runs, whereas the harpsichord's seems to do the opposite. Still, a pleasing disc: Klapprott's advocacy of Tomkins reminds us how much of this first golden age of the keyboard remains unexplored.

Choral Works

Third Service. O Lord, let me know mine end. O that the salvation were given. Know you not. In Nomine (1648). In Nomine (1652). Voluntaries – G; C; A minor
New College Choir, Oxford / Edward Higginbottom with David Burchell org
CRD CRD3467 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1990

This is a well-balanced programme of sacred music by Thomas Tomkins. The four movements of the Third, or Great Service, together with the three anthems are spaced out with five organ pieces – two In Nomines and three voluntaries – chosen and arranged in such a way that the resulting key sequence has a satisfying natural flow. After an unassuming intonation, the truly royal Te Deum of the Great Service takes off with great verve and vigour, the rich 10-part texture of the full sections contrasting well with the lighter scoring of the verses. This energy and these contrasts are characteristic of the performances as a whole. There is some delightful solo singing in the verse anthems, in particular the alto solo in O Lord, let me know mine end. The two solo trebles are kept busy: they have a rather distinctive but complementary tone-quality, which makes up for a slight imbalance in volume. In general, however, the balance is good and the ensemble excellent. The trebles are a confident group with good articulation; they soar up to their top B flats with ease.

Michael Torke

American 1961

At first influenced by Stravinsky and Bartók, Torke wrote his earliest orchestral work, Statement (1979), for the Milwaukee Music for Youth ensemble, in which he played principal bassoon. He entered the Eastman School in 1980 and studied composition with Schwantner and Rouse among others. At this time he began to incorporate pop and jazz elements into his music. After graduating from the Eastman School he studied at Yale, where his teachers included Rzewski. He gained notoriety in 1985 for the pop-tinged Ecstatic Orange.

Book of Proverbs

Book of Proverbs[a]. Four Proverbs[b]
[a]Valdine Anderson, [b]Catherine Bott sops
[a]Kurt Ollmann bar [a]Netherlands Radio Choir and Philharmonic Orchestra / Edo de Waart;
[b]Argo Band / Michael Torke
Decca 466 721-2DH (52 minutes: DDD). Texts and Ⓕ translations included. Recorded [a]1996 and [b]1993 ●●

You would have to go a long way to find music as communicative and as uplifting as Michael Torke's. What's more, his compositions are uniquely individual and full of integrity. Listen to this disc, and you will find an essentially traditional harmonic language at work, but the result is most definitely music of today. Furthermore, for all Torke's ingenious construction techniques, this is music straight from the heart; it's also full of optimism.

The opening track of this disc, the orchestral prelude to his Book of Proverbs, is a perfect example of Torke's style: lucid, invigorating and wonderfully orchestrated. His settings of texts from the Bible's Book of Proverbs abound in skilful musical device, but the meaning and power of the texts is never lost, and is quite frequently heightened and brought into sharper focus. A sense of momentum towards a climax is beautifully achieved throughout the work's eight movements by Torke's decision to expand the use of the chorus in each setting, until, in the final proverb 'Boast not of Tomorrow', the entire chorus sing together. Movement 6, 'Drink our Fill of Love', for baritone and men's chorus, is one of the highlights: a veritable mini-drama, beautifully structured with a harmonic tension building to an impressive climax. Just the sort of sophisticated musical treatment of a text that one would find in a song by Stephen Sondheim.

To complete the disc, Decca has included a recording of Torke's Four Proverbs . Smaller in both duration and scoring (just solo soprano and small ensemble), it nevertheless possesses the same ingenuity and melodic inventiveness of the larger work. Performances throughout the disc are excellent, and the recorded sound is clean, bright and atmospheric. This is a must for all enthusiasts of Torke's music.

Tomás de Torrejón y Velasco

Spanish 1644-1728

GROVE Torrejón y Velasco went to Peru in 1667 when his employer was appointed viceroy there. He held administrative (non-musical) posts until 1676 when he became maestro de capilla of Lima Cathedral. He was admired for his villancicos, some of them polychoral; he also wrote liturgical music (notably vespers for Charles II) and an opera La púrpura de la rosa (after Calderón) celebrating Philip V's 18th birthday in 1701; it is the earliest surviving opera from the New World.

La púrpura de la rosa

Isabel Alvarez sop Amor; Alicia Borges mez Belona; Graciela Oddone sop Adonis; Adriana Fernández sop Celfa; Marcello Lippi bar Chato; Elisabetta Riatsch mez Cintia; Nadia Ortega sop Clori; Furio Zanasi bar Desengaño; Susanna Moncayo mez Dragón; Fabián Schofrin counterten Envidia; Sandrah Silvio sop Flora; Sandra Galiano sop Ira; Eliana Bayón sop Libia; Mariana Rewerski sop Sospecha; Isabel Monar mez Venus; Cecilia Diáz mez Marte; Madrid Zarzuela Theatre Orchestra and Chorus; Elyma Ensemble / Gabriel Garrido
K617 ② K6171082 (129 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and English notes included. Recorded 1999 ●

The first-ever recording of Tomás Torrejón y Velasco's opera La púrpura de la rosa was produced by Andrew Lawrence-King's Harp Consort for DHM; now we are presented with another version, based on a production mounted in opera houses in Geneva and Madrid under the musical direction of Gabriel Garrido.

The opera was originally first performed in Lima, Peru, in 1701: a homage by the newly-appointed viceroy, the Count of Monclava, to King Philip V of Spain on his 18th birthday. The libretto, which retells the story of Venus and Adonis, was written by the great Spanish playwright Pedro Calderón de la Barca, and had previously been set to music by the court composer Juan Hidalgo and performed in Madrid in 1660. Hidalgo's opera has sadly been lost, and it is impossible to know how much Torrejón y Velasco's setting owes to it, if anything. It is a great shame that South American musicologist Bernardo Illari's detailed essay on the decisions he had to take in the making of his edition of La púrpura de la rosa are presented only in French and Spanish in the booklet: his summary is both frank and illuminating, so that the listener knows exactly which parts have been reconstructed (in effect, composed by Illari) and what has been the intention behind each decision.

The textual problems (in terms of both text and music) of the source result in some marked differences between this version and that by the Harp Consort, but this is not the place to explore these in any detail. The listener should be aware, however, that both versions have introduced additional items, and both show considerable ingenuity, based on years of experience in techniques of improvisation and early music performance, in the realisation of the score. The only quibble with the Garrido/Illari version is their determination to use a much broader palette of instrumental colour, to the extent of involving wind instruments such as oboes, shawms, recorders and dulcians in a quasi-obbligato manner at times: a lack of instrumental colour, Illari believes, would be contrary to the spirit of the work. There are times, however, when the instrumentation is very effective, as in the cave scene where Mars encounters the allegorical figures of Anger, Suspicion, Envy, Fear and, finally, Disillusion, in a confrontation with his own emotions: here organ continuo and low winds enhance the spookiness already inherent in the disembodied vocal writing for these initially mysterious characters. The Harp Consort, for all its richly sensual sound world, is less evocative here.

The great strength of the new recording by Garrido in terms of performance is the way in which it conveys the dramatic nature of the piece. The fact that it was performed on stage before being taken into the recording studio helped, but there is also a fundamental difference in approach: not only is Garrido's dramatic pacing more revealing, but also his interpretation is far more text-based. And what a text! This is powerful, evocative writing, full of poetry, universal resonances and deep human emotions. Garrido's singers, more operatically trained than most of those on the Harp Consort version, and more at home with the language, use the music to enhance the text, singing the dialogues and soliloquies with real meaning so that the tragic tale of Venus and her beautiful but doomed Adonis unfolds with great immediacy. If the Harp Consort's roses – the symbol of Adonis's blood and the flower into which he is finally transformed – are of red satin, sensual and enveloping, Garrido's have the scent – and the thorns – of the real thing.

Given that the recordings are so different, one can only recommend that you have both. Torrejón y Velasco is not Monteverdi or Cavalli, not Lully or Purcell, but with this one work he shows himself to have been an instinctive opera composer writing in a highly distinctive idiom with its roots in Spanish tradition: a few more commissions from the viceroy and he could well have made his mark on operatic history.

La púrpura de la rosa (ed Stein/Lawrence-King)
Ellen Hargis sop Caliope, Adonis; Judith Malafronte mez Terpsicore, Venus; María del Mar Fernández Doval sop Urania, Marte; Josep Cabré bar El Tiempo, Desengaño; Gloria Banditelli mez España, Dragón; Päivi Järviö mez Belona; Douglas Nasrawi ten Chato; Nancy Mayer mez Celfa; Johanna Almark sop Amor; Santina Tomasello sop Flora, Envidia; Gabriela de Geanx sop Cintia, Temor; Catríona O'Leary sop Clori, Sospecha; Jennie Cassidy mez Libia, Ira; chorus; The Harp Consort / Andrew Lawrence-King hp/hpd/org
Deutsche Harmonia Mundi ② 05472 77355-2 Ⓕ
(137 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included
Recorded 1997 ●

Tomás de Torrejón y Velasco was one of the most important musical figures in late 17th-century Peru. Born and educated in Spain, he became a page to the future viceroy of Peru and at the age of 23 accompanied him to Lima (the administrative and cultural centre of Spain's colonial empire). There for more than half a century he was maestro de capilla at the cathedral, writing polychoral works that achieved considerable fame. In 1701 he was commissioned to compose an opera to honour the new king, Philip V, on his 18th birthday: it was the first opera produced in the New World whose music is extant.

Preceded by a loa in which allegorical figures hail the arrival of a new star, La púrpura de la rosa ('The blood of the rose') is a one-act opera on a text by Calderón. It deals with the myth of Venus and the initially hesitant Adonis and the jealousy of Mars, who is goaded on by his sister Bellona; inserted into it are popular dances, low-life characters – a peasant, his wife and a soldier (providing what may charitably be called comic relief) – and some personifications of human emotions.

The work's quite individual style differs markedly from contemporary Italian Baroque opera: recitatives are absent, replaced by strophic ariosos; all the characters but two are allotted to actresses, so the tessitura throughout is high; and the three main characters are each provided with a theme that serves to identify them at the start of a scene.

The music, which incorporates South American dance rhythms, has been edited by the American scholar Louise Stein, who has colourfully filled out the original's single continuo line with an instrumental ensemble typical of the period and reconstructed choruses and diferencias in the dances.

The prevalence of women's voices makes it almost impossible to know who everyone is, and what is going on, unless one keeps a firm eye on the libretto; and it is somewhat bewildering that Mars is the most feminine-sounding; but all the singers are good, particularly Ellen Hargis in the demanding part of Adonis.

Concerted voices tend to be overloud (abetted by the acoustics of the recording venue); and not until well into the second half is much attempt made to underline the work's dramatic course – for example, off-stage placing, frequently called for, is totally ignored – and this often results in long, repetitious strophic sequences. But the dramatic high spot – the battle between Mars, who seeks to wreak revenge on Adonis, and Venus, who implores Jupiter to intervene with his thunderbolts – is stirring and occurs to the rhythm of a xácara. Predictably, the most moving music is at the death of Adonis and Venus's lament for him. After the play itself, the mournful mood is rudely dispelled with a rowdy kind of vaudeville on a peasant's lot.

All of the performers, and DHM's enterprise in making this rare work known, are to be warmly applauded. There is much here to enjoy.

Charles Tournemire French 1870-1939

GROVE Tournemire was a pupil of Widor at the Paris Conservatoire and of Franck, whose place as organist at Ste Clotilde he inherited in 1898; from 1919 he also taught at the Conservatoire. His works include operas, oratorios and eight symphonies (1900-24), often on religious and esoteric subjects. But he is remembered for the monumental L'orgue mystique (1932), 51 organ masses using plainsong melodies appropriate to a particular Sunday, for the liturgical year, in a mystical style between Franck and Messiaen.

Symphony No 8

Symphonies – No 5 in F minor, Op 47; No 8 in G minor, 'Le triomphe de la mort', Op 51
Liège Philharmonic Orchestra / Pierre Bartholomée
Astrée Naïve V4793 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

The Liège Philharmonic may not be a world-class orchestra, but it plays with wholehearted commitment and sensitive dynamics, and is directed by a conductor who is clearly in sympathy with the Franckian school, so that these performances offer a very satisfactory presentation of this deeply felt, passionate music. Tournemire (who was one of Franck's successors at Ste Clotilde) could best be described as a Romantic mystic: unlike some other enormously prolific composers, his ideas have quality and his treatment of them is both original and extremely effective. Those wishing to sample his style are recommended to start with the beatific Pastorale of the Fifth Symphony, a work written in 1913-14 and inspired by Alpine scenery which produced in him a poetic mood of exaltation. The Eighth Symphony of a decade later, which employs a gigantic orchestra in virtuoso and varied fashion and is somewhat bolder in harmonic idiom, is subtitled Triumph over Death and was written on the death of the composer's dearly loved wife.

Without doubt, a remarkably individual and gripping voice that demands to be heard.

L'Orgue mystique

L'Orgue mystique – Office 2, Postlude; Office 3, Paraphrase; Office 7, Fantaisie; Office 11, Diptyque; Office 27, Fantaisie paraphrase; Office 29, Alleluia No 1; Office 30, Alleluia No 2; Office 31, Alleluia No 3; Office 32, Alleluia No 4; Office 33, Alleluia No 5; Office 35, Paraphrase and Carillon; Office 43, Choral alleluiatique No 1; Office 51, Fantaisie sur le Te Deum et Guirlandes Alleluiatiques Office 44, Choral alleluiatique No 2; Office 45, Choral alleluiatique No 3; Office 46, Choral alleluiatique No 4; Office 47, Choral alleluiatique No 5
Marie-Bernadette Dufourcet-Hakim org
Priory ② PRCD669AB (134 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Played on the organs of La Sainte Trinité, Paris and La Basilique du Sacré-Cœur de Montmartre, Paris.
Recorded 1990 and 1995

This generously-filled two-CD set makes an excellent introduction to the sprawling, theatrical, sometimes hysterically neo-Gothic and spontaneous world of L'Orgue mystique, the magnum opus of Charles Tournemire (1870-1939). Until 1927 his compositional output was directed mostly at secular music, orchestral symphonies, string quartets and opera. Over the next five years Tournemire renewed French liturgical organ music, writing 51 suites (one for each Sunday of the year) based on 300 Gregorian plainchants.

Marie-Bernadette Dufourcet-Hakim's 17-track selection consists of postludes, 11 of them drawn from the 13 suites for Sundays during Pentecost, thereby duplicating the excellent recording of the complete Pentecostal suites made by Georges Delvallée in St Sernin, Toulouse (on Accord).

Mme Dufourcet-Hakim captures brilliantly the improvisatory fleetingness and impressionistic mysticism inherent in Tournemire's music. She steers committedly and seemingly effortlessly around this often turbulent organistic assault course, helped by the generous acoustics of La Sainte Trinité (Messiaen's church), and, in two tracks, the Basilica of Sacré-Coeur in Montmartre, the latter more out of tune than the former. For anyone intrigued by the roots of Messiaen's radical organ writing these recordings will provide clear answers. These sizzling performances, expertly caught by Priory's Neil Collier, come strongly recommended.

Suite évocatrice, Op 74

Tournemire Suite évocatrice, Op 74
Vierne Symphony No 3, Op 28
Widor Symphonie Gothique, Op 70
Jeremy Filsell org
Herald HAVPCD145 (71 minutes: DDD)
Recorded in 1991 on the Harrison and Harrison organ of Ely Cathedral Ⓕ OO

Compared with, say, the symphonies of Tchaikovsky or Sibelius the organ symphonies of Widor and his pupil Vierne are not particularly long. But in terms of organ music they are among the longest single works in the repertory. Within their five-movement form the composers set out to exploit the full expressive range of the organ, and it was no coincidence that the organ symphony developed in turn of the century France. The great French organ builder Aristide Cavaillé-Coll was then producing instruments capable of hitherto undreamt-of colour and expression. Both Widor (at St Sulpice) and Vierne (at Notre Dame) had at their disposal the finest instruments in Paris and they indulged themselves fully in their symphonies. The subtitle of Widor's Ninth (Gothic) says it all. The structure is vast, intricately detailed, and almost forbidding in its grandness. Vierne's Third also presents an awesome spectacle, full of complex music and technically demanding writing, while Tournemire's neo-Classical Suite gives a moment almost of light relief in such heavyweight company. Jeremy Filsell is an outstanding virtuoso player with a gift for musical communication, and the Ely Cathedral organ produces the range of the great French instruments, but within an altogether clearer acoustic. These are performances and recordings of exceptional quality.

Tommaso Traetta

Italian 1727-1779

GROVE Traetta studied with Porpora and Durante in Naples and had his first operas staged there and in Rome and Venice. In 1758-65 he was maestro di cappella to the court at Parma, where he began to adopt features of French tragédie lyrique in his operas; the works of Jommelli and (later) Gluck were also influential. Ippolito ed Aricia (1759), which borrows from Rameau's Hippolyte et Aricie, was an early success among these 'reform' operas. Notable among those for other theatres were Sofonisba (1762, Mannheim) and Ifigenia in Tauride (1763, Vienna). After three years as director of the Ospedaletto conservatory in Venice, he became music director of the Russian court chapel in St Petersburg, 1768-75; his finest work there was Antigone (1772). He later went to London and elsewhere, and presented his last two operas in Venice. Traetta's reform operas show a powerful dramatic sense and melodic gift. They generally feature classical subject matter, large scene complexes, more orchestral music and accompanied recitative than was usual, and dramatic choruses. His output also includes some more conventional serious operas and several comic ones (c40 stage works in all), pieces for pasticcios, sacred music, songs and a few instrumental works.

Antigona

María Bayo sop Antigona; Anna Maria Panzarella mez Ismene; Carlo Vincenzo Allemano ten Creonte; Laura Polverelli mez Emone; Gilles Ragon ten Adrasto Accentus Chamber Choir, Les Talens Lyriques / Christophe Rousset P
Decca L'Oiseau-Lyre ② 460 204-2OHO2 Ⓕ
(160 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included

On the basis of this outstanding new recorded version, one would have to say that Traetta's tragedia per musica far outclasses Mozart's opera seria Lucia Silla (written around the same time, 1772) for its consistent musical inspiration and sheer theatrical know-how. Traetta's score for Antigona exhibits a strong French influence; and the unwitting listener finds himself plunged into the tragic world of Gluck or the Mozart of Idomeneo (a work manifestly influenced by Traetta's and Gluck's francophile style).

Where Traetta parts company with the reformed Gluck is in his native Italian veneration of virtuoso singing: he wrote the title-role of Antigona for the outstanding soprano, Caterina Gabrielli, and both she and the tenor Prati, creator of Creonte, must have had considerable technical ability judging by the difficulty of their music as recorded here. Traetta writes beautifully for women's voices, and his approach to the aria is often highly innovative: One of the most striking passages in the score is the funerary chorus at the beginning of Act 2 in which Antigona illegally cremates the remains of her degraded brother and cries out his name, Polinice – like Orpheus bemoaning Eurydice in the opening chorus of Gluck's opera.

Decca's recording certainly deserves to put Antigona – and Traetta – back on the modern musical map: Rousset's musical direction of his Talens Lyriques is evangelical in its fervour. Although the recording is based on concert performances at the Beaune International Festival of Baroque Music, it has a highly charged theatrical atmosphere thanks to Rousset's dynamic and expressive conducting. It is possible to imagine more vocally charismatic singers for the leading roles; listening to María Bayo's fluent, effortless coloratura and sweet but slightly soubrettish timbre in the title-role, one hankers for the richer sound and more tragic demeanour of, say, a Cecilia Bartoli, but Bayo's singing is never less than accomplished. Carlo Vincenzo Allemano as Creonte copes extremely well with the demanding fioriture and is especially successful at suggesting the pent-up fury of the Theban tyrant. The choral singing is superb. More Traetta, please.

Eduard Tubin Estonian 1905-1982

GROVE Tubin was a pupil of Eller at the Tartu Academy (1924-30); in 1944 he moved to Sweden. His music often combines propulsive rhythm with expansive melody, orchestrated in an expressive manner; he wrote ten symphonies (1934-73).

Symphonies

Symphonies – No 1 in C minor[a]; No 2, 'The Legendary'[b]; No 3 in D minor[c]; No 4 in A, 'Sinfonia lirica'[d]; No 5 in B minor[e]; No 6[b]; No 7[f]; No 8[c]; No 9, 'Sinfonia semplice'[g]; No 10[h]. Kratt – Ballet Suite[e]. Toccata[g]
[abc]Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra; [d]Bergen Philharmonic Orchestra; [e]Bamberg Symphony Orchestra; [fgh]Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
BIS ⑤ CD1402/4 (331 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded late 1980s ●●

Vividly scored and dynamically expressive, Tubin's symphonies span almost his entire creative career. The First, only his third orchestral score, dates from 1931-34 and the single-movement Tenth from 1973, while at his death nine years later an Eleventh lay unfinished on his desk.

Even without the Eleventh, the BIS set has much to commend it. The performances, variable in acoustic, are remarkably consistent in approach and quality of execution. Järvi's commitment to and understanding of the music is total and its quality shines through in every bar, whether in the early symphonies where Tubin was still moving towards his mature style, or Nos 5 to 8 with their absolute mastery of form. OK, even Järvi cannot avoid the Third's peroration sounding like The Pines of Tallinn, but there is no doubt of the work's or its creator's stature.

Although repackaged from the original issues, BIS avoids laying the symphonies out in chronological sequence. The recordings still sound wonderful, though occasionally perhaps too spacious. Järvi never sounds rushed, allowing the Eighth's opening Andante quasi Adagio to build into an impressive-sounding edifice. He is unmatched in the deeply felt finale. Overall, Järvi remains first choice, especially at this price.

Symphonies – No 4, 'Sinfonia lirico'; No 7
Estonian National Symphony Orchestra / Arvo Volmer
Alba ABCD155 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001

Tubin's Fourth is quite different in character to works such as Nos 5-8, or even the Third. Its lyrical, pastoral melodies often have a modal feel that brings Vaughan Williams or even Rubbra to mind, while – especially in the scherzo – there is more than a hint of 1930s Hilding Rosenberg (think of his Third Symphony, for instance). There are fleeting concurrences of style with other figures of the period but Tubin was his own man and in this performance the Fourth Symphony comes alive in a way that Järvi's account (on BIS) does not.

The Seventh (1955-58) is more typical of Tubin's later style, thematically chromatic and harmonically more astringent (with a higher norm of dissonance) within a freely tonal and more concise expressive idiom. The lyrical impulse is still present, however, and Volmer gives the music a lean, Classical-style balance. Compared to Järvi, he takes a more measured view of tempi, missing some of his rival's headlong excitement but still whipping up a rather Simpson-like storm in the finale. Honours between the two versions are equal – the interpretative gains in the one offset by the virtuosity of the other. If you like your symphonies coupled together, Alba's is self-recommending: BIS's couplings are of smaller orchestral works and the Piano Concerto.

Joaquín Turina Spanish 1882-1949

GROVE Turina trained in Seville, Madrid and Paris (at the Schola Cantorum), and was associated with Falla, with whom he returned to Spain in 1914; he remained there, working as a teacher, critic and composer. His Schola experience gave him a command of the grand scale, moderated by Sevillian grace and wit. His works include operas, orchestral works (he was the only leading Spaniard of his generation to compose a symphony), chamber music, guitar music, songs and numerous piano pieces, including many colourful and effective character and genre pieces as well as some larger-scale works.

Orchestral Works

Sinfoniá sevillana. Danzas fantásticas. Ritmos (Fantasía coreográfica). La procesión del Rocío
Castilla y León Symphony Orchestra / Max Bragado Darman
Naxos Spanish Classics 8 555955 Ⓢ
(62 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002 ●

Turina was a gentle man who, like Segovia, placed high value on beauty and clarity of thought, and responded to 'programmatic' images; the portrayal of profound tragedy had no place in his music. Although he tried harder than his contemporaries to write in the conventional musical forms, his Sinfonía sevillana is a poetic and colourful tone poem rather than a symphony, a French-influenced depiction of aspects of the city of his birth.

Ritmos was conceived as a ballet but was never performed as such – present-day choreographers please note! The Danzas fantásticas range from the quietly poetic to the energetic and relate to quotations from José Más's novel La orgía. Two dances, the Aragonese jota and the Andalusian farruca, frame a dream-like evocation of elements of Andalusian melody and dance rhythm of the Basque zortziko.

Turina's skill and sensitivity in the art of orchestration shines throughout this programme, as does that of the Castilla y Léon Symphony Orchestra in extracting every good feature the music offers. The recording is clear, with a believably spacious acoustic. There are other recordings of these works, but none that brings them all together – or exceeds the quality of these performances. An outstanding issue.

Mark-Anthony Turnage

British 1960

GROVE Turnage studied at the Royal College of Music, with Oliver Knussen and John Lambert. He gained wide attention with his first orchestral score Night Dances (1981) which won the Guinness Prize and revealed the eclectic nature of his style, drawing on a wide range of early 20th-century sources and the inflections of jazz and blues harmonies. An even wider stylistic net informs On All Fours for 13 instruments (1986), in which Baroque dance forms, refracted through the model of Stravinsky's Agon, provide the rhythmic impulsion. He attracted wide attention with his opera Greek (1988, Munich).

Blood on the Floor

Blood on the Floor[a]. Dispelling the Fears[b]. Night Dances[c]. Some Days[d]. Your Rockaby[e]
[d]Cynthia Clarey sop [ae]Martin Robertson sax [b]Håkan Hardenberger, [b]John Wallace tpts [a]John Scofield egtr [a]Peter Erskine drum kit [d]Chicago SO / Bernard Haitink; [e]BBC SO / Sir Andrew Davis; [c]London Sinfonietta / Oliver Knussen; [b]Philharmonia O / Daniel Harding; [a]Ensemble Modern / Peter Rundel
Decca ② 468 814-2DM (139 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
[a]Recorded live in 1996 OO

Turnage's sound world attempts to form a central amalgam between jazz and associated black music and the avant-garde concert hall, and these recorded performances draw on top musicians from both spheres. The earliest work here, Night Dances (1981), is an ear-tickling, transluscent sequence of exotic sounds, using a chamber solo group plus string quintet, orchestra and a wide range of percussion. The song-cycle Some Days also expresses despair, its awkward vocal lines powerfully projected by Cynthia Clarey and accompanied with conviction by Bernard Haitink. Here, as with Birtwistle, one is often struck by its unexpected affinities with Stravinsky's dance-inspired Rite of Spring.

But it is in the ambitious Blood on the Floor that Turnage's different stylistic patterns coalesce most readily into a satisfying whole, with jazz influences made especially potent by the hand-picked cast of player-soloists. Turnage's opening movement combines vibrant moto perpetuo minimalism with something approaching a jam session, and the following sections range from the bluesy, melodically memorable 'Junior addict' to an extended finale. This is an abbreviated version of the earlier, thornily complex work for two virtuoso trumpets and orchestra, Dispelling the Fears. Whether it was wise to use it here again is open to question. Turnage obviously intended a a remarkably compelling coda and it does make a convincing resolution. But even when added in abbreviated form, it outbalances the rest of the work, and takes the overall length of Blood on the Floor to nearly 69 minutes. Performance and recording are superb.

An Invention on Solitude

Two Memorials[a]. An Invention on Solitude[b]. Sleep on[c]. Cortège for Chris[d]. Two Elegies Framing a Shout[e]. Three Farewells[f]. Tune for Toru[g]
Nash Ensemble ([f]Philippa Davies fl [bdf]Richard Hosford cl [bf]Marianne Thorsen, [bf]Elizabeth Wexler vns [bf]Lawrence Power va [bcdf]Paul Watkins vc [f]Skaila Kanga hp [cdeg]Ian Brown pf [ce]Richard Hosford cl [ae]Martin Robertson sop sax)
Black Box BBM1065 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

An effective showcase for the composer's small-ensemble music of the 1990s, this album might have been entitled 'Another Side of…Mark-Anthony Turnage'. Where, in some of his major orchestral works, Turnage's idiom has seemed quintessentially urban, indebted (via Tippett and Britten) to Stravinsky and Berg, here we come surprisingly close to the much-derided English pastoral tradition. The jazz element is evident too, as you might expect, but there is little trace of the composer's penchant for rock and raunch; the mood is more wistful than confrontational. Anyone who thinks that contemporary music and memorable melodic writing are somehow incompatible should audition this disc without delay. From the plangent solo sax of the Two Memorials to the intensely evocative solo piano version of Tune for Toru, there is little to frighten the horses and much that touches the heart. The biggest utterance is the clarinet quintet, An Invention on Solitude, composed, like much of this music, during Turnage's work on the score of his opera The Silver Tassie. The Nash Ensemble are no strangers to Turnage and their unsentimental playing is well served by the boldly immediate recording.

Additional recommendation

Blood on the Floor

Couplings: Dispelling the Fears. Night Dances. Some Days. Your Rockaby.

Various artists, orchestras and conductors

Decca British Music Collection 468 814-2DM (139 minutes: DDD: 8/01) Ⓜ

An excellent collection for newcomers to Turnage. Performances and recording are superb.

Erkki-Sven Tüür

Estonia 1959

Drawing on both his immediate classical heritage and aspects of jazz and rock, Tüür came to prominence with the Architectonic series of nine ensemble pieces (1990-93), each with an atmospheric and open-minded approach to instrumental writing. This timbrel sensitivity has been continued in such recent works as the Third Symphony (1997), whose formal subtlety and thematic resource is a promising continuation of the Nordic tradition.

Crystallisatio

Architectonics VI. Passion. Illusion. Crystallisatio. Requiem

Estonian Philharmonic Chamber Choir; Tallinn Chamber Orchestra / Tõnu Kaljuste

ECM New Series 449 459-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Text and translation included. Recorded 1994-95

Architectonics VI sounds like one of those titles that are too good to resist, and it is to the credit of Erkki-Sven Tüür that he admits as much in the brief interview in the booklet to this beguiling disc. Tüür's piece – written in 1992 – isn't architectonic in construction (well, any more than the music of a hundred other composers), but it is well put together and effective on its own terms. Passion and Illusion, both for string orchestra and composed in 1993, are closer in spirit to the prevailing 'New Simplicity' of current East Baltic composition. Passion, indeed, is occasionally reminiscent of Tüür's better-known compatriot, Arvo Pärt, although the brief Illusion has a curiously English feel to it. The title track, Crystallisatio (1995), is scored for three flutes, bells, string orchestra and live electronics and is somewhat more demanding in scope. It is here that Tüür's synthesis of minimalism with serial techniques is heard most eloquently; not wholly achieved, perhaps, but fascinating in application.

By far the biggest piece is the Requiem (1992-93; in memory of the conductor Peeter Lilje). It is a deeply felt, half-hour-long setting of the Mass for the dead, and is of markedly different character to the other pieces here. This is a handsomely produced, thought-provoking release. Anyone wanting to hear up-to-the-minute new music that will not sear the ears off his or her head should try it.

Symphony No 3

Symphony No 3. Cello Concerto[a]. Lighthouse

[a]David Geringas vc Vienna Radio Symphony Orchestra / Dennis Russell Davies

ECM New Series 465 134-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1998 ●

Among the younger generation of would-be symphonists, Erkki-Sven Tüür is one of the most hope-inspiring. The first movement of his Third Symphony builds impressive momentum from the contrast of two types of music: one dogged and metronomic, the other free and apparently tempo-less. These eventually collide, producing an electrifying climax. The second movement has wildly diffuse elements – from Lutosławskian modernism to quasi-Bachian chorale tune and lush tonal romanticism. This is clearly music of strong personality, integrity and confidence, with warmth as well as acerbity, directness as well as ingenuity. The same could equally be said for the string fantasy Lighthouse, and still more for the Cello Concerto, though here the transition from modernism to Romantic lyricism is easier to follow and harder to resist. Also appealing is the vigour of much of the writing, especially for the strings – occasionally recalling the great string works of Tippett. Like his Finnish near-neighbour and fellow symphonist Kalevi Aho, Tüür is plainly worth taking very seriously, and it's good to report that the performers on this disc do just that. Excellent recordings too. A must for the curious, and for those who care about the future of the symphony.

Geirr Tveitt

Norwegian 1908-1981

GROVE Tveitt studied at the Leipzig Conservatory and in Vienna and Paris. His often rhythmic, dynamic music derives from Norwegian folk music and he wrote two concertos for the Hardanger fiddle. He was heard as the soloist in his six piano concertos.

Hardanger Fiddle Concertos

Hardanger Fiddle Concertos[a] –
No 1, Op 163; No 2, 'Three Fjords', Op 252. The Water Sprite, Op 187

[a]Arve Moen Bergset hard Stavanger Symphony Orchestra / Ole Kristian Ruud

BIS BIS-CD1207 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded c2001

The Hardanger fiddle of western Norway probably originated in the mid-17th century, possibly – as Reidar Storaas suggests in his notes – as a hybrid of earlier folk fiddles and the viola d'amore. Its tone is smaller than the violin and, with its four sympathetic strings, sounds not unlike a treble viol. It was inevitable, perhaps, that local boy Geirr Tveitt should write for it, but not that he would produce two such marvellous concertos.

The First dates from 1955 and its première at the Bergen Festival the following year was an unalloyed triumph for the composer. It is not hard to hear why: the idiom is Tveitt's best folksy manner, the orchestration expert and bright and the solo part virtuosic. The opening movement is relatively gentle, succeeded by a wonderfully atmospheric if wistful Andante and a lively finale reminiscent of Malcolm Arnold. The Second – incidentally Tveitt's last concerto – followed 10 years later and replicates the same basic design, yet is a more personal utterance, the structure more concisely realised, the inspiration drawn from the three fjords of his native region.

Arve Moen Bergset is a prize-winning folk player and plays with commendable feeling and technical assurance. He is ably supported by Ruud and the splendid Stavanger orchestra, who also provide an excellent performance of The Water Sprite ('Nykken', 1956), a tone-poem relating how the sprite snares a boy by disguising itself as a horse. Beautifully clear as usual from BIS. All in all, highly recommendable.

Piano Concerto No 4

Piano Concerto No 4, 'Aurora Borealis'. Variations on a Folksong from Hardanger[a]
Håvard Gimse, [a]Gunilla Süssmann pfs
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Bjarte Engeset Ⓢ
Naxos 8 555761 (61 minutes: DDD) ●●

There are many musical depictions of the Northern Lights, but few if any on quite so lush and expansive a scale as Tveitt's Fourth Piano Concerto (1947). A paean to this extraordinary natural phenomenon, it is conceived on a Baxian scale following a seasonal cycle with its kaleidoscopic first movement, 'The Northern Lights awakening above the autumn colours', running to almost 31 of the whole 51-minute length. The slower central span, 'Glittering in the winter heavens, and…' is more straightforward and the swifter final movement ('Fading away in the bright night of spring') acts as an epilogue.

The manuscript of the Fourth Concerto was lost in the calamitous 1970 fire that destroyed Tveitt's home and 80 per cent of his output. Christian Eggen was able to reconstruct it from the orchestral parts and a two-piano reduction, leaving the Third to be issued (Nos 2 and 6 are irretrievably lost). The coupling here is the delightful Variations on a Folksong from Hardanger for two pianos and orchestra, written in 1939 for Tveitt to play with his first wife, a highly diverse late-Romantic effusion and a real winner.

The performances are superb, Gimse totally in the Tveitt style with exemplary support from the RSNO and Bjarte Engeset; Gunilla Süssmann makes a splendid second soloist in the Variations. Excellent sound once again from Tim Handley. A marvellous disc.

A Hundred Hardanger Tunes

A Hundred Hardanger Tunes, Op 151 – Suite No 2, 'Fifteen Mountain Songs'; Suite No 5, 'Troll-tunes'
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Bjarte Engeset
Naxos 8 555770 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded in 2001

Only four of Geirr Tveitt's suites from his unique, folk-inspired collection, A Hundred Hardanger Tunes, survive. The two presented here exhibit the same principal characteristics as Nos 1 and 4 (also on Naxos), although without the quasi-narrative structure of No 4, Wedding Suite. The Second Suite is largely a pastoral affair, though with moments of rugged grandeur befitting its subject; the mountains of Hardanger in western Norway. They are brilliantly orchestrated, as one now expects from Tveitt, the final six exceptionally so. The scoring of the Fifth Suite is richer still, like a kind of concerto for orchestra. The trolls here are not the moronic ogres of Harry Potter or The Fellowship of the Ring, nor even the subterranean imps of Peer Gynt, but rather all the 'netherworld' peoples, whose music is as dazzling as they were legendarily beguiling.

The Royal Scottish orchestra sound as if they thoroughly enjoyed themselves in this music, as well they should have. A splendid and enjoyable disc, beautifully played and recorded. Strongly recommended.

Marco Uccellini

Italian c1603-1680

GROVE Uccellini became head of instrumental musica at the Modena court in 1641 and maestro di cappella at Modena Cathedral in 1647. From 1665 he was court maestro di cappella at Parma. He composed instrumental music, stage works and vocal pieces; his solo and ensemble sonatas (1639-49) are notable for their thematic unity, chromaticism and advanced violin technique.

Sonatas

Sonatas – Op 4 No 2; Op 5 Nos 3, 4, 9 and 12; Op 7 Nos 1, 3 and 11; Op 9 No 1. Arias, Op 4 – Nos 2, 3 and 9. Sonata over Toccata No 5. Correntes – Nos 4, 9 and 20
Romanesca (Andrew Manze vn Nigel North archlte/Baroque gtr/theorbo John Toll hpd/org)
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7196 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

This companion recital to Romanesca's disc of Biagio Marini's violin music features violin sonatas, instrumental arias and correntes by Marini's contemporary Marco Uccellini. Uccellini, along with Marini, Fontana, Turini and several others, developed an idiomatic, virtuosic approach to violin writing which aspires to emulate the expressive range of the human voice. With their imaginative exploration of the violin's technical potential and in the pioneering spirit of the time, these composers made significant and lasting contributions both to technique and form. Thus in Uccellini's music we are made aware of a distinctively exploratory, improvisatory idiom in which there is a highly developed sense of fantasy.

It is one of Andrew Manze's many strengths that he unfailingly responds to the technical and interpretative challenges of this repertoire with curiosity, stylistic propriety and playful imagination. Expressive delicacy, engaging inflexions and a discerning love of detail are all of the greatest assistance in bringing these pieces to life. In each department Romanesca succeeds admirably, enlivening Uccellini's extravagant gestures with demonstrative panache and rhythmic vigour, the more introspective ones with affectionate warmth. The gamut of Uccellini's expressive range, and Romanesca's realisation of it, are vividly displayed in the fine Sonata No 1 from the composer's Op 7 (1660). The instrumental sonorities are rewarding, and this aspect of the performance has been very well captured by the sympathetic recorded sound.

Edgard Varèse French/American 1883-1965

GROVE Varèse studied with d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum (1903-5) and Widor at the Paris Conservatoire (1905-7), then moved to Berlin, where he met Strauss and Busoni. In 1913 he returned to Paris, but in 1915 he emigrated to New York; nearly all his compositions disappeared at this stage, with the exception of a single published song and an orchestral score, Bourgogne (1908), which he took with him but destroyed towards the end of his life. His creative output therefore effectively begins with Amériques for large orchestra (1921), which, for all its echoes of Debussy and of Stravinsky's early ballets, sets out to discover new worlds of sound: fiercely dissonant chords, rhythmically complex polyphonies for percussion and/or wind, forms in continuous evolution with no large-scale recurrence.

In 1921 he and Carlos Salzedo founded the International Composers Guild, who gave the first performances of several of his works for small ensemble, these prominently featuring wind and percussion, and presenting the innovations of Amériques in pure, compact form: Hyperprism (1923), Octandre (1923) and Intégrales (1925). Arcana (1927), which returns to the large orchestra and extended form with perfected technique, brought this most productive period to an end.

There followed a long stay in Paris (1928-33), during which he wrote Ionisation for percussion orchestra (1931), the first European work to dispense almost entirely with pitched sounds, which enter only in the coda. He also took an interest in the electronic instruments being developed (he had been calling for electronic means since his arrival in the USA), and wrote for two theremins or ondes martenot in Ecuatorial for bass, brass, keyboards and percussion (1934). The flute solo Density 21. 5 (1936) was then his last completed work for nearly two decades.

During this time he taught sporadically and also made plans for Espace, which was to have involved simultaneous radio broadcasts from around the globe; an Etude pour Espace for chorus, pianos and percussion was performed in 1947. Then, with electronic music at last a real possibility owing to the development of the tape recorder, he produced Déserts for wind, percussion and tape (1954) and a Poème électronique (1957-8), devised to be diffused in the Philips pavilion at the Brussels Exposition of 1958. His last years were devoted to projects on themes of night and death, including the unfinished Nocturnal for voices and chamber orchestra (1961).

The Complete Works

Awards 1999

Tuning Up. Amériques. Poème électronique. Arcana. Nocturnal. Un grand sommeil noir (orig version/orch Beaumont). Offrandes. Hyperprism. Octandre. Intégrales. Ecuatorial. Ionisation. Densité 21.5. Déserts. Dance for Burgess

Sarah Leonard, Mireille Delunsch sops Kevin Deas bass Jacques Zoon fl François Kerdoncuff pf Edgard Varèse electronics Prague Philharmonic Choir; ASKO Ensemble; Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Riccardo Chailly

Decca ② 460 208-2DH2 (151 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1992-98 ●●●

This set is announced as 'The Complete Works' of Edgar Varèse. 'Complete' requires clarification. Excluded are the electronic interlude, La procession du Vergès, from the 1955 film Around and About Joan Mirò and the 1947 Etude Varèse wrote as preparation for his unrealised Espace project.

Works such as Octandre and Intégrales require scrupulous attention to balance if they are to sound more than crudely aggressive: Chailly secures this without sacrificing physical impact – witness the explosive Hyperprism. He brings out some exquisite harmonic subtleties in Offrandes, Sarah Leonard projecting the texts' surreal imagery with admirable poise. The fugitive opening bars of Ionisation sound slightly muted in the recorded ambience, though not the cascading tuned percussion towards the close.

The instrumentational problems of Ecuatorial are at last vindicated, allowing Varèse's inspired mix of brass and electronic keyboards to register with awesome power. Chailly opts for the solo bass, but a unison chorus would have heightened the dramatic impact still further. Amériques, the true intersection of romanticism and modernism, is performed in the original 1921 version, with its even more extravagant orchestral demands and bizarre reminiscences of The Rite of Spring and Schoenberg's Five Orchestral Pieces, understandably replaced in the revision. Arcana was recorded in 1992, Chailly probing beyond the work's vast dynamic contours more deeply than any other rival on disc.

No one but Varèse has drawn such sustained eloquence from an ensemble of wind and percussion, or invested such emotional power in the primitive electronic medium of the early 1950s. Déserts juxtaposes them in a score which marks the culmination of his search for new means of expression. The opening now seems a poignant evocation of humanity in the atomic age, the ending is resigned but not bitter. The tape interludes in Chailly's performance have a startling clarity, as does the Poème électronique, Varèse's untypical but exhilarating contribution to the 1958 Brussels World Fair. The unfinished Nocturnal, with its vocal stylisations and belated return of string timbre, demonstrates a continuing vitality that only time could extinguish. Varèse has had a significant impact on post-war musical culture, with figures as diverse as Stockhausen, Charlie Parker and Frank Zappa acknowledging his influence. Chailly's recordings demonstrate, in unequivocal terms, why this music will continue to provoke and inspire future generations.

Arcana / Amériques

Ionisation[a]. Amériques[a]. Arcana[a]. Density 21.5. Offrandes[b]. Octandre[b]. Intégrales[b]
Rachel Yakar sop Lawrence Beauregard fl
[a]New York Philharmonic Orchestra; [b]Ensemble InterContemporain / Pierre Boulez
Sony Classical SMK45844 (77 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included OO

Edgard Varèse has become one of those composers whose music is more talked about than performed. His music and ideas have had a considerable influence on the development of 20th-century music, and yet even today his works are rarely heard in the concert hall. Varèse was a pioneer, a quester and above all a liberator. Music for him was a form of 20th-century alchemy – the transmutation of the ordinary into the extraordinary, an alchemical wedding of intellectual thought with intuitive imagination. The remarkable thing about his music is that there is not a single weak work in his output; every piece has something new and unique to offer, and has the unmistakable fingerprint of his highly individual style. It was the writings of the 14th-century cosmologist and alchemist Paracelsus that formed the inspiration behind his orchestral work Arcana, a vast canvas of sound built entirely out of one melodic motive. Echoes of Stravinsky and others are discernible, but the totality of Arcana is pure Varèse.

The same is true of Amériques, a title that Varèse emphasised was not to be taken as 'purely geographical but as symbolic of discoveries – new worlds on earth, in the sky or in the minds of men'. Here romanticism and modernism seem to coexist side by side, where allusions from works such as La mer and The Firebird seem like memories carried into his brave new world. The remaining items consist of smaller chamber works which display Varèse's most radical, though equally rewarding, styles. Boulez and his players give committed, virtuosic performances of these challenging and intriguing works.

Additional recommendation
Amériques. Arcana.
Couplings: Ionisation. Déserts – Episodes I-IV
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Boulez
DG 471 137-2GH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Boulez's new Chicago remakes are not all gain; that said, the Amériques shows the conductor at his interpretative best and the non-electronic Déserts is also very fine.

Peteris Vasks

Latvian b1952

Peteris Vasks was born in Aizpute, Latvia, and trained as a double-bass player. In 1970 he joined the Latvian National Opera orchestra, the Latvian Symphony Orchestra and chamber orchestra. In 1978, after graduating from the Latvian State Conservatory's Composition Class, Vasks began his teaching career, and many of his pupils are now noted Latvian composers. His initial compositional forays were noted for their unconventionality but by the 1980s he had found his uniquely Latvian voice in string, brass and piano music.

Second Symphony

Symphony No 2[a] Violin Concerto, 'Distant Light'[b]
[a]Tampere Philharmonic Orchestra / [b]John Storgårds vn [b]Ostrobothnian Chamber Orchestra / Juha Kangas
Ondine ODE1005-2 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

The Latvian composer Peteris Vasks (*b*1946) has been winning himself something of a cult following over the past decade. On the evidence of this blistering première recording, his Second Symphony of 1998-99 seems set to repeat the popular and critical success of Voices, its hugely effective 1991 predecessor for string orchestra.

A single-movement canvas of nearly 40 minutes' duration, it traverses emotions from bare-faced rage and serene contemplation to icy despair, achieving a vast, uneasy quietude at the close ('a sense of light-filled sorrow,' in the composer's words). Stylistic echoes are plentiful: Shostakovich, Kancheli, Górecki and Pärt; folk-music, birdsong and hymnody are further ingredients in this approachable cocktail. Fortunately, Vasks's compassionate inspiration eschews any hint of new-age pretentiousness or designer chic, conveying instead a strength of conviction, unflinching honesty and profound sense of wonder that easily hold the listener in its thrall. All of which, of course, is also testament to the formidable interpretative skills of conductor John Storgårds, who secures exemplary results from the Tampere Philharmonic. The sound is splendidly ample and detailed to match.

For the coupling, Storgårds gives a heartfelt performance of Vasks's Violin Concerto (Distant Light). Written in 1996-97 at the behest of Gidon Kremer and his then recently formed Kremerata Baltica, this is another single-movement, readily assimilable essay, though its at times enigmatically disparate elements are here perhaps less convincingly fused into a satisfying whole. Nevertheless, this enterprising release deserves every success.

Ralph Vaughan Williams

British 1872-1958

GROVE Vaughan Williams studied with Parry, Wood and Stanford at the Royal College of Music and Cambridge, then had further lessons with Bruch in Berlin (1897) and Ravel in Paris (1908). It was only after this that he began to write with sureness in larger forms, even though some songs had had success in the early years of the century. That success, and the ensuing maturity, depended very much on his work with folksong, which he had begun to collect in 1903; this opened the way to the lyrical freshness of the Housman cycle On Wenlock Edge and to the modally inflected tonality of the symphonic cycle that began with A Sea Symphony. But he learnt the same lessons in studying earlier English music in his task as editor of the English Hymnal (1906) – work which bore fruit in his Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis for strings, whose majestic unrelated consonances provided a new sound and a new way into large-scale form. The sound, with its sense of natural objects seen in a transfigured light, placed Vaughan Williams in a powerfully English visionary tradition, and made very plausible his association of his music with Blake (in the ballet Job) and Bunyan (in the opera The Pilgrim's Progress). Meanwhile the new command of form made possible a first symphony, A London Symphony), where characterful detail is worked into the scheme. A first opera, Hugh the Drover, made direct use of folksongs, which Vaughan Williams normally did not do in orchestral works.

His study of folksong, however, certainly facilitated the pastoral tone of The Lark Ascending, for violin and orchestra, and then of the Pastoral Symphony. At the beginning of the 1920s there followed a group of religious works continuing the visionary manner: the unaccompanied Mass in G minor, the Revelation oratorio Sancta civitas and the 'pastoral episode' The Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains, later incorporated in The Pilgrim's Progress. But if the glowing serenity of pastoral and vision were to remain central during the decades of work on that magnum opus, works of the later 1920s show a widening of scope, towards the comedy of the operas Sir John in Love (after The Merry Wives of Windsor) and The Poisoned Kiss, and towards the angularity of Satan's music in Job and of the Fourth Symphony. The quite different Fifth Symphony has more connection with The Pilgrim's Progress, and was the central work of a period that also included the cantata Dona nobis pacem, the opulent Serenade to Music for 16 singers and orchestra, and the A minor string quartet, the finest of Vaughan Williams's rather few chamber works.

A final period opened with the desolate, pessimistic Sixth Symphony, after which Vaughan Williams found a focus in the natural world for such bleakness when he was asked to write the music for the film Scott of the Antarctic : out of that world came his Seventh Symphony, the Sinfonia antartica, whose pitched percussion colouring he used more ebulliently in the Eighth Symphony, the Ninth returning to the contemplative world of The Pilgrim's Progress.

Piano Concerto

Vaughan Williams Piano Concerto in C
Foulds Dynamic Triptych, Op 88
Howard Shelley pf
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Vernon Handley
Lyrita SRCD211 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded early 1980s ●

There are four unequivocal masterpieces for piano and orchestra in English 20th-century music: Bax's Winter Legends, Frank Bridge's Phantasm and the two works recorded here. Until the appearance of this recording the VW Concerto had been more frequently presented in its revised 1946 version for two pianos and orchestra – one that did no favours in revealing the masterpiece of his original inspiration. The exceptionally taxing solo part, and the power required by the soloist to project over an extremely large orchestra, almost certainly inhibited the original version's ingress into the repertoire. However, when heard under the guiding hand of a pianist of Howard Shelley's calibre, we are allowed once more to discover the work in its true glory.

It is easy to see why the piece was so admired by Bartók when it received its German première under Hermann Scherchen and the concerto's dedicatee Harriet Cohen, for this is surely one of the most cogent and tautly constructed examples of its genre to have emerged from English music of the period. John Fould's Dynamic Triptych is scarcely less impressive. Though it lacks the conciseness of the Vaughan Williams, this is a work and a performance to treasure.

Complete Symphonies

No 1, 'A Sea Symphony'; No 2, 'A London Symphony'; No 3, 'A Pastoral Symphony'; No 4 in F minor; No 5 in D; No 6 in E minor; No 7, 'Sinfonia antartica'; No 8 in D minor; No 9 in E minor

---

Symphony No 1, 'A Sea Symphony'
Joan Rodgers sop William Shimell bar
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Choir and

Orchestra / Vernon Handley
Classics for Pleasure 575 3082 (DDD) Ⓑ

Symphonies – No 2, 'A London Symphony'; No 8
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley
Classics for Pleasure 575 3092 (DDD) Ⓑ

Symphonies – No 3, 'A Pastoral Symphony'; No 4
English Folksong Suite
Alison Barlow sop Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley
Classics for Pleasure 575 3102 (DDD) Ⓑ

Symphony No 5. Flos campi. Oboe Concerto
Christopher Balmer va Jonathan Small ob
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Handley
Classics for Pleasure 575 3112 (DDD) Ⓑ

Symphonies – Nos 6 and 9. Fantasia on Greensleeves
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley
Classics for Pleasure 575 3122 (DDD) Ⓑ

Symphony No 7, 'Sinfonia antartica'. Serenade to Music. Partita for Double String Orchestra
Alison Hargan sop Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Handley 💰
Classics for Pleasure 575 3132 (DDD) Ⓑ ◉◉

Handley's performances can withstand comparison with the very best. The first to appear was the Fifth Symphony. Rightly acclaimed on its initial release, this remains a gloriously rapt, yet formidably lucid realisation. The coupling, a supremely dedicated rendering of the exquisite Flos campi, is just as distinguished. Handley's masterly pacing is a compelling feature of both the Sea Symphony and Sinfonia antartica, but, whilst it is difficult to fault either performance on artistic grounds, here more than elsewhere one notes the limitations of the slightly cramped acoustic of Liverpool's Philharmonic Hall.

There are no technical shortcomings about the intense Third or the Fourth, with its unbridled ferocity and orchestral virtuosity. The Second and Eighth bring outstandingly perceptive, marvellously communicative music-making, with both scores emerging as fresh as the day they were conceived. Handley's interpretation of the Sixth Symphony is a model of cogency and long-term control. Don't be deceived by the element of slight reserve in the opening movement. It soon transpires that Handley already has his eyes firmly set on the work's terrifying apex, namely the baleful climax of the succeeding Moderato. Handley's Scherzo teems with busy detail, its feverish contrapuntal workings laid out before us with maximum clarity and force. So many performances have come to grief in the finale; Handley's is a triumphant exception. In this desolate, inconsolable landscape, Handley achieves a truly awesome hush and concentration.

And what of the Ninth, VW's other 'E minor'? Few interpreters on disc have probed much beneath the surface of this elusive, craggy masterpiece. Handley captures the music's mordant wit, while allowing the listener to revel afresh in the astonishing vitality and startlingly original sonorities of VW's ever-imaginative inspiration. The overriding impression left is one of supreme sensitivity and utter dedication to the cause. In the visionary finale, whose monumental, block-like structure gradually takes shape before our eyes like Stonehenge itself, Handley's conception just has the edge over his rivals in terms of elemental power and effortless inevitability. The recordings are admirably natural.

Additional recommendations

Complete Symphonies 🄷
Baillie, Ritchie sops Cameron bar Gielgud narr
London Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Boult
Decca British Music Collection ⑤ 473 241-2DC5
(353 minutes: ADD: recorded 1952-53, '56 and '58) Ⓜ

Music-making of the highest calibre throughout. The mono engineering is always vivid, often stunningly so – especially in A Sea Symphony and Sinfonia antartica. If you don't already know these magnificent recordings, don't hesitate.

Complete Symphonies
Couplings: Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis. The Wasps. Serenade to Music. In the Fen Country. Norfolk Rhapsody No 1. The Lark Ascending. English Folk Song Suite. Fantasia on 'Greensleeves'. Concerto for Two Pianos and Orchestra. Job
Armstrong, Burrowes, Price sops Case bar
London Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra;
New Philharmonia / Boult; various artists
EMI ⑧ 573924-2 (534 minutes: ADD: 1/01) Ⓑ

An ideal supplement to Belart's super-bargain box of Boult's mono VW cycle for Decca.

Symphony No 1, 'A Sea Symphony'

Dame Felicity Lott sop Jonathan Summers bar
Cantilena; London Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
EMI 749911-2 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1989 ◉◉

A firm hand on the tiller is needed to steer a safe course through this, Vaughan Williams's first and most formally diffuse symphony, completed in 1909. Haitink is clearly an ideal choice of helmsman, and he is helped by a remarkably lucid recording that resolves details that would rarely be revealed in live performance. What might be more unexpected here is the obvious affinity he shows for this music: while never transgressing the bounds of Vaughan Williams's characteristically English idiom, he manages to place the work in the European mainstream, revealing a whole range of resonances, from Bruckner and Mahler to the Impressionists. Not all the glory should go to the conductor, of course. Both soloists are particularly fine, the vulnerability behind the spine-tingling power of Felicity Lott's voice providing excellent contrast to the staunch solidity of Jonathan Summers. The LPO Chorus, aided by Cantilena, is on top form and the whole enterprise is underpinned by the LPO's total commitment and expertise.

Symphony No 1 H
Dame Isobel Baillie sop John Cameron bar
London Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Sir Adrian Boult
Belart mono 450 144-2 (68 minutes: ADD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1952 ●●●

'Classic recording of Symphony No 1' proclaims the sleeve of this super-budget Belart CD. That assessment is absolutely spot-on. Fine as is Boult's own 1968 stereo remake (available on an EMI reissue), this Decca performance surpasses it for sheer fervour and concentration: no one before or since has held the finale together with quite such effortless mastery. Vaughan Williams himself lent his supervision to the sessions, and the mono sound remains remarkably full-blooded, if inevitably rather lacking in range. No Vaughan Williams enthusiast can afford to overlook the present reissue. The singular lack of texts is, however, an irritating oversight.

Symphony No 2, 'A London Symphony'

Vaughan Williams Symphony No 2 (original version, 1913)
Butterworth The Banks of Green Willow
London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Awards 2001
Chandos CHAN9902 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001 ●●●

It was during the summer of 1911 that George Butterworth (a victim of The Great War, and whose enchanting 1913 idyll, The Banks of Green Willow, comprises the achingly poignant curtain-raiser here) first suggested to Vaughan Williams that he should write a purely orchestral symphony. VW dug out some sketches he had made for a symphonic poem about London, while at the same time deriving fruitful inspiration from HG Wells's 1908 novel, Tono-Bungay (and its visionary final chapter in particular). Geoffrey Toye gave the successful Queen's Hall première in March 1914, and VW subsequently dedicated the score to Butterworth's memory. Over the next two decades or so, the work underwent three revisions (including much judicious pruning) and was published twice (in 1920 and 1936). In his compelling 1941 recording with the Cincinnati SO, Eugene Goossens employed the 1920 version, which adds about three minutes of music to that definitive 1936 'revised edition'. Now Richard Hickox at long last gives us the chance to hear VW's original, hour-long canvas – and riveting listening it makes too!

Whereas the opening movement is as we know it today, the ensuing, expanded Lento acquires an intriguingly mournful, even world-weary demeanour. Unnervingly, the ecstatic full flowering of that glorious E major Largamente idea, first heard at fig F in the final revision, never materialises, and the skies glower menacingly thereafter. Towards the end of the Scherzo (at 5'44") comes a haunting episode that Arnold Bax was particularly sad to see cut ('a mysterious passage of strange and fascinating cacophony' was how he described it in his autobiography, Farewell, My Youth [Scholar Press; 1992]). The finale, too, contains a wealth of additional material, most strikingly a liturgical theme of wondrous lyrical beauty (try from 6'42") and, in the epilogue, a gripping paragraph (beginning at 15'47") which looks back to the work's introduction as well as forward to the first movement of A Pastoral Symphony. Sprawling it may be, but VW's epic conception evinces a prodigal inventiveness, poetry, mystery and vitality that do not pall with repeated hearings.

Hickox and the LSO respond with an unquenchable spirit, generous flexibility and tender affection that suit VW's ambitious inspiration to a T, and Chandos's sound is big and bold to match. An essential purchase for anyone remotely interested in British music.

Symphony No 3

Symphonies Nos 3 and 4
Amanda Roocroft sop London Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
EMI 556564-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

These are thought-provoking interpretations of great dedication and intelligence. If Haitink's deeply felt conception of A Pastoral Symphony is the most daringly broad we've yet had on disc, its concentration and abundant character grip from first measure to last. Aided by orchestral playing of the highest quality, the opening movement unfolds with a luminous serenity, its climaxes unerringly 'placed', yet Haitink is also acutely aware of the ominous stirrings just beneath the surface. Most distinctive of all is the Moderato pesante third movement which, as Haitink views it, is a monumentally sombre, even intimidating affair. This is an interpretation of compelling individuality and tragic intensity which all Vaughan Williams aficionados should investigate forthwith.

The same holds true for the Fourth. Again, Haitink presides over a performance of immense integrity and long-term rigour. Speeds here are less controversial. By not driving the first movement too hard, Haitink allows us to savour the full expressive eloquence of the strings' appassionato sostenuto secondary idea. What's more, the Scherzo possesses fine rhythmic point, and the transition into the finale generates a tremendous expectancy. In this last movement Haitink keeps a firm hand on the tiller and steadfastly refuses to whip up any artificial excitement, but its rugged symphonic strength must surely command enormous respect.

Symphony No 4

Symphonies Nos 4[a] and 5[b] 🄷
[a]BBC Symphony Orchestra / Ralph Vaughan Williams; [b]Hallé Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli 🏅
Dutton mono BP9731 Ⓢ
(66 minutes: ADD)
Recorded [a]1937 and [b]1944 ○○○

No performance on record of Vaughan Williams's Fourth Symphony has ever quite matched this very first one, recorded under the composer's baton in October 1937. As Michael Kennedy says in his note for this reissue, it is 'taken at a daredevil pace', and more importantly has a bite and energy beyond any rival. If early listeners to this violent work were shocked by the composer's new boldness, here his conducting demonstrates the passionate emotion behind the piece. The remastered sound is so vivid and immediate, so full of presence, that in places one almost has the illusion of stereo before its time.

Barbirolli's première recording of the Fifth Symphony, made in February 1944 eight months after the first performance, is hardly less remarkable. This, too, has never been matched since for the stirring passion of the great climaxes in the first and third movements, with Barbirolli in each carefully grading the intensity between exposition and recapitulation. It is also a revelation to find him taking the triple-time of the Passacaglia finale much faster than latter-day rivals, relating it more closely than usual to the great example of the finale of Brahms's Fourth Symphony, making it no pastoral amble but a searing argument. Here again hiss has been virtually eliminated, but that has left the high violins sounding rather papery. Even so, there's no lack of weight in the big climaxes, with brass and wind atmospherically caught.

An outstanding issue for all lovers of this composer's music, not just those who specialise in historic recordings.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 4
Couplings : Violin Concerto, 'Concerto accademico'.
Sillito vn London Symphony Orchestra / Thomson
Chandos CHAN8633 (50 minutes: DDD: 1/89) Ⓕ

Thomson approaches the work as a magnificent piece of symphonic argument – exuberant, full of rumbustious humour and spiced with exquisite passages of lyricism.

Symphony No 5

Symphony No 5[a]. Valiant-for-truth[b]. The Pilgrim Pavement[c]. Psalm 23 (arr Churchill)[b]. Hymn-tune Prelude on 'Song 13' by Orlando Gibbons (arr Glatz)[a]. Prelude and Fugue in C minor[a]
[c]Ian Watson org [bc]Richard Hickox Singers; [a]London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9666 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1997 ○○

This is an exceptionally powerful yet deeply moving account of the Fifth. Aided by glowing, wide-ranging engineering, Hickox's is an urgently communicative reading. The first and third movements in particular emerge with an effortless architectural splendour and rapt authority, the climaxes built and resolved with mastery. The Scherzo is as good a place as any to sample the lustrous refinement of the LSO's response. Hickox ensures that the symphony's concluding bars positively glow with gentle ecstasy: here is a Fifth that can surely hold its own in the most exalted company.

Material from The Pilgrim's Progress made its way into the Fifth Symphony and two of the five enterprising couplings here provide further links with John Bunyan's timeless allegory: the 1940 motet for mixed voices with organ, Valiant-for-truth and John Churchill's 1953 arrangement for soprano and mixed chorus of Psalm 23 (originally sung by The Voice of a Bird in Act 4 of The Pilgrim's Progress). The latter receives its finely prepared recorded début on this occasion, as do both The Pilgrim Pavement (a 1934 processional for soprano, chorus and organ) and Helen Glatz's string-orchestra arrangement of the solo-piano Hymn-tune Prelude on 'Song 13' by Gibbons. Which just leaves the Prelude and Fugue, originally written for organ in 1921, but heard here in a sumptuous orchestration.

Additional recommendations
Symphony No 5
Coupling: Bax Tintagel
Philharmonia; London Symphony Orchestra / Barbirolli
EMI British Composers 565110-2 Ⓑ
(54 minutes: ADD: 3/95)

Barbirolli's much-loved 1962 Philharmonia account of VW's No 5 superbly transferred.

Couplings: The Lark Ascending.
Norfolk Rhapsody No 1
Chang vn London Philharmonic Orchestra / Haitink
EMI 555487-2 (68 minutes: DDD: 12/95) Ⓕ

Haitink directs a reading of enormous integrity and lucidity with the London Philharmonic on radiant form.

Further listening
Tubin Symphony No 4, 'Sinfonia lirica'
Coupling: Symphony No 9[a]. Toccata[a]
Bergen Symphony Orchestra; [a]Gothenburg Symphony Orchestra / Järvi
BIS CD227 (64 minutes) Ⓕ

If you want to explore the symphony beyond the standard repertoire don't miss Tubin's music. His Fourth Symphony (1944) is predominantly pastoral, a mixture of the Slavonic and the Nordic.

Symphony No 6

Symphony No 6 in E minor[a]. The Lark Ascending[b]. A Song of Thanksgiving[c]
[c]Betty Dolemore sop [c]Robert Speaight narr 🏵
[c]Harry Grab org [b]Jean Pougnet vn [c]Luton Choral Society; [a]London Symphony Orchestra, [bc]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Adrian Boult
Dutton Laboratories mono CDBP9703 Ⓑ
(69 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1949-52 ●●

Although it was Boult who premièred VW's awesome Sixth Symphony, his white-hot February 1949 account with the LSO was not in fact the work's début recording – that singular honour falling to Stokowski and the New York Philharmonic (who pipped their British counterparts to the post by just two days). The return to the catalogue of Boult's legendary version – last available on an identically programmed Great Recordings of the Century anthology (EMI) – is a cause for celebration, especially in such a vivid transfer (if fractionally hollow in the bass) and so modestly priced to boot. Like Stokowski's scarcely less thrilling realisation, the performance offers us the opportunity to hear VW's original Scherzo. This has been allotted a separate track at the end of the symphony, its place taken by the same team's February 1950 recording of the composer's revision (not an ideal arrangement, perhaps). Whether the performance as a whole entirely displaces Sir Adrian's marvellous 1953 Decca version with the LPO (available in a disappointingly rough transfer on Belart) is open to debate, but both interpretations comprehensively outflank Sir Adrian's New Philharmonia stereo remake for EMI in terms of fiery concentration and sheer guts.

Written in response to a commission from the BBC in 1943 for a work to celebrate the defeat of Hitler's Germany, A Song of Thanksgiving was first broadcast shortly after VE Day. This commercial recording followed in December 1951. The work (which is scored for soprano, narrator, chorus and orchestra) has a smattering of decent invention (including, from around 4'30", fleeting echoes of the Sixth's second movement), but overall it's hardly representative of VW at his most inspired.

Last, and certainly not least, comes a wholly cherishable account (from October 1952) of The Lark Ascending, with Jean Pougnet a wonderfully silky toned, humane soloist. Boult's accompaniment, too, is a model of selfless dedication and intuitive rapture. For some, it remains, quite simply, the most tenderly unaffected and profoundly moving Lark on disc, though the string timbre on that earlier EMI restoration is much preferable to this over-processed newcomer. None the less, a most valuable VW reissue.

Symphony No 6. Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis. The Lark Ascending 🏵
Tasmin Little vn BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
Warner Apex 0927 49584-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1990 ●

Sir Andrew Davis clearly thought long and hard before committing this enigmatic and tragic symphony to disc, and the result is one of the most spontaneous and electrifying accounts of the Sixth Symphony available. The urgency and vigour of the first and third movements is astonishing, leaving one with the impression that the work might have been recorded in one take. His treatment of the second subject's reprise in the closing pages of the first movement is more underplayed and remote than the beautifully sheened approach of some recordings, but is arguably more nostalgic for being so. The feverish, nightmare world of the Scherzo is a real tour de force in the hands of an inspired BBC Symphony Orchestra, and the desolate wasteland of the eerie final movement has rarely achieved such quiescence and nadir as here. Davis's searchingly intense Tallis Fantasia is finely poised with a beautifully spacious acoustic. The disc concludes on a quietly elevated note with Tasmin Little's serene and gently introspective reading of The Lark Ascending. The recording is excellent.

Symphony No 6. In the Fen Country. On Wenlock Edge
Ian Bostridge ten London Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
EMI 556762-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1998 ●●

This is a noble, rewarding and profoundly musical account of the Sixth. Drawing some magnificently clean and sonorous playing from the LPO (and aided by a ripe and wide-ranging recording), Haitink steers a characteristically purposeful course through the first movement, alighting on precisely the right tempo for the second subject's final ecstatic metamorphosis. Right from the outset, one notes how the supreme articulation of the orchestral playing helps to make so much sense of the composer's trenchant counterpoint. However, it's in the succeeding Moderato that Haitink really pulls ahead of most of his rivals, his eloquent conception displaying a riveting long-term rigour. No complaints, either, about the implacable mystery and tingling concentration of Haitink's epilogue. Altogether a distinguished Sixth, and one which deserves to rank alongside the finest currently available. It's also difficult to imagine a more refined, sympathetic rendering of In the Fen Country than Haitink's. It unfolds with melting beauty and tender grace. A cherishable display indeed, and the delights continue with On Wenlock Edge. Ian Bostridge sings with moving ardour and intelligence (his 'Is my team ploughing?' is an especially compulsive interpretation), whilst Haitink's support is a model of scrupulous sensitivity and delicate nuance. All in all, a release to savour.

Symphony No 7

Sheila Armstrong sop London Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
EMI 747516-2 (42 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1984 ●●

Scored for wordless soprano solo and chorus plus a large orchestra, this Seventh Symphony was based on the composer's music for the film Scott of the Antarctic. It comprises five movements; the Prelude, which conveys mankind's struggle in overcoming hostile natural forces; a Scherzo, which depicts the whales and penguins in their natural habitat; 'Landscape', which portrays vast frozen wastes; Intermezzo, a reflection of the actions and thoughts of two members of the party; and 'Epilogue', describing the final tragic assault on the South Pole. Bernard Haitink's conducting is highly imaginative, very concentrated and very committed, and the LPO responds to him with some wonderfully atmospheric playing, full of personality and colour. Armstrong's eerie disembodied soprano voice and the remote chorus heighten the atmosphere, so that the score emerges as a powerful, coherent essay in symphonic form. The recording is magnificently sonorous and spacious.

Additional recommendations

Symphony No 7 🄷
Couplings: Oboe Concerto. Tuba Concerto. The Wasps Overture. Fantasia on 'Greensleeves'. Five Variants of 'Dives and Lazarus'. Elgar Introduction and Allegro. Serenade. Cockaigne.
Ritchie sop Hallé Choir and Orchestra / Barbirolli various artists
EMI British Composers ② 566543-2 Ⓑ
(138 minutes: ADD: recorded 1953)

Sir John Barbirolli's première recording has an imposing grandeur and a marvellous humanity. Equally sympathetic performances of VW's concertos for oboe and tuba.

Symphony No 8 🄷
Coupling: Symphony No 2, 'A London Symphony'
Hallé Orchestra / Barbirolli
Dutton Laboratories Barbirolli Edition CDSJB1021 Ⓜ
(74 minutes: ADD: recorded 1956-57) ●●●

Two recording classics in one package. Barbirolli's première recording of the Eighth with the Hallé is vividly captured for posterity. A joyous performance, which radiates enthusiasm. The London Symphony is just as fine – it's hard to think of another that matches it for heartfelt spontaneity.

Symphony No 9

Symphonies Nos 8 and 9
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
EMI 557086-2 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●●

A friendly word of warning to VW fans everywhere: Haitink will make you think again. No 'little' Eighth, this, rather an unapologetically big-scale conception, full of doughty integrity and always seeking out the intuitive logic that binds VW's symphonic thinking. If the Scherzo alla marcia falls short in terms of twinkling good humour here, the preceding, inimitably subtitled Variazioni senza tema unfolds with a revelatory sweep and purposefulness.

Likewise, the finale by and large forfeits celebratory pomp and glitter in favour of a sinewy, intriguingly defiant strength entirely consistent with Haitink's patient view as a whole. Most distinctive of all is the sublime Cavatina for strings: very measured, raptly concentrated and imbued with a lofty serenity to relate it all the more movingly to the great Romanza of VW's Fifth Symphony. Some may find the emotional temperature set just a few notches too low for comfort, but, as a thought-provoking alternative to Barbirolli (Pye – nla), Handley and Slatkin, Haitink's Eighth certainly earns its spurs.

Turning to the craggy, questing Ninth, both Slatkin and Handley have given of their considerable best in this fascinating, wonderfully vital utterance. On balance, Haitink's resplendent new version can be rated as the finest yet, a thrillingly convinced and convincing demonstration of the timeless universality of VW's masterpiece. Witness the clear-sighted dedication and stoic grandeur of the opening Moderato maestoso. Not only is Haitink meticulously faithful to the letter and spirit of the score, VW's argument evolves with a nobility and wholeness that grip from first measure to last. Those ff tenuto strings at Fig 2 (1'02") in the second movement have just the right 'mud on boots' feel to them, and, like Handley before him, Haitink doesn't overplay his hand in the central lyrical episode (its chaste beauty all the more affecting as a consequence). The hobgoblins of the Scherzo cackle with malevolent glee, yet Haitink proves just as tenderly responsive to the strings' ravishing cantabile e sostenuto dialogue between Figs 30 and 34 (from 4'06" to 4'42").

It's in the awesome final movement, though, where Haitink really surpasses himself: VW's monolithic vision is surveyed with an organic power and cumulative impact that leaves one dumb struck with admiration and gratitude. Throughout, the LPO play marvellously for their former chief, and EMI's Abbey Road sound is excellent, truthful in timbre and expertly balanced (listen out for some handsomely extended bass sonorities). A distinguished achievement and absolutely not to be missed.

Symphony No 9. Piano Concerto in C
Howard Shelley pf London Symphony Orchestra / Bryden Thomson
Chandos CHAN8941 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990 ●

Alongside the scorching account of the apocalyptic Fourth Symphony, this clear-headed, perceptive traversal of the enigmatic

Ninth has fair claims to be regarded as the best thing in Bryden Thomson's underrated VW cycle for Chandos. Thomson's urgent conception of the opening Moderato maestoso in particular has a sweep and momentum one might not have previously associated with this movement, yet the gain in terms of sheer concentration and symphonic stature is irrefutable. Granted, some may find the outer sections of the succeeding Andante sostenuto just a little too lacking in evocative magic, but there's no gainsaying the effectiveness of gallumphing woodwind in the oafish Scherzo; certainly, the LSO's saxophone trio seems to be enjoying its day out hugely. In the finale, too, Thomson's approach is more boldly assertive than usual – not the way one would always want to hear this music, perhaps, but a thoroughly valid and convincing performance all the same. The coupling, Howard Shelley's distinguished remake of the same composer's craggily elusive Piano Concerto, is both imaginative and desirable. All in all, a highly recommendable disc: the LSO is in fine fettle, whilst the glowing sound is close to ideal.

Additional recommendations
Piano Concerto
Coupling: Foulds Dynamic Triptych
Shelley pf Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley
Lyrita SRCD211 (57 minutes: DDD: 3/93) Ⓕ

A vital reading of the one-piano version by Howard Shelley, aided by one of the most searching of Vaughan Williams conductors.

Coupling: Finzi Eclogue. Delius Piano Concerto
Lane pf Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley
EMI Eminence CD-EMX2239 (61 minutes: DDD: 11/95) Ⓜ

Piers Lane brings an exhilarating dash and bravura to Vaughan Williams's craggy concerto, aided by Handley's characteristically lucid, watchful direction.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 1 in G minor; No 2 in A minor. Phantasy Quintet[a]
[a]Garfield Jackson va Maggini Quartet 🏵
Naxos 8 555300 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 2000 ●●●

Awards 2001

Why is Vaughan Williams's Second Quartet not part of the international chamber repertory? Played as eloquently as this it seems unarguably a masterpiece, and a masterpiece specifically of its time: 1942/43. Its first movement and deeply fraught Scherzo are as troubled as Shostakovich (whose music at moments, like a sudden stab of violence in that first allegro, it passingly resembles), while the misleadingly titled slow 'Romance' is haunted and haunting. It is tranquil but not at peace. It achieves an impassioned nobility and approaches serenity at the end, but something ghostly (it walks again in the Epilogue to the Sixth Symphony) refuses to be exorcised until the beautiful calm finale.

What these players do with the two much earlier pieces is no less remarkable. In them Vaughan Williams's style is audibly emerging from the influences (notably Ravel, briefly his teacher) that helped form it. In the First Quartet's opening movement an arching, lyrical melody that sounds like Vaughan Williams speaking with a French accent (and is it a French lark that ascends a little later?) has shed the accent by its return; something similar happens in the finale. But it was not an immature composer (he was 36, after all) who in the slow movement recognised a kinship with Fauré. And the Phantasy Quintet is audibly by the composer of the Tallis Fantasia, grateful to Ravel for giving him access to a deft rhythmic flexibility, but exploring his own unmistakable territory in the serenity tinged with poignancy of the slow movement. The Magginis and Garfield Jackson clearly love this music deeply; they play it with great beauty of tone and variety of colour and with passionate expressiveness. The ample recording allows both grand gestures and quiet intimacy.

Dona nobis pacem

Dona nobis pacem[a]. Sancta civitas[b]
[a]Yvonne Kenny sop [b]Philip Langridge ten Bryn Terfel bass-bar [b]St Paul's Cathedral Choir; London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
EMI British Composers 754788-2 🏵
(63 minutes: DDD). Texts included Ⓑ
Recorded 1992 ●●

This is a generous and inspiring coupling of two of Vaughan Williams's most important choral utterances. Hickox coaxes magnificent sounds from the LSO throughout: in Dona nobis pacem, for example, the sense of orchestral spectacle during 'Beat! Beat! drums!' is riveting in its physical impact. The London Symphony Chorus combines full-throated discipline and sensitivity to nuance, and Hickox's trio of soloists is excellent, with Terfel outstandingly eloquent. Sancta civitas is a work whose multi-layered scoring places great demands on both conductor and production team alike: suffice it to report, it is difficult to see Hickox's inspirational account of this still-underrated score being surpassed for years to come. EMI's clean, wide-ranging sound is admirable.

Additional recommendations
Dona nobis pacem
Coupling: Five Mystical Songs
Wiens sop Rayner Cook bar London Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Thomson
Chandos CHAN8590 (57 minutes: DDD: 3/89) Ⓕ

A strong, convincing and well-paced interpretation. Brian Rayner Cook could scarcely be bettered.

Couplings: Four Hymns. Toward the Unknown Region. O clap your hands. Lord, thou hast been our Refuge
Howarth sop Ainsley ten Allen bar Corydon Singers and Orchestra / Best
Hyperion CDA66655 (76 minutes: DDD: 5/94) Ⓕ

An enticing VW collection enhanced by the late Christopher Palmer's typically illuminating booklet-notes.

Further listening

Magnificat

Coupling: Song of Thanksgiving, Choral Hymns, Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains, Old 100th
Dawson sop Wyn-Rogers contr Ainsley ten Terfel bar Corydon Singers, CLS / Best
Hyperion CDA66655 (73 minutes: DDD: 8/92) Ⓕ

The only version available of the sensuous Magnificat.

Mass in G minor

Vaughan Williams Mass in G minor. Te Deum in G
Howells Requiem. Take him, earth, for cherishing
Mary Seers sop Michael Chance counterten Philip Salmon ten Jonathan Best bass Corydon Singers / Matthew Best with Thomas Trotter org
Hyperion CDA66076 (60 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Texts included ●●

Vaughan Williams's unaccompanied Mass in G minor manages to combine the common manner of Elizabethan liturgical music with those elements of his own folk-music heritage that make his music so distinctive, and in so doing arrives at something individual and new. The work falls into five movements and its mood is one of heartfelt, if restrained, rejoicing. Howells's Requiem dates from 1936, a year after the death of his only son. The work was not released in his lifetime but was reconstructed and published in 1980 from his manuscripts. It is a most hauntingly beautiful work of an intensely personal nature. Take him, earth, for cherishing was composed to commemorate the assassination of J F Kennedy. The text is an English translation of Prudentius's 4th-century poem, Hymnus circa Exsequias Defuncti. Again it shows the great strength of Howells's choral writing, with a clear outline and affecting yet unimposing harmonic twists. The Corydon Singers give marvellous performances and the sound is very fine.

Mass in G minor. Lord, thou hast been our refuge. Prayer to the Father of Heaven. O vos omnes. O clap your hands. O taste and see. O how amiable. The Christian Year. Come down, O Love divine
Thomas Fitches org
Elora Festival Singers / Noel Edison 🏅
Naxos 8 554826 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 2001 ●

This fine Canadian choir perform very beautifully in a style which seems natural and right. The Elora Festival Singers have more in common with King's College, Cambridge under Willcocks; relaxed and habituated, they offer the welcome loveliness of a choral tone where the blend and match of voices produce a sound that is eminently 'at unity with itself'. There is no shortage of good recordings of the Mass in G minor, the one that stands out as being open-eyed and adventurous in spirit being the version on Meridian by the Choir of New College, Oxford. They favour a sharper tone, a quicker tempo in the Credo and a brighter acoustic.

The choice between women's and boys' voices may prove the deciding factor when it comes to which version; here the Elora Singers' female voices seem to give this music precisely what is required. Yet more decisive in the business of choice may be the coupling. The two recordings by the college choirs couple music by other composers. The Canadians stay with Vaughan Williams, in a mood which assorts well with the Mass. Particularly apt is O vos omnes, also written for Sir Richard Terry and the Choir of Westminster Cathedral. The Skelton setting, Prayer to the Father of Heaven, from 1948 – a comparative rarity and sensitively performed – has a chill which is partly medieval, partly perhaps from the Antarctica of VW's Seventh Symphony. Down Ampney ('Come down, O Love divine') brings the warmth and cheer of a settled major tonality at the close.

A Cotswold Romance

A Cotswold Romance. Death of Tintagiles
Rosa Mannion sop Thomas Randle ten Matthew Brook bar London Philharmonic Choir; London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9646 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1997

A Cotswold Romance is a gift from Vaughan Williams to those who hold the music of Hugh the Drover in deep affection but who, under torture, would probably have to admit that the opera itself is less than perfect. Hugh, first produced in 1924, enjoyed sufficient immediate success for a set of records to be produced with the original cast. It then had to wait till 1979 for a complete recording on LP (reissued on EMI), and till 1994 for a new one on CD. The adaptation as a dramatic cantata came out in 1951, reducing the two-act opera to 10 numbers and rescoring some of the music to allow a (still) larger part for the chorus. The addition of wordless chorus is delightful, not least when the chorus sings the first part of Hugh's song of the road and re-enters with delicious harmonies at 'All the scented night'. Thomas Randle, who has the voice of a man of the road and a lover, is admirably cast. Rosa Mannion, with a slight hint of turning tremulous under pressure, is otherwise an ideal Mary, and the chorus is excellent. Hickox conducts with brio and with due feeling for the romance.

Death of Tintagiles comprises incidental music written for a play by Maeterlinck, performed without much success in 1913. In his interesting notes, Stephen Connock associates it with Riders to the Sea and the Sinfonia antartica; and it is true that there are sternly impressive moments, of menace and darkness. It hardly seems viable as an orchestral suite, but is never the less good to have on this disc.

On Wenlock Edge

On Wenlock Edge. Merciless Beauty. Two English Folksongs. Ten Blake Songs. Along the Field
John Mark Ainsley ten The Nash Ensemble
(Gareth Hulse ob Leo Phillips, Elizabeth Wexler vns Roger Chase va Paul Watkins vc Ian Brown pf)
Hyperion CDA67168 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1999 ●

The programme here has an identity of its own and as such is without competitors. Its 'theme' is to collect those of Vaughan Williams's songs which have something other than piano accompaniment. On Wenlock Edge (1909) is for voice, piano and string quartet, Merciless Beauty (1921) with string trio, Along the Field (1927) and Two English Folksongs (published 1935 but of earlier date) voice and violin, and the Blake songs (1957) with oboe. Eligible for inclusion might have been Four Hymns (1914) with piano and viola, and perhaps The Willow Whistle (1939) for voice and pipe. The Three Vocalises of 1958, with clarinet, are specifically for soprano, but show the composer's continuing taste for such combinations right into the last year of his life.

And there is a taste, a feel, to them. Whereas a piano accompanies almost in the literal sense of keeping the voice company, supporting it, the solo violin or oboe isolates it. The absence of chordal comforts disquiets; this is particularly so in the Blake settings and the Housman of Along the Field: these are not comfortable poems, and the strange fusion of interdependence and alienation between voice and instrument is entirely apt. All are memorable and deeply affecting compositions, and the disc makes a valuable contribution simply by associating them.

It also does much more, for the performances come very close to the heart's desire. John Mark Ainsley sings with the right sense of a civilised personal utterance, refined and restrained, yet capable of full-bodied tone and a ringing forte when needed: the cry 'O noisy bells, be dumb' is as emotional as an operatic climax and all the more effective for the exceptional frankness of its release.

It seems that he has rarely done better on record; these are highly demanding pieces, the voice unremittingly exposed, and he brings to them a fine poise, in breathing, phrasing, expression and the even emission of quite beautiful tone.

He has also the considerable advantage of exceptional players to work with. Individually admirable, they combine in On Wenlock Edge to give an unusually imaginative performance.

Songs of Travel

Vaughan Williams Songs of Travel Butterworth Bredon Hill and other songs. A Shropshire Lad
Finzi Let us garlands bring, Op 18 Ireland Sea Fever. The Vagabond. The Bells of San Marie
Bryn Terfel bass-bar Malcolm Martineau pf
DG 445 946-2GH (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1995 ●●

There is a touch of genius about Bryn Terfel. To those who have known most of these songs since childhood and heard them well performed innumerable times, it will come not quite as a revelation but more as the fulfilment of a deeply felt wish, instinctive rather than consciously formed. As in all the best Lieder singing, everything is specific: 'Fly away, breath' we recite, thinking nothing of it, but with this singer it is visual – we see it in flight, just as in Sea Fever we know in the very tiniest of gaps that in that second he has heard 'the seagulls crying'. As in all the best singing of songs, whatever the nationality, there is strong, vivid communication: he will sometimes sing so softly that if he had secured anything less than total involvement he would lose us. There is breadth of phrase, variety of tone, alertness of rhythm, all the musical virtues are there; and yet that seems to go only a little way towards accounting for what is special.

One after another, these songs are brought to a full life. There is a boldness about Terfel's art that could be perilous, but which, as exercised here, is marvellously well guided by musicianship, intelligence and the genuine flash of inspiration. Malcolm Martineau's playing is also a delight: his touch, in its way, is as sure and illuminating as the singer's.

Vaughan Williams Songs of Travel[a]. On Wenlock Edge[a] Butterworth Love blows as the wind blows[b]
Elgar Pleading, Op 48 No 1[b]. Song Cycle, Op 59[b]. Two Songs, Op 60[b]
Robert Tear ten Thomas Allen bar City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / [a]Sir Simon Rattle, [b]Vernon Handley
EMI British Composers 764731-2 🏵
(69 minutes: DDD/ADD). Texts included Ⓑ
Recorded 1979-83 ●

Neither of Vaughan Williams's song cycles was originally written with orchestral accompaniment. On Wenlock Edge was scored for accompaniment of piano and string quartet, while the Songs of Travel were written with piano. Both lose a little when sung with orchestra but the gain seems to considerably outweigh any loss, especially when three such superb artists are involved. Tear's singing is notable for some wonderfully long phrases (as also is Allen's in the other cycle) together with the other Tear qualities, of clarity of words and such matters. The CBSO plays especially well for Rattle – all in all, superb performances that do real justice to Vaughan Williams's imagination, his care for words and his orchestration. The Tear/Handley Elgar and Butterworth items are rarities and were all première recordings. Throughout, Tear sings with sensitivity and the CBSO under Handley gives irreproachably alert imaginative support. The recording is vivid and well balanced.

Serenade to Music

Serenade to Music[cd]. The Poisoned Kiss Overture. Old King Cole[cd]. Five Mystical Songs[ad]. Prelude on an Old Carol Tune. The Running Set. 49th Parallel – Prelude. Sea Songs. The Lark Ascending[c]. Two Hymn-Tune Preludes. Oboe Concerto in A minor[b]. Fantasia on 'Greensleeves'. Preludes on Welsh Hymn-Tunes – No 2, Rhosymedre; No 3, Hyfrydol (orch Foster). Violin Concerto in D minor, 'Concerto accademico'[c] Five Variants of 'Dives and Lazarus'
[a]Stephen Roberts bar [b]Roger Winfield ob [c]Bradley Creswick vn [d]Northern Sinfonia Chorus; Northern Sinfonia / Richard Hickox 🏅
EMI British Composers ② 573986-2 Ⓑ
(157 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1983, 1984 and 1987 ●●

This release comprises the contents of nearly three exemplary VW collections from the 1980s (the only casualty being a fine Flos campi – a work that Hickox has anyway since re-recorded with violist Philip Dukes and these same Tyneside forces on Chandos). Outstanding items include swaggeringly affectionate performances of the lovely 1929 overture to The Poisoned Kiss and that delightful 1923 ballet Old King Cole (the latter featuring a splendidly lusty contribution from the Sinfonia Chorus). Hickox also directs a most sensitive account of the glorious Five Mystical Songs (though baritone Stephen Roberts's timbre lacks something in bloom). Bradley Creswick surpasses himself in the Violin Concerto and The Lark Ascending (irreproachably poised and sensitive realisations, both), and if Roger Winfield isn't quite as agile or quick-witted a protagonist of the Oboe Concerto as some of his rivals, his is a supremely touching presence all the same, and Hickox's typically warm-hearted, pliant accompaniment strikes one as quite masterly. Even old chestnuts like the Fantasia on 'Greensleeves' and Five Variants of 'Dives and Lazarus' come up as fresh as the day they were created, and there's also an agreeable clutch of relatively unfamiliar offerings to enjoy, not least the stirring prelude to the 1941 film 49th Parallel and those two generously sung Hymn-Tune Preludes (listen to 'Hyfrydol' for a pungent example of VW's penetrating modality). All in all, cracking value for money.

Serenade to Music. Flos campi. Five mystical songs[a]. Fantasia on Christmas carols[a]
Elizabeth Connell, Linda Kitchen, Anne Dawson, Amanda Roocroft sops Sarah Walker, Jean Rigby, Diana Montague mezzos Catherine Wyn-Rogers contr John Mark Ainsley, Martyn Hill, Arthur Davies, Maldwyn Davies tens [a]Thomas Allen, Alan Opie bars Gwynne Howell, John Connell basses Nobuko Imai va Corydon Singers; English Chamber Orchestra / Matthew Best
Hyperion CDA66420 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1990 ●

In 1938 Sir Henry Wood celebrated his 50 years as a professional conductor with a concert. Vaughan Williams composed a work for the occasion, the Serenade to Music, in which he set words by Shakespeare from Act 5 of The Merchant of Venice. Sixteen star vocalists of the age were gathered together for the performance and Vaughan Williams custo-mised the vocal parts to show off the best qualities of the singers. The work turned out to be one of the composer's most sybaritic creations, turning each of its subsequent performances into aspecial event. Hyperion has gathered stars of our own age for this outstanding issue and Best has perceptively managed to give each their head whilst melding them into a cohesive ensemble. A mellow, spacious recording has allowed the work to emerge on disc with a veracity never achieved before.

The coupled vocal pieces are given to equal effect and the disc is completed by Nobuko Imai's tautly poignant account of Flos campi, in which the disturbing tension between solo viola and wordless chorus heighten the work's crypticism.

Additional recommendations
Serenade to Music
Coupling: The Wasps Overture. Symphony No 2. Fantasia on 'Greensleeves'
Sols inc Baillie, Suddaby sops Nash ten Henderson bar BBC Symphony Orchestra; Queen's Hall Orchestra / Wood
Dutton Laboratories CDAX8004 (63 minutes: ADD: 10/93) Ⓜ

This performance with the 16 original soloists possesses a very special beauty and atmosphere.

Couplings: English Folk Song Suite. Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis. Fantasia on 'Greensleeves'. The Lark Ascending. Wasps (excerpts)
Sols inc Burrowes sop Partridge ten Noble bass London Philharmonic Orch / Boult; various artists
HMV5 72162-2 (66 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ

A well-matched group of soloists, with a passionate commitment in the climaxes unmatched since Wood.

Five Tudor Portraits

Five Tudor Portraits
Five Variants of 'Dives and Lazarus'
Jean Rigby mez John Shirley-Quirk bar London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9593 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text included. Recorded 1997 ●

First heard at the 1936 Norwich Festival, Vaughan Williams's Five Tudor Portraits find the composer at his most dazzlingly inventive, the resourceful and witty writing fitting Skelton's words like a glove. Moreover, an irresistible humanity illuminates the most ambitious of the settings, 'Jane Scroop (Her Lament for Philip Sparrow)', which contains music as compassionate as Vaughan Williams ever conceived. It is a life-enhancing creation and well deserving of this first-rate recording. Aided by disciplined orchestral support, the London Symphony Chorus launches itself in lusty fashion into the ale-soaked narrative of 'The Tunning of Elinor Rumming', though the resonant acoustic rather precludes ideal clarity of diction. Hickox is exuberant in this sparkling tableau, while Jean Rigby's characterful contribution should raise a smile. John Shirley-Quirk's is a touching presence in 'My Pretty Bess', and the mordant, black humour of 'Epitaph of John Jayberd of Diss' is effectively captured. Jane Scroop's lament in the fourth (and surely best) movement finds these fine artists at their most perceptive. How ravishingly Hickox moulds his strings in the hushed passage following 'It was proper and prest!' where the music movingly anticipates the poignancy of the closing section. Listen out, too, for the wealth of exquisitely observed woodwind detail in the enchanting funeral processional. The concluding 'Jolly Rutterkin' goes with a swing, though Shirley-Quirk is a mite unsteady at the top of his range.

The coupling is a heart-warming Dives and Lazarus, with the LSO strings producing their most lustrous tone.

The Pilgrim's Progress

Gerald Finley bar Pilgrim; Peter Coleman-Wright bar John Bunyan; Jeremy White bass Evangelist, Envy, Third Shepherd; Donaldson Bell bar Pontius Pilate; Gidon Saks bass Apollyon, Lord Hate-Good, Mistrust; Richard Coxon ten Pliable, Mister By-Ends; Francis Egerton ten Timorous, Usher; Roderick Williams bar Obstinate, Watchful, First Shepherd; Adrian Thompson ten Lord Lechery, Celestial Messenger; Rebecca Evans sop Madam Wanton, Shining One; Pamela Helen Stephen mez Madam Bubble, Shining One, Heavenly Being II; Anne-Marie Owens mez Madam By-Ends, Pickthank; Christopher Keyte bass Simon Magus; John Kerr bass Judas Iscariot; Susan Gritton sop Malice, Bird, Shining One, Heavenly Being I; Neil Gillespie ten Worldly Glory; Jonathan Fisher bar Demas; Mark Padmore ten Interpreter, Superstition, Second Shepherd; Robert Hayward bar Herald; Mica Penniman sop Woodcutter's Boy; Chorus and Orchestra of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden / Richard Hickox
Chandos ② CHAN9625 (130 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1997 ●

It is a matter of choosing here between Hickox's excellent version and the classic Boult (reviewed below). Both have strong soloists, though voice for voice Boult fares better than Hickox, though with an exception that is crucial. John Noble was a fine Pilgrim on the earlier recording, but Gerald Finley brings not only a voice that is as good and well suited but also a dramatic quality that is more colourful and intense. But Boult's cast is very strong, with several of the short parts, such as the Herald (Terence Sharpe) better sung than as here (Robert Hayward). In the Valley of Humiliation the voice of Apollyon comes as an amplified sound from off-stage, but on record the trick is to catch an overpowering terror, and this they manage better on EMI, partly by virtue of having Robert Lloyd to strike it, and also by the producer's decision to bring it closer. Nor, in the comparison, is there any sense of a confrontation of 'bright young feller' and 'grand old fuddy-duddy'. Boult does not sound like an old man, any more than Hickox sounds like a youngster. The Boult recording, finely remastered, is a strong survivor. Hickox has a bigger canvas for the recorded sound, and achieves a clearer texture. The newer version also has Gerald Finley, and is a fine performance anyway.

The Pilgrim's Progress
John Noble bar Pilgrim; Raimund Herincx bass John Bunyan, Lord Hate-Good; John Carol Case bar Evangelist; Wynford Evans ten Pliable; Christopher Keyte bass Obstinate, Judas Escariot, Pontius Pilate; Geoffrey Shaw bass Mistrust, Demas; Bernard Dickerson ten Timorous, Usher; Sheila Armstrong sop Shining One 1; Marie Hayward Segal sop Shining One 2, Madam Wanton; Gloria Jennings mez Shining One 3, Madam By-Ends; Ian Partridge ten Interpreter, Superstition; John Shirley-Quirk bar Watchful; Terence Sharpe bar Herald; Robert Lloyd bass Apollyon; Norma Burrowes sop Branchbearer, Malice; Alfreda Hodgson contr Cupbearer, Pickthank; Joseph Ward bar Lord Lechery; Richard Angas bass Simon Magus, Envy; John Elwes ten Worldly Glory; Delia Wallis mez Madam Bubble; Wendy Eathorne sop Woodcutter's Boy; Gerald English ten Mister By-Ends; London Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Sir Adrian Boult– 🏅
EMI British Composers ② 764212-2
(153 mintues: ADD). Notes and texts included Ⓑ
Recorded 1970-71 ●

When this glowing performance of one of Vaughan Williams's most raptly beautiful works first appeared in 1972 as a centenary offering to the composer, it was hoped that the record would lead to more stage performances on both sides of the Atlantic. That hope, alas, was not fulfilled. That Vaughan Williams drew from a whole series of Bunyan inspirations over 30 years has made for meatiness of material and little or no inconsistency of style. 'They won't like it,' predicted the composer after the first performance at Covent Garden. 'They don't want an opera with no heroine and no love duets – and I don't care. It's what I meant, and there it is.' Though he described the work as a 'morality', he was aggressively concerned that it should be treated as an opera, not as an oratorio. One can see what he meant. He wanted the work's strength and cohesion brought out, not just its piety, but in truth precious little is lost from not having it staged, and the format of recording might well be counted as ideal, allowing the listener to picture his own staging.

Sir Adrian's portrait, marvellously characterful, stands as one of the very finest of his many records of Vaughan Williams's music, beautifully paced and textured with the fascinating references to the symphonies – not just No 5 which took material from the previously written Act 1 but (at least by implication) Nos 3, 4 and 7 as well, not to mention the Serenade to Music. In every way Vaughan Williams's Bunyan inspirations permeated his music, and this opera stands as their centre-point. John Noble, who as a very young singer scored a great success in the 1954 Cambridge production, may not have the richest or most characterful baritone, but his dedication and understanding make for compelling results. Outstanding among the others are such singers as Sheila Armstrong, Ian Partridge, Norma Burrowes and John Shirley-Quirk. The chorus sings with fervour, and the sound – using the always helpful London Kingsway Hall – remains first-rate.

Riders to the Sea

Riders to the Sea[a]
Norma Burrowes sop Nora; Dame Margaret Price sop Cathleen; Helen Watts contr Maurya; Benjamin Luxon bar Bartley; Pauline Stevens mez Woman Ambrosian Singers; Orchestra Nova of London / Meredith Davies

Epithalamion[b]
Stephen Roberts bar Jonathan Snowden fl Howard Shelley pf Bach Choir; London Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir David Willcocks

Merciless Beauty[b]
Philip Langridge ten members of the Endellion Quartet (Andrew Watkinson, James Clark vns David Waterman vc)
EMI British Composers 764730-2 – ✿
(75 minutes: ADD/DDD). Texts included Ⓑ
Recorded [a]1970 and [b]1986 ◉

Vaughan Williams completed his masterly setting of J M Synge's one-act drama, Riders to the Sea, in 1932. Although it has enjoyed the occasional revival, it remains one of the least-known and most under-appreciated of VW's major works. Indeed, with scoring that is both economical and intensely evocative, it can be a gripping experience, especially when presented as sympathetically as here. The cast is uniformly strong, and Meredith Davies inspires everyone to give of their very best. The 1970 sound has come up superbly, creating a rather more vivid impression, in fact, than its modern partners from 1986. These are also both considerable rarities. Epithalamion is a large-scale cantata from 1957 based on Edmund Spenser's love-poem of the same name: musically, it draws extensively on material used in VW's 1938 masque, The Bridal Day, and its emotional centrepiece, 'The Lover's Song', boasts a viola solo of exquisite beauty. Finally, there is Merciless Beauty, three pithy Chaucer settings for tenor and string trio from 1921. Performances are all one could wish.

Additional recommendation
Riders to the Sea
Couplings: Household Music. Flos Campi
Attrot, Dawson sops Finnie, Stephen mezs Daymond bar Dukes va Northern Sinfonia and Chorus / Hickox
Chandos CHAN9392 (79 minutes: DDD: 11/95) Ⓕ
Less congested, freer orchestral texture than the above recording offers, capturing a feeling of timelessness.

Sir John in Love

Adrian Thompson ten Shallow/Dr Caius; Stephan Loges bar Shallow/Host; Stephen Varcoe bass Sir Hugh Evans; Daniel Norman ten Slender; Henry Moss ten Peter Simple; Roderick Williams bar Page; Donald Maxwell bar Sir John Falstaff; John Bowen ten Bardolph; Richard Lloyd-Morgan bass Nym; Brian Bannatyne-Scott bass Pistol; Susan Gritton sop Anne Page; Laura Claycomb sop Mrs Page; Sarah Connolly mez Mrs Ford; Mark Padmore ten Fenton; Mark Richardson bass Rugby; Anne-Marie Owens mez Mrs Quickly; Matthew Best bass Ford; The Sinfonia Chorus; Northern Sinfonia / Richard Hickox
Chandos ② CHAN9928 (137 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included
Recorded in 2001

There is no lack of glorious melody in Sir John in Love, and not just folksong cunningly interwoven. Musically, what comes over strongly, more richly than ever before in this magnificent new recording from Richard Hickox, is the way that the writing anticipates later Vaughan Williams, not just the radiant composer of the Fifth Symphony and Serenade to Music, with key-changes of heart-stopping beauty, but the composer's darker side, with sharply rhythmic writing.

The work's title, Sir John in Love, points to Vaughan Williams's different approach to the central character. With him Shakespeare's fat knight is not just comic but a believable lover, more genial and expansive than in Boito's portrait, yet hardly a noble figure such as Elgar portrayed in his big symphonic study. Donald Maxwell makes a splendid Falstaff, relishing the comedy without making it a caricature. Above all, his full, dark voice is satisfyingly fat-sounding. On the only previous recording, the vintage EMI set of 1974, Raimund Herincx gave a finely detailed performance, but lacked that important fat-sounding quality. The 1974 set certainly stands the test of time remarkably well, but the extra fullness and richness of the Chandos sound coupled with as keen a concern for the atmospheric beauties of the score, notably in offstage effects, gives the new set an obvious advantage. Interpretatively, Hickox is just as incisive as Meredith Davies on EMI in bringing out the sharper side of the score, though he is more warmly expressive, a degree more affectionate in drawing out the glowing lyricism.

Chandos's casting is satisfyingly consistent, with no weak link. Matthew Best may be rather gruff at times as Ford, but that is very much in character when, if anything, he is more venomous here than in Verdi, until at the start of Act 3 Vaughan Williams allows a wonderful duet of reconciliation with Mrs Ford, 'Pardon me, wife'. As Ursula Vaughan Williams has reported, her husband wrote Sir John in Love 'entirely for his own enjoyment', because he was in love with the subject. And from first to last this new set reflects that.

Giuseppe Verdi

Italian 1813-1901

GROVE Born into a family of small landowners and taverners, at 12 Verdi was studying with the local church organist at the main church in nearby Busseto, whose assistant he became in 1829. In 1832 he was sent to Milan, but was refused a place at the conservatory and studied with Vincenzo Lavigna, composer and former La Scala musician. He returned to Busseto, where he was passed over as maestro di cappella but became town music master in 1836 and married Margherita Barezzi, his patron's daughter (their two children died in infancy).

Verdi had begun an opera, and tried to arrange a performance in Parma or Milan; he was unsuccessful but had some songs published and decided to settle in Milan in 1839, where his Oberto was accepted at La Scala and further operas commissioned. It was well received but his next, Un giorno di regno, failed totally; and his wife died during its composition. Verdi nearly gave up, but was fired by the libretto of Nabucco and in 1842 saw its successful production, which carried his reputation across Italy, Europe and the New World over the next five years. It was followed by another opera also with marked political overtones, I lombardi alla prima crociata, again well received. Verdi's gift for stirring melody and tragic and heroic situations struck a chord in an Italy struggling for freedom and unity, causes with which he was sympathetic; but much opera of this period has political themes and the involvement of Verdi's operas in politics is easily exaggerated.

The period Verdi later called his 'years in the galleys' now began, with a long and demanding series of operas to compose and (usually) direct, in the main Italian centres and abroad: they include Ernani, Macbeth, Luisa Miller and eight others in 1844-50, in Paris and London as well as Rome, Milan, Naples, Venice, Florence and Trieste (with a pause in 1846 when his health gave way). Features of these works include strong, sombre stories, a vigorous, almost crude orchestral style that gradually grew fuller and richer forceful vocal writing including broad lines in 9/8 and 12/8 metre and above all a seriousness in his determination to convey the full force of the drama. His models included late Rossini, Mercadante and Donizetti. He took great care over the choice of topics and about the detailed planning of his librettos. He established his basic vocal types early, in Ernani: the vigorous, determined baritone, the ardent, courageous but sometimes despairing tenor, the severe bass; among the women there is more variation.

The 'galley years' have their climax in the three great, popular operas of 1851-53. Rigoletto, produced in Venice (after trouble with the censors, a recurring theme in Verdi), was a huge success, as its richly varied and unprecedentedly dramatic music amply justifies. No less successful, in Rome, was the more direct Il trovatore, at the beginning of 1853; but six weeks later La traviata, the most personal and intimate of Verdi's operas, was a failure in Venice – though with some revisions it was favourably received in 1854 at a different Venetian theatre. With the dark drama of the one, the heroics of the second and the grace and pathos of the third, Verdi had shown how extraordinarily wide was his expressive range. Later in 1853 he went – with Giuseppina Strepponi, the soprano with whom he had been living for several years, and whom he married in 1859 – to Paris, to prepare Les vêpres siciliennes for the Opéra, where it was given in 1855 with modest success. Verdi remained there for a time to defend his rights in face of the piracies of the Théâtre des Italiens and to deal with translations of some of his operas. The next new one was the sombre Simon Boccanegra, a drama about love and politics in medieval Genoa, given in Venice. Plans for Un ballo in maschera, about the assassination of a Swedish king, in Naples were called off because of the censors and it was given instead in Rome (1859). Verdi was involved himself in political activity at this time, as representative of Busseto (where he lived) in the provincial parliament; later, pressed by Cavour, he was elected to the national parliament, and ultimately he was a senator. In 1862 La forza del destino had its première at St Petersburg. A revised Macbeth was given in Paris in 1865, but his most important work for the French capital was Don Carlos, a grand opera after Schiller in which personal dramas of love, comradeship and liberty are set against the persecutions of the Inquisition and the Spanish monarchy. It was given in 1867 and several times revised for Italian revivals. Verdi returned to Italy, to live at Genoa. In 1870 he began work on Aida, given at Cairo Opera House at the end of 1871 to mark the opening of the Suez Canal: again in the grand opera tradition, and more taut in structure than Don Carlos. Verdi was ready to give up opera; his works of 1873 are a string quartet and the vivid, appealing Requiem in honour of the poet Manzoni, given in 1874-75, in Milan, Paris, London and Vienna. In 1879 composer-poet Boito and publisher Ricordi prevailed upon Verdi to write another opera, Otello; Verdi, working slowly and much occupied with revisions of earlier operas, completed it only in 1886. This, his most powerful tragic work, a study in evil and jealousy, had its première in Milan in 1887; it is notable for the increasing richness of allusive detail in the orchestral writing and the approach to a more continuous musical texture, though Verdi, with his faith in the expressive force of the human voice, did not abandon the 'set piece' (aria, duet etc) even if he integrated it more fully into its context – above all in his last opera. This was another Shakespeare work, Falstaff, on which he embarked two years later – his first comedy since the beginning of his career, with a score whose wit and lightness betray the hand of a serene master, was given in 1893. His final work was a set of Quattro pezzi sacri (although he was a non-believer). He spent his last years in Milan, rich, authoritarian but charitable, much visited, revered and honoured. For his funeral 28,000 people lined the streets.

Overtures and Preludes

Overtures and Preludes – Oberto; Un giorno di regno; Nabucco; Ernani; Giovanna d 'Arco; Alzira; Attila; I masnadieri; Macbeth; Il corsaro; La battaglia di Legnano; Luisa Miller; Rigoletto; La traviata; I vespri siciliani; Un ballo in maschera; La forza del destino; Aida Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra /Herbert von Karajan
DG @453 058-2GTA2 (113 minutes:ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1975 ●

Karajan was one of the most adaptable and sensitive of dramatic conductors. His repertoire in the theatre is extraordinarily wide, and he is at home equally in Verdi, Wagner, Richard Strauss and Puccini. In this celebrated 1975 collection of all of Verdi's overtures, he gives us some fine insights into the composer's skill as an orchestrator, dramatist and poet. Though Karajan had only recorded Aida complete his dramatic instincts bring some fine performances of the lesser-known preludes. The earliest, Nabucco from 1842 (the collection is arranged chronologically), already shows a mastercraftsman at work, with a slow introduction promising much. La traviata shows a quite different skill – the delicate creation of a sensitive poet working in filigree. The final four preludes are great works fully worthy of this individual presentation. Even the lesser-known preludes are enhanced by Karajan's dramatic instincts. Good recordings, though less than outstanding.

Overtures and Preludes – Oberto; Nabucco; Giovanna d 'Arco; Alzira; La battaglia di Legnano; Attila; I masnadieri; Il corsaro; Un giorno di regno; Ernani; I due Foscari; Macbeth. Ballet Music – Macbeth
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Edward Downes
Chandos CHAN9510 (76 minutes:DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

These performances from an experienced British operatic stalwart have dignity (witness the brass in Nabucco), panache and splendidly colourful orchestral playing, including real string virtuosity, using the widest dynamic range. The crescendo at the opening of Giovanna d 'Arco is most compelling. Some of the shorter preludes are full of atmosphere. The brief Macbeth Prelude is particularly potent, and the ballet music is both dramatic and rumbustious while I masnadieri closes with a swooning cello solo. La battaglia di Legnano, which ends the programme, has plenty of full-blooded brass at the opening and close. The recording is spectacular.

Messa da Requiem

Verdi Messa da Requiem$_{b}$. Overture 'I vespri siciliani'$_{c}$ Schubert Mass No 6 in E flat, D950$_{a}$ ^{a}Anne Pashley, ^{b}Amy Shuard sops ^{a}Sybil Michelow, ^{b}Anna Reynolds mezzos ^{a}David Hughes, ^{b}Richard Lewis, ^{a}Duncan Robertson tens ^{a}William McCue, ^{b}David Ward basses ^{a}Scottish Festival Chorus, ^{a}New Philharmonia Orchestra; Philharmonia ^{b}Chorus and ^{bc}Orchestra / Carlo Maria Giulini
BBC Legends/IMG Artists BBCL4029-2 Ⓜ
(153 minutes:ADD)
Recorded live ^{bc}1963 and ^{a}1968 ●●●

In Great Britain in the 1960s, the art of large-scale choral singing reached what was arguably its apogee with the work of the two choruses featured here: the Philharmonia Chorus, directed by Wilhelm Pitz, and the Edinburgh Festival Chorus, directed by Arthur Oldham. Even allowing for the fact that this Prom performance of the Verdi Requiem was given around the time of an intensive period of rehearsal during which the EMI studio recording was also being made, the Philharmonia Chorus's singing is stunningly good: first-rate diction, impeccable intonation, fine dynamic control and absolute involvement in the music as Giulini relays it to them.

In the Schubert Mass the Edinburgh Festival Chorus acquits itself magnificently. Giulini's reading is powerful and reverential, one in which the chorus comes to speak with the single voice of an individual believer.

The Verdi is superbly recorded. The unnamed BBC team working live in the Royal Albert Hall produce sound that is focused yet open, clear but warm. Giulini's reading of the Requiem, thrilling yet humane, is precisely the one we hear on EMI's recording, with the Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra as expert live as they are on record (the orchestral playing is well-nigh flawless). Of the solo singers, the youngest, Anna Reynolds, could have gone straight into the EMI recording, so well does she sing. Richard Lewis, nearing the end of his career, is less gorgeous of voice than EMI 's Nicolai Gedda, but the bass, David Ward, here at the height of his powers, is more than a match for the younger Nicolai Ghiaurov. As for Amy Shuard and EMI's Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, they are complementary. Shuard is technically fine; very much the real thing dramatically and absolutely right for the live performance. In short, this is an indispensable set.

Messa da Requiem
Angela Gheorghiu sop Daniela Barcellona mez
Roberto Alagna ten Julian Konstantinov bass Eric Ericson Chamber Choir; Swedish Radio Chorus; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
EMI ② 557168-2 (84 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 2001. Also available on DVD ●

EMI was quite right to be on hand to record this performance in Berlin at a time when Abbado had arisen from his sick-bed to show just how much this work meant to him in the circumstances. It is conveyed in spades through the tremendous concentration and emotional thrust felt throughout this shattering interpretation. This performance has something extra that you find in Fricsay's live, 1960 account, and both come close to the spiritual element in the music. Abbado has at his bidding a superb group of specialist choirs who combine effortlessly into a cohesive whole, singing with commendable breadth, accuracy and involvement, few if any better on disc. They find fit counterparts in the players of Abbado's Berlin Philharmonic who seem individually, in solos, and collectively intent on giving of their appreciable best for their chief. So all the big choral moments, Dies Irae, Rex tremendae, Sanctus, Libera me fugue are superbly achieved. EMI's recording is wide-ranging and immediate, the equal of any the work has yet received.

If the solo singing cannot be given such an unqualified encomium, much of it is impressive, especially that of the young mezzo Daniela Barcellona, even in tone and beseeching in manner. Gheorghiu does so much so well: she sings throughout in that rich, warm tone of hers and offers many long, arching phrases. She is also as dramatic as one could wish in the Libera me, but she doesn't really do the ethereal moments as well as many of her predecessors. Alagna has his uneven moments and cannot compare with Pavarotti on Muti's version (reviewed below) for sheer effulgence, but he sings with a deal of passion and authority. The disappointment here is with the youthful Bulgarian bass Julian Konstantinov, whose singing is lamed by several untidy moments and by ill-tuned pitching.

In terms of fidelity to Verdi, Toscanini, Serafin, Giulini (in the BBC Legends version), Muti (though the live EMI recording at La Scala is not so successful as this one in Berlin) and Gardiner, in his individually authentic way, are indispensable, but the new Abbado, given its superlative sound and special circumstances, is an important addition to the work's discography.

Messa da Requiem
Cheryl Studer sop; Dolora Zajick mez; Luciano Pavarotti ten; Samuel Ramey bass Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Riccardo Muti
EMI digital ② 749390-2 (88 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included
Recorded live in 1987 ●

Muti's tempos, both in his 1979 EMI version and here, are substantially faster (Sanctus) or slower (opening Kyrie, 'Rex tremendae', 'Lacrymosa') than Verdi indicates and permits far more rallentandos than are marked. Nobody wants slavish adherence to what may be accounted only as suggestions on the composer's part, but Muti does sometimes lose the overall view of a movement by overplaying his hand as an interpreter. That is the main criticism of a performance that is certainly positive in terms of its dramatic strength, deriving from Muti's close rapport with his Scala forces.

Here he has a very different chorus from the much smaller professional British group on his earlier set (on EMI Double Forte). That has advantages and disadvantages. The sound here is grander, more specifically operatic in scale as one would expect, with some arrestingly histrionic effects such as the bold, black-browed singing at 'Rex tremendae' and the awed senza misura incantation at the start of the 'Libera me'. But there is not quite the bright, incisive quality found on the former recording.

The performance starts hesitantly, particularly where the soloists are concerned. Cheryl Studer initially seems a shade tentative and over-awed, but as the evening develops she confirms what a fine lirico-spinto soprano she is. The final phrase of the 'Offertorio' is perfectly accomplished and the whole of the 'Libera me' is delivered with strong, firm tone and a deal of passion. Her slightly resinous tone blends very well with Zajick 's in the 'Recordare' and the Agnus Dei, one of the set 's most successful movements. On her own Zajick also improves from an anonymous start to reach heights of eloquence at the start of the 'Lux aeterna'. The dark grain of her chest register contrasts with a degree of brilliance at the top.

Many will probably buy the recording for Pavarotti. He is in his best, most persuasive form, more individual and subtle in utterance than for Solti (Decca), even if the voice has lost a little of its old opulence. He is also more considerate of his colleagues in the unaccompanied passages, which here are as carefully blended as on any recording, much helped by Ramey's solid bottom line. Ramey trumps even Pavarotti at 'Hostias' in the 'Domine Jesu', his dolcissimo singing here full of inward feeling. 'Oro supplex', taken up to Verdi's tempo rather than being dragged as it can be by heavier basses, is firmly and securely phrased. Others have sung the bass part with more character, few – except Pinza – with such security and musicality.

The recording is rather recessed with the character of the soloists' voices hard to discern. However, where the chorus and orchestra are concerned, the new Muti certainly achieves a theatrical perspective, catching the atmosphere of La Scala, and the choral recording obviously has a bigger range than on his old set.

Messa da Requiem[a]. Quattro pezzi sacri[b] Ⓟ
[a]Luba Orgonášová, [b]Donna Brown sops Anne Sofie von Otter mez Luca Canonici ten
Alastair Miles bass Monteverdi Choir; Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique /

Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Philips ② 442 142-2PH2 (120 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded 1992 ●

Gardiner's Verdi Requiem is in a class of its own. His are readings that combine a positive view and interpretative integrity from start to finish, something possible only in the context of the superb professionalism of the (augmented) Monteverdi Choir, which sings with a burnished and steady tone throughout and suggests, rightly, a corporate act of worship. Its contribution is beyond praise.

He might also have been surprised and delighted to ear the soloists' contribution sung with such precision by such a finely integrated quartet, who perform the important unaccompanied passages with special grace and sensitivity. Instead of the usual jostle of vibratos, here the four voices are firm and true. Individually they are also distinguished. Pride of place must go to Orgonášová who gives the performance of her life. The exactly placed high B in the 'Quid sum miser 'section of the 'Dies irae', the perfect blending with von Otter at 'Dominum', the whole of the Andante section of the 'Libera me', sung with ethereal tone and a long breath, make the heart stop in amazement.

In 'Oro supplex' Gardiner follows Verdi's tempo marking. More often he follows tradition, with slower speeds than those suggested, and he allows more licence than the score, or conductors like Toscanini. But as his liberties all seem so convincing in the context of the whole,. who should complain? In the Pezzi sacri, Gardiner gives the most thrilling account yet to appear.

The recording, made in Westminster Cathedral, has a huge range which may cause problems in confined spaces. You are liable to be overwhelmed, for instance, by the 'Dies irae'.

Messa da Requiem. Quattro pezzi sacri
Elena Filipova sop Gloria Scalchi mez César Hernández ten Carlo Colombara bass Hungarian State Opera Choir and Orchestra / Pier Giorgio Morandi
Naxos @ 8 550944/5 (126 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 ●

Morandi brings to his interpretation a youthful, Italian energy and generosity of expression. Given a judicious choice of young soloists, all up to their exigent tasks, an excellent chorus (a shattering 'Dies irae', an alert, not too drilled Sanctus, a disciplined 'Libera me' fugue) and a well-fashioned recording, this set makes a compelling case for recommendation as an alternative to Gardiner's period-performance set. Try track 7, the 'Rex tremendae', where you can hear how Morandi builds a movement unerringly to an appropriately tremendous climax.

The soloists show how involved they are in the work, form a good ensemble and individually exhibit the intelligence to sing quietly as needed. Filipova and Scalchi combine into a rich-toned duo in 'Liber scriptus', spoilt a little by moments of indeterminate pitch from the soprano. Hernández, with his warm, baritonal, Spanish-style tenor, sings a sensitive 'Ingemisco' (a touch of insecurity at the start excepted), succeeded by Colombara's truly magisterial conjuring of the flames of hell at 'Confutatis maledictis'. Filipova's floated entry at 'huic ergo' in the succeeding trio and the sheer intensity of the whole 'Lacrymosa' bring the 'Dies irae' to a fitting close.

The rest of the work's performance is on an equivalent level of achievement, Morandi always judging speeds to a nicety. The fill-up to this large-scale reading is a fine performance of the Quattro pezzi sacri .

Additional recommendations
Messa da Requiem
Caniglia sop Stignani mez Gigli ten Pinza bass 🄷
Rome Opera Chorus and Orchestra /Serafin
EMI Références mono 567486-2 Ⓜ
(72 minutes: ADD: 5/90R). Text and translation included. This set is also available on Naxos Historical Ⓢ 8110159

Serafin's 1939 Requiem recording is something of a classic, with Ebe Stignani and Ezio Pinza ideal for their parts and Maria Caniglia and Beniamino Gigli almost as good. Note, there are small cuts.

Messa da Requiem[a] 🄷
Couplings: Te Deum[b] . Aida –Sinfonia[c] . La forza del destino – Sinfonia[d]. Luisa Miller – Sinfonia[e] .
La traviata – Preludes: Act I and II[f]. I vespri siciliani – Sinfonia[g]
[a]Tebaldi sop [a]Elmo mez [a]Prandelli ten [a]Siepi bass [b]Westminster Choir; [a]Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan; [bcdefg]NBC Symphony Orchestra / Toscanini
Istituto Discografico Italiano mono ② IDIS345/46 Ⓜ
(135 minutes:ADD: recorded 1940-43, 1945 and live in 1950) ●

The huge plus of this set is the young Tebaldi in radiant voice; not many soloists have come so close to fulfilling all this work demands. All the other soloists are good if not outstanding; the chorus is perhaps a shade unruly, but Toscanini himself seems at his best, combining dramatic force with lyrical warmth.

Messa solenne in E flat

Messa solenne in E flat. Qui tollis in F. Tantum ergo in F. Tantum ergo in G. Laudate pueri in D. Pater noster in G. Ave Maria in D. Messa per Rossini – Libera me
Elisabetta Scano, Cristina Gallardo-Domâs sops Sonia Prina mez Juan Diego Flórez, Kenneth Tarver tens Eldar Aliev bass Giuseppe Verdi Symphony Chorus and Orchestra, Milan / Riccardo Chailly
Decca 467 280-2DH (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000

The Pater noster and Ave Maria of 1880 and the 'Libera me' from the composite Messa per Rossini (later the bases from which Verdi developed the full Requiem) are clearly enough established in the canon, if rarely performed or recorded. The remaining five works, notably the Messa solenne, are all pieces dating from his late teens and twenties. Though in these youthful pieces there are few, if any, indications of the mature opera-composer to come, they provide a fascinating view of the young Verdi's development. As the pupil of Busseto choirmaster Ferdinando Provesi, untraditional and anti-clerical in that role, he was led towards operatic models, with choral writing echoing Rossini ensembles.

The Messa solenne, sketched out in 1833 when Verdi was 20, but revised and performed only two years later, is, sadly, incomplete. The very opening of the first Kyrie sounds transition-like, a clearing of the throat before the main argument is put in an almost Beethovenian style. That brief movement is very square, and the lyrical setting of the 'Christe' in compound time is conventional too, but then in the second Kyrie, even briefer than the first, the natural vigour of the young Verdi emerges positively in sharply rhythmic choral writing.

The three movements of the Gloria are similarly variable in their inspiration. Generally, throughout these student pieces – including the two early Tantum ergo settings and the separate 'Qui tollis'– allegros are more striking than slow passages. Most Rossinian of all is the Laudate pueri, an ensemble piece with two tenor soloists and a bass joining the chorus, in which, after a jaunty flute solo, there is a full Rossini-like crescendo. If none of this music brings the sort of insights that, say, Berlioz's youthful inspirations so often do, it is consistently enjoyable, and warmly and incisively performed under Chailly by the Milan choir and orchestra as well as a splendid line-up of soloists, all fresh and clear. The soprano, Cristina Gallardo-Domâs, is the lovely soloist in the Ave Maria, written in 1880, heightening its anticipations of Desdemona's Willow song and 'Ave Maria' in Otello. Equally, the a cappella setting of the Pater noster, which precedes it, anticipates the last act of Otello. It makes one wonder why these two pieces for contrasted forces, designed to go together, are so neglected. Less surprising is the neglect of the 'Libera me', when in fact it is a draft for the great 'Libera me' in the Requiem. It is true that most of the ideas are already fully worked out, but the changes in detail make all the difference, notably the striking fortissimo chords with bass drum which introduce the 'Dies irae' in the later version. Excellent Decca sound, though the unaccompanied chorus in the Pater noster is rather distant.

Opera Choruses

Opera choruses: Nabucco – Gli arredi festivi giù cadano infranti; Va, pensiero, sull'ali dorate. I Lombardi – Gerusalem!; O Signore, dal tetto natio. Macbeth – Tre volte miagola; Patria oppressa. I masnadieri – Le rube, gli stupri. Rigoletto – Zitti zitti. Il trovatore – Vedi! Le fosche notturne spoglie; Squilli, echeggi la tromba guerriera. La traviata[a] – Noi siamo zingarelle ... Di Madride nio siam mattadori. Un ballo in maschera –Posa in pace. Don Carlos –Spuntato ecco il dì. Aida – Gloria all' Egitto. Otello –Fuoco di gioia. Requiem – Sanctus

[a]Marsha Waxman mez [a]David Huneryager, [a]Richard Cohn basses Chicago Symphony Chorus and Orchestra /Sir Georg Solti

Decca 430 226-2DH (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1989 ●

Verdi's choruses occupy a special place in is operas. They are invariably red-blooded and usually make a simple dramatic statement with great impact. The arresting 'Chorus of the Hebrew Slaves' ('Va, pensiero') from Nabucco is probably the best-known and most popular chorus in the entire operatic repertoire, immediately tugging at the heart-strings with its gentle opening cantilena, soon swelling out to a great climax. Solti shows just how to shape the noble melodic line, which soars with firm control, yet retaining the urgency and electricity in every bar. The dramatic contrasts at the opening of 'Gerusalem!' from I Lombardi are equally powerfully projected, and the brass again makes a riveting effect in 'Patria oppressa' from Macbeth . But, of course, not all Verdi choruses offer blood and thunder: the volatile 'Fire chorus' from Otello flickers with an almost visual fantasy, while the wicked robbers in I masnadieri celebrate their excesses gleefully, and with such rhythmic jauntiness that one cannot quite take them seriously. The 'Gypsies' chorus ' from La traviata has a nice touch of elegance, and the scherzo-like 'Sanctus', from the Requiem, which ends the concert, is full of joy. But it is the impact of the dramatic moments which is most memorable, not least the big triumphal scene from Aida, complete with the ballet music, to provide a diverse interlude in the middle. The recording is in the demonstration class.

Opera Duets

Otello – Già nella notte densa; Venga la morte!. Aida[a] – La fatal pietra; Morir si pura e bella; O terra addio[b]. Il trovatore[a] – Miserere ...Ah, che la morte ognora. Simon Boccanegra – Cielo di stelle orbato; Vieni a mirar la cerula. I vespri siciliani –Pensando a me!I Lombardi alla prima crociata[a] – Oh belle, a questa misera; All' armi!La traviata[a] – Libiamo, ne' lieti calici. Rigoletto – Ah! veglia, o donna; Signor ne principe; T'amo! T'amo; E il sol dell' anima; Addio, addio[c] . Don Carlo – E dessa!...Un detto, un sol; Vago sogno m'arrise; Ma lassù ci vedremo. I masnadieri – Qual mare, qual terra; Qui nel bosco?; Lassù risplendere.

Angela Gheorghiu sop Roberto Alagna ten [bc]Sara Mingardo mez [c]Brian Parsons, [c]Rodney Gibson tens [ab]London Voices; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra /Claudio Abbado

EMI 556656-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●●

This long, fascinating, highly ambitious recital, nothing less than a conspectus of Verdi's soprano-tenor duets, is executed with distinction on all sides. Gheorghiu deserves particular plaudits. It seems that nothing in Verdi (and indeed in much else) is beyond her capabilities. Her singing here, especially as Gilda, Aida and Desdemona, is so exquisite, the tone so warm and limpid, the phrasing so shapely as surely to melt any heart. Take, for example, Gilda's touching exchanges with Giovanna, herself sung by the superb mezzo Sara Mingardo, the whole of Aida's solo beginning 'Presago il core', with the soprano's warm lower register coming into play and that ultimate test, Desdemona's poised 'Amen'. Throughout, both musically and interpretatively, she simply cannot be faulted.

Neither she nor her husband is backward in coming forward with less hackneyed pieces, those from the early operas – try the section starting 'Ma un' iri di pace' in the Masnadieri duet, the two voices in ideal blend, phrases and tone sweetly shaded with the following cabaletta all light eagerness on both sides. Then there's plangent singing on both sides in the sad little piece from Vespri, though it's a pity they did not attempt this in the original French. Here and throughout Alagna is his customary self, assured (a few over-pressed high notes, some unwritten, apart), impassioned, thoughtful and accurate in his phraseology, nowhere more so than in the parts he is unlikely as yet to take on stage – Radames and Otello. Even more important in so many passages, Alagna finds the right mezzo-piano, where heavier tenors have to sing forte , notably in the closing phrases where Otello wafts his love of Desdemona on to the night air – a moment of sheer magic.

Abbado and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra are at their peak of achievement and the recording catches these voices in their full glory, making this a most desirable issue.

Opera Arias

Roberto Alagna

Luisa Miller – Oh! fede negar potessi ...Quando le sere al placido. I Lombardi alla prima crociata – La mia letizia infondere. Aida – Se quel guerrier ...Celeste Aida. Ernani[f] – Mercè, dilette amici ...Come rugiada al cespite ...O tu che l 'alma adora. Un ballo in maschera – Forse la soglia ...Ma se m'è forza perderti. Otello[bcde] –Dio! mi potevi; Niun mi tema. La forza del destino – Prelude, Act 3; La vita è inferno ...O, tu che in seno. Macbeth – O figli, o figli miei!...Ah, la paterna mano. Jérusalem – L 'Emir auprès de lui ...Je veux encore entendre. Il trovatore[af] – Ah! si, ben mio ...Di quella pira.

Roberto Alagna ten with [a]Angela Gheorghiu sop [b]Andrew Busher ten [c]James Bobby bar [d]Richard Fallas, [e]Noel Mann basses [f]London Voices; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra /Claudio Abbado

EMI 556567-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●

Alagna here shows, in the most demanding programme imaginable, that there is little if anything wrong with his technique and a great deal right with his sense of Verdian style. Indeed, he takes the score as his bible. That is evident, for instance, in his treatment of Otello. In the great Act 3 monologue, besides thinking imself into the Moor's deep well of despondency at this juncture of the tragedy, evinced in a slightly juddering tone, he sings the opening passage as written, staying on the A flat and E flat, not going for unwanted melodrama. Then the cantilena is sung with the appropriate touch of pained nobility. In the Death scene he finds the right pent-up voice for 'Come sei pallida' and the repeated 'Desdemona', then sings 'Or morendo' with a pp on the high G, as Verdi enjoins.

So much else in the recital is just as thoughtfully interpreted. He solves the problem of the high B flat at the end of 'Celeste Aida' by starting it mezzo-forte and shading it away affectingly in a well-executed diminuendo, having sung the whole aria in a suitably poetic manner. Alagna is the brigand to the life in Ernani 's introductory aria. Riccardo's (or if you like Gustaf's) Act 3 aria is charged with emotion, the tone properly plaintive and darkened for the middle section. Then there's perhaps the most taxing aria for tenor in all Verdi: Alvaro's 'O, tu che in seno' from Forza. Following the most eloquent playing by the Berlin Philharmonic's clarinet in the long introduction, Alagna catches the Inca's sense of longing in the recitative and then rises to the challenge of the aria's relentless tessitura with fine-grained, almost heroic tone. Nor does he shirk the high Cs in 'Di quella pira'.

The recording allows us to ear the full bloom of Alagna's voice, but occasionally the sound of the voice appears to stray or float around the sound spectrum, a disconcerting effect, but that's not enough of a distraction to prevent a strong recommendation.

Angela Gheorghiu

Aida – Qui Radames verrà; O patria mia. Un ballo in maschera – Morrò, ma prima in grazia. Don Carlo – Tu che le vanità. La forza del destino – Pace, pace, mio Dio. Otello a – Era più calmo?; Mia madre aveva; Piangea cantando; Ave Maria. Rigoletto – Gualtier Maldè ...Caro nome. Simon Boccanegra – Come in quest'ora bruna. Il trovatore[b] – Che più t'arresti?... Tacea la notte placida ...Di tale amor. I vespri siciliani – Mercè, dilette amiche

Angela Gheorghiu sop [a]Laura Polverelli, [b]Tiziana Tramonti mezzos Giuseppe Verdi Symphony Orchesra, Milan/Riccardo Chailly

Decca 466 952-2DH (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included

Recorded 1998-99 ●●●

So much is enthralling in this superbly executed recital that it is hard to know where to begin. In some respects Elisabetta's long scene from Don Carlo is a template for everything. There you hear the spinto sound that is just about ideal for the long-breathed phrases at the start; the floated tone and voce portando in the remembrances of happier days in France; finally, in the agitated section, comes the glottal attack so reminiscent of great Verdi sopranos from the past. As important as any of these attributes is Gheorghiu's ability to think herself from nowhere into a new character. All Elisabetta's torment of the soul is there. Callas is an obvious influence at certain key moments, and the reading need fear nothing by comparison. Montserrat Caballé in the complete Don Carlo (EMI) is another great singer recollected, but Gheorghiu, as sensitive as the Spanish soprano, as the more appropriate voice.

'O patria mia' is again just about ideal, with the difficult close nicely encompassed. One notices here, too, the acuity with words, the wonderful control of breath, the poise of line. Throughout the programme, Chailly gives not only considerate support but also helps by establishing tempos that never drag. Each aria flows easily and naturally, effects all the better for being made within a firmly set context. Gheorghiu's warmth of feeling and tone informs the Boccanegra Amelia's sea-influenced thoughts, but here, and possibly for Gilda (a poor note near the end of 'Caro nome' should have been re-taken), a slightly brighter timbre would be preferable. The prayer of that other Amelia, the erring wife of King Gustavus in Ballo, adumbrates all her desperation. Better still are the even more desperate thoughts of the Forza Leonora in extremis, an interpretation to rank with the most compelling on disc.

At last, sated with so much sure artistry, we reach Desdemona. The Willow song flows beautifully in voice and orchestra, and with so many shades and colourings used the 'Ave Maria' has a beseeching, inward quality. Scotto or de los Angeles finds even more pathos in the scena, but none sings with quite the same degree of security and natural ease. The Milan recordings, at two sessions and venues, are excellent.

Julia Varady

Nabucco – Ben io t'invenni ...Anch'io dischiuso un giorno. Il trovatore – Tacea la notte placida ...Di tale amor; Timor di me?...D'amor sull'ali rosee. La traviata –E strano!... Ah, fors'è lui ...Follie! Sempre libera[a]; Teneste la promessa ...Addio del passato. Un ballo in maschera – Ecco l'orrido campo ...Ma dall'arido stelo divulsa ...Morrò, ma prima in grazia. La forza del destino – Pace, pace, mio Dio

Julia Varady sop [a]Lothar Odinius ten

Bavarian State Orchestra / Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau

Orfeo C186951 (51 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1995 ●

Varady endows these arias we have heard hundreds of times, and of which we all have our favourite memories and recordings, with renewed life through an art which is fully responsive, highly fastidious, lovely in the quality of its sound and individual in its timbre and inflection. The beauty of tone is evident first of all in its well-preserved purity (and Varady, born in 1941, is of an age when normally allowances have to be made). Hers is not a full-bodied, rich Ponselle-like voice, but she makes wonderfully effective use of her resources, which include a surprisingly strong lower register and an upward range that (as we hear) easily encompasses the high D flat and has an E flat available. She is dramatic in style yet also thoroughly accomplished in her scales, trills and other fioriture. Her first Trovatore aria, for instance, includes the cabaletta with its full complement of technical brilliances. The musical instinct seems almost infallible – a 'wrong' portamento or rubato always irritates and here everything seems just right. A remarkable sensitivity is at work throughout.

The orchestra is conducted by Fischer-Dieskau, Varady's husband, and here too is a fine example of a positive, non-routine collaboration, the pacing and shading of the orchestral parts so frequently having something specific to offer (for example, in the letter passage from La traviata). The recording is well balanced.

Aida

Anna Tomowa-Sintow sop Aida; Brigitte Fassbaender mez Amneris; Plácido Domingo ten Radames; Siegmund Nimsgern bar Amonasro; Robert Lloyd bass Ramfis; Nikolaus Hillebrand bass King; Norbert Orth ten Messenger; Marianne Seibel sop Priestess; Bavarian State Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Riccardo Muti

Orfeo d'Or ② C583 022I (143 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ

Notes included. Recorded live at the National Theatre, Munich in 1979 ●

Riccardo Muti's 1974 studio recording on EMI (listed below), with Caballé, Cossotto and Domingo, has been one of the steady recommendations for this work on CD. This live account from 1979 in many, but not all ways, surpasses the studio performance.

In the first place, Muti's reading has matured to the extent of being less wilful – for instance, his tempo for the closing scene's 'O terra addio' is the better for being more orthodox – and even more persuasive in terms of fulfilling Verdi's exacting demands on all concerned. Seldom if ever has this reviewer heard the full panoply and subtlety of the composer's scoring, especially the wonderful wind writing, so clearly expounded. The chorus is also commendable in every respect.

Domingo, fine enough on EMI, here gives possibly his most responsive and exciting Radames on disc and that's saying something. In tremendous voice, he produces magic towards the end of 'Celeste Aida' with the triple pianissimo Verdi asks for but seldom gets, and throughout he make every effort to fulfil Verdi's demand for dolce and pp effects. It hardly needs saying that he was at the time at the peak of his amazing powers.

Tomowa-Sintow provides most of the heft combined with sensibility that the title part calls for. Although she cannot manage Caballé's many exquisite moments when she floats her tone on high, she has the firmer, stronger voice to ride the orchestra at climactic moments. One doesn't feel quite the strong identification with the part that Fassbaender undoubtedly gives to her first Amneris.

Fassbaender is very much her idiosyncratic, wholly compelling self, rising to heights of music-drama in Amneris's great Act 4 scene, the repeated 'io stessa... lo getta' rending the heart. This is an interpretation to savour.

The recording, although the voices are sometimes a little distanced, catches the high excitement of a first night in the opera house. Applause is never intrusive, scenery change only once so. This is as gripping an account of the piece of any on disc.

Aida 🄷
Maria Callas sop Aida; Fedora Barbieri mez Amneris; Richard Tucker ten Radames; Tito Gobbi bar Amonasro; Giuseppe Modesti bass Ramphis; Nicola Zaccaria bass King of Egypt; Elvira Galassi sop Priestess; Franco Ricciardi ten Messenger; Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Tullio Serafin
EMI Callas Edition mono ② 556316-2 Ⓕ
(144 minutes:ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1955 ◉◉

Aida, the daughter of the Ethiopian king, is a prisoner at the Egyptian court where she falls in love with Radames, an Egyptian captain of the guard; Amneris, the Egyptian princess, also loves him. The tensions between these characters are rivetingly portrayed and explored, and the gradual build-up to Aida's and Radames's union in death is paced with the sureness of a master composer.

Callas's Aida is an assumption of total understanding and conviction; the growth from a slave-girl torn between love for her homeland and Radames, to a woman whose feelings transcend life itself represents one of the greatest operatic undertakings ever committed to disc. Alongside her is Fedora Barbieri, an Amneris palpable in her agonised mixture of love and jealousy – proud yet human. Tucker's Radames is powerful and Gobbi's Amonasro quite superb –a portrayal of comparable understanding to stand alongside Callas's Aida.

Tullio Serafin is quite simply ideal, and though the recording cannot compete with modern versions (it was never, in fact, a model of clarity), nowhere can it dim the brilliance of the creations conjured up by this classic cast.

Aida
Birgit Nilsson sop Aida; Grace Bumbry mez 💰 Amneris; Franco Corelli ten Radames; Mario Sereni bar Amonasro; Bonaldo Giaiotti bass Ramfis; Ferruccio Mazzoli bass King; Piero de Palma ten Messenger; Mirella Fiorentini mez Priestess; Chorus and Orchestra of Rome Opera / Zubin Mehta
HMV Classics ② HMVD5 73410-2 Ⓑ
(141 minutes:ADD). Recorded 1966 ◉

In the 1950s and 1960s EMI made a series of what have become classics with Rome Opera forces that have Verdi in their blood. This Aida, greeted with reservations then, now seems like manna from heaven in a world starved of true Verdian voices. Above all there is Corelli's truly spinto tenor, a thrilling sound in itself, and used, as Radames (one of the most exciting on disc), with far more sensitivity than is usually allowed for. Nilsson matches Corelli in vocal bite and gets inside the character, even if she is a touch unwieldy at times. As on stage, Bumbry is an imposing, spirited Amneris, Sereni makes an above-average Amonasro and Giaiotti sounds like Pinza as Ramfis – praise cannot be higher. Mehta conducts with a deal of dramatic verve. The recording is excellent.

Additional recommendation
Aida
Caballé Aida Domingo Radames Cossotto Amneris Chorus of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden; New Philharmonia Orchestra;Trumpeters of the Royal Military School of Music, Kneller Hall / Muti
EMI Great Recordings of the Century ③ 567613-2 (148 minutes: ADD: 1/87^{R}). Highlights available on EMI Encore Ⓑ 574759-2 Ⓜ

Montserrat Caballé gives her most successful Verdi performance on record, full of those vocal subtleties and beauties that inform her best singing, while Riccardo Muti gives an impassioned account of the score.

Alzira

Marina Mescheriakova sop Alzira; Ramón Vargas ten Zamoro; Paolo Gavanelli bass Gusmano; Slobodan Stankovic bass Alvaro; Wolfgang Barta bass Ataliba; Jovo Reljin ten Ovando; Torsten Kerl ten Otumbo; Jana Iliev mez Zuma; Geneva Grand Théâtre Chorus; Suisse Romande Orchestra / Fabio Luisi
Philips ② 464 628-2PH2 (92 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included

With the possible exception of Un giorno di regno no Verdi opera has been more disparaged than Alzira; even its composer thought it beyond saving. It's generally agreed that the plot is the problem: a play by Voltaire with every feature of interest ruthlessly filleted out, and equipped by Verdi – writing in feverish haste, interrupted by illness – with music that moves bewilderingly fast. So why does it here seem so intriguing, so flawed yet so rich?

On the face of it this new recording looks under-cast. Vargas is a lyric tenor in a role tailored to a singer famed for his forceful declamation; Gavanelli has a baritone that tends to become unsteady under pressure. But Fabio Luisi treats both singers with the greatest understanding. Neither is obliged, even momentarily, to force, and the consequence is that Vargas can sing with real eloquence, growing in the process to fit his role, while Gavanelli and Luisi find many hints of Gusmano's change of heart in his earlier music, hints that are perfectly justified by both text and score. The result is that his dying blessing to the lovers whose happiness he had thwarted is genuinely moving, and in the duet in which he demands Alzira's hand as the price of her lover's life there is a distinct impression of him forcing himself against his will to be brutal. Alzira herself is less involving, and Mescheriakova gives her vocal glamour but not much more, though even here Luisi's watchful care allows her to float lyrical phrases as well as glitter in defiant coloratura.

Luisi shows a real understanding of Verdi's early style and proves that Alzira has a curious but distinct character of its own. The older Orfeo recording is fine, too, with Ileana Cotrubas a more touching Alzira than Mescheriakova. José Carreras, though, is more taxed and less convincing as Zamoro than Vargas. Chorus and orchestra are both excellent; the balance of the recording is outstanding.

Un ballo in maschera

Maria Callas sop Amelia; Giuseppe di Stefano ten Riccardo; Ettore Bastianini bar Renato; Eugenia Ratti sop Oscar; Giulietta Simionato contr Ulrica; Antonio Cassinelli bass Sam; Marco Stefanoni bass Tom; Giuseppe Morresi bar Silvano; Angelo Mercuriali ten Judge; La Scala, Milan Chorus and Orchestra / Gianandrea Gavazzeni H
EMI mono ② 567918-2 (131 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live at La Scala Theatre, Milan in 1957 ●●

This set comes from live performances at La Scala in the mid-1950s when the diva was at the height of her powers. Callas gives here an even more vital performance than on her studio recorded set. It was Callas's particular genius to find exactly the appropriate mode of expression for every role she tackled. Here we have Callas the tormented, guilty wife. But she also gives us a hundred different individual inflections to reflect the emotion of the moment: indeed, as John Steane points out in one of his illuminating notes, it is often a small aside that reveals as much about the character she is portraying as a big set-piece.

The context of an evening in the theatre makes this a more arresting, vivid interpretation on all sides than its studio counterpart of a year earlier, with Gianandrea Gavazzeni galvanising his fine cast to great things. As the late John Ardoin put it in his study of Callas's recordings: 'The La Scala performance is sung with more vivid colours, with accents more etched and a general intensification of Verdi's drama.' Here the sound picture is appreciably superior to that on earlier live sets which capture Callas in other roles at La Scala. The irresistible Di Stefano is the soul of vital declamation as Riccardo. Ettore Bastianini's forthright Renato, the only role he sang in London and one of his best in an all too short career, and Giulietta Simionato's classic Ulrica are also huge assets. Other roles are filled with house singers of the day. All in all, an unbeatable set.

Un ballo in maschera H
Giuseppe di Stefano ten Riccardo; Tito Gobbi bar Renato; Maria Callas sop Amelia; Fedora Barbieri mez Ulrica; Eugenia Ratti sop Oscar; Ezio Giordano bass Silvano; Silvio Maionica bass Samuel; Nicola Zaccaria bass Tom; Renato Ercolani ten Judge; Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Antonino Votto
EMI Callas Edition mono ② 556320-2 Ⓕ
(130 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded in 1956 ●●

Ballo manages to encompass a vein of light-hearted frivolity (represented by the page, Oscar) within the confines of a serious drama of love, infidelity, noble and ignoble sentiments. None of the more recent recordings has quite caught the opera's true spirit so truly as this one under Votto's unerring direction. Callas has not been surpassed in delineating Amelia's conflict of feelings and loyalties, nor has di Stefano been equalled in the sheer ardour of his singing as Riccardo. Add to that no less a singer than Tito Gobbi as Renato, at first eloquent in his friendship to his ruler, then implacable in his revenge when he thinks Riccardo has stolen his wife. Fedora Barbieri is full of character as the soothsayer Ulrica, Eugenia Ratti a sparky Oscar. It is an unbeatable line-up.

Un ballo in maschera
Plácido Domingo ten Riccardo; Piero Cappuccilli bar Renato; Martina Arroyo sop Amelia; Fiorenza Cossotto mez Ulrica; Reri Grist sop Oscar; Giorgio Giorgetti bass Silvano; Gwynne Howell bass Samuel; Richard Van Allan bass Tom; Kenneth Collins ten Judge; David Barrett bar Servant; Haberdashers'Aske's School Girls' Choir; New Philharmonia Orchestra; Chorus of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden / Riccardo Muti
EMI 566510-2 (127 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1975 ●

This is the Ballo which, above all else, glories in Muti as an exuberant man of the theatre. The impetus with which he whips up the constituent parts of an ensemble into the vortex, and the juxtaposition of blasting tutti with slim, sweetly phrased woodwind detail, so typical of this opera, hits the ear more thrillingly than ever. So does the equally characteristic tugging undercurrent of the ballo against the intrigue of the maschera, activated by Muti with such acute perception and élan.

He provides pliant, springing support for all his singers too: Domingo, a warm, generous Riccardo, is every bit as happy with Muti as with Abbado. The same cannot be said of Martina Arroyo, the weak link on this recording. Dramatically forceful, but curiously cool and detached from the expressive nuancing of her part, she has little of the vulnerability of a Ricciarelli (Abbado), or the individuality of a Price (Solti). But, although this mid-price recording may not offer the most consistently luxurious vocal banquet, none the less, with Cossotto's stentorian Ulrica and Cappuccilli's staunch, resilient Renato, its strong sense of theatrical presence and its dramatic integrity will make it the chosen version for many new collectors.

Additional recommendation

Un ballo in maschera

Ricciarelli Amelia Domingo Riccardo Bruson Renato Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Abbado

DG ② 453 148-2GTA2 (127 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Notes included

A satisfying and unified performance, largely because Abbado and his La Scala forces give us the sense of a real theatrical experience. Ricciarelli and Domingo give involved and expressive performances.

Don Carlo

Plácido Domingo ten Don Carlo; Montserrat Caballé sop Elisabetta di Valois; Shirley Verrett mez Eboli; Sherrill Milnes bar Rodrigo; Ruggero Raimondi bass Filippo II; Giovanni Foiani bass Grand Inquisitor; Simon Estes bass-bar Monk; Delia Wallis mez Tebaldo; Ryland Davies ten Conte di Lerma; John Noble bar Herald; Maria-Rosa del Campo sop Voice from Heaven; Ambrosian Opera Chorus; Royal Opera House Orchestra, Covent Garden /Carlo Maria Giulini

EMI Great Recordings of the Century ③

567401-2 (209 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Text and translation included. Recorded 1970 ●●●

From the day that Giulini conducted the now legendary production of Don Carlo at Covent Garden in 1958, a recording of the opera by him looked a must. In fact, it was to be 12 years before EMI took the plunge, but the set was worth waiting for: it's the five-act version in Italian, without the cuts made at the Royal Opera, and well recorded and handsomely cast. Giulini himself had slowed down since the live performances, but the blend of majesty and lyric beauty that he brings to the opera is hard to resist. The music glows warmly in his hands, as befits one of Verdi's most human dramas.

His cast gathers together five of the leading singers of the 1970s. In particular, the trio of Caballé, Domingo and Milnes seemed to be rather predictably the names on almost every Italian opera recording at the time, but how glad we would be to have young singers like them today. Caballé, though occasionally sounding blowsy, is exquisite whenever quiet singing is called for, and Domingo is at his golden best throughout. Their murmured farewells at the monastery of San Giusto in Act 5 have never been surpassed. Verrett is a fiery Eboli (although it is a shame Giulini did not give her more pace in 'O don fatale'), and Milnes provides generous-hearted singing as Rodrigo. It is good to have an Italian bass as Philip II, but Raimondi lacks the black tone and fearsome presence of his notable predecessor in the role, Boris Christoff. Lovers of the opera will want to investigate the four-act version under Santini and also the five-act version in French under Pappano, both on EMI (which has more or less cornered the market for this opera). Otherwise, 30 years on, Giulini's splendid performance is as satisfying as any, probably still the number one recommendation.

Don Carlos

Roberto Alagna ten Don Carlos; Karita Mattila sop Elisabeth; Waltraud Meier mez Eboli; Thomas Hampson bar Rodrigue; José van Dam bass-bar Philippe II; Eric Halfvarson bass Grand Inquisitor; Csaba Airizer bass Monk; Anat Efraty sop Thibault; Scot Weir ten Comte de Lerme, Herald; Donna Brown sop Voice from Heaven; Chorus of the Théâtre du Châtelet; Orchestre de Paris / Antonio Pappano

EMI ③ 556152-2 (206 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Notes, text and translation included.

Recorded live in 1996 ●●

This is an eloquent and inspiriting performance of Verdi's singular music-drama depicting private tragedy within public conflict; and a recording of the French version. With regard to the text, Pappano excludes the opening scene for the chorus at Fontainebleau, cut by the composer before the first night; he includes the important dress-changing scene at the start of Act 3 (which explains Carlos's ardour towards the 'wrong' woman), a snippet of the Elisabeth-Eboli duet in Act 4, and the whole of the Carlos-Philippe duet after Posa's death (the theme of which was reused in the Requiem). Pappano also chooses some of the alternative settings, notably in the Rodrigue-Philippe duet in Act 2 and the farewell encounter of Elisabeth and Carlos in Act 5, amendments that Verdi made for the neglected 1872 Naples revision. Neither seems an improvement.

Pappano's is a subtly shaped, superbly paced and vital interpretation from start to finish. He is as able to encompass the delicacies of the Veil song and the succeeding exchanges as he is to purvey the grand, tragic passion of Elisabeth and Carlos in Act 2, the intricacies and changes of feeling in the colloquy between Rodrigue and Philippe, the terrible menace of the Grand Inquisitor. The orchestra supports him with playing of dedication and sensitivity. Giulini's noble conducting of the Italian version (reviewed above) comes to mind when listening to Pappano and his players. Praise cannot be higher.

By and large he has singers who can sustain his vision. Mattila sings a lovely Elisabeth. Her soft-grained yet strong tone and exquisite phrasing in all her solos and duets are balm to the ear. By Mattila's side Alagna offers an equally involving Carlos, presenting a more vulnerable picture of the unbalanced infante. His is a fully rounded portrayal that will please his many admirers, the difficult tessitura seldom troubling him and his French, of course, is impeccable. As Rodrigue, Marquis de Posa, Hampson also has idiomatic French. His mellifluous baritone well suits this French version and he provides many moments of vocal beauty. Arguably, the death needs a more imposing voice but the added decibels can easily be borne to appreciate Hampson's intelligence. Van Dam nicely balances the exterior authority and interior agony of Philippe, everywhere in command of line, language, phrase.

The recording catches the frisson of the theatrical experience; everything is clear and in its place, and the balance with the pit sounds natural. This is a landmark in the Don Carlos discography.

Ernani

Mario Del Monaco ten Ernani; Anita Cerquetti sop Elvira; Ettore Bastianini bar Don Carlo; Boris Christoff bass De Silva; Luciana Boni sop Giovanna; Athos Cesarini ten Don Riccardo; Aurelian Neagu bass Iago; Maggio Musicale Fiorentino Chorus and Orchestra / Dimitri Mitropoulos 🄷
Bel Canto mono ② BCS5011 (118 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes included. Recorded live in 1957 ●

This is a performance to delight Verdians, Florence seriously challenging its La Scala rival on EMI. The calibre and strength of the singing here reminds one how often today we put up with third-best. Each of the four principals not only has a voice of essential power but also has Verdian style as part of his/her interpretative make-up. Furthermore they are led by the legendary Mitropoulos, such a force for good at the Maggio Musicale until his untimely death. He easily encompasses the cut and thrust, the rudimentary fervour of one of Verdi's earliest successes, combining at once rude rhythms with lyrical breadth of phrase in supporting is admirable cast and firmly controlling the many ensembles, and his orchestra responds with eagerness to is positive beat.

Cerquetti, whose brief but distinguished career came to an abrupt end not long after this performance took place, had an evenly projected spinto soprano and used it with such command that she was at the time spoken of as Tebaldi's equal. She encompasses with confidence her taxing aria and cabaletta at the beginning of the work and makes the most of what little the composer offers his soprano thereafter, shining particularly in the final trio, where Verdi is at his most inspired. As the eponymous hero, Del Monaco shows conclusively that he was more than the stentorian tenor he was often portrayed as being in his day, combining, in the lovers' brief moment of repose in Act 2, with Cerquetti's Elvira in a quietly reflective way. Of course, where the supposed bandit breathes fire, Del Monaco is there with the appropriately flashing tone that made him so popular.

Verdi gives his baritone, Don Carlo, the meatiest music. Bastianini, then at the height of his powers, sings all his solos with resplendent and keen tone. Although he doesn't provide all the subtleties of line and colour Bruson achieves for Muti, Bastianini touches a real note of eloquence at 'O sommo Carlo' in Act 3. As old Silva, Christoff is his imposing self, rivalling his younger Bulgarian colleague, Ghiaurov, on the version from La Scala: both are excellent, but Christoff makes more of the text.

Mitropoulos sanctions a few regrettable cuts not tolerated by Muti. In other respects there's little to choose between these two live performances. For its age the sound on this 'new' version is remarkably good and well worth investigating at mid-price.

Ernani
Plácido Domingo ten Ernani; Mirella Freni sop Elvira; Renato Bruson bar Don Carlo; Nicolai Ghiaurov bass De Silva; Jolanda Michieli sop Giovanna; Gianfranco Manganotti ten Don Riccardo; Alfredo Giacomotti bass Iago; Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Riccardo Muti
EMI ② 747083-8 (128 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live in 1982

Renato Bruson's Don Carlo is an assumption that is as gripping dramatically as it is vocally. In his portrayal more than anywhere, the musical tension of Ernani becomes manifest, and everywhere Bruson offers superb Verdi singing. Domingo's Ernani is hardly less impressive and he benefits from being caught live on stage. His opening aria and cabaletta are full of delicate touches and obedience to the dynamic marks. In the last act, his recitative, 'Tutto ora tace d'intorno', has great pathos, and his contributions to the final trio an overwhelming eloquence. Here, too, Freni achieves most, the etching in of 'Il riso del tuo volto fa ch' io veda', a brief utterance of happiness, most affecting, and her desperate appeals to Silva for mercy sung with brio.

In her opening aria and cabaletta, the famous 'Ernani, Ernani', too much is asked of a voice not really meant by nature for this kind of heavy duty, but none can quite match the sorrow and heartbreak of Elvira's predicament that Freni manages in the theatre. Ghiaurov, rusty as his voice had become, creates a great impression of dignity and implacable strength, and many of those qualities are carried over into his singing. 'Infelice' is delivered with mature nobility, 'Ah, io l'amo' is intensely moving. Ghiaurov is denied Silva's probably spurious cabaletta. Otherwise the work is given complete.

Muti conducts the score in exemplary manner. He has learnt when to allow his singers licence to phrase with meaning and when to press on. The La Scala chorus gives us the genuine sound of Italian voices in full flight, sounding much more inside their various assumptions than their rivals. The audience is occasionally in evidence, as are the on-stage effects, but the atmosphere of being in an opera house and taking part, as it were, in a real occasion has all the advantages over the aseptic feeling of a studio.

Falstaff

Tito Gobbi bar Falstaff; Rolando Panerai bar Ford; 🄷 Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Alice Ford; Anna Moffo sop Nannetta; Luigi Alva ten Fenton; Fedora Barbieri mez Mistress Quickly; Nan Merriman mez Meg Page; Tomaso Spataro ten Dr Caius; Renato Ercolani ten Bardolph; Nicola Zaccaria bass Pistol; Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan

EMI Great Recordings of the Century ② 567083-2 Ⓜ
(120 minutes: ADD).Notes, text and translation
included. Recorded 1956 ○○○

This Falstaff still stands (with Toscanini) peerless in the catalogue. At its centre stands Tito Gobbi, and his is a presence large enough to encompass both the lord and the jester, the sensuous and the sensual, and the deep seriousness as well as the deep absurdity of his vision. Few Falstaffs have such a measure of the simplicity of his first monosyllables in the bustle around him; few find the poise as well as the confusion within his music. Karajan's recording is incomparable in its quartet of merry wives. Schwarzkopf's Alice radiates both the 'gioia nell'aria' and the 'gioia nel'cor' of Verdi's writing, Fedora Barbieri's redoubtable Mistress Quickly, with her stentorian cries of 'Povera donna!', puts other readings in the shade; Anna Moffo's Nannetta, perfectly matched in timbre and agility with Luigi Alva's Fenton, is a constant delight. It is, above all, their corporate presence which works at such a distinctively higher level. Rolando Panerai is a magnificent Ford; his 'E sogno? o realtà?' is a high point of the performance.

This 1956 recording has been discreetly and skilfully doctored, but a little background hiss does remain. But one doesn't actually end up hearing it. This great recording is a-flutter with pungent solo detail, realising, with Nannetta, that the world is 'tutto deliro, sospiro e riso'. The episodes of the opera, its exits and entrances, its subjects and counter-subjects, pass with the unique sensibility of Verdi's final great exuberant fugue of life.

Falstaff
Bryn Terfel bass-bar Falstaff; Thomas Hampson bar Ford; Adrianne Pieczonka sop Alice Ford; Dorothea Röschmann sop Nannetta; Daniil Shtoda ten Fenton; Larissa Diadkova mez Mistress Quickly; Stella Doufexis mez Meg Page; Enrico Facini ten Doctor Caius; Anthony Mee ten Bardolph; Anatoli Kotscherga bass Pistol; Berlin Radio Chorus; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG ② 471 194-2GH2 (113 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 2000

In the event, Terfel's portrayal of the title-role doesn't quite live up to expectations; though the singing is extremely fine, this perhaps is really a Falstaff for Terfel fans only. Somehow he's too knowing and too self-conscious; in the two monologues, for instance, he sometimes allows us to see him, as it were, without the make-up. But such moments pass and there's plenty else to listen to. This is a well-cast recording (much better than the recent one under Gardiner with its vocally ill-focused Falstaff). The wives are excellent, especially Larissa Diadkova as Quickly, and the Nannetta, Dorothea Röschmann, is among the best of all. Thomas Hampson as Ford is perhaps not such a good idea – his voice doesn't have a mean streak in it. But the comics do well and the interesting Daniil Shtoda is a distinctive Fenton. This array of talent is recorded with little sense of presence compared to their predecessors, most notably those of the Karajan/Gobbi set of 1956 and the Solti/Evans of 1963. The aural vision is clear enough; it's just rather reduced and remote.

Falstaff is of course a musical score of the rarest quality, and you won't hear it much better sung and played than it is here. Abbado conducts with a full appreciation of the wit and tenderness, energy and refinement, all justly balanced. But in this of all operas it is essential to 'see' the stage. The characters must be there before the ears which are your eyes. Otherwise (among other consequences) you don't get the fun of it – and if it's fun you want there's always Toscanini!

Falstaff H
Giuseppe Valdengo bar Falstaff; Frank Guarrera bar Ford; Herva Nelli sop Alice Ford; Teresa Stich-Randall sop Nannetta; Antonio Madasi ten Fenton; Cloe Elmo contr Mistress Quickly; Nan Merriman mez Meg Page; Gabor Carelli ten Dr Caius; John Carmen Rossi ten Bardolph; Norman Scott bass Pistol; Robert Shaw Chorale; NBC Symphony Orchestra /Arturo Toscanini
RCA Gold Seal mono ② 74321 72372-2
(117 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1950 ○○○

This Falstaff remains, as it always has been, one of the half a dozen greatest opera sets ever recorded. It is a miracle in every respect. How Toscanini loved Verdi and how he strained every sinew to fulfil this amazing score's variety in line, feeling and colour. Whether it is the clarity and discipline of the ensembles, the extraordinary care taken over orchestral detail or the alert control of dynamics, Toscanini is supreme, yet nothing is done for effect's sake; everything seems natural, inevitable, unforced, as though the score was being created anew before us with chamber-music finesse – and the atmosphere of a live performance adds to the feeling of immediacy. Nobody dares, or seems to want, to interrupt the magic being laid before him. Toscanini in his old age is matching the subtlety and vitality of the composer's own Indian summer – or one might be tempted to say spring, so delicate and effervescent does the scoring sound.

If, vocally, the main glory is the wonderful sense of ensemble gained through hours of hard rehearsals, individual contributions are almost all rewarding. Indeed, Valdengo's Falstaff, under Toscanini's tutelage, has not been surpassed on disc even by Gobbi. Flexibility, charm, exactness, refinement inform his beautifully and wisely sung portrayal. He is no less pointed and subtle in his encounter with Frank Guarrera's imposing Ford. Another great joy of the set is the women's ensemble, their contribution the very epitome of smiling chatter. The Alice, Meg and Nannetta (Stich-Randall – none better), all sound, as they were, fresh and youthful. Herva Nelli is a lively and delightful Alice and Cloe Elmo's Quickly is as rich and ripe of voice and diction as any on disc, though a trifle coarse at times. The Fenton is sweet and Italianate in tone, but not as stylish as others. The smaller roles are all very much part of the team.

This set should certainly be a source of delightful revelation to a new generation of collectors who may have a wrong-headed view of what Toscanini was about. The remastering gives it clearer, more immediate sound than ever heard before from the originals.

Additional recommendation
Falstaff
Trimarchi Falstaff Servile Ford Faulkner Alice Ford Dilbèr Nannetta Comencini Fenton Chorus and Orchestra of Hungarian State Opera / Humburg
Naxos ② 8 660050/1 (120 minutes: DDD: recorded 1996). Notes and synopsis included Ⓢ

Naxos's set does a good job at challenging the best in the field. Humburg strikes just the right balance between the high spirits and the delicacy in Verdi's score. Trimarchi as Falstaff gives a reading full of ripe understanding; his voice lies, as the role requires, ideally poised between baritone and bass. All in all, a very lovable portrait. This is a Falstaff to savour and one that will bear repetition.

La forza del destino

La forza del destino (1869 version)
Martina Arroyo sop Leonora; Carlo Bergonzi ten Don Alvaro; Piero Cappuccilli bar Don Carlo; Ruggero Raimondi bass Padre Guardiano; Biancamaria Casoni mez Preziosilla; Geraint Evans bar Melitone; Antonio Zerbini bass Marchese; Florindo Andreolli ten Trabuco; Mila Cova mez Curra; Virgilio Carbonari bar Mayor; Derek Hammond-Stroud bar Surgeon; Ambrosian Opera Chorus; Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Lamberto Gardelli
EMI Opera ③ 567124-2 (168 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1969 ●

This opera demands an array of principal singers who need to be skilled in an unusually wide range of vocal and dramatic skills. It is a 'chase' opera in which Carlo pursues Alvaro and Leonora through two countries, through cloister and convent, through scenes popular and martial, all treated on the most expansive scale. It is dominated by its series of magnificent duets that are composed so that the music marches with the development of situation and character.

Gardelli's reissue is an excellent mid-price buy. It features Bergonzi, that prince among Verdi tenors, as an exemplary and appealing Alvaro, and Piero Cappuccilli – like Bergonzi at the peak of his powers when this set was made – as a full-blooded and Italianate Carlo. In the three all-important duets, their voices blend ideally. Leonora was the most successful of Arroyo's recorded roles, and she sings here with a feeling and urgency appropriate to Leonora's desperate situation. Casoni's vital Preziosilla, Raimondi's grave but over-lugubrious Padre Guardiano and Sir Geraint's keenly characterised Melitone all complete a well-chosen cast. Over all presides Gardelli, a Verdi conductor with an instinctive feeling for the ebb and flow of his music.

La forza del destino (1862 version)
Galina Gorchakova sop Leonora; Gegam Grigorian ten Don Alvaro; Nikolai Putilin bar Don Carlo; Mikhail Kit bass Padre Guardiano; Olga Borodina mez Preziosilla; Georgy Zastavny bar Melitone; Askar Abdrazakov bass Marchese; Nikolai Gassiev ten Trabuco; Lia Shevtsova mez Curra; Gennadi Bezubenkov bass Mayor; Yuri Laptev ten Surgeon; Kirov Theatre Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips ③ 446 951-2PH3 (158 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1995

It is appropriate that the first recording of the first version of Forza should come from St Petersburg, where the work had its première in 1862. By and large the artists fare splendidly, four of the five principals enjoying the weight of voice and command of the appropriate style to make their roles tell. Gorchakova evinces the weight of voice, also the broad sweep of tone and line, that her solos demand. Added to that there is a feeling for dramatic situation. 'Pace, pace', for instance, is suitably filled with foreboding, the lustrous, dark timbre recalling that of Ponselle – and there can be no higher praise. Just once or twice, at the top, the voice becomes a shade strident, but it is an inter- pretation of formidable achievement.

